X-Bazin is a flesh-colored powder, delicately rose perfumed, exquisitely French in its daintiness, wonderfully clean and effective. It works like magic, leaving the skin smooth, white, cool, and free from all objectionable hair. After using X-Bazin, you will be delighted to notice how effectively the future growth of hair has been diminished. This is its chief advantage over shaving, which surely encourages further growth.

structed to edit all anti-Semitism from Brasol's material.

The Jew-hating of Dr. Houghton appears to have been sincere as well as energetic. During the war, while he was in military intelligence, he took it upon himself, according to information which I have from one of his subordinates, to investigate Jacob Schiff, Otto Kahn, Felix Warburg, the Rothschilds, Guggenheim, Samuel Untermyer, the Rev. Dr. Magnes and the Rev. Stephen Wise. In fact, this informant says that Dr. Houghton, as an American army officer, told this informant and others attached to his office, to investigate any Jew as long as he was prominent.

"The first big case I investigated for Dr. Houghton," runs a statement by this informant, "was the airplane investigation.

"I was ordered to proceed to Stamford, Conn., and investigate Gutzon Borglum, with reference to his activities with airplanes and was instructed to see if I could make a connection between Borglum and Jacob Schiff."

An early contact of Dr. Houghton's with the Russian crowd that led him into protocoling was with Miss De Bogory. Six months after we had gone into the war, Dr. Houghton took her into his office. It was through her that Dr. Houghton came into contact with the "Black Hundred Russians" who interested Dr. Houghton and the American Secret Service in the mysteries of the protocols. She investigated prominent Jews, and a statement which I have at hand from an investigator in Houghton's office says that "some of her friends were Lieutenant Brasol, Count Sasnovsky and Wallevitch." Wallevitch was on Houghton's staff.

Mr. Ford must realize by now that his set of "proofs" of the great Jewish conspiracy was a melodramatic forgery. Next month we shall give him a flagrant illustration of the way his anti-Jewish organization overlapped the anti-liberal war persecutions. We have in our possession information about Senator La Follette that should never have left the archives of the American Government. Henry Ford is a pacifist, Robert La Follette is a pacifist. Yet here we find the money of one used in the attempted hunting-down of the other.

Henry Ford, in his detective work, had three men who had been in the United States Secret Service. A document, fired up in war-time by the censor against Senator Robert Marion La Follette, found its way into the hands of the Ford investigators. How did they get this government property? See Hearst's International for October, ready September 20th.

LORENZO—In truth, Master, that coat of Venetian mail and those heavy gloves make you look like a Teuton warrior rather than a Florentine lover.

THE DUKE—By Saint Cosimo, you speak the truth! Bring me a doublet lined with sable, Neapolitan fashion, and perfumed gloves.

LORENZO—Are we going?

THE DUKE—Captain Cesena and Biomo, the Hungarian, Ferdinand the Andalusian, follow me.

Once in Lorenzo's room the Duke throws his sword on the bed and goes over to the fireplace. Lorenzo in the meantime ties the handle of the Duke's sword to the belt so that it cannot be unsheathed.

THE DUKE—What are you doing?

LORENZO—I'm hiding your sword under the pillow. It's just as well to be prepared for the worst, in affairs of this kind. But the woman, for whom you risk everything, must not suspect for a moment that you forgot her to think of your own safety.

THE DUKE—Do you think there's anything to fear here?

LORENZO—For the next few hours, I see no one but myself who could trouble you in any way.

THE DUKE—In that case, allow me to feel safe. I know your valor! How that fire cheered me! I was quite stiff with cold. (He takes off his cloak.) I've been told that Catterina is a good talker and knows her classics. The dust of old books sticks in my throat and I can't make love in metaphors. Tell her, please, that she must expect no compliments, and warn her not to feign a resistance which will not mislead me, anyway. Tell her I know all the tricks! (He wraps an ermine coverlet around him and throws himself on the couch.)

LORENZO (in a whisper to Scoronconcolo, at the door)—The time has come. My heart thumps so I can't walk.

SCORONCONCOLO—If it's from fear, let me go first.

LORENZO—No, it's from joy. (He takes his sword in his hand and walks to the couch, pulling aside the curtains softly.) Are you asleep, sir? (He thrusts the sword through the Duke's body.) The deed is done.

The Duke falls to the ground groaning. Scoronconcolo slashes his cheek with the dagger. The Duke, bleeding, gets to his feet and rushes about the room.

LORENZO—Fool! You cut his face! Pierce his heart, his heart! (To the Duke) Stop there, sir, not so much noise! Let me muffle you! (He sticks his fingers in the Duke's mouth.)

SCORONCONCOLO—Five more stabs in the heart. . . . I want to make sure he's dead.

LORENZO (gets down from the couch)—At last! (He looks at his bleeding hand.) The finger will always be maimed. So much the better! A glorious wound, emblem of an hour worth remembering.

CATTERINA (entering with a torch)—I came up to see you, brother. Madonna sent me away from church saying I had prayed enough. But I'm afraid downstairs with Eleonora. We thought we heard strange sounds, the stamping of feet and muffled voices. There's a cry of death in the air. (She screams) Great God! What's that on the floor? Blood! And on you, and on that man, everywhere!

LORENZO—Come and kiss me, dearest. This arm knows how to protect and to punish. It is the arm of Lorenzo, the avenger!

CATTERINA—Lorenzino, what do you mean, whom do you want to avenge?

LORENZO—No one, now. I have no more enemies. My heart is full of pity.

CATTERINA—My heart, too. I hate one man, only.

LORENZO—Who is he?

CATTERINA—Your coarse and barbarous Duke! Imagine yesterday, when he passed under the window, he had the impudence to send me a kiss?

LORENZO—He won't do it any more. Come and see.

CATTERINA—See what?

LORENZO (with an infernal laughter)—Look, I said. (He pulls away the curtain.) There is the Duke. I, I killed him!

CATTERINA (screaming)—Oh! Assassin! A dead body! How terrible! (She throws herself in Lorenzo's arms and hides her face in her hands.)

LORENZO—Listen, Catterina. This man

bought you for a handful of gold. I sold you, and if you see him there, on that bed, it's because he was expecting you; he thought that like a courtesan you would throw yourself in his arms for money.

CATTERINA (straightening up suddenly) He thought that, Lorenzino?

LORENZO—Was I wrong in killing him?

CATTERINA—Are you sure he's dead? Take away the coverlet and give me the torch. I want to look him in the face. Give it to me, I'm not afraid any more! My hand doesn't tremble. Vile body, curse you! (to Scoronconcolo) Cut off his head and show it to the people! In its enthusiasm it will hail Lorenzo, Duke of Medici!

LORENZO—No, sister, I didn't kill this man to crown myself with the ducal crown! I killed him because I hated him; for his bravados, for the outrages he heaped on me, and to avenge your honor and mine. I killed him to quench my thirst, to cure my deep wounds, to find sleep, happiness and peace again. Now, I long for nothing more. I respect myself.

CATTERINA—Then you must flee. Every moment's delay is dangerous. The people's favor will be with the man who first exploits it. If you don't profit by your deed, you'll be victim of the people's ingratitude. Run, brother, I beg you on my knees!

SCORONCONCOLO—I, too, Master, beg you on my knees!

LORENZO—Flee like a criminal? Well, why not! Lorenzo never worked to please men, and now less than ever. Let's go. Let's escape from the vile beast called the masses who devoured the Pazzi. Life is sweet to me and now I want to live long to remember the day my sword killed the Goliath. Good-by, sweet Catterina. Good-by, sister dearest, the only person who never doubted!

CATTERINA (kissing him)—Brother, I can't bear it! (She faints.)

LORENZO (picking her up in his arms)—Let's carry her to her mother. Lock the door and take the key. I want to take it to Venice to our Strozzi. I want to keep it all my life.

In the New York Manner

together. There was just nothing to do but go home.

Joe had the impulse every afternoon at five o'clock to wait for her in the lobby. He repressed that. But he found himself taking long walks after dinner. Twice he walked all the way up Fifth Avenue to One Hundred and Tenth Street. He found himself wishing she wasn't so perfect. If she were only a little more ordinary he'd feel more at home with her. But, of course, she never would be ordinary. Anything she did or said or wore would have distinction.

He had reached this point in his reflections about her for the third or fourth time when he realized that he was actually walking across Sixtieth Street. He was almost exactly opposite her house. He hurried on. It wouldn't do for her to discover him mooning in front of her house, like a love-sick boy. He turned south at the first corner—he could get the subway at Fifty-ninth Street. And then it began to rain. It began to rain hard all of a sudden without the slightest warning—at least without any warning he had observed. Joe instinctively ran. He reached Fifty-ninth Street but the subway was a block east, at Lexington Avenue. He kept on running. The rain came faster. He dodged into the doorway of the drug-store on the corner. And then he saw her. She had an umbrella and she was wearing a raincoat. She must have known it was going to rain.

"Hello," she cried.

"Hello," he answered.

SOMEHOW her tone, her expression, her air were less formal than usual—as if in response to the informality of the occasion. "I've got an umbrella," she said, "I'll see you to the subway just as soon as it lets up a bit."

"Thanks awfully," Joe said. They stood side by side in the doorway and watched the rain. After a few minutes it did let up. She handed him the umbrella.

"It's nice to meet you this way," he said as they started off. "I wish there were some place we could go or something."

From across the street came the steady beat of a dance orchestra with drums and plenty of brasses. Joe looked across. An electric sign announced: Dancing 25 Cents. Miss Robinson's gaze followed his. She saw the sign. Then she stopped short.

"Do you know what I'd like to do?" she asked, impulsively.

"No," Joe said stupidly.

"I'd like to go over there and dance."

"Really?" Joe asked.

"Yes," she said. "I like that gorgeous, noisy, awful music."

The big orchestra was striking up The Sheik when they reached the floor. It played it with a bang. Joe put his arm around Miss Robinson. They danced. They danced the dance the music called for. Joe forgot all about Miss Ponsonby-Smith's four inches of space. They finished in an absolutely middle-class kind of whirl.

"Gee," she said, "that was fun."

When they reached the door of her house an hour later he had to say something.

"Look here," he said, "won't you go dancing with me tomorrow night? We'll go to dinner first."

"At Cyrano's?" she asked.

"Of course," he answered.

Miss Robinson looked thoughtfully down at the toe of her shoe. They were standing under her umbrella. That is, she was standing under it.

"No," she said.

"I—I—I'm sorry," Joe stammered.

Miss Robinson continued to study the tip of her shoe.

"I'm sorry if I've presumed," Joe continued. It was the flattest refusal he had ever experienced. And ten minutes before she had been so jolly. What could have happened?

"Oh," she said, "you haven't presumed. Not in the least. You never would—conceivably."

She paused.

"I must go in," she finished. "Won't you keep my umbrella? You can bring it to the office in the morning."

"But I don't understand," Joe said. "I—I—I," he stammered.

She flashed a look at him.

"I've half a notion to tell you the truth," she said.

"Please do," Joe said stiffly.

"Well," she said. "You are a New Yorker—you've been used to it all your life—you won't understand what I mean. But I'm going to tell you. It's just—it's just that I'm not up to it—to your sort of thing. It cramps my style. I knew it would, but—it was fun to go to Cyrano's once. But a place like that makes me self-conscious. Why, I didn't dare to go with you until I'd got a new dress. You see, I'm from Iowa."

"What?" said Joe.

"I knew it wouldn't work that first time we walked up Fifth Avenue together—I knew it when we passed Hicks's and I said they served such good fresh-fruit sodas and you didn't say a word. Why—back home a man would have taken me in and bought me a soda. But you wouldn't—you wouldn't take a girl to a soda-fountain. You're too—too awfully New Yorkish."

Joe took her arm in his free hand.

"Look here," he said. "How long have you been in New York?"

She laughed.

"I came in September—I haven't been here a year."

"You've been here longer than I have," Joe said fiercely. "I came in October. I thought you were a New Yorker."

With a quick movement he caught her hand in his and snuggled it.

"I begin to get it now," he said. "I've been putting up a bluff on you and you've been putting up a bluff on me. And it's going to stop—right here."

He put his arm around her. He kissed her. And she let him.

She released herself and looked up at him, smiling.

"That," she said softly, "that wasn't a bit in your New York manner."

"No," said Joe Thayer, "that was the Indiana way."

The Leader of the Opposition

By RICHARD H. WALDO,

Publisher of Hearst's International Magazine

IN the Daily Express tomorrow will appear, says a Universal Service cable, dated London, June 2nd, the following interview with William Randolph Hearst:

"I HAD an interesting talk with your Prime Minister yesterday, but I met him first many years ago. I have always considered him one of the great men of the world. He radiates power and personality. He impresses one first with the strength of his mentality and then with the charm of his manner.

"History, however, judges a man not merely by his personality and appearance, but by his achievements. Lloyd George's chief claims to fame lie in what he has accomplished for his country. He has brought his country safely through the most critical period in its career in domestic affairs. He has advanced democracy without disturbance. He has been progressive with wisdom and judgment. The men who damned him most at one time praise him most today. The success of a man can best be measured by the success of his cause."

SUCH was the tribute paid by Mr. Hearst to the greatest figure in English public life today. And, strangely enough, Lloyd George could use the same words, with scarcely a change, to express the more enlightened foreign opinion concerning William Randolph Hearst, the greatest figure in American public life today.

MY two years' residence abroad, from '17 to '19, and my return to the International Chamber of Commerce meeting in '21, made astonishingly clear to me how profoundly Europe admires Mr. Hearst. His vision, his patience, his far-reasoning moulding of American public opinion are seen there in their proper perspective. And their importance to us as a nation is appreciated quite frankly by European realists in private conversation. For centuries of political training have taught the European statesman a high regard for real leadership, as such, without any special reference to contrasting opinion or divergence of political aims.

MODERN government, as all readers of this Magazine know, depends upon opposition, competently led, to stabilize its policies and, in fact, to enable it to carry on its business at all. In England, the leader of the "Opposition" is a respected as well as salaried officer of the Government. Here on this side we do not go quite so far, but even in our state and national legislatures, the Minority Leader is always a more or less important figure.

WITHOUT any general recognition of the fact on our own side of the water, the actual leadership of the Opposition in this country, and its only leadership worthy of the name, has been held for some years by Mr. Hearst. Public opinion, finding expression mostly through the daily press has, for reasons patent enough to anyone familiar with the vast business operations of the modern newspaper, never lacked its outlets of the moneyed sort. This very fact has relegated the opposition to a less wealthy and less powerful class, and the newspapers giving voice to opposition views have been few, and usually weak. That was until the Hearst organization was created! Today, both sides of every vital question are put before the people with all the force and skill that our present civilization affords.

LIKE Lloyd George, Mr. Hearst has advanced democracy without disturbance. He has emasculated the plans of agitators and destructive radicals who feed upon dumb discontent. He has proved, through building the greatest business of its kind in existence, that absolute faith in democracy is far from being incompatible with the most brilliant commercial success.

SOME of our more timid friends have from time to time suggested that on account of the personal antagonism that necessarily accrues to anyone constantly making enemies through his public work—the name "Hearst's" might, perhaps, prove more of a handicap than a help to the progress of an International Magazine.

BUT to those of us who study more carefully the direction the winds of progress are blowing, the name seems the greatest single asset that an INTERNATIONAL magazine could have. Than Mr. Hearst, no man in America is better known—here or abroad—as having any definite foreign policy! And Mr. Hearst's policy is known, beyond equivocation, to favor strict adherence to the old time American policy of avoiding entanglements of any sort whatever.

HERE, then, is at least one magazine into which clever propaganda for European interests will not be allowed to creep. So long as it is so definitely trademarked with this guarantee of its pro-Americanism, its readers will know absolutely that liberal thought throughout the world is being presented as it actually exists. And in these days of world reconstruction there hardly seems possible any greater public service than keeping the American people thoughtfully and truthfully informed concerning the progress of their world-neighbors with whose fortunes and misfortunes their own welfare is so intricately intertwined.

Bianca de Medici, "Daughter of Venice"

who, aided by her beauty, rose through a career of romance to be Grand Duchess of Tuscany. Italian ladies of her century (the 16th), used the dark red juice of the fruit of the deadly Nightshade as a paint. Hence the name of the drug Bella Donna—"Beautiful Lady."

In the unenlightened days of the Medicis, the use of unknown concoctions was excusable. But even today how few women have learned to select their toilet-ries with the extreme care that lasting beauty demands!

What do you know of the toilet preparations you are using?

Have you stopped to realize that the powder you are applying to your tender skin may be tearing down the fine tissues, clogging the pores, hurling you, more rapidly than you can imagine, into the class of old-young women?

And why, in this day and age, should you experiment when right at your finger tips are the creations of the world's greatest authority on beauty science—Mon-sieur Vivaudou!

Vivaudou's La Bohème preparations are made of the finest ingredients, chosen to make the skin lovely and to keep it lovely for years and years. They are the choice of the "exquisites" of the present century who must be charming—without fear of the consequences that eventually follow the use of carelessly made preparations.

“Because of its high quality, big sheets and low price per sheet, I always buy A. P. W. Satin Tissue Toilet Paper.”

That is what ANY ONE of hundreds of thousands of American homekeepers will gladly tell you—

Because A. P. W. Satin Tissue is the finest, firmest, softest toilet paper, made by the largest manufacturer of branded toilet paper in the world—always made from pure, clean, new materials (even the water with which the pulp is mixed comes from specially driven artesian wells to insure absolute purity). The sheets are extra large (5 x 5 $\frac{3}{4}$  inches) and there are 2500 sheets to a roll so you do not have to put up a new roll every day or so.

And You Save Money, Too!

Because A. P. W. Satin Tissue costs less per sheet than many of the poorest papers you can buy. A carton of four rolls is nearly a year's supply for the average family and costs only $2.00 (west of the Mississippi, $2.25). A. P. W. Satin Tissue is sold by more than 10,000 leading dealers who carry one or more of the family of six—

By A. Conan Doyle

I PROMISED you, my dear uncle, that I would tell you anything of interest concerning the siege of Jerusalem, but, indeed, these people whom we imagined to be unwarlike have kept us so busy that there has been little time for letter-writing. We came into Judea thinking that a mere blowing of trumpets and a shout would finish the affair, and picturing a splendid triumph in the Via Sacra to follow, with all the girls in Rome throwing flowers and kisses to us. Well, we may get our triumph, and possibly the kisses also, but I can assure you that not even you who have seen such hard service on the Rhine can ever have experienced a more severe campaign than this has been. We have now won the town, and today their temple is burning, and the smoke sets me coughing as I sit writing in my tent. But it has been a terrible business, and I am sure none of us wish to see Judea again.

In fighting the Gauls or the Germans, you are against brave men, animated by the love of their country. This passion acts more, however, upon some than others, so that the whole army is not equally inflamed by it. These Jews, however, besides their love of country, which is very strong, have a desperate religious fervor, which gives them a fury in battle such as none of us had ever seen before coming East to wage this bitter campaign.

You know that our fellows of the Tenth Legion have been, ever since Caesar's time, as rough soldiers as any with the Eagles, but I can assure you that I have seen them positively cowed by the fury of these fanatics. If any man says a Jew is not a good soldier, you may be sure that he has never been in Judea. As a matter of fact, we have had least to bear, for it has been our task from the beginning to guard the base of the peninsula upon which this extraordinary town is built. It has steep precipices upon all the other sides, so that it is only on this one northern base that fugitives could escape or a rescue come.

However, all this has nothing to do with what I took up my stylus to tell you. No doubt it is the common gossip of the forum and of the baths, how our Army, excellently handled by the princely Titus, carried one line of wall after the other until we had only the temple before us. This, however, is—or was, for I see it burning even as I write—a very strong fortress. Romans have no idea of the magnificence of this place. The temple of which I speak is a far finer building than any we have in Rome, and so is the palace built by Herod or Agrippa, I really forget which. This temple is two hundred [Continued on page 145]

Fun and Ideals

IN THE end, the attempt of this magazine to achieve leadership in American thought cannot be separated from the kind of fiction it prints.

If a widely-read periodical is to acquire lasting identity as a leader of progress, the same soul must pervade it from cover to cover. Often the various manifestations of a single spirit will be controlled by different editors, furnished by different writers. Occasionally one person may be expressive in both fields. One of the foremost American publicists has just written us a personal letter in which he says that his dream is to be "in a modest sort of way an H. G. Wells," putting his thought now in fiction and again in essay form.

The novel of which the first instalment appears next month is an ideal story for this publication. Diverting, even amusing, easy to understand and to talk about, it nevertheless stretches the conscience and the understanding. Of perhaps the most fertile thinker now living it takes the distilled essence and gives it with the attractive simplicity of a talent for spinning tales. No problem is too large for "Men Like Gods." Yet Wells has written nothing of simpler narrative interest.

To Mr. Herrick's novel beginning this month a similar test will apply. A young girl loses her father, who is her only friend. She and her mother are totally out of sympathy. Over many rough places she works out her own life. Is that an interesting story, or is it not? Is the answer of the utmost importance to every parent, or is it not?

If Dr. De Kruif's article on Vitamins, in this issue, and the series on drink abroad, and the Marconi article, in addition to being essential to our present-day knowledge were not also interesting to the untrained mind, they would miss the purpose of this monthly. If Wells's novel, in addition to being entertaining, lacked its importance of content, it would play a minor rôle. In the sport of writing policies in single sentence, we have constructed nothing more exact than "have fun while you read, but know something when you get through."

Muddling Along

CAUSES in the end are what matter, not mere symptoms. The two largest aspects of the coal troubles are irregularity of employment and lack of participation by labor in the management. An outstanding result of this year's strike was fabulous profits for non-union operators. They got more than war prices, while paying wages at the November 17th or the April 17th scale. Before the war the operators were happy when they got ten cents a ton profit. Five cents was common. During the strike they got from one dollar to two dollars profit, and that on huger outputs. That shows the meaning of an increase in non-union production, and it shows why the operators have fought against investigating the non-union mines.

High Spots

IN FOREIGN news many readers lack chart or compass. In our opinion, a serious reader might well select from the mass of topics the few most important, to bear always in his mind. Somewhat thus:

1. The relation of France to Germany. Until this is improved Europe will not recover.

2. The relation of Russia to Europe, and incidentally to America. Four and a half years of wavering, and every species of intervention, have made the problem insufferably heavy, but it must still be solved.

3. What is the rôle of the United States in general European reconstruction? On this matter no amount of thinking by Americans can be too much.

There are other first-class problems, as in India and in China, but they press upon us not quite so immediately. If any reader is clear on these three he will come near being a success as citizen of this world.

Drink Abroad

THE SERIES on the fight against alcohol in foreign countries is something we have dreamed about for years. The human race loves to manufacture a sentence and then go to sleep for a decade or two and let the sentence go on working. The allegation that Europe confines itself to moderate drinking, principally light wine and beer, has been at work for more than half a century, entirely regardless of the facts, and for any reader, whether he believes in prohibition or not, it would be a good exercise to sharpen his teeth on this concrete information. He will gather from this article a general idea of what Mr. Hunt is doing. Next month he will have the actual, irrefutable facts about France. Before the series is finished the reader will have a conception of the rôle of alcohol in Europe that is far less naive than the idea so energetically propagated for over half a century.

Back to Jefferson

MR. TAFT'S appointment as Chief Justice was a setback in industrial decisions. It fixed the majority of the highest tribunal on the side of feudalism. But few men are all right or all wrong. In other fields Mr. Taft is showing much value, his amiable temper bringing conflicting feelings into harmony, and his judgment, when the class conflict does not scare him, being good. That he rendered the child labor decision himself is significant.

Perhaps that decision will be recognized some day as the beginning of an epoch; the epoch of State Duties. State Rights succumbed to the Rights of the Nation. Gompers and Mrs. Kelly and others who have attacked this decision should recognize that the crime of conservatism lies in not recognizing that the spiral upward movement involves changes in direction. The slogan of progress must now be—Back to the Small Unit.

Only a Few

NUMBERS are not always decisive. One man may signify more than a million. It was only a hundred ministers, out of the small sect of Unitarians, who came out with a demand that Mr. Harding turn out of jail the prisoners still there for political opinions. The ministers gave two reasons for their position:

1. What these prisoners did is by our laws no longer a crime.

2. All other countries have released such men.

Only a hundred, Mr. Harding, and you can, if you wish, stop your ears to the cries of wives and children, as well as to the clear voice of reason. Your heart is right, but sometimes your caution is so extreme as to look like weakness.

Virtue, Progress and Love

Green THE CONVENTIONALLY minded are not to be taken too hard. They are always the bulk of the world. They call for amusement and patience, not irritation. To quote Holmes from memory:

"Good old-fashioned folks are they;
They say an undisputed thing
In such a solemn way."

Most of our pillars of society realize little about world-movements. They are startled when Frazier wins the primaries in North Dakota, but they do not know that fundamental reforms all over the world now seem likely to come from embattled farmers rather than from Socialists. The farmers are now in power in Poland, Bulgaria, Austria. They have parties in Canada and Australia. In New South Wales a leader of the Farmer's Party says: "We do not want more people in towns and cities." The Green International is likely to play a bigger part in the next decade or two than is the over-talked Red International. When the International Labor Conference, set up by the Peace Treaties, meets at Genoa, October 18th, agricultural questions will loom large. Our Farm Bloc has not shown much sense yet. It is inexperienced and uneducated, but it feels the breath of freedom in its nostrils, and after a few more follies it may begin to represent adequately that element on the land which all over the world is beginning to rumble out the omens of its coming power.

Do You Get This? A RUSSIAN friend, wise and well informed, says in a letter: "What exists is the Russian problem, not the problem of the Soviet Government. The second is but a detail of the first. The gravest mistake of the last two years has been that to important European and American minds the perspective was reversed and the Russian question lost in that of the Soviet Government. This error was the result of social panic."

Social panic, we regretfully admit, still dominates Washington, just as it still dominates Paris. Our State Department is dragged along by facts, like a mule being hauled up hill. It finally recognized the Baltic States, after talking over two years about how smart it was in not recognizing them. In the end it had to let Bakhmetev go, although his leading representative remained.

Our friend goes on: "The social side of a revolution is bound to run its course, according to known laws, the same as in revolutions of the past. The greatest danger from a revolution comes from outside. While the revolutionary country is in the fluid state, outside pressure threatens its normal development, and thereby brings about excess of nationalism."

Exactly, O wise young man, but can you put such an idea over on Charles E. Hughes or Raymond Poincaré?

As to the present Moscow Government, which so alarms the conventionally minded, our Russian correspondent says: "The revolutionary social development will always end in the formation of a new ruling class, which will assume executive power and carry out the principal purposes of a national executive, namely, the feeding of the population and the protection of the national territory and sovereignty. The most unpardon-able act of some of our present émigré politicians is to let their views on the social struggle blind them to their national duty."

Savinkov, for example, encouraged the Poles in their aggression against Russia. It was social blindness that made him do it. Certain Russian politicians in Paris wish to see an international commission of Russian control, with the duty of trying to force on the Soviet Government changes of policy. These politicians do not see that if such a commission succeeded it would outlast the present Moscow Government and create a dirty international mess long after the rule of Lenin is ended.

Consider the Boy THE disgraceful steps, taken in mid-season, for several years, to try to prevent any other baseball clubs from having a fair chance against the New York teams ought to kill the game. Everybody suffers except the money-changers. What suffers most is the ideal of the small boy on the vacant lot. To teach him that in his favorite sport it is only money that talks is a poison more deep-seated than was the venality of a few players rightly banished for selling games.

Love and Poetry WHY, of the world's greatest poetry, does so little treat of love? Usually we think of love as the very stuff of which poetry is composed. This is largely true in the lower grades, but not at the top. It has not the leading rôle in the Iliad, in Æschylus, in Dante, in Virgil, in Pushkin, in Goethe, even in Schiller, in Milton or Shakespeare. The greatest poetry in English is perhaps in Hamlet, Lear, Macbeth, and Paradise Lost. After Shakespeare and Milton stands Wordsworth, again a poet in whose work love, in the more restricted sense in which we use it, plays but a minor part.

It is not that the greatest authors do not picture love. Romeo and Juliet stands alone. The Vita Nuova is poetry in its essence. It is only that with them it is part of life, whereas with the lesser breeds it is played up as the surest key to the popular heart.

What is Virtue? PROGRESS, as was said a minute ago, is a spiral. To change the metaphor, the good in life is a mixture of many elements, one often increasing to the damage of another. It was this that the ever-wise Goethe had in mind when he said of Byron: "His fearlessness and majesty must cultivate those who admire them. We must be careful not to confine ourselves too warmly to what is moral and decorous. All greatness helps him who is able to appreciate it."

The trouble with moral judgments is that they are so often wrong. Rousseau speaks of the plays of Molière as "a school of vice and iniquity." What is now generally held to be Molière's greatest play, The Misanthrope, failed on the first night, because it disagreed with what was then the public prejudice. The pursuit of virtue must needs be our constant and increasing aim through life, but, like everything else, if not supplemented by other values, it tends to flatness and decay.

Some day, when we are too old for editing, we mean to write an epoch-marking volume on what morals are.

C Lilla looked Lambert directly in the eyes as he took her in his arms. "I did it," she said to herself with a curious, fatalistic honesty, as he kissed her. "It may be wrong, but I want him to kiss me." There was not one word of love, no words at all. If he had said any love word, something ironic in her would have laughed aloud and mocked him.

Beginning: A Novel of a Modern Woman's Search for Freedom
Her Own Life

By Robert Herrick

Illustrated by Dalton Stevens

LILLA! . . . LIL-LA! . . . LIL-LA-A!"
"Wha-t?"

The stocky figure of a little girl finally emerged from the lean-to on the further side of the barn and stopped.

"Wha-at is it?" she called back to her mother. Mrs. Vance, composedly folding her arms, stood motionless at the door of the ranch house, without reply. Slowly Lilla moved a few steps nearer, then paused. "What do you want?" she demanded.

The woman said nothing. Again the stocky figure resumed its tentative progress towards the commanding voice. Lilla did not come swiftly. She raised herself each step upon her toes with a peculiar little beat as if she enjoyed the muscular effort of her stout, sturdy legs. Her cotton dress was short, obviously too small for a girl of twelve, and the two braids of thick dust-colored hair had unraveled at the ends. Her face was smudged and sweaty. Her mother eyed her disapprovingly, noting every disorderly detail.

"Lilla," she said at last when the little figure had got within conversational radius, "I want you to come when I call you."

"I'm comin', can't you see?" Lilla answered sulkily. "What you want?"

"Lilla, don't speak like that—'wha-at you wa-ant!'" Her mother mocked the little girl's drawl. "You talk like Dan."

Lilla brushed a dirty paw over her hot face and argumentatively squinted her eyes. "Well, what's the matter with Dan?" she demanded.

"There is nothing the matter with him, but he's just a common laborer," Mrs. Vance explained, speaking slowly and precisely with the enunciation of New England.

Lilla considered this explanation for a moment, assorting it with other remembered reproofs, then concluding that it was hardly worth developing, demanded, "What you want me for?"

"I want you to go to your father and tell him he must stop his sawing and go to town this afternoon. It's getting late. Tell him he must go this afternoon."

"He said the horses were too tired," Lilla vouchsafed.

"I don't care! He must get there somehow. He's been putting it off and putting it off."

"But Prince is lame already," Lilla protested.

"Lilla, go tell your father what I say!"

THE LITTLE girl shrugged her broad shoulders, as if slipping off responsibility for this bit of folly, and turned back to the lean-to where she kept her pony. Mrs. Vance's gaze followed her, still critical. Lilla was conscious of what her tall, lean mother was thinking. Her mother's thoughts seemed to pierce her body and lodge in her mind. "A homely little girl . . . careless . . . A tomboy . . . Always dirty and tumbling into things and 'slack' like her father." "Slack" was one of Mrs. Vance's favorite words. Another was "vulgar." Both she and her father were "slack" and "vulgar." They didn't pronounce their words distinctly, in the New England way that Mrs. Vance held to be proper, and they laughed at "vulgar" jokes.

Lilla thought of these things as she tightened the girths expertly about Nellie's fat belly. What was the use of her riding up to the sawmill after her father! The horses weren't fit to travel—she knew it—and her father wanted to get out that lumber for the new barn before snow fell. He couldn't go to Rome today: it was too late anyway. But she knew that her father would go, somehow, if her mother insisted. He always did, just as she always did, in the end. Her mother had made him put in the acetylene gas plant, which was always getting out of order and needing to be fed with carbide. Her father didn't want the gas thing—lamps were good enough for him; but her mother had talked and talked, and then one day the thing came and was put up and the pipes were run all over the old ranch house, and her mother was content—for a time. . . .

WHEN LILLA, riding astride on Nellie, passed the dingy little ranch house, she saw her mother's face in the front window watching her. It was a good-looking face, though worn and faded, and the smooth black hair was neatly arranged over the high forehead. Lilla felt that her mother was thinking—"How did I ever have a daughter like Lilla!" The little girl smiled with an inward chuckle at the joke. Her mother was different from her father and from her. She liked her mother in a way, as she guessed her father did, and she minded her mother in a way as her father did too. But they two were different. Her mother didn't seem to belong there, and she was always reminding them that she didn't belong on a Wyoming horse ranch, that she belonged somewhere else, back in Chicago, where they had lived before coming out here, or still farther away, back in Worcester, Mass., where Uncle Don lived, and all the other relations, in big wooden houses, and had money and clothes and "advantages." It was queer. . . .

Nellie took her time, and Lilla, absorbed in her own train of thoughts, let the horse dawdle along the trail in the warm October sunshine. It was queer somehow, the whole business. . . . Lilla could just remember the place outside of Chicago where they used to live, a place of long white streets, with houses a little ways apart on either side and broad cement walks—she had called it "Sidewalks." That was what she chiefly remembered of this early home.

Then the family had whisked away from Sidewalks on a steam train, traveling a long, long time in the stuffy cars. There had been five of them then, her parents and her two older brothers. Bill had died, and Ed had gone away somewhere. That was after the mine had run out. The family, she knew, had moved out to Wyoming because of the mine, which was no good, and then her father had bought a lot of horses—they still had a few—and then last year he had talked about getting a permit to cut lumber from the Government reservation in the hills, and sent for a gasoline engine and sawmill. Mother didn't approve. Lilla knew. She said her father ought to stick to something long enough to make it pay. Lilla supposed he ought to. But she rejoiced at the gas engine and the sawmill. She understood her father's reckless enthusiasms for something new. One didn't like to do the same things always. That her mother didn't understand. She didn't like to go to school every day in winter, that is, after she had become used to the excitement of galloping Nellie over the eight miles of rough prairie road to Rome, where the nearest school was. But her mother made her go every day, good and bad weather. She said her daughter must be "educated." There it was, her mother again. . . . And they all had to do what she said. She talked so much. She had ideas.

The distant mountains across the western horizon were taking on their evening colors, and Lilla hurried the pony by kicking Nellie's bulging ribs with the heels of her cowhide shoes. Of course it was too late for her father to go to town today. She might have gone perfectly well, with Nellie in the single buck-board. She would have liked the trip. But her mother said it wasn't the proper thing for a little girl to go riding around to the stores, getting things and hearing the talk in such places. She was severe with Mr. Vance for suggesting such a thing. "Can't you remember she is a girl?" she said to her husband. "No, I can't—most times," her father had replied, and laughed, and Lilla had laughed too, proudly.

"Well, she is. . . . and I'd like you to think of it sometimes, and what's to become of her out in this wild country?"

"OH, I GUESS she'll get along some as others," her father said easily, tweaking one of Lilla's pigtailed.

"You'd be willing to have her grow up and marry in Rome, wouldn't you?" her mother had said accusingly.

"I guess it don't make much odds where she marries, does it?"

Lilla had laughed as she always did when her father and mother got into an argument about her, but she could not tell what she was laughing at. Perhaps she laughed because their differences seemed to her unimportant.

She was riding now at an easy gallop up a rocky gulch at the head of which the new sawmill had been set up, just on the edge of the Government reservation. She could hear already the tug-tug, tug-tug of the gas engine, and the brrrz of the band-saw, rising into a staccato shriek as it bit into the log and then fading into a rumble in the midst of the wood, fighting its way through the tough fiber, to emerge with a thin, triumphant zzz at the other end. That song of the band-saw thrilled her, excited her strangely, with its zur-zur-zur, and its zum-zum-zum, ending with the shrill zezeze like the tearing of silk. It excited her as a reckless gallop over a rocky trail across a treacherous field excited her. She wanted to laugh. Life was like that—a tearing through something triumphantly, with a delicious sinking of your teeth and claws into it, as the band-saw sunk its teeth into the protesting logs. It was great! She kicked Nellie into renewed speed. As the pony clattered up the last rise before the trail turned sufficiently to give a view of the sawmill, Lilla felt a sudden change in the cheerful song of the band-saw, a sudden sinking in the note as if it had struck something soft, or was about to stop. But it didn't stop, and there was a queer sort of shriek in the intervals of the tug-tug, tug-tug, pschug of the boisterous little gas engine. A bad log, Lilla thought, as the tug-tug, pschug, continued, though the saw merely whined dully and the queer moan that was neither saw nor engine kept on.

Another moment and she could see the mill, with the large body of her father stooping over the table. No! He was lying flat on it head down as though he were fixing something. Lilla galloped on up to the mill, and stopped, shouting: "Father! What you doing?"

HE DID not raise his head as she expected, and there was a distinct groaning coming from the table where he lay. Then in a flash she understood. The wicked steel band was whirring, not flashing its bright teeth, but all streaked with something bright red: it was cutting its way through her father, down from the shoulder! She seemed to see that as she fell from the saddle to the ground, and forgetting to catch Nellie, who whirled and scampered off, she ran to her father. She did not call out again or ask questions. She knew swiftly what she must do—stop that saw. Stop the engine! She had seen her father do it many times, in various ways, usually by the switch on the saw table. Her hand went quickly out to the spot on the table where the switch should be, but she could not find it. Her father's body lay across it.

There was the long, sagging belt. Lilla had seen her father throw it off the roller with one powerful jerk of a single arm. She grabbed at it, but the belt merely dragged her along the ground away from the table. No, that was not the way. She must pull it in toward her. Bracing her two feet against a corner of the saw table, she gave another hearty tug at the thick belt. At first it merely stiffened, and drew her slowly toward the engine, but she could feel it slipping from the smooth wooden roller. Another violent jerk, and the saw suddenly stopped with a final snarl, but the engine chugged, more rapidly, racing with itself now that it was released from its burden.

She did not speak—she seemed to realize that words were wholly useless. Again grasping the inert body she tried with all her might to turn it over face up, but it was too heavy. Then she saw that the band-saw, bloody-toothed, was still embedded deep in the fleshy back and holding the body rigid in its grasp. Closing her eyes and biting her lips as she had the habit of doing when excited, she grasped the two feet sticking out across the table, tucking one of the heavy boots under either shoulder and again put forth all her strength, tugging strongly, trying to work the saw out of the body into which it had bit its way. Her father moaned terribly, but Lilla, her eyes still tight shut, kept pulling steadily until she succeeded in dragging her father out of the grasp of the saw and rolling him over face upward on the table. Lilla stood still, trying to think what she should do next, looking around the empty shed in a vague search for help. Then her father opened his eyes and looked at her from their narrow depths as if from a long way off.

"Lilla," he whispered. "Get somebody—get Dan!"

Dan was in the upper pasture feeding the colts—she had seen him there when she started from the barn. She turned to look for Nellie, but the pony had disappeared.

"Nellie has run away, father!" she wailed, coming back to the injured man. "Tell me what to do—I don't want to leave you, father! I can't leave you like this!"

"Try to stop the bleeding," he whispered in his faint voice, so unlike the shout with which he usually gave directions. "Get something to tie up my shoulder."

AGAIN THE eyes closed, and he seemed unconscious. Lilla quickly stripped off the cotton waist she was wearing, wound it into a sort of rope, and then following her father's directions, slipped it under his head, down below him, leading one end up between the injured arm and the collar-bone and tying the two ends in a thick knot above the chest. The blood spurting up from the wound quickly soaked the bandage, and Lilla took off her linen riding skirt and tried to stanch the flow with this. In an interval of consciousness, her father directed her to insert a stick in the knot on his chest and thus to tighten the bandage. He groaned terribly, with long, sighing groans from the depths of his powerful body, as she twisted the stick and drew the wet bandage taut across the deep, gaping wound.

They found her there in the dark shed, her two bare arms stretched protectingly about the dead man's bloody chest, clinging with taut fingers to the tourniquet she had made from her cotton waist. Her hands and face and underclothes were smeared with her father's blood, and her blue eyes, wildly open, were staring down into his silent face.

"He's dead," she said dully to her mother. "Father's dead," she repeated in the same voice. "I couldn't keep it tight enough. . . . He's dead," she repeated.

Ever afterwards Lilla's blue eyes were peculiarly open and staring, as if always she was seeing the dead face in the twilight of the shed, and hearing the drip of blood into the pool on the ground.

That time after her father's death remained all her life an evil dream. She helped Dan feed and tend the stock, and the rest of the long days roamed with Nellie over the ranch, even to her mother's horror revisiting the sawmill and living over again the terror and the sorrow of those dark hours. When she admitted to her mother where she had been, Mrs. Vance said severely:

"How could you do such a thing, Lilla?" To which the girl replied enigmatically, "Oh, 'cause," and stopped. She could not say what impulse urged her to stamp into her soul every impression of her father, that big, shambling, jolly man who had been the best part of her life hitherto, and with whom she had had a sort of conspiracy against the higher standards of her mother. How often he had protected her from a severe scolding or a worse punishment! As when she had left the wire down thoughtlessly in the upper pasture, letting the brood mares escape into the Government reservation (which had caused her father much trouble and expense). To her imperfect alibi to which her mother had listened suspiciously, her father had added a natural explanation of the fact, taking the blame on himself, and later had got the truth from Lilla with the words, "Well, now, Lilla, you can tell me the whole truth"—which she had done. And on her side she had loyally concealed from her mother various shortcomings of her father, that would have brought him censure. She knew him so much better than she knew her mother, and though she couldn't phrase it she knew him so much better than his wife knew him. . . . And now he had slipped away into death and left her alone. . . .

Now she was more alone than her mother. That she discovered when her Aunt Myra came from Chicago with her older brother, Ed. It was worse than those first days when she was alone with her mother and Dan. For she realized that all three of these people were somehow against her father and her, did not really care for the dead man. Even her mother, beneath her proper bereavement and black dress, betrayed to Lilla's watchful eyes and ears a composure that amounted to relief. Brother Ed, with whom she visited the abandoned mine, let slip a remark that indicated a belittling judgment of their dead father. Standing at the weedy entrance to the shaft pit in his neat, city clothes with his stiff hat tipped somewhat back from his pale forehead, he whistled with the cold objectivity of youthful egotism and said, "Gee! I wish I had the money the old man sunk in this hole in the ground!"

Lilla, who had lived through that feverish period of hopes and despairs about the silver mine, one of her earliest recollections of the ranch, asked dully, "What would you do with it, Ed?"

"Put it into city lots around Chicago," he said superiorly. "There's more money to be made out of those sandy acres than in the whole state of Wyoming!"

Lilla did not understand. But she did know that it was not merely lust for gold and silver that had made her father abandon Chicago and "business" for the wild Wyoming country. It was something else, something that she felt in herself with a sinking of the heart as she began to realize that her family had no intention of remaining any longer on the ranch than necessary to sell out and pack up. She even dared to protest to her mother the evening after the trip with Ed to the abandoned mine.

"Aren't we going to stay here, mother?"

"Of course not, Lilla! What an idea! What could you and I do with a big ranch like this?"

"I could help Dan with the chores," Lilla suggested, "and p'r'aps Ed c'd come out too."

"Don't you think it," that young man interposed. "See me giving up the city for a heap of sagebrush!" He laughed scornfully at the suggestion.

Lilla left the room and wandered down to the barn where Dan was smoking his evening pipe.

"We're going to Chicago," she told him, resignedly.

"So I s'pose," Dan replied. The girl looked at him miserably.

"You'll like it fust rate," he suggested.

"No, I won't! I'll hate it—but I got to go."

Lilla knew a fact when she met it, and never wasted emotion over the inevitable, neither then nor later.

"I'm going to give you Nellie," she said.

"Thank you," Dan accepted awkwardly, "if your mother don't object."

"She's mine! Father gave her to me. I brought her up on a bottle 'cause her mother died!"

"Well, most like they'll want me to keer for the stock this winter," Dan remarked, "and I'll see Nellie don't want nothin'."

BUT IT seemed that even her father's gifts no longer held good. Nellie was put up at auction with the rest of the stock before the family left the ranch. She was bought in by a stout horse dealer in Rome, who rode off on the little mare, sawing at her mouth to quiet her. Lilla, standing a little aloof, watched the performance, then repaired to the kitchen where her mother with Aunt Myra was preparing some hot coffee for the neighbors who had attended the "sale."

"You'd no right to sell Nellie," Lilla burst out, her face white with concentrated fury.

"What would you want with a horse in Chicago!" her aunt laughed. "You can't go galloping bareback up and down the streets of Lawndale, my little girl."

"I don't care. Father gave me Nellie. It's his and mine, and you stole it from me," she said accusingly to her mother.

"See here, pigtailed," her brother interposed. "None of that talk to your mother."

"You all hated him," the girl went on, torrentially, "and now he's dead you are doing everything he don't want, just to spite him! I know you hated him!"

But Lilla was ready on time the next morning to drive with the family to Rome and take the train for Chicago. She had learned in the interval the futility of rebellion when one was a girl, whose only friend had died, not quite thirteen, though large and strong for her age. She had learned that she owned nothing in her own

The Leader of the Opposition

By RICHARD H. WALDO,

Publisher of Hearst's International Magazine

IN the Daily Express tomorrow will appear, says a Universal Service cable, dated London, June 2nd, the following interview with William Randolph Hearst:

"I HAD an interesting talk with your Prime Minister yesterday, but I met him first many years ago. I have always considered him one of the great men of the world. He radiates power and personality. He impresses one first with the strength of his mentality and then with the charm of his manner.

"History, however, judges a man not merely by his personality and appearance, but by his achievements. Lloyd George's chief claims to fame lie in what he has accomplished for his country. He has brought his country safely through the most critical period in its career in domestic affairs. He has advanced democracy without disturbance. He has been progressive with wisdom and judgment. The men who damned him most at one time praise him most today. The success of a man can best be measured by the success of his cause."

SUCH was the tribute paid by Mr. Hearst to the greatest figure in English public life today. And, strangely enough, Lloyd George could use the same words, with scarcely a change, to express the more enlightened foreign opinion concerning William Randolph Hearst, the greatest figure in American public life today.

MY two years' residence abroad, from '17 to '19, and my return to the International Chamber of Commerce meeting in '21, made astonishingly clear to me how profoundly Europe admires Mr. Hearst. His vision, his patience, his far-reasoning moulding of American public opinion are seen there in their proper perspective. And their importance to us as a nation is appreciated quite frankly by European realists in private conversation. For centuries of political training have taught the European statesman a high regard for real leadership, as such, without any special reference to contrasting opinion or divergence of political aims.

MODERN government, as all readers of this Magazine know, depends upon opposition, competently led, to stabilize its policies and, in fact, to enable it to carry on its business at all. In England, the leader of the "Opposition" is a respected as well as salaried officer of the Government. Here on this side we do not go quite so far, but even in our state and national legislatures, the Minority Leader is always a more or less important figure.

WITHOUT any general recognition of the fact on our own side of the water, the actual leadership of the Opposition in this country, and its only leadership worthy of the name, has been held for some years by Mr. Hearst. Public opinion, finding expression mostly through the daily press has, for reasons patent enough to anyone familiar with the vast business operations of the modern newspaper, never lacked its outlets of the moneyed sort. This very fact has relegated the opposition to a less wealthy and less powerful class, and the newspapers giving voice to opposition views have been few, and usually weak. That was until the Hearst organization was created! Today, both sides of every vital question are put before the people with all the force and skill that our present civilization affords.

LIKE Lloyd George, Mr. Hearst has advanced democracy without disturbance. He has emasculated the plans of agitators and destructive radicals who feed upon dumb discontent. He has proved, through building the greatest business of its kind in existence, that absolute faith in democracy is far from being incompatible with the most brilliant commercial success.

SOME of our more timid friends have from time to time suggested that on account of the personal antagonism that necessarily accrues to anyone constantly making enemies through his public work—the name "Hearst's" might, perhaps, prove more of a handicap than a help to the progress of an International Magazine.

BUT to those of us who study more carefully the direction the winds of progress are blowing, the name seems the greatest single asset that an INTERNATIONAL magazine could have. Than Mr. Hearst, no man in America is better known—here or abroad—as having any definite foreign policy! And Mr. Hearst's policy is known, beyond equivocation, to favor strict adherence to the old time American policy of avoiding entanglements of any sort whatever.

HERE, then, is at least one magazine into which clever propaganda for European interests will not be allowed to creep. So long as it is so definitely trademarked with this guarantee of its pro-Americanism, its readers will know absolutely that liberal thought throughout the world is being presented as it actually exists. And in these days of world reconstruction there hardly seems possible any greater public service than keeping the American people thoughtfully and truthfully informed concerning the progress of their world-neighbors with whose fortunes and misfortunes their own welfare is so intricately intertwined.

HER OWN LIFE

A New Novel by Robert Herrick ★

The Distinguished Author of "TOGETHER"

The distant mountains across the western horizon were taking on their evening colors, and Lilla hurried the pony by kicking Nellie's bulging ribs with the heels of her cowhide shoes. Of course it was too late for her father to go to town today. She might have gone perfectly well, with Nellie in the single buck-board. She would have liked the trip. But her mother said it wasn't the proper thing for a little girl to go riding around to the stores, getting things and hearing the talk in such places. She was severe with Mr. Vance for suggesting such a thing. "Can't you remember she is a girl?" she said to her husband. "No, I can't—most times," her father had replied, and laughed, and Lilla had laughed too, proudly.

"Well, she is. . . . and I'd like you to think of it sometimes, and what's to become of her out in this wild country?"

"OH, I GUESS she'll get along same as others," her father said easily, tweaking one of Lilla's pigtails.

"You'd be willing to have her grow up and marry in Rome, wouldn't you?" her mother had said accusingly.

"I guess it don't make much odds where she marries, does it?"

Lilla had laughed as she always did when her father and mother got into an argument about her, but she could not tell what she was laughing at. Perhaps she laughed because their differences seemed to her unimportant.

She was riding now at an easy gallop up a rocky gulch at the head of which the new sawmill had been set up, just on the edge of the Government reservation. She could hear already the tug-tug, tug-tug of the gas engine, and the brrrz of the band-saw, rising into a staccato shriek as it bit into the log and then fading into a rumble in the midst of the wood, fighting its way through the tough fiber, to emerge with a thin, triumphant zzz at the other end. That song of the band-saw thrilled her, excited her strangely, with its zur-zur-zur, and its zum-zum-zum, ending with the shrill zezeze like the tearing of silk. It excited her as a reckless gallop over a rocky trail across a treacherous field excited her. She wanted to laugh. Life was like that—a tearing through something triumphantly, with a delicious sinking of your teeth and claws into it, as the band-saw sunk its teeth into the protesting logs. It was great! She kicked Nellie into renewed speed. As the pony clattered up the last rise before the trail turned sufficiently to give a view of the sawmill, Lilla felt a sudden change in the cheerful song of the band-saw, a sudden sinking in the note as if it had struck something soft, or was about to stop. But it didn't stop, and there was a queer sort of shriek in the intervals of the tug-tug, tug-tug, pschug of the boisterous little gas engine. A bad log, Lilla thought, as the tug-tug, pschug, continued, though the saw merely whined dully and the queer moan that was neither saw nor engine kept on.

Another moment and she could see the mill, with the large body of her father stooping over the table. No! He was lying flat on it head down as though he were fixing something. Lilla galloped on up to the mill, and stopped, shouting: "Father! What you doing?"

HE DID not raise his head as she expected, and there was a distinct groaning coming from the table where he lay. Then in a flash she understood. The wicked steel band was whirring, not flashing its bright teeth, but all streaked with something bright red: it was cutting its way through her father, down from the shoulder! She seemed to see that as she fell from the saddle to the ground, and forgetting to catch Nellie, who whirled and scampered off, she ran to her father. She did not call out again or ask questions. She knew swiftly what she must do—stop that saw. Stop the engine! She had seen her father do it many times, in various ways, usually by the switch on the saw table. Her hand went quickly out to the spot on the table where the switch should be, but she could not find it. Her father's body lay across it.

There was the long, sagging belt. Lilla had seen her father throw it off the roller with one powerful jerk of a single arm. She grabbed at it, but the belt merely dragged her along the ground away from the table. No, that was not the way. She must pull it in toward her. Bracing her two feet against a corner of the saw table, she gave another hearty tug at the thick belt. At first it merely stiffened, and drew her slowly toward the engine, but she could feel it slipping from the smooth wooden roller. Another violent jerk, and the saw suddenly stopped with a final snarl, but the engine chugged, more rapidly, racing with itself now that it was released from its burden.

She did not speak—she seemed to realize that words were wholly useless. Again grasping the inert body she tried with all her might to turn it over face up, but it was too heavy. Then she saw that the band-saw, bloody-toothed, was still embedded deep in the fleshy back and holding the body rigid in its grasp. Closing her eyes and biting her lips as she had the habit of doing when excited, she grasped the two feet sticking out across the table, tucking one of the heavy boots under either shoulder and again put forth all her strength, tugging strongly, trying to work the saw out of the body into which it had bit its way. Her father moaned terribly, but Lilla, her eyes still tight shut, kept pulling steadily until she succeeded in dragging her father out of the grasp of the saw and rolling him over face upward on the table. Lilla stood still, trying to think what she should do next, looking around the empty shed in a vague search for help. Then her father opened his eyes and looked at her from their narrow depths as if from a long way off.

"Lilla," he whispered. "Get somebody—get Dan!"

Dan was in the upper pasture feeding the colts—she had seen him there when she started from the barn. She turned to look for Nellie, but the pony had disappeared.

"Nellie has run away, father!" she wailed, coming back to the injured man. "Tell me what to do—I don't want to leave you, father! I can't leave you like this!"

"Try to stop the bleeding," he whispered in his faint voice, so unlike the shout with which he usually gave directions. "Get something to tie up my shoulder."

AGAIN THE eyes closed, and he seemed unconscious. Lilla quickly stripped off the cotton waist she was wearing, wound it into a sort of rope, and then following her father's directions, slipped it under his head, down below him, leading one end up between the injured arm and the collar-bone and tying the two ends in a thick knot above the chest. The blood spurting up from the wound quickly soaked the bandage, and Lilla took off her linen riding skirt and tried to stanch the flow with this. In an interval of consciousness, her father directed her to insert a stick in the knot on his chest and thus to tighten the bandage. He groaned terribly, with long, sighing groans from the depths of his powerful body, as she twisted the stick and drew the wet bandage taut across the deep, gaping wound.

They found her there in the dark shed, her two bare arms stretched protectingly about the dead man's bloody chest, clinging with taut fingers to the tourniquet she had made from her cotton waist. Her hands and face and underclothes were smeared with her father's blood, and her blue eyes, wildly open, were staring down into his silent face.

"He's dead," she said dully to her mother. "Father's dead," she repeated in the same voice. "I couldn't keep it tight enough. . . . He's dead," she repeated.

Ever afterwards Lilla's blue eyes were peculiarly open and staring, as if always she was seeing the dead face in the twilight of the shed, and hearing the drip of blood into the pool on the ground.

That time after her father's death remained all her life an evil dream. She helped Dan feed and tend the stock, and the rest of the long days roamed with Nellie over the ranch, even to her mother's horror revisiting the sawmill and living over again the terror and the sorrow of those dark hours. When she admitted to her mother where she had been, Mrs. Vance said severely:

"How could you do such a thing, Lilla?" To which the girl replied enigmatically, "Oh, 'cause," and stopped. She could not say what impulse urged her to stamp into her soul every impression of her father, that big, shambling, jolly man who had been the best part of her life hitherto, and with whom she had had a sort of conspiracy against the higher standards of her mother. How often he had protected her from a severe scolding or a worse punishment! As when she had left the wire down thoughtlessly in the upper pasture, letting the brood mares escape into the Government reservation (which had caused her father much trouble and expense). To her imperfect alibi to which her mother had listened suspiciously, her father had added a natural explanation of the fact, taking the blame on himself, and later had got the truth from Lilla with the words, "Well, now, Lil, you can tell me the whole truth"—which she had done. And on her side she had loyally concealed from her mother various shortcomings of her father, that would have brought him censure. She knew him so much better than she knew her mother, and though she couldn't phrase it she knew him so much better than his wife knew him. . . . And now he had slipped away into death and left her alone. . . .

Now she was more alone than her mother. That she discovered when her Aunt Myra came from Chicago with her older brother, Ed. It was worse than those first days when she was alone with her mother and Dan. For she realized that all three of these people were somehow against her father and her, did not really care for the dead man. Even her mother, beneath her proper bereavement and black dress, betrayed to Lilla's watchful eyes and ears a composure that amounted to relief. Brother Ed, with whom she visited the abandoned mine, let slip a remark that indicated a belittling judgment of their dead father. Standing at the weedy entrance to the shaft pit in his neat, city clothes with his stiff hat tipped somewhat back from his pale forehead, he whistled with the cold objectivity of youthful egotism and said, "Gee! I wish I had the money the old man sunk in this hole in the ground!"

Lilla, who had lived through that feverish period of hopes and despairs about the silver mine, one of her earliest recollections of the ranch, asked dully, "What would you do with it, Ed?"

"Put it into city lots around Chicago," he said superiorly. "There's more money to be made out of those sandy acres than in the whole state of Wyoming!"

Lilla did not understand. But she did know that it was not merely lust for gold and silver that had made her father abandon Chicago and "business" for the wild Wyoming country. It was something else, something that she felt in herself with a sinking of the heart as she began to realize that her family had no intention of remaining any longer on the ranch than necessary to sell out and pack up. She even dared to protest to her mother the evening after the trip with Ed to the abandoned mine.

"Aren't we going to stay here, mother?"

"Of course not, Lilla! What an idea! What could you and I do with a big ranch like this?"

"I could help Dan with the chores," Lilla suggested, "and p'raps Ed c'd come out too."

"Don't you think it," that young man interposed. "See me giving up the city for a heap of sagebrush!" He laughed scornfully at the suggestion.

Lilla left the room and wandered down to the barn where Dan was smoking his evening pipe.

"We're going to Chicago," she told him, resignedly.

"So I s'pose," Dan replied. The girl looked at him miserably.

"You'll like it fust rate," he suggested.

"No, I won't! I'll hate it—but I got to go."

Lilla knew a fact when she met it, and never wasted emotion over the inevitable, neither then nor later.

"I'm going to give you Nellie," she said.

"Thank you," Dan accepted awkwardly, "if your mother don't object."

"She's mine! Father gave her to me. I brought her up on a bottle 'cause her mother died!"

"Well, most like they'll want me to keer for the stock this winter," Dan remarked, "and I'll see Nellie don't want nothin'."

BUT IT seemed that even her father's gifts no longer held good. Nellie was put up at auction with the rest of the stock before the family left the ranch. She was bought in by a stout horse dealer in Rome, who rode off on the little mare, sawing at her mouth to quiet her. Lilla, standing a little aloof, watched the performance, then repaired to the kitchen where her mother with Aunt Myra was preparing some hot coffee for the neighbors who had attended the "sale."

"You'd no right to sell Nellie," Lilla burst out, her face white with concentrated fury.

"What would you want with a horse in Chicago!" her aunt laughed. "You can't go galloping bareback up and down the streets of Lawndale, my little girl."

"I don't care. Father gave me Nellie. It's his and mine, and you stole it from me," she said accusingly to her mother.

"See here, pigtailed," her brother interposed. "None of that talk to your mother."

"You all hated him," the girl went on, torrentially, "and now he's dead you are doing everything he don't want, just to spite him! I know you hated him!"

But Lilla was ready on time the next morning to drive with the family to Rome and take the train for Chicago. She had learned in the interval the futility of rebellion when one was a girl, whose only friend had died, not quite thirteen, though large and strong for her age. She had learned that she owned nothing in her own right, not even food and clothes, and must accept her fate whatever it was, until she was strong enough to emancipate herself from the tyranny of her elders. . . . She sat glumly with Dan on the front seat of the old buckboard, and did not turn around as even her mother did for a last look at the shabby ranch house which had been her home for seven years, the only home she really knew.

So this was "Sidewalks!" Lilla, remembering her old name for the city, gazed appraisingly and contemptuously on the broad, flat, tree-lined streets of Lawndale, as the cab plodded up the empty, never-ending suburban street. Her aunt pointed out a pretentious yellow brick building, which was to become a familiar object to the girl and center of her life for many years.

"That's our new high school, Lilla," she said, "where you'll go to school."

LILLA looked at it composedly and resumed her gaze at the drab-colored houses, each one set back from the parkway thirty or forty feet, and spaced from its neighbors by another twenty or thirty feet, like soldiers standing at attention, each one almost exactly like its fellows, with a pointed roof, a front porch, a front and rear entrance.

"Lawndale's grown some, since we been out there," her mother observed admiringly.

"I should say!" her son agreed with the genial enthusiasm of the real-estate "booster." "T'won't be long 'fore there'll be a solid line of improvements all the way to the city limits. . . . I'll show you the new addition."

The cab pulled up before a tidy three-story house at the corner of a street. It had a broad piazza on two sides and seemed a little larger and a little more distinguished than its neighbors, as befitted the home of a prosperous real estate promoter.

"This is to be your home, Lilla," her aunt remarked with a hospitable smile.

It was to prove not a bad sort of home, in the American sense, for Lilla. Lawndale was "healthy" and far enough removed from the great lowering smoke blur of Chicago to be clean and "safe."

At first Lilla roamed the town and far beyond on the still undeveloped prairie, much as a dog explores a new environment, smelling it out for herself and judging its possibilities. She even discovered, beyond the huddle of industrialism at Croyville, a farmer trying to cultivate the sandy prairie between two long lines of empty freight cars sidetracked on either boundary. Unknown to her family Lilla made a number of visits to the tar-paper and corrugated-iron shack where the Lithuanian farmer lived with a wife and children, and helped him with his fall plowing one Sunday by riding his single skinny farm horse. But presently other interests nearer home weaned Lilla from her hunger for the open and the old shack.

THE PORTERS' home life was of the best Lawndale standards. The house was comfortable and roomy. The furniture was more plentiful and more elegant than any that Lilla had ever known, with lace curtains, stuffed chairs and couches, hangings at the places where there should be doors, shiny cherry bedroom sets, etc. There was one comfortable, sloppy servant to help in the housework, which Lilla and her mother also shared, and the food was more than plentiful, for Mr. Porter prided himself upon being something of an epicure and invariably brought back from Chicago on his frequent trips thither delicacies not to be had in the plain markets of Lawndale, such as fish, oysters, and game.

The Porters took the Chicago Tribune, and the Outlook, and one of the older magazines. There were a few novels and a gift book or two in the small oak bookcase in the front room. Other books one was supposed either to borrow or get out of the public library, which was a struggling institution. For in common with all Lawndale the Porters were not "great readers," except of magazines and newspapers, a copious variety of which cluttered up the living-room. The Porters were members of the Baptist church, but did not take their religion strenuously: it was rather an educational and social matter than a spiritual one for them. To Lilla church meant merely boredom, like putting on new clothes, or getting new lessons; but as it did not take much time and was more troublesome to evade than to accept she took it like the other non-essentials of her life, which was made for her and which she must accept.

School was very important, as she recognized from the first, when she had hated it and had indeed played truant several times. It came almost at once, after a number of excursions to the big, confusing city, where she had hung listlessly about the counters of great stores while her mother and aunt debated the terrible question of clothes. She was finally reclothed according to city standards, and feeling rather proud of herself though uncomfortable, "started in" at the high school in the big yellow brick building. And there humiliation succeeded humiliation, at first. She was sent back for two terms to the grade school because she had not been adequately prepared at the Rome school for the stricter standards of Lawndale, though she was convinced that if allowed to try she could do as well as the others in high school. In the grade school she was huddled into a desk too small for her, with children her physical and mental inferiors, and was called "Fatty," "Legs," "Pigtails," "Cowboy," and other opprobrious names. It was the period when she fought a boy and licked him, climbed fences, stole grapes, and played truant out at the Lithuanian's farm.

It was better at the high school. Her hair was up, and she was growing fast to meet her stout legs; her dresses at that time were longer, and she had become in general more amenable to Lawndale conventions. Her teachers spoke well of her ability in her studies, but reported that she was occasionally "boisterous" and given to laugh out loud in class, which was not always respectful. Still they hoped for the best, and thought that in time she might become "a wholesome influence in the school," for it was evident that she had "the quality of leadership."

SO THE YEARS passed, thirteen, fourteen, fifteen, sixteen, and Lilla was almost a woman. She was large and sturdily built, like her father, larger than most of the girls of her age in Lawndale, of a larger mold than the average American woman in the generations succeeding the pioneers. In her close-cut tailor-made best suit she looked quite the woman, as her uncle appreciatively remarked.

Already awkward youths rang the Porter doorbell instead of standing out on the street and whistling for Lilla to come and play tennis. But Lilla treated them just the same whether they rang the bell or whistled. She played with them, more roughly than her mother thought proper.

"It isn't nice," Mrs. Vance would protest.

Lilla laughed. If her mother only knew! If all the Lawndale mothers knew what went on in the big, dusty attic of the high school building, in the corners of empty recitation rooms, in their own homes when they were out for the afternoon or evening. Perhaps they did know—they had been pupils at the school, some of them, or at other similar schools in small American towns and suburbs—but they did not want to remember.

As a matter of fact, Lilla had hitherto shared very little in these trespasses. The big boys with whom she recited in school and played tennis, and in summer went on picnics with into the country, tried to kiss her as they did other girls. She would have felt belittled if they had shown no inclination to do that. Sometimes she roughhoused them and repulsed them with her great strength, sometimes she simply boxed their ears and laughed at them, and—rarely—she let them kiss her, by way of curiosity. But never the same one twice—that was a curious code of honor with herself.

Lilla had always known the facts of sex, much more than the other girls whom she sometimes instructed in a queer, impersonal way, her revelations punctuated by bursts of contemptuous laughter. Her father, she remembered, had taken pains to explain it to her, in simple, commonplace language, as part of the routine of life, desirable to know.

LILLA had no sickly curiosities, no furtiveness in her nature. She was downright and literal in this, the most hidden of woman's perceptions, as few girls, even the "nicest" that she knew, were. She came to her womanhood absolutely natural and without cultivated prejudice, as simple as a peasant girl, with an added touch of city mockery.

Yet in the rare moments when she was quiet enough for reflection, she wondered a little whether the "facts of life" were quite as simple as she supposed, whether there was not something more in the great mystery about which human beings whispered and evaded and troubled themselves, whether the great conspiracy did not hide a savage reality beyond her imagination.

When Lilla was eighteen she was graduated from the high school. That summer as usual she and her mother spent at Pitcher's Landing. Pitcher's Landing was a small piece of the scrubby high bluff which skirts Lake Michigan from the far north to the sandy dunes of Indiana. The Porters had a small summer cottage on the very edge of the bluff, fifty or sixty feet above the white beach, in a clump of old sycamores that hung gracefully over the edge.

The June of Lilla's graduation from the high school, Mrs. Vance talked of visiting some Massachusetts relatives. Lilla thought of going to an Eastern woman's college in the fall and the summer would give her a chance to see "Eastern people" and to get a fresh start, so her mother urged. But Lilla was obdurate—one more summer at the lake, and as was usually the case when she really wanted anything she had her own way.

So the day after graduation, Lilla with some chosen friends left for Pitcher's Landing to picnic in the Porter cottage. Mrs. Vance was to come a few weeks later after the Porters had gone to Europe. She arrived one hot July evening accompanied by a correctly dressed young man, whom she introduced to her daughter as "Cousin Lambert Wells."

Lilla, who had been surprised in the midst of a drastic cleaning of the cottage, with tousled hair and torn skirt, leaned upon her broom handle and stared at the young man.

"My, what a messy place!" her mother observed unhappily. "Is this the way you keep house when I am not around?"

"We had a big party last night," Lilla explained. "I'll fix it up soon."

Cousin Lambert laid aside his neat blue coat, rolled up his sleeves, borrowed an apron, and took part in cleaning the cottage, talking volubly all the time. He explained that he was on his way to Alaska, where his father was interested in a new copper mine, and having to stay in Chicago for several days, he had looked up his father's cousins and Mrs. Vance had asked him to spend the Sunday at Pitcher's Landing. Lilla listened to his conversation watchfully without offering any reply.

After the sweeping and putting to rights, Lambert sat down in an easy-chair and lighted a cigarette, carefully pulling up his trousers and settling himself for conversation.

"I'm going to bathe in the lake," Lilla said. "Want to come?"

When she appeared in her faded old cotton bathing suit, bare-legged as was the fashion at Pitcher's Landing, her thick hair tied in a tight knot about her head, she felt self-conscious with her elegant cousin and wished she had not proposed the bath. His swift glances seemed to take her all in from the knotted hair to the bare legs and the red mosquito bites on her white flesh. She felt that her suit was too small for her and that her bare legs were horribly undressed and too plump. As always when she was embarrassed, she tried to carry it off with bravado. Flicking her towel at Lambert, she ran out onto the white beach.

"Can you swim?" she asked.

"RATHER!" . . . But he seemed in no hurry to take to the water, gazing first out across the level lake where the sun was sinking into fiery banks of cloud. "A nice little pond," he observed condescendingly. Lilla, to whom Lake Michigan was as majestic as the ocean and much more companionable, resented this appreciation. She felt his gaze settling again to her costume, to herself. She dashed into the oily lake and buried her head in a long plunge. Lambert quickly followed.

Cousin Lambert stayed on past Monday into the middle of the week, and after a few days in Chicago returned to the lake cottage. His business, as Lilla observed to him, seemed very flexible.

"Oh, what's the use of worrying yourself?" he replied lightly. "I guess Alaska will last."

After the first embarrassment of his arrival her consciousness of the young man was curiously double. She secretly admired his good clothes, his easy habits, and admitted that he was "quite good-looking," tall and well built with a lot of shaggy brown hair and a prettily forked chin. But she was fiercely sensitive to the possibility of "airs," to a superiority that she suspected he deftly concealed.

Once they explored a bit of the primeval forest which had somehow escaped destruction, a dark, cool spot with mighty sycamores and feathery undergrowth. It was some distance from Pitcher's Landing, and Lilla had never been in it before.

"It's deliciously cool here," her cousin said, throwing himself on the ground and preparing to roll a cigarette.

"It's very mysterious," Lilla remarked. "They say all the country was like this before it was settled up. It must have been great in those days."

"You seem to like it rough. You ought to go to Alaska!"

"I'd love to—it must be like Wyoming, only more so!"

SUDDENLY Lambert leaned across and, putting his hand over her shoulder, drew her head back and kissed her. She drew away and looked at him inquiringly, composedly.

"Is that what you do with your Eastern girls?" she asked coldly.

"Sometimes," he said, "when they want it."

Lilla got to her feet and began walking rapidly through the forest. She did not especially resent the kiss. It was not a serious matter, and if she had felt sure that he meant no disrespect, that he had not taken the liberty with her because she was a crude Western cousin and thought he might, she would have let him do it again. But she thought it safer to keep walking.

They went home through the twilight, neither speaking, with something lying between them.

One hot August day Mrs. Vance had to go to Chicago. She left by the early morning train and planned to return by the afternoon boat to Grand Haven. She had hinted that it would be well for Lambert Wells to terminate his visit and accompany her to Chicago, but the young man had been impervious to all hints. So, fretting over the circumstances which obliged her to leave, Mrs. Vance admonished Lilla to ask one of her girl friends to spend the day with her. Lilla agreed but seemed to forget all about it. Instead she put up a luncheon in her canvas knapsack and proposed to Lambert that they walk along the lake shore as far as St. Joe and return in the afternoon.

Just as the sun sank into the dull gray smudge which Lilla assured her cousin was Chicago, they paused under the overhanging branch of a great hemlock and ate their sandwiches. They had both grown silent and conscious of themselves. Lilla was asking herself for the hundredth time whether she really liked this sophisticated young man, who spoke lightly of dissipations she had always held in horror, or merely felt flattered by his attendance. She knew he wanted to kiss her again, and she was not sure that she wanted him to do it. So she rose and suggested that they hunt for a spring in the ravine close by. Away from the shore it became suddenly dark. For some time they roamed through the deep dells covered with scrubby growth formed by the drifting sand and Lilla explained elaborately the formation of these dunes in obedience to shifting winds. Then they found the spring and quenched their thirst. The first light of the moon was filtering through the scrub pines into the cup-shaped hollow where they sat. Lambert took her hand negligently, saying:

"A hard little paw!"

Lilla opened it and looked at it thoughtfully, realizing that it was like her, very much like her, firm, hard, not pretty. And she was conscious of the man's face bending over hers, conscious, too, of that inner power in her which was dragging at him. Now was the time to escape, she thought, but something held her there—she did not want to escape. She looked him directly in the eye as he took her in his arms. "I did it," she said to herself with a curious, fatalistic honesty, as he kissed her lips and face passionately, roughly. "I wanted him to do it. It may be wrong, but I want him to kiss me." And she gave herself unresistingly to his embraces. . . .

A long, long time afterwards it seemed she came struggling back to the surface, and with a long shuddering sigh looked at her disheveled self, at him; and a sad smile quivered on her lips.

"Lilla! Lilla!" the man stammered, frightened and already repentant. "I—I didn't mean to . . . I didn't think . . . Lilla, forgive me!"

Lilla looked at him with a sudden contempt.

"Yes, you meant to, all along, I guess."

"You mustn't think that!"

"It wasn't your fault any more than mine," she said in a hard voice, as if a compelling honesty forced her to the admission.

LAMBERT seemed immensely relieved by this frank sharing of responsibility with him for what had occurred.

"You are an awful good sort, Lilla!" he said, trying to put his arm about her and draw her to him.

She drew back stubbornly, looking at him as if she were reading his man's soul like a wide-open book. She began deliberately to rearrange her disheveled dress, then leaned over the spring and washed her eyes, which were burning. Then without further words she rose and threaded her way through the underbrush to the beach. Wells followed.

"Lilla," he said as they emerged on the deserted sands. Then he tried to embrace her, but she slipped out of his hands and, facing him with a mocking smile, asked bluntly:

"Want to take me to Alaska now?"

"Why—why—certainly, if you want to go."

Lilla laughed gustily, harshly.

"Let's get home!"

They found Mrs. Vance at the cottage disturbed and suspicious. She had taken the afternoon train instead of waiting for the slower boat and had made inquiries of the neighbors. Lilla, leaving Wells to explain the day, said she had a headache and went at once to her room. When her mother knocked an hour later, the door was locked and no sound came from within. . . .

Lilla lay stretched, face up, straight out on her narrow cot-bed, staring into the dark with burning eyes. She did not seek to minimize or evade the tormenting thoughts that ran through her mind. She was "ruined"—yes, that was the word people used about women who had done what she had done.

It never occurred to her that she could go to Alaska with Lambert Wells, or that he could help her in any way. She had suggested Alaska merely at random as a kind of test. Now she spent no time reviling him for her plight. He was not to blame, or at any rate not more than she was herself, and her trouble was her own. The thing that haunted her most was her own double feeling—the attraction and the repulsion she had felt for Lambert, the willingness and the desperate unwillingness, and the weary indifference she now felt for him.

Hour by hour the silent night went by, and Lilla could not sleep. The same ideas kept coursing maddeningly through her suffering brain. If only her father had been alive—she knew she could have told him all, that he would have understood and helped her—but her mother, never! . . . She must be somehow different from other girls, coarser, lower, the sort that "wen' bad" from inclination, that no "good man" would ever want to marry. She was not "nice"; and a humble appreciation of her mother's puritan restrictions and prim inhibitions came over her. Her mother could never have been like her.

C. Lambert waded rapidly into the water with a great splashing indicative of his excitement. "Are you trying to drown yourself, Lilla?" he demanded.

FOR THREE years a great new world war has been going on, with Europe as the principal battleground—and until a year ago Europe didn't even know about it.

In 1919 certain crusading American prohibition groups, organizing the meager dry forces of Europe, declared war on the wet world. Europe and the world merely laughed.

It was like Liberia declaring war on the British Empire: it was a huge joke. One might as well make war on the bread or meat of the millions of Europe as to attack their wine and beer and spirits. It was all a fantastic, comic-opera joke.

And then a chill crept up the back of wet Europe. Slowly, silently, unknowingly, an Idea began to get abroad in the land. It seeped in, it slipped in like a shadow—and then suddenly it ceased to be a harmless joke and became cold, and to many, a harrassing reality.

That was about a year ago, and every day since then things have been humming in the wet and dry camps of Europe and the world. Rudely awakened from their sleepy security the wet interests of Europe have sprung to arms overnight and, now completely organized, equipped, and financed—and thoroughly frightened—are carrying on a determined offensive against the dry idea that is sweeping throughout the world.

Today these wet interests have a great international organization in Paris functioning like a general staff.

This world wet organization has France has the reputation of being a nation of moderate drinkers—but read these statistics (from "L'alcoolisme en France"—1913) for the five-year period between 1905 and 1910, which is the last reliable pre-war record obtainable. Total wine, beer, and spirits consumption is reduced to figures of 100% pure alcohol:

branches and national committees in all the countries of Europe.

For purposes of anti-prohibition propaganda they have easy access to practically the whole press of Europe.

They are securely intrenched in politics and are able in all but two or three smaller countries to control any unfavorable anti-liquor legislation that may come up.

They have powerful friends in governmental circles and, especially in the great wine-growing countries of southern Europe, they can bring pressure to bear on international trade agreements.

SPAIN, with the moral assistance of France and Italy, has forced bone-dry Iceland to open her doors to Spanish wines.

France, backed by Spain, is forcing partially dry Norway to accept her high percent wines.

So powerful is the economic pressure the wine interests can bring to bear, through their governments, that no small nation in Europe dares to go dry.

Lastly, they are carrying the war straight into the "enemy's" country, and if they feel it will have any effect they will not hesitate to spend money on electioneering propaganda in America during the Congressional elections. For America is the great enemy country in this wet war. America's finest old brewery families, dreaming of a light wine and beer era, could not contribute more prayers or enthusiasm or straight propaganda to the "cause," directly within the borders of the United States, than do the great wine exporters of France, financially assisted by all the "trade" interests of Europe.

For America is the crux of the whole wet and dry world problem—and every statement concerning the future of this world war must necessarily be marked with the tag, "If there is no change in American prohibition."

The moral significance of a dry America is tremendous. It would be difficult to overestimate the ultimate effect of this American idea on the consciousness of Europe. It is a part of the American civilization that is slowly spreading over the world—the civilization of the low-priced motor car, the picture show, the jazz music, the higher standard of living, the universal bathtub and toothbrush.

BUT BESIDES furnishing the moral issue, America is asked to furnish the dollars—the munitions of war. This, of course, is for the dry armies.

I recall very vividly what a temperance leader in Italy told me about the money side of this war. His name was Domenico Pastorello and he was an odd, little, half-shy man who had been dreaming about prohibition all his life. While we were having coffee in a tiny café in Venice he answered in broken English my question as to how soon Italy would go dry.

"Tell me how much money America will send us and how much we can raise here in Italy and I will tell you when Italy and the world will be prohibition. Money is everything—money and what happens in America. If we have money we can do a big propaganda and soon we will have a law against distilled spirits. Then slowly we will gain Local Option. Prohibition against wine and beer would come later when we have found a substitute for using the grapes besides making wine—when we have solved the economic side. . . . It will come—in twenty or thirty years Italy will be dry. And when Italy goes dry the world will be dry. Nothing can stop it once it gets started in Europe."

This was a dry "crank" talking—the same sort of crank who twenty-five years ago used to predict nation-wide prohibition in America. No one—except a few wise distillers and brewers and wine people—listens to this Italian fanatic, just as few listened to his American counterpart a generation ago; apparently he is an actor without an audience, but he will not be so for long.

That's where the great drama of all this liquor fight comes in—the drama of a handful of despised cranks backed only by an American idea and a few American dollars, fighting the combined traditions and customs and powers of the world. Time and again in the three months that I have been wandering about Europe and Britain gathering material for these articles, I have fairly gasped at the plain audacity, the daring, the apparent impossibility of this dry war. A few graybeards and old women—and an IDEA! And a great, sublime faith in the justice of their cause and an assurance of ultimate victory.

One sees about Europe the same despised dry leaders, the same "cranks," the same unpopular cause one saw a quarter of a century ago in America. To the uninitiated the whole movement is only fit for cartoonists and paragraphers. To the average European or Britisher it is still only a great joke—just as American prohibition was a joke a generation ago.

But this is far from true of the men who are financially interested in keeping the world wet. They are not only awake to the danger to their business—they are thoroughly frightened. And they have good cause to be.

To pick up the whole story one must go back to pre-war days. Long before the great World War threw the motor of civilization into reverse, a world prohibition campaign was well under way. Anti-alcoholic congresses had been held in different cities in Europe and America. In 1909, at the Anti-Alcoholic Congress in London, a World Prohibition Federation was formed under the active presidency of Guy Hayler of London.

However, it was always from America that the great force of the international prohibition idea came. The United States was far ahead of European nations in the progress of dry laws and prohibition territory, and most of the inspiration for the world temperance movement originated there.

The war brought a forced interruption to international intercourse and it was not until the FIFTEENTH International Congress Against Alcohol held in Washington, D. C., September 21-26, 1920, that the world movement was given a big push forward. However, previous to this meeting, "Pussyfoot" Johnson had invaded England and Scotland and brought to the British and European "trade" interests, their first vivid realization of what an American dry organizer, supplied with American expense money, could do. Opening offices in the heart of Fleet Street, London, Pussyfoot proceeded to inject American ideas and efficiency into the Scottish local option fight.

There is an interesting little story that has to do with the "discovery" of Pussyfoot. One bright morning in the summer of 1920, the city editor of the Daily Mail of London received a penciled note from Lord Northcliffe, the paper's owner and publisher, bearing this legend:

"If we don't watch out, these darn Yankees will be turning England dry. See what you can do about it."

THE CITY editor, naturally eager to follow up the wishes of his big chief, called over one of his star local reporters, handed him the note and without further instructions told him to get busy. This young man—Ferdinand Tuohy, by name—started out on his quest with drooping spirits and, in order to revive them a bit, stepped in at the venerable Cheshire Cheese, made famous some centuries ago by Doctor Johnson.

With his story on his mind and his glass of gin and bitters in his hand, Tuohy addressed the barmaid of the Cheshire Cheese as follows, "Cheerio! You know we'll be having prohibition over here soon enough."

Whereupon the barmaid informed the reporter that "one of 'em" had been in the bar that morning drinking water and looking about. "He wrote his name in the book there," she added. Our reporter, of course, promptly found the name and address, called on the good Pussyfoot, and the next morning the campaign started in the Daily Mail that cost Pussyfoot an eye but brought him eternal fame.

Pussyfoot's English and Scottish campaign, coupled with the ultimate realization that American prohibition was actually in the Constitution, brought some little temperature to the "liquor interests" of Britain and the Continent, but it came very slowly. The following year, at the Sixteenth Anti-Alcohol Congress held at Lausanne, Switzerland, in August, 1921, most of the international dry organizations held their annual meetings in connection with the Congress, and at the same time there was organized an International Temperance Bureau, with headquarters at Lausanne. This organization, under the direction of Dr. Hercod, was to be used as a propaganda-distributing center for all Europe. With the World Prohibition Federation and the World League Against Alcoholism, it makes up the Big Three in the move to make the world dry.

By the time this 1921 Anti-Alcoholic Congress was called the great wine-exporting interests of France, Italy, and Spain and the general wine, beer, and liquor interests of all Europe and Britain had become aware that there was a genuine world dry movement and that it could no longer sit back and smile at it. So from Paris a call was sent out and on September 23rd, 1921, almost immediately following the Anti-Alcoholic Congress, the first great international wet congress was convened at Lausanne.

At this two-day session ninety-eight delegates, representing twelve countries, were in attendance. These included representatives from Britain, France, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Switzerland, Sweden, Norway, Holland, Denmark, Poland, and Belgium. Plans were immediately started for a complete, embracing organization of the wine, beer, and spirits interests that could not only fight defensively against the slow but steady growth of the dry idea throughout the world, but conduct an active offensive against it, and again turn into the wet channels countries that were already dry.

C. To fill oneself with alcohol is to lose one's time, to lose one's money, to lose one's health, to lose one's intelligence, to lose one's dignity, to destroy one's children. The title is "The Octopus," and underneath is the statement that the drinker gives himself up without defense to the tentacles of the monster.

It is interesting to note that at this first Anti-Prohibition Congress no delegates from the old enemy countries were permitted to be seated. France especially drew this strict line. However, to get around this embarrassing situation the work of organizing the wine, beer, and spirits interests in the Central European countries was intrusted to a Swiss citizen by the name of Dr. Neumann—and at the Second Congress to be held in October of this year at Brussels these ex-enemy nations are to be represented by their own delegates on the threat that otherwise they will refuse to contribute to the central organization.

SUPPLIED with funds and an office at Berne, Dr. Neumann proceeded immediately on his task of arousing the sluggish wet proprietors throughout the new countries of the old Austro-Hungarian Empire, as well as Germany and Switzerland. Working temporarily through an organization known as the International Swiss Anti-Prohibition League, Dr. Neumann organized active national propaganda committees in Vienna, Prague, Budapest, and Berlin, and as I write these lines in midsummer, 1922, he is busy lecturing and instructing these different branches on the divers schemes of securing favorable wet propaganda, controlling politics, giving wine exhibits, raising funds and in all the details of handling a vigorous campaign.

I dropped in the National Hungarian Committee's offices in Budapest to see just what sort of work these different organizations were doing. The large, airy rooms, at No. 49 Podmaniczsky Street, were bristling with great posters announcing a wine industrial exhibition to be held in Budapest between August 18th and September 15th, of this year. Beaming with pride, the director of the bureau, a very genial gentleman by the name of Arthur Singer, explained that this was one of their first bits of real constructive work, and that they had other great things planned.

"Our Committee here in Hungary embraces every possible department of the whole wine, beer, and spirits industry," he explained with considerable enthusiasm. "We have seventeen distinct branches of the industry already organized. These include not only the distillers and brewers and wine makers but the bottle manufacturers and even the cork makers. Every part of the trade is working together. And it is very necessary.

"For a long time we were sleeping, but no longer. The enemy was right in our midst before we knew it. There have been two Americans here in the past few months organizing Prohibition Committees and spending American money. They have already given $500 to a Hungarian Anti-Alcoholic Committee headed by Countess Apponyi and they are going to give much more money. You know all this is Rockefeller money and he is going to pour thousands and thousands into Europe to make us dry here.

"But we are awake to our peril now and we will fight. There is great danger and we must all stand together. Americans must join with their European brothers and help. And Americans must work hard to smash their own terrible dry law. If she remains dry it will be very hard to keep the world from going dry. If America could go wet again it would be very easy to keep the whole world wet. America is everything in this fight."

But this local country organizing is but one small phase of the great offensive being carried on at present by the wine, beer, and spirits interests of Europe. Probably most spectacular of all is the effort made through and directly by the governments of the wine countries of Spain, France, and Italy, to break down in other countries any legislation or trade barriers against the importation of wines. And more startling than that, to actually compel tiny countries that are bone dry to open their doors again to the importation of wine.

In the case of small, weak Iceland this has actually been done by the government of Spain, at the behest, and in the direct interest of its wine exporters. Iceland was the first country in the world to go bone dry. Her prohibition legislation came into effect June 1, 1915, and no objection was raised against it until a little over a year ago, when Spain demanded, in the form of an economic ultimatum, that Iceland should modify her prohibition law in such a way as to permit [Continued on page 104]

THE MAN WHO DIDN'T PLAY FAIR

By William MacHarg

Illustrated by David Robinson

AT TIMES Laura Burroughs wondered in what way it was that she loved her husband. Not intensely, though that had been true in the first years of their marriage. Not with ardor even. Matter-of-factness had come into their relation in the eight years of their life together.

Sometimes he seemed to her, in her appreciation of his mental processes, a portion almost of herself; sometimes it seemed as if this were an illusion produced merely by the regularity of routine. In either case, no new experiences seemed possible between them.

She sat each morning in the octagonal dining-room whose high-set windows gave no outlook on the nearby surrounding buildings but let in a flood of sunlight on the fresh linen and the shining silver; and he sat across from her, smooth-shaven and ready for the office. At five in the afternoon, he called her up to learn what their evening plans were. She rebelled occasionally against this uniformity; why did he not call her up at three, or four, or six? But to have done so once would have made no difference. It distressed her to realize that habit completely controlled them; their life was fixed; it would go on like this till both were old and death supervened.

At breakfast on this particular morning, she was opening her letters, interspersed with first-of-the-month household bills, and making comments to him.

"Listen," she said. "Isn't this dandy, Henry! You know mother has left Paris and her steamer gets here a week from Wednesday. Well, Jessica and Ted are coming East; they'll get here the day before she does. They've planned that because of her. They'll spend a week here with us and then go back with mother to Detroit."

"That's fine," he said.

She opened the next envelope and her brows drew together in perplexity.

"Why, Henry, this is queer! Phillips and Marsh have charged a lot of things to me that I never bought. A steamer rug. A trunk. All traveling things. And such terribly expensive things, too! All things for some woman who is going on a trip."

"Some mistake," he answered. "Let me have the bill. I'll step in there today and have it straightened out."

"There's no need of your doing it. I'm going there myself this afternoon. I'll speak to them."

"Laura, give me that bill."

"Why, how strange you are. You've always said you didn't want to be bothered with the bills and complained to them if they sent them to the office——"

Suddenly fear struck through her, unexpected, chilling. She looked swiftly up and saw that he was caught.

Her mind jumped intuitively. A score of incidents which had seemed unimportant at the time fell into place like bits of glass in a kaleidoscope.

"Good God," she heard him say angrily, under his breath.

"Of course," she managed. "I understand that this part of the bill was expected to go to your office." Then she could not go on.

A hand had reached into her breast and caught her heart. She was in agony with feelings that she had never had before—with shame, with sickening disillusionment, with jealousy, with blind anger, with horror. Startling memories were coming to her—his talk of business necessitating a South American trip; the vague reasons he had assigned during the last few weeks why portions of their property should be in her name; the papers she had signed, usually without even reading them.

C Laura was in agony with feelings that she had never had before—with shame and sickening disillusionment, with jealousy and blind anger.

The maid came in, bringing the breakfast coffee, and Henry followed the maid back to the door.

"Don't come in here again," he told her.

He closed the door after the maid and turned around. He had turned white and sick and guilty looking, but there was something dogged in his manner, too. He seemed like a man cornered against odds, who has long seen the inevitability of a leap into space and who suddenly resolves to take it.

"Well, it's out," he said unevenly. "I'm sorry, Laura. But you're persistent; now that you've seen that bill you'd keep after it until you got the answer. It doesn't really matter; you'd have known in a few days anyway. Only I wanted to spare you what I could. I've got myself into a terrible mess. I've been in hell for weeks; I—I didn't want to drag you any deeper into it than I could help."

"You're taking someone with you!"

"I'm leaving New York—with her—for good. I've done the best I can for you. I've left you almost all the property. This house is yours."

"That does not interest me. Who is the woman?"

"Oh, it's just a girl." He seemed to regard her question merely as an interruption. "Believe me, Laura, I've tried to think it out and do the best I could for everyone. I've got to go. It is the only way."

She had a feeling of amazement. "You've got to go?" she asked. "What do you mean?"

"There's going to be a baby."

She sat perfectly still; she could not, she felt, have moved; what held her was the unbelievableness of what she heard. This was her husband—Henry—opposite whom she had sat, three minutes before, opening her mail, secure, happy at least as the average person is. She felt rages of jealousy and hate surging

“Did mere youth mean so much to men that an older woman could not war successfully against it?” Laura asked herself despairingly inside of her. She did not know why, instinctively, her mind went back months and months to a night—several nights in succession—when, awakening, she had found that he had left the bed beside her own and was sleeping on the couch in his dressing-room adjoining.

“You must make more explanation to me than this,” she told him, stifling.

“I can’t see what more you’d want to know.”

“How long has this been going on?”

“ABOUT a year.” It seemed a relief to him to talk. “You remember when the Norvalburg Motor Company’s affairs were up and P. J. Valley asked me out to Long Island over the weekend to talk over the reorganization? It was a wild party. There were girls there. There was a lot of drinking. You don’t know what some of those house parties are. You never will. All men—and girls who do not care. Through it all Valley and I were really doing business. I’m not trying to excuse myself. I picked this girl out because she really was quite innocent, it was the first time she had been on a party of that sort—and since they’d made the rule that everyone must have a girl, she seemed the safest. Then—Good God, Laura, I can’t explain to you how it happened! You wouldn’t understand. The atmosphere is different. Things don’t seem so much to matter. A man—among men—”

“And it’s been going on ever since?”

“At intervals. You see, she didn’t want to give me up—I told you she was inexperienced. She really is a very good sort of a girl. Lives at home with her family. Her people aren’t much. And then—this happened. What I told you.”

“How old is she?”

“Nineteen.”

“Does—does she want the baby?” Laura asked breathlessly.

He stared at her. “Want it?” he repeated. “Heavens, no! She—she hates the thought of it. It’s—her trouble. It’s separating her from her family—from the people that she knows. It’s—it’s smashed her life. Like mine. She wanted just to go away somewhere—and leave the baby with someone to be taken care of and then come back home. I wouldn't let her do that. I couldn't. I'm responsible. It's my——"

"No; of course you can't leave it with strangers to be brought up. Is she still at home?"

"She can't be; her family would find out. They think she's visiting a girl she knows up state, but really she's in town at a hotel. She mails her letters to her family under cover to the girl, and the girl mails them back."

She shrank back sickly.

"I know," he said. "It's sordid; one thing follows another and leads on and on. I tell you that I've been in hell—seeing her and then coming back to you, immaculate. It's awful to hurt you in this way! I hate to do it; I wanted merely to go away and let you find out afterward only as much as might be necessary. And—and it worked out well, considering everything, with your mother coming so she can be with you——"

SHE PUT up her hands with a gesture of horror and appeal. "You can't do that!" she cried. "You mustn't! I'll not have them find me here like that. Deserted. Mother and Jessica and Ted. I won't be pitied. I won't have Jessica comparing you with Ted and me with her. I won't listen to the sort of things they'd say. You've got to stay here till they've come and gone. After they're gone——"

He stood gazing at her uncertainly. "Laura, if it were possible to talk this thing over sensibly——" he said.

"Am I not talking it over sensibly? Can you ask more than I am doing? Haven't I tried to accept things as they are? But there are limits."

"Laura, there are a good many reasons why I ought to go on Thursday as I planned."

"What reasons?"

He came intently closer to her. "It's not so easy to arrange such a thing as this so that it protects the child. You can't bring a child into the world without some people knowing it. Even if she went somewhere under an assumed name—— But this way the baby will be born at sea. You see, that's different. I've taken passage on a small steamer; there are very few other passengers, none who will have any curiosity. Everything will seem regular. There are plenty of babies born at sea. We go aboard as two, we land as three. Who in South America ever would make inquiries? You see; it starts the baby right."

"I will take charge of that," she said.

Her words seemed incomprehensible to him. She was very white; her fingers moved queerly on the tablecloth in front of her.

"Perhaps you don't remember," she declared, "that among the charities I've given money to there's a maternity home. My word goes a long way there. If—if a girl goes there ostensibly sent by me, and I request that no questions shall be asked, it can be made very easy for all who are concerned. But I won't be left here to face my family all alone."

HE SEEMED bewildered. "You mean," he asked incredulously, attempting to realize what she had just said, "that after what I've told you, you want me to stay here in this house?"

"Yes."

"You want me to meet your mother and your sister and her husband and deceive them as to what is going on?"

"You ought not to find the deception difficult," she told him. "You've deceived me for a year. It is only until they go."

He dropped into his seat across from her and put his face into his hands.

"I have some rights," she said unsteadily. "You cannot trample upon all of them. If this is to be done, I can at least demand that it be done the way I want it done," Laura declared.

After a while he raised his head and looked at her.

"All right," he said, "do it the way you wish."

He got up, gazing at her uncertainly; then as she said nothing more, he opened the door into the hall.

"The car is waiting, Mr. Burroughs," the maid announced outside. She brought his hat, and he took it and again looked back at Laura before he left.

Laura knew that she would not have acted as she had just done toward her husband if it had not been for the opposition between herself and her mother and her sister. She had never had an actual disagreement, it was true, with either of them. She admired and loved her mother, the beautiful Mrs. Walton, who was good, intelligent, with an exalted sense of honor that had made Laura feel often that her mother was superior to herself. Mrs. Walton was too good and too honorable, as everyone declared, and as she herself had given evidence by her actions, to have lived even a day with Laura's father after she had discovered that he was unfaithful to her. She had divorced him when Laura was six.

Mrs. Walton had brought up her two daughters very carefully. Jerry Walton, if he had proved himself unfit to be a husband, had never unfitted himself to be a money-maker. There was a pleasing alimony which allowed his former wife to do exactly as she wished. Mrs. Walton had wished to go once a year to Europe, except during the war years, and to be a prominent and popular member of a number of women's clubs and of several welfare movements. Society liked and admired her. Laura had seen that her mother made many women, who found themselves chained to the wheel of their household cares, envy her freedom and caused them to wonder whether, after all, married life was indeed all that they had once thought it must be.

The trouble was that Laura never had ceased to love her father. Even when she was a tiny child he had pretended to pay respect to her opinions and to listen to what she had to say as attentively as though she had been a grown person, and in the security of being treated thus, she had talked childish matters with him that she would not have mentioned to anyone else.

Of course, there were some things about her father that had troubled her and hurt her. She could recall, young as she had been, that before the divorce a picture of her mother had stood always on her father's dresser. After the divorce, when she had visited her father, there had been still a picture, not of her mother, on the dresser. About the age of twelve, she had become aware that it was not always the same picture.

THIS bore out clearly her mother's contention that her father was a wicked man. But Laura saw that he was never angry to the point of taking out his irritation unjustly upon those around him; that he never spoke harshly even to his servants, and that his servants loved him. She saw that he wished well to those about him. She perceived also that, while her mother implied often in the presence of her daughters that their father was a despicable and immoral person, her father spoke always gently and kindly of her mother.

Mrs. Walton laid Laura's affection for her father to what she termed the "injustice" of the court decree, which had compelled her to let her daughters see their father at stated intervals. She made it quite plain that she felt that her former husband had taken advantage of this to poison Laura's mind against her. Laura had long given up trying to make her mother share her own belief that her father hoped that her mother was happy; she felt that her complete inability to make her mother believe this was peculiarly indicative of instinctive longing for revenge against her former husband on her mother's part.

These feelings of her mother's, she was vaguely conscious, were somehow at the bottom of her mother's opposition to her own marriage to Henry Burroughs. Of course, Mrs. Walton had not assigned Henry's likeness in many ways to Jerry Walton as the basis of her objection to him; she had contended merely that he then held so small a position in the firm of corporation lawyers with which he was connected that it gave her anxiety as to Laura's future; and she had contrasted Laura's marriage with that of Jessica, who had married an automobile manufacturer in Detroit, where the couple was known as "the" Ted Meadows.

But these things had summed themselves into a total, so that Laura, when she had realized her husband's guilt, had been overwhelmed, even in her resentment and misery, by the coming of her mother and her sister; she shrank from their being present personally to have the triumph of pitying her, of discussing with her the destruction of her marriage, and of weeping over her. For the instant this had proved the stronger feeling.

With Henry's departure for the office, the house snapped back unbelievably into its routine. There was something incredible to Laura in this stability of everyday affairs. Her throat was dry, her eyes were hot and wet with shame and outrage; the temple of her married life had fallen into ruins. Yet merely because there was here a house upon a New York cross-street, with its several servants; because the telephone would ring with people trying to make engagements with her or asking for instructions; because the household was going forward by its own inertia and she must oversee it, her life gave no external evidence that it was suddenly overturned.

Her plan had been to go shopping in the afternoon, and after thinking it over, she decided that she still would do that. She got back in the late afternoon, and as she was taking off her things the thought came to her that today [Continued on page 98]

is interested in a Woman who is mysterious but it takes more than Mystery to make a woman Irresistible

GREGORY MOREL had seen her first standing by a red poinsettia bush in her garden, with the monkey on her shoulder. He had been busy all day getting settled in his house in Vedado, on the heights above Havana, and had come out at evening to loaf in his own small garden and to smoke a cigarette. A hedge of hibiscus separated his place from hers; he had looked over it and had seen her, standing motionless, poised, one hand lifted to support the small gray animal on her shoulder. In the distance, by a chance trick of composition, was some glint of opal sea. . . . The play of light made a remote background for her head; gave a shade of purple to her dark hair.

Morel was grateful for the picture. It was the second year after the war, and the war was still pretty vividly fastened upon his mind. He was rather an easy-going, phlegmatic sort of blond young American. But the war had stirred him and shaken him. It had left him with a desire for aloofness and peace. Unconsciously he had come to regard himself as one who stands outside the life-current, looking on with appreciation and interest, but without emotion.

Perhaps he had sensed something of the same attitude in the woman standing by the poinsettia bush. There was an element of deliberation in her choice of pose, in her choice of background; yet she was also subtly detached, removed from her surroundings.

He had had a whimsical notion that he ought to applaud her.

He went back into his house, pleased with his own state of mind. Yes, he was grateful for whatever life could give him in the way of beauty. But he was not to be moved by it. His ideal of spectatorship did not admit of romance except at second hand.

He was lucky, and knew it. He had come out of the war whole, and with a decent record. He had returned to his job in the Anglo-American Bank of Cuba, had been made second vice-president and was doing well. Extremely well. He had promised himself in France that if ever he got back to Havana he would have a house in Vedado, a house to himself, where he could stretch out and order his life as he wanted it.

WELL, he had his house. A square, single-story building, of pale pink cocoa-stone, with iron-barred windows, and high-ceilinged rooms separated by swinging shutters that reached only as high as his head. The living-room opened directly off the porch. The floor was of native tile and the walls were decorated with a faded fresco. It was all very cool and comfortable and satisfying. The Chinese servant who served him his dinner was satisfying. He dined by candle-light, looking out over a small balcony toward the house opposite. While he was drinking his coffee he saw a figure come to the window of that house and close the shutters. He recognized the woman he had seen in the garden. The monkey was still perched on her shoulder.

He wondered who she was; and then, definitely, as one who excludes a thought that would tend to qualify or define a mood of delightful abstraction, he put aside curiosity. What he wanted, what his spirit wanted, was not experience or adventure. It was peace and beauty—at a distance.

But the next Saturday afternoon, after eighteen holes of golf, as he sat drinking his Scotch and soda on the veranda of the Country Club, he spoke to Mrs. Titcombe about his neighbor. Mrs. Titcombe knew everything and everybody in Havana. She was an Englishwoman, the wife of a British official, charming and omniscient. She had been asking Gregory about his house—they were sitting at a table waiting for Titcombe to come from the locker-room—and Morel, on impulse, had mentioned the woman who lived next-door to him.

"She has purple hair, and carries a monkey on her shoulder. I've seen her in her garden. Very picturesque."

"And mysterious," said Mrs. Titcombe.

"Why?"

"Simply because she is. Oh, there's no gossip about her. . . . That's why she's mysterious."

"Do you know her?"

"No one knows her. Her name is Courbet—Madame Courbet. French? Yes. But she's not I think. She came out in 1918—while you were in khaki. One sees her at the races, at the Casino here occasionally. Always alone, always striking. . . . Extraordinary! May I give you some tea?"

"No, thanks." He hesitated a moment; then said: "But someone must know her."

"My dear Gregory, if I don't know her she simply isn't known. Of course I called, and she received me. Charming, but absolutely elusive. . . . A day or two later, when I got home from the Orphanage Committee—we're having a bazaar after Lent; you must come and spend money, Gregory—I found her cards. I haven't tried again. Something about the woman—an aloofness. One feels it."

"And respects it," said Morel.

"Oh, quite. After all, why shouldn't she be mysterious if she wants to be? It's none of my business."

"Nor mine."

Mrs. Titcombe tilted her pretty head in a mocking way she had.

"YOU? YOU'LL probably fall in love with her across that hibiscus hedge of yours, and then I shall hate her, because she'll monopolize you—"

"No!" said Morel. "I'm not falling in love this season."

"Not even with me?"

"Oh, that's different. I'm perennially in love with you, Lydia."

"Do come and tell me so occasionally. I'll be quite lonely after Freddie goes."

"Where is he going?"

"To England. Some silly directors' meeting—Oh, hello, Freddie"—This to her husband, who had just come up to the table. "What do you think? Gregory loves me."

"Does he? Damned bit of cheek, I call it. . . . I got an 83 on the last round, my boy. Hang the ant-hills, though. They're ruining the course. Are you paying for the drink?"

"Yes," said Morel, and beckoned to a waiter. "Dos highballs escoses. . . ."

"We were talking," said Mrs. Titcombe, "about that mysterious woman in Vedado. Madame Courbet. Gregory says she has purple hair."

"What earthly difference does it make? I say, they ought to do something about those damned ants. . . ."

Morel leaned back in his chair, sipped his drink and looked out over the rolling green course adorned with clumps of palm trees. How good it was to hold such pictures in one's eyes. How good to lounge on the broad veranda, in the cool of the winter afternoon, with these friendly, casual people who shared with him the slight wistfulness of voluntary exile. Yes, it was exile in a way; Cuba was exile. But that was good, too. One worked here; worked hard and steadily. But it wasn't like grinding away at a desk at home. One could keep one's mind always a little apart; the whole atmosphere had enough of pageantry in it to be something of a spectacle. Life didn't grip you and plunge your head under the stream. . . .

No; he wasn't falling in love this season.

"But why the monkey?" Unconsciously he had spoken his thought aloud.

"Exactly," said Mrs. Titcombe. "I saw it the day I called. Horrid little beast. Looked at me as if I were a python. I don't like monkeys. They're too—reminiscent. I wonder if they haven't souls?"

"Rot," said her husband. "Damned rot!" and added, somewhat querulously: "Why don't we talk about the ants? They're positively a menace. . . . I daresay they'll have gobbled the course by the time I get back from England."

The monkey's name was Koko. Morel heard the servant next door, a shrill-voiced Spanish woman, calling it at the top of her lungs. "Koko! Koko! Where are you? You'll drive me mad. The mistress wants you—"

Koko. An absurd name. It amused him. Also, for no reason, it irritated him a little. Why didn't Madame Courbet keep the little beast in a cage? Why must she let it have the run of the place, as if it were a member of her household—?

It was the monkey that brought them finally together.

HE WAS sitting sprawled in his living-room, one evening, with his pipe and a book, when he heard the Spanish woman shouting under his windows. He got up, pretending to be entertained, but in reality annoyed at the uproar. At that moment there came a knock at the front door. He crossed the room and opened it. Madame Courbet was there, standing on his porch, her pale face made startling by the light falling out of the doorway. She had around her throat a string of pearls. He noticed that, and her dark eyes; they were like pieces of jet, luminous, set under highly-arched brows.

She spoke calmly, in English, with a slight accent.

"I am very sorry. I think Koko is in your house. Maria says she saw him go in through the window."

"Shall I look?" said Morel. "Or will you—?"

"I'll come in, if you please. He would never come to you."

"By all means," said the young man, and held open the door for her. She gave him a quick glance and swept past him. He went about turning on the electric lights. . . .

Shortly he heard her voice from the dining-room. He went to the door and saw Koko perched on the buffet, eating a banana which he had appropriated from a fruit-dish.

Madame Courbet was apologetic.

"I am very sorry. He is a thief. He has stolen a banana."

"He's quite welcome to it," said Gregory, laughing.

She addressed the monkey. "Come to me, Koko. At once, do you hear?" The monkey began to chatter at her, showed its teeth and, as she came toward it, leaped up to the top of the buffet, where it sat scowling.

"He is sulky. He doesn't like me tonight," said Madame Courbet, in a tone that gave Morel an unpleasant shock. It was exactly as if she had been speaking of a person. She took another step forward, holding out her hands.

"Koko?" Then suddenly, almost passionately: "I tell you to come down. I won't have it, do you understand? I shall wear it all I choose. . . . If you sulk, I shall sell you, do you hear? Sell you!"

The monkey gave a queer sound—something between a cry and a hiss. It made Morel's flesh creep. And it produced a sudden change in Madame Courbet. She seemed to give in, to surrender. Certainly her attitude was one of conciliation.

"Very well. I'll take it off." He saw her hands go to her throat; she was taking off the pearl necklace. She held it bunched in her hand. "Look, Koko. I won't wear it any more tonight. I promise."

THE MONKEY climbed down from the buffet and leaped to her shoulder. She turned to Morel, and reading the amazement on his face, smiled coldly.

"He is a tyrant. He doesn't like me to wear my pearls."

"I see," said Gregory. "I see. So that's why he ran away?"

"Yes. I am very sorry. I will try not to let it happen again."

"Not at all. Don't mention it. . . . I see," stammered the young man, as he walked with her to the door. What he thought was: "This is extraordinary—grotesque. . . . The idea of humoring a monkey's whims. . . . It ought to be explained. You ought to explain it. . . . There's something queer about this." But all he said was: "Not at all. I see. Good evening."

She went out. The door closed after her. He returned to his pipe and his novel; but he was uncomfortably aware of his inability to lose himself in the book. He kept thinking of Madame Courbet, not as a picture, but as a person. She had become for him, all at once, disturbingly real. Yet there was about her, about her actions, her gestures, the tones of her voice, that which left his impression of her still pretty much in the air.

Hang it, why must she come trailing mystery into his house? A few nights later he deliberately spoke to her across the hibiscus hedge. He had been smoking in his patch of garden and she had come into hers, apparently to stand by the poinsettia bush and nothing more. It seemed ridiculous not to speak to her.

"Good evening," said Morel, in what he conceived to be a neighborly tone. "How is —Koko?"

She turned to him without embarrassment or restraint.

"He is chained up. I am punishing him. He had no right to run away."

"Oh, well," said Morel, lightly. "It's good to run away now and then. Relieves the monotony."

"But monotony is good, too," she said.

"Yes. If it's the right sort."

She inclined her head as if to agree with him, said, "Good evening," turned and walked away toward the house. He did not take it as a rebuff. It was merely that she had nothing further to say to him.

He lighted a fresh cigarette, and strolled about, watching the pink and jade evening melt out of the sky. "I understand," he said to himself, "I understand. . . . You want simply to be let alone. Well, good Lord! I shan't bother you."

HE WENT to bed that night, saying: "I understand. It's quite natural. Rest assured I shan't bother you. . . ."

The next time he saw her was at the races. He had gone into the grandstand to speak to Mrs. Titcombe and that lady had pointed her out to him at once.

"There's your lady of Veda-do. In the third box from ours. Alone, as usual. Don't look now——"

A moment later he looked. Yes, it was Madame Courbet. She was beautifully dressed, and with her pale face, her red lips, her dark eyes and hair, made a figure that was, as Mrs. Titcombe once had said, unusually striking.

"Run along, Gregory," said the Englishwoman. "I know you're dying to speak to her."

"No."

"Is it because you've not been properly presented? I'll take you over to her, if you like——?"

"Thanks, no," said Morel, calmly.

"Extraordinary!" said his companion. "She seems to exist for no other reason than to make a picture——"

Gregory did not go to Madame Courbet's box, nor even look at her again. But at the close of the afternoon, as he was leaving the grandstand, he suddenly came across her in the crowd.

¶ She stood there, her pale face made startling by the light falling on it. What strange imposition was it that kept her natural energies confined? She had become for Gregory, at once, disturbingly real. Still she had come trailing mystery into his house.

"How do you do?" he inquired, smiling, as he took off his hat. "How do you do?"

Her voice was cool and gracious, but there was in it a degree of finality that left him without further opportunity for speech. He bowed and went on. Driving home, in his modest roadster, he passed her riding in an open coche. For some reason it irritated him. "Parallel lines," he reflected, "never meet."

That particular proposition in geometry had somehow always irritated him.

He felt—baffled.

He saw her scarcely ever in her garden after that. She seemed to be avoiding him. And then, by an utterly commonplace turn of circumstances, he was drawn into close acquaintance with Madame Courbet.

SHE HAD come to the bank for advice and assistance regarding her business affairs, and they had sent her to him. The business in question involved not only the transfer of her property in France to American and Cuban holdings, but the transfer of her citizenship as well. It was a complicated and rather an intimate transaction, which continued over a period of several weeks. Morel handled it with a tact, a professional decorum that at times seemed almost to amuse her. But she was grateful to him, nevertheless. "You have been very kind," she said to him at the close of their final interview.

"Not at all," replied Gregory, with a fine impersonality. "Not at all. It's my business, you know. . . . I'll bring those papers to your house tonight. You can sign them there. You won't need a witness. That will finish everything."

"You are very kind," she said again, and gave him her hand. He took it—still with his impersonal air—was conscious of a sweetness in the contact, and dropped it hurriedly. She bowed, and left the office.

He had learned in the course of his dealings with her a good deal about the facts of her life. She was a Russian, born in Moscow, but had spent most of her life in London and in Paris. She had married in 1912, two years before the war, a wealthy young Frenchman, Raoul Courbet, concerning whom Morel knew nothing except that he had died of wounds received in battle, in the autumn of 1914. Four years later Madame Courbet had come to Cuba, had taken a house in Vedado, and had remained there, alone with her servants and her inexplicable monkey, ever since.

These things he had learned, but they told him little of the woman herself. That he wanted to know more about her he did not admit; at least he had not admitted it up to the moment of her final departure from his office. But that afternoon, driving home in his car, he faced his curiosity frankly—and found that it was more than curiosity. "Good Lord!" he thought, "am I falling in love with her, after all?" Then: "Of course I'm not. I'm simply interested in her as—as an enigma. I've always been fond of puzzles." He clung to that. "I've always been fond of puzzles—"

What an odd sensation it had been to touch her hand! Like a slight electric shock. He could feel it now, exciting, vital. Yes, she was a vital creature! What strange imposition was it that kept her natural energies confined to a graceful impotence? He would like to know. He would find out if he could, and then, having solved the puzzle, abandon it for his somewhat impaired spectatorship.

THAT night, after dinner, he took to her house the papers she had to sign. When she had put her name to them, he said:

"That's the end of it. You're a citizen of the Republic of Cuba, now. And your property is quite safe, I believe."

"I will never have to go back to France?"

"No. You can spend your life here, if you like."

She stood looking at him across a table with a lamp on it. The monkey was on her shoulder—he had crouched there, grinning at Morel, while she was signing the documents.

"Yes," she said. "I shall spend my life here."

It was on the tip of his tongue to ask: "Why?" But he said simply, "You like Cuba?"

"Very much. It has charm and color. . . . One finds here always the appropriate background."

He said: "I suppose that's what we're all looking for, isn't it? The appropriate background?"

Her face was like marble in the flare of the lamp.

"Yes. . . . One thinks of life as a painting. One feels the necessity to find one's proper place in the composition."

He had been ready to agree with her till then; he wanted to agree with her, to put himself on a plane with her, whatever that plane might be. But there was something in this brief statement of her philosophy that he was forced to combat, something unpleasant in the thought of reducing life to two dimensions. A painting—? So that was how she looked at it! That was why she moved so picturesquely—the word had been more apt than he had realized—through the social fabric of Havana, without becoming entangled in it? That was her pose—?

Had it not been also his? No matter—

"I don't know that I look at it quite that way," he said, awkwardly. "I have a feeling that, after I've thought it out, I'd dispute that with you. At least," he broke off, with a laugh that caused Koko to scowl at him, "if you're ever so good as to talk with me again."

"I should like to talk with you. . . . You have been very kind. But I must tell you—I never make friends."

"Neither do I," said Morel.

That amused her.

"But you have a great many friends, Mr. Morel."

"No; as a matter of fact, I haven't. I've a good many acquaintances, but as for friends—"

"That pretty Mrs. Titcombe, for instance?"

"Oh, yes, Lydia. I've known her for ages. But since the war I've been—I can't seem to want to get too close to people."

"That's interesting. . . ." She had stopped smiling; her eyes looked steadily into his. Her hand—she had a long, white hand—stroked slowly the monkey's fur. "If you want to talk with me, come and I'll give you a cup of tea."

"When?" said Gregory.

"Any time. I have no engagements."

"Tomorrow?"

Her hand paused in its caressing movement.

"Very well. If you like."

"Good," said Morel. "I'll come about five."

The monkey had begun to chatter. She took him down from her shoulder and tossed him lightly to the floor. "Go away, Koko. I won't have you scolding me, do you understand?" Then straightening up, she said to Morel:

"BUT REMEMBER, it is the beginning of nothing. I tell you that because you have been kind, and because I—because it is only honest to tell you."

"I understand," said Morel. "I'll come, and we'll talk." He put out his hand. "It is interesting, as you say. Like meeting someone on a journey, and going along with him a way, and getting nowhere."

"Yes," said Madame Courbet.

He was rather proud of himself for putting it so neatly. If only her hand had not that odd electric quality—!

He went to her house the next afternoon with a sense of excitement that he was at pains to tell himself did not exist. She received him on a small screened balcony that overhung her garden. The monkey, fastened by a collar and chain to the grilled railing, sat falkily in a corner. He chattered as Morel appeared.

"I've chained up Koko. He doesn't like me today."

"He has bad taste," said Morel.

She disregarded his answer and occupied herself with a samovar under which burned a charcoal fire. She had on a plain white skirt and a loose blouse the color of coral. The string of pearls was around her neck.

She was not beautiful, perhaps; but certainly she had command of beauty. Her hair had the dark gloss of heavy wet strokes of paint, and was coiled in a conscious and facile design. Her features, under their mask of serenity, were mobile and expressive. Her red mouth, had it been less finely drawn, would have been fantastic. But she escaped the fantastic by virtue of her poise, her intelligence, her quiet grace. One felt an intellectual presence standing guard over the assembled pattern of her appearance.

She fitted perfectly into her background. The bouganvillea climbing with its purple flower over the balcony gave just the proper note of color to supplement her own coloring. If it was her desire to make a picture of herself, to arrange herself in a composition, she had succeeded admirably.

She gave him a cup of tea and he drank it, while the monkey glared at him from the corner. Its small eyes were alive with a peculiar vindictiveness. It had a habit of drawing back its lips in an uncanny grin. Occasionally it made a hissing sound, like that of an onlooker at a displeasing play.

"Koko, behave yourself," said Madame Courbet.

C "You will think I am mad," she said slowly, "but I know that the soul of my husband lives in that little beast, Koko. If I broke my vow he would know and laugh. . . ." Gregory had a feeling that they were both mad. Two mad figures, and the monkey, with its brilliant eyes, in a room of shadows.

"He's having some sort of a joke at my expense," said Morel. "No. It's I. . . . You see, I am wearing my pearls." Gregory put down his cup. "Look here—" he began; then checked himself. "I see," he substituted weakly. "I have had this necklace since I was a child. My husband—" She stopped. He was aware of some obstacle in her mind. After a moment, as if compelled to go on, she said: "My husband never liked it. He had an aversion to pearls. It was nothing—a prejudice. . . ."

"And Koko has the same prejudice?"

"Yes," said Madame Courbet, in a tone that made Morel turn to look at her.

"Are you fond of him?—of Koko?"

"Fond of him?" She seemed surprised at the question; he had a notion that she would have liked to avoid it. But he kept his eyes on hers. "My husband gave him to me," she said finally. "It was in Morocco—while we were on our wedding journey."

"I see. It's a natural sentiment. . . . I mean, that you should be attached to him."

"Yes, I am attached to him. . . . May I give you another cup of tea?"

"No, thanks."

She offered him a cigarette from a carved silver box, took one herself and lighted it. "I'm sorry I have no Russian tobacco to offer you. It is much better than this—"

"I've been thinking," observed Morel, rather bluntly, "of what you said yesterday. About life being—like a painting. A composition. You really believe that?"

"For myself, yes."

"But—how does it work out? I'm interested. . . . There was a fellow in my company in France. A painter. Quite a promising one, I believe. He was killed at St. Mihiel. I used to talk to him. . . . He told me once that the chief problem a painter had to contend with was the problem of giving solidity to his subjects. That is, of creating a third dimension. It was this third dimension, he said, that gave the illusion of life. And you are trying to reduce life to two dimensions!"

She said: "My husband was an artist."

"A painter?"

"Yes. He belonged to the most advanced group. . . . His idea was that life could be represented only by a fourth dimension; by an arrangement of patterns to represent the abstract. His paintings were attempts to portray a mood—a spiritual pose. As an artist he did not admit the importance, or even the reality, of physical properties."

"He must have been a remarkably high-minded man," said Morel with interest.

She was looking down at the tip of her cigarette. Her face, seen at that angle, was a little out of drawing, a little strange.

"His mind was one thing," she said. "He was another."

She did not elaborate the statement. She simply put it forth as though to correct a false impression—an impression that did not matter particularly except as it was false.

Morel decided to press on a little farther.

"WHAT you're trying to do," he said, "is to put your husband's theories into practice. To live in the abstract, so to speak. Is that it?"

She looked, not at him, but at Koko crouching in his corner. Gregory followed her glance and again felt the vindictiveness of the monkey's pinched stare.

"Yes," she said, simply; "I suppose that is it—if it can be put into words."

He had an impulse to protest, to denounce her point of view as monstrous and absurd. But he went on, cautiously: "It's a bit beyond me. How can you? What does it prove?"

"Is it necessary to prove anything? Yet—as far as that goes—it proves that life can be what he tried to make it—on canvas. A mood, a spiritual pose—"

"But what possible satisfaction—"

She caught him up: "Ah, satisfaction! Well, does an artist paint to satisfy others, or to satisfy himself? He paints to satisfy himself—to express himself; and if he is an esthete as well, he finds pleasure, not in the cause or effect of his work, but in its enjoyment. It is the projection—and the appreciation—of his own soul that counts."

"That may be true," said Gregory, now definitely committed to argument. "But when the thing is done—it is shown. Your creation, your purpose, even if you succeeded in accomplishing it, would be simply a gesture lost in the air. Who will ever know?"

"Koko will know," she said; and rose with an abruptness that broke up Morel's line of thought completely. He felt confused and bewildered, as if he had been waked from a dream—a dream in which he had carried on a conversation in Sanskrit with a beautiful mummy.

He went back to his own house, stretched himself out in the living-room, and fortifying himself with whisky and tobacco, tried to analyze his own position in the matter. He realized that he had been inconsistent; he had held himself out to her, had gained her confidence, to a certain extent, as a fellow-abstractionist. Then, when it had come to the point, he'd jumped over the fence and demanded what good it was to waste one's gestures on the air. The whole matter was strange and discomforting; and the most discomforting element in it was Koko.

The damned little beast had a secret in its eyes.

MRS. TITCOMBE's charity bazaar was held in the Orphanage, a rambling old building, formerly a convent, which stood on a hill overlooking the Malecon and the sea. Morel had gone expecting to be bored, and to pay generously for his boredom, but as it turned out, he was not in the least bored.

"She's here," whispered Mrs. Titcombe, leaning out of her booth to speak to him. "She swept through the place looking like one of Tolstoy's heroines; spent her money and vanished. . . . Go and find her, Gregory. Her isolation is superb, but it rather gets on my nerves. And don't forget—"

He was off before she had finished the sentence; she watched his tall, square-shouldered figure pushing through the crowd and sighed.

"Tired, Lydia?" asked one of her co-workers in the booth.

Mrs. Titcombe tilted her head to one side. "My dear, do you know, I think I'm beginning to feel my age."

"Nonsense!" said the other conclusively.

Gregory found Madame Courbet on the broad, pillared portico looking on the sea. She was sitting alone, posed, just outside a fallen streak of moonlight.

He sat down and they talked awhile. Finally he said: "Look here. It's a fine night. Let's drive out to the club or—"

She said: "I must go home."

"Well, then, let me drive you home."

She hesitated.

"Oh, come!" said Morel. "Surely that won't place you under any obligation of friendship."

He was standing before her, looking down at her. She rose and put her hand on his arm. He felt his heart beating, his senses confused. . . . Her voice was a murmur that hardly reached his ears.

"Very well. . . . If you wish."

It seemed to him, as he drove with her toward Vedado, that she must feel something of the emotion that stirred and possessed him. She sat beside him on the seat of the roadster, her shoulder touching his. She must feel it. Perhaps that was why she did not speak. . . . She was silent—a still figure wrapped in a cloak that shone a little when the moonlight fell on it.

The silence lasted until he drew up before her house. Then cutting off the motor, he turned to her and said: "Would you mind if I came in for just a moment? I want very much to talk to you."

Her voice was low, almost a whisper. He caught the word "Tomorrow—"

"No, tonight," said Gregory.

She made a sign with her hand.

He helped her down from the car and together they went into her house, into the high-walled, hollow living-room, cool with the coolness of old stone. A lamp burned on the table, throwing a circle of light on the tiled floor.

They stood in the scope of this light. Gregory said: "It's no use pretending any longer. You—you must know. I love you, Anna."

He heard her draw in her breath; but she did not speak. He went on: "It's a fact. I haven't willed it. . . . It's a fact. You've got to reckon with it." He was stumbling over his words. "I love you—"

She lifted her head.

"I am sorry. I warned you."

"I know you did. I can't help it. You can send me away if you like; you can tell me you never want to see me again, but that doesn't alter the fact. Listen to me, you beautiful creature! Do you think you can go through life, showing yourself, and not be loved? I dream of you. I dream of you! Your face comes to me at night, and by day—"

She was moved; she half raised her [Continued on page 107]

They Call Me Carpenter

By Upton Sinclair

Illustrated by Lucius Wolcott Hitchcock

C. The last and most dramatic instalment of the novel that tells what Christ might see and do if he should come to earth today

I PROMISED T-S to try to find out about the prophet at once. "He won't get away," I said, "because he doesn't ride in automobiles, and he and Mary Magna can't walk very far on the street without the newspapers finding them!"

I took my telephone book, and looked up the name of Abell. It is an unusual name, and there was only one attorney bearing it. (I was struck by the fact that the first name of this attorney was Mark.) I called him on the telephone, and heard the familiar gentle voice. Yes, Comrade Carpenter had just arrived, and Miss Magna was with him. They were going to have a little party, and they would be glad to have me come. Yes, Mr. T-S would be welcome, of course. So then I called up the magnate of the pictures, and not without an inward smile conferred on him the gracious permission to spend the evening at the headquarters of Local Western City of the Socialist Party!

When I got to the meeting-place I found that a feast had been spread. I don't know where the money came from; maybe it was Bolshevik gold, as the enemy charged, or maybe it was the ill-gotten gains of a "million-dollar movie vamp." Anyhow, there was a table spread with a couple of cloths that were clean, if ragged, and on them flowers and fruit. Carpenter was seated at the head of the table, and I noted to my surprise that he had on a beautiful robe of snow-white linen, instead of the one he had formerly worn, which was not only stained with kerosene but filthy with the dust of the streets. I learned that Mrs. T-S had brought this festal garment—a simple matter for her, because in movie studios they have wardrobe rooms where they turn out any sort of costume imaginable.

This robe was so striking that it created a little controversy. James, the carpenter, who had an ascetic spirit, considered it necessary to speak plainly, and pointed out that Mrs. T-S would have done better to take the money and give it to the poor. But the prophet answered: "Let this woman alone. She has done a good thing. The poor you have always with you, but me you have only for a short time. This woman has helped to make our feast happy, and men will tell about it in future years."

But that did not satisfy the ascetic James, who retired to his corner grumbling. "I know, we're going to start a new church—the same old graft all over again! A man has no business to say a thing like that. The first thing you know, they'll be taking the widow's mite to buy silk and velvet dresses for him, and golden goblets for him to drink from! And then, before you know it, they'll be setting him up in stained-glass windows, and priests'll be wearing jeweled robes, and saying it's all right, and quoting his words!" I perceived that it wasn't so easy for a prophet to manage a bunch of disciples in these modern days!

THE CONTROVERSY did not seem to trouble Mrs. T-S, who was waddling about, perfectly happy in the kitchen—doing the things she would have done all the time, if her husband's social position had not required her to keep a dozen servants. Also, I noted to my great astonishment that Mary Magna, instead of taking a place at the prophet's right hand, according to the prerogative of queens, had put on a plain apron and was helping "Maw" and Mrs. Abell. More surprising yet, T-S had seated himself inconspicuously at the foot of the table, while at the prophet's right hand there sat a convict with a twenty-year jail sentence hanging over him—John Colver, the "wobbly" poet! Again an ancient phrase learned in childhood came floating through my mind: "He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree!"

THE DOOR of the room was opened, and another man came in; a striking figure, tall and gaunt, with old and pitifully untidy clothing, and a half-month's growth of beard upon his chin. He wore an old black hat, frayed at the edges; but under this hat was a face of such gentleness and sadness that it made you think of Carpenter's own. Withal, it was a Yankee face—of that lean, stringy kind that we know so well. The newcomer's eyes fell upon Carpenter, and his face lighted; he set down an old carpet-bag that he was carrying, and stretched out his two hands, and went to him. "Carpenter! I've been looking for you!"

And Carpenter answered, "My brother!" And the two clasped hands.

Presently I whispered to Abell, "Who is he?" I learned that he was one I had heard of in the papers—Bartholomew Howard, the "millionaire hobo"—he was grandson and heir of one of our great captains of industry, and had taken literally the advice of the prophet, to sell all that he had and give it to the unemployed. He traveled over the country, living among the hoboes and organizing them into his Brotherhood.

T-S had stopped at a caterer's on his way to the gathering, and had done his humble best in the form of a strawberry shortcake almost half as large around as himself; also several bottles of purple color, with the label of grape-juice. When the company gathered at the table and these bottles were opened, they made a suspicious noise, and so we all made jokes, as people have the habit of doing in these days of getting used to prohibition. I noticed that Carpenter laughed at the jokes, and seemed to enjoy the whole festivity.

A. On the silence of the night a voice rang out: "Make way-y for the Grand Imperial Kle-eagle of the Ku Klux Klan!" Pointing at Carpenter, the white robed figure cried: "Possess yourselves of this guilty wretch." And some fifty of the Ku Kluxers closed around Carpenter and led him away from the mob who had meant harm to him.

It happened that fate had placed me next to James, so I listened to more ascetism. "He oughtn't to do things like this! People will say he likes to eat rich food and to drink. It's bad for the movement for such things to be said."

"Cheer up, my friend!" I laughed. "Even the Bolsheviks have a feast now and then, when they can get it."

"You'll see what the newspapers do with this tomorrow," growled the other; "then you won't think it so funny."

Korwsky was telling Carpenter there were sure to be spies here! They would never leave such a man unwatched. They would set to work to get something on him, and if they couldn't get it, they would make it. When Carpenter asked what he meant, he explained, "Dey'll plant dynamite in de place vere you are, or dey'll fake up some letters to show you been plannin' violence."

"And do people believe such things?" asked Carpenter.

"Believe dem?" cried Korwsky. "If dey see it in de papers, dey believe it—sure dey do!"

The prophet answered, "Let a man live so that the world will believe him and not his enemies." Then he added a startling remark. "There is one among us who will betray me."

Of course, they all looked at one another in consternation. They were deeply distressed, and each cried in turn—"Comrade," or "Brother," or "Fellow-worker," or whatever term they used—

"Is it I?" Presently the sturdy-looking fellow named Hamby, who called himself a pacifist, asked, "Is it I?" And Carpenter answered quietly, "You have said it."

Then, of course, some of the others started up; they wanted to throw him out, but Carpenter bade them sit down again, saying, "Let things take their course; for the powers of this world will perish more quickly if they are permitted to kill themselves."

APPARENTLY he saw no reason why this episode should be permitted to interfere with the festivities. Mary Magna came in laughing, bearing the strawberry shortcake, and set it on the table and proceeded to portion it out. When it was served, Carpenter said, "I shall not be with you much longer, my friends; but you will remember me when you see this beautiful red fruit on top of a cake; and also you will think of me and my message when you taste rich purple grape juice that has perhaps stayed a day or two too long in the bottle!"

Some of the company laughed, but others of them had tears in their eyes; and I noticed that in the midst of the merriment the fellow Hamby got up and slipped out of the room. Not long after that the company began to disperse for various reasons. Karlin explained that his old horse had been working all day, and had had no supper. Colver was uneasy, not for himself, but for his friend, and I saw him start every time the door was opened.

Also, T-S was having some night-scenes taken, and he and Mary were to see the work. Finally Carpenter dismissed the company, with the statement that he wished to retire to Comrade Abell's private office to pray; and Abell and his friend Lynch and the young Mexican said they would watch and wait for him. The rest of us took our departure, not without misgivings and sorrow in our hearts.

Now, you may find it hard to believe a confession which I have put off making—the fact that at this time I was engaged to be married. There was a certain member of what is called the younger set, whom I had given reason to expect that I would think about her at least once in a while. But here for precisely three days I had been chasing about at the skirts of a prophet fresh from God, getting my name into the newspapers in scandalous fashion, and not daring even to call the young lady on the telephone and make apologies. That evening there was a dinner-dance at her home, and I supposed I was supposed to be there; but no one had bothered to invite me, and as a matter of fact I would not have known of the affair if I had not seen the announcement in the papers. I was too late for the dinner, but I got myself a taxicab, and drove to my room and changed my clothes, and hurried in my own car to the dance.

You would not be interested in the fact that when I arrived I was treated as an unwelcome guest, and Miss Betty even went so far as to remind me that I had not been invited. But after I had pleaded she consented to dance with me; and so for an hour or two I tried to forget there were any people in the world who had anything to do but be happy. Just as I was succeeding, the butler came, calling me to the telephone, and I answered, and who should it be but Old Joe!

My surprise became consternation at his first words: "Billy, your friend Carpenter is in peril!"

"What do you mean?"

"They are going to get him tonight."

"Good God! How do you know?"

"It's a long story, and no time to tell it. Somebody's tipped me off. Where can I meet you? Every minute is precious."

"Where are you?" I asked, and learned that he was at his home, not far away. I said I would come there, and I hurried to Betty and had another scene with her, and left her weeping, vowing that she would never see me again. I ran out and jumped into my car—and I would hate to tell what I did to the speed laws of Western City. Suffice it to say that a few minutes later I was in Old Joe's den, and he was telling me his story.

PART OF IT I got then, and part of it later, but I might as well tell it all at once and be done with it. It happened that at the restaurant where Old Joe and I had dined before we went to the mass-meeting, he had met a girl whom he knew too well, after the fashion of young men about town. In greeting her on the way out, he had told her he was going to hear the new prophet, and had laughingly suggested that the meeting was free. The girl, out of idle curiosity, had come, and had been touched by Carpenter's physical, if not by his moral charms. It chanced that this girl was living with a man who stood high in the secret service department of "big business" in our city; so she had got the full story of what was being planned against Carpenter. That afternoon, it appeared, there had been a meeting between Algernon de Wiggs, president of our Chamber of Commerce, and Westerly, secretary of our "M. and M.," and Gerald Carson, organizer of our "Boosters' League." These three had put up six thousand dollars, and turned it over to their secret service agents, with instructions that Carpenter's agitations in Western City were to be ended inside of twenty-four hours.

A plan had been worked out, every detail of which had been telephoned to Old Joe. A group of men had been hired to seize the prophet and treat him to a tar and feathering. It had not taken much to move them to action, for the afternoon papers were full of accounts of Carpenter's speech on Main Street.

But that was not all, said Old Joe; and I saw that his hand was trembling as he spoke. It appeared that there was an "operative" named Hamby, who was one of Carpenter's followers.

"My God!" I burst out, in sudden fury. "I was sure that fellow was a crook!"

"Yes," said the other. "He's been telephoning in regular reports as to Carpenter's doings. And now it's been arranged that he is to put an infernal machine in the Socialist headquarters where Carpenter has been staying."

I was almost speechless. "You mean—to blow them up?"

"No, to blow up their reputations. Hamby is to lure Carpenter out to the street, and when the gang grabs him, Hamby will fire a shot, and there will be three or four secret agents in the crowd, who will incite the others, and see to it that Carpenter is lynched instead of being tarred and feathered!"

So there was the layout; and now, what was to be done? The first thing was to call Abell on the telephone, and see if anything had happened. I picked up the receiver; but alas, the report was "No answer." I urged central to try sever I times, but all I could get was, "I am ringing them." Carpenter, no doubt, was praying. What were the others doing? I kept on trying, but finally gave up.

Could the mob have taken them away? But Old Joe answered no, a definite hour had been set. The men were to gather on the stroke of midnight. We had nearly an hour yet.

I put my wits to work. We needed a good-sized crowd; we needed, in fact, a mob of our own. And suddenly the word brought to me an inspiration; that mob which T-S had drilled at Eternal City! I recalled that a year or so ago I had been lured to sit through a very dull feature picture which the magnate had made, showing the salvation of our country by the Ku Klux Klan; and I knew enough about studio methods to be sure they had not thrown away the costumes, but would have them stored. Here was the way to save our prophet! Here was the way to get what one wanted in Mobland!

I PICKED up the receiver and called Eternal City. Yes, Mr. T-S was there, but he was on the lot and could not be disturbed. I gave my name, and stated that it was a matter of life and death; Mr. T-S must come to the telephone instantly. A couple of minutes later I heard his voice, and told him the situation, and also my scheme. He must come himself, to make sure that his orders were obeyed; he must bring several bus-loads of men, clad in the full regalia of Mobland's great Secret Society; and they must arrive at Abell's place precisely on the stroke of midnight. The men must be paid five dollars apiece, and be told that if they succeeded in bringing away the prophet unharmed, they would each get ten dollars extra. "I will put up that money," I said to T-S; but to my surprise he cried: "You ain't gonna put up nuttin'! Damn dem fellers, I'll beat 'em if it costs me a million!" So I realized that the prophet had made one more convert!

"Have you got that bus with the siren?" I asked; and when he answered, yes, I said, "Let that be the signal. When we hear it, Joe and I will bring Carpenter down to the street, and if the men are there, it's up to you to persuade them you're the bigger mob!"

Then Old Joe and I ran down to my car, and drove at full speed to the Socialist headquarters; and on the way we worked out our own plan of campaign. The real danger point was Hamby, the secret agent, and we must manage to put him out of the way. Despite his pose of pacifism, he was certain to be armed, said Old Joe; yet we must take a chance, and do the job unarmed. If we should get into a shooting-scape, they would certainly put it onto us; and they would make it a hanging matter, too.

I named over the members of Carpenter's party who had stayed with him. We would get rid of Hamby, and then we would wait for T-S and his siren. By the time these plans were thoroughly talked out, we had reached the building in which the headquarters were located. The street was apparently deserted, and we did not stop to look for any "operatives," but left our machine and stole quietly upstairs and into the room.

COMRADE ABELL sat at the table, with his head bowed in his arms, sound asleep. Lynch and Tom Moneta, the Mexican, were lying on the floor snoring. And on a chair near the doorway, watching the scene, sat Hamby, wide awake. He leaped to his feet the instant we entered the door. "Oh, it's you!" he said, recognizing me; I noted the alarm in his voice.

I beckoned to him, softly. "Come here a moment"; and he came out into the ante-room. At the same time Old Joe stepped across the big room, and stooped down and waked up Lynch. We had agreed that Joe was to give Lynch a whispered explanation of the situation, while I kept Hamby busy.

"Where is Mr. Carpenter?" I asked.

"He's in the private office, praying."

"Well," said I, "there's a sick woman who needs help very badly. I wonder if we'd better disturb him."

"I don't know," said Hamby. "I've been here an hour, and haven't heard a sound. Maybe he's asleep."

I was uncertain what I should do, and I elaborately explained

C. Half a dozen rowdies had got hold of a girl and began tearing her clothes. Then they tossed her up beside Carpenter. "Here's a woman for you," one of them shouted.

my uncertainty. Of course, praying was an important and useful occupation, and I knew that the prophet laid great stress upon it, and all of us who loved him so dearly must respect his wishes.

"Yes, of course," said Hamby.

Yet at the same time, I continued, this woman was very ill, a case of ptomaine poisoning——

"Do you think he can cure that?" asked Hamby guilelessly; and at that moment Old Joe and Lynch came from the big room. Hamby started to turn, but he was too late. Old Joe's arms went around him, and Hamby's two elbows were clamped to his sides, in a grip which more than one professional wrestler in our part of the world has found it impossible to break. At the same time I stooped on my knees and grasped the man's two wrists; because we were taking no chances of his gun. Lynch had a cloth, taken from the big table, and he flung this over Hamby's head and stifled his cries.

I took a revolver from his hip-pocket, but Joe was not satisfied. "Search him carefully," said he, and so I discovered another weapon in a side-pocket. Then I made hasty search in a big closet of the room, and found a lot of [Continued on page 136]

ROBBING THE U. S. CENSOR

By Norman Hapgood

PART FIVE

TO TELL the peculiarities of Mr. Ford's campaign against the Jews takes some space. For the benefit of those who have not read our preceding issues we sum up a few of the more salient points.

C. One

In June we described the agency conducted in New York with Mr. Ford's money, headed by C. C. Daniels, brother of Josephus Daniels. Also we sketched the relation between the Ford activities and the anti-Jew campaign, in this country, of the Russian monarchists headed by Boris Brasol.

C. Two

In July the outstanding feature was a forgery of a Protocol that pretended to show up the details of the anti-Jew plot. It illustrated dramatically the fact that when the business of using forged documents in race fights gets going in any country, it cuts both ways. We also told in this instalment how our campaign to expose and stop the Jew-Mania came to be undertaken. It started at a lunch at which were present two of Russia's best-known liberal statesmen. There was also given in that issue a list of the Daniels investigators, with their secret numbers, including two Russians.

C. Three

In August the exploits of a gentleman called "25 H" had the leading place. General Leonard Wood appeared in the story; also Ralph Easley of the National Civic Federation; Charles Stewart Davison, of the American Defense Society; Woodrow Wilson, Colonel House, William Howard Taft and Mr. Justice Brandeis.

C. Four

Last month we showed how stale is the bait that the innocent manufacturer of automobiles has been swallowing. We gave the full story of the marketing in this country of the ancient forgeries of the Russian agents, and of the gobbling of them by Mr. Ford and his representatives. Now we come to the United States Government.

THERE were in the service of Henry Ford in his crusade against the Jews three men who had been in the service of the United States Government. They were:

103 A Dr. Houghton
F. Hunter Creech

At present we are making no further comment on this connection between the Government and the Ford effort, as far as individuals are concerned who formed the connections. Indeed, we have no particular interest in personalities. We have omitted from this series many interesting touches because those touches might have injured or embarrassed individuals without carrying forward our purpose. We have left out bushels of volunteered material bearing on the various aspects of Mr. Ford's career, partly because on the whole we are great admirers of his career and partly because we are making this series strictly documentary and strictly limited to what we consider the needed purpose of protecting American liberalism from the importation of a foreign disease.

Even the most careless reader of the newspapers must have noticed that the two most constructive statesmen in post-war Germany have been assassinated; that both of these statesmen were Jews; and that in both instances the assassins were reactionaries. This country since the war has been going through spasms of reaction relieved by spasms of opposition to reaction. A recent phase of the reactionary side is an undoubted increase in anti-Semitic feeling. It is beginning to stir in the colleges; it took melodramatic shape in the revival of the Ku Klux Klan; and Ford's campaign came along just at the right time to increase its impetus. It is against this wave that we are in opposition and we are rejecting from this series even the most exciting information if it does not carry us forward.

The connection between Ford's crusade and the United States Government has a striking relevancy. Palmerism, Garvanism, Doughertyism, Ralph Easleyism, the activities of such organizations as the American Defense Society and the National Security League, all acting together in an organized attack on liberalism, constitute exactly the thing we are after. It is in fact our foremost intention to show that the fight against the Jews does not stand alone and cannot stand alone. From the very opening of the series we have offered proof of the close connection between Ford's campaign against the Jews and the campaign of the Russian monarchists against the Jews. For the same reason we have stressed the inevitableness with which the Ford campaign against the Jews developed into a campaign against the liberals. We come now to a case in which the Ford organization, by some method on which we do not commit ourselves, obtained possession of a document, reproduced on page 39, secured in the heat of war by Government agencies against one of the most conspicuous liberals in the United States.

An associate of mine presented to Senator Robert La Follette a photograph of a certain document. As he looked over the paper the Senator asked: "What is this? A censor's report?"

"Yes."

"Oh, I see!" La Follette replied. "A censor's report on one of the issues of my magazine."

The Senator took the document and read it slowly. He smiled at the careful digest which the censor had made.

"Yes," he observed. "That censor was somebody who knew how to write."

Then he entered into an analysis of the document which, in those bygone war days, was so bold.

IT WOULD appear that William Snodgrass, of Nueva Gerona, Isle of Pines, West Indies, right behind the island of Cuba, had honored La Follette's Magazine with a subscription.

In the due course of events this particular issue of the magazine was sent forward to Mr. Snodgrass, by way of Key West. And there the censor stopped it. The censors stopped many a magazine and newspaper during the war. They digested so much material that some of the men who acted as censors during the war have ever since found their mental stomachs out of shape. But editors didn't see the censor's "digests." Yet here was Senator La Follette, an editor, reading a censor's report of his own editorial. He smiled as he noted from the markings that it was Examiner 1773, sitting at the Press Table at Key West, Florida, on that September day. He tried to gather more amusing facts from the photograph. What did "Original to MID, WTB, ONI and CCC" mean? He perused the mystic lettering.

There passed under his eye his own words, contained in the final paragraph of the censor's digest, which accurately described La Follette as declaring that we should do well to concentrate all our power on, and dedicate all our patriotism to the task of "making these United States safe for Democracy; not a Morganized Democracy but a Democracy where the will of the people is the law of the land."

AFTER he had amused himself by his analysis he was told what the photograph was taken from.

"This original document was extracted from the Government files," said my associate, perhaps a bit dramatically.

"And," he continued, "it was found in the possession of Henry Ford's anti-Jewish sleuths in New York City."

The Senator looked out through the window of his office in the Senate building, silent, for many minutes.

"In Russia," explained my associate, "the aristocrats attacked the Jews in order to disorganize the liberals."

La Follette knew that. He didn't have to be told. But here, before his own eyes, indeed, in his right hand, was a document which proved to him that the United States may, unless we check the poison, some time follow a similar course.

"As soon as I saw that Henry Ford had begun to attack the Jews, I saw the danger that he was running," La Follette said. "I wrote an article immediately against Ford's action."

And then he sat longer.

I don't know what he thought, but I do know what he might have thought. If some sleuth had gone so far as to remove from Government files an official document to prove to someone else that La Follette was too liberal, what was the impelling motive behind the sleuth's work? The impelling motive was Ford's money in an anti-Jewish fight.

Now let us go on to other elements in this sort of Government work, necessary, of course, in war, but deadly in its after

Ⓐ This partly mutilated letter called Mr. Ford's attention to the statement that in the United States the Jew is in the way of no one except "cowards and traitors."

effects on the public mind. Our readers are fully aware that Lieutenant Boris Brasol is at the head of the Russians who in this country are fighting to get a Romanov back on the throne of Russia, and also that he is at the head of the Russian Jew-baiters here. In 1918 Lieutenant Brasol was in the employ of our Government in secret service work. He had working under him two Russians. One was Natalie De Bogory, already familiar to readers of this series. The other was a gentleman by the name of Vassilivitch. One of the enterprising acts of Mr. Vassilivitch was to go to a prominent Jewish citizen of the United States, well known to me personally, a man of the highest standing and character. Mr. Vassilivitch indicated to my friend that the protocols which the Russians were then intending to market here would be stopped for a compensation.

At this time Mr. Brasol was receiving interesting assistance from a lawyer well known in New York. His name is Maurice Leon. Mr. Leon is himself a Jew, but he comes from one of the French possessions and looks upon France as the country which he is called upon most energetically to represent. During the war Mr. Leon was extremely patriotic. He found a great many whom he believed traitors. He passed the names along to the United States Government. In the course of his round-up of the disloyal he made up his mind that the German-Jews, as the head of the International Jews, were the outstanding menace.

Mr. Leon had in his possession a cross index, more complete than anything that Brasol in any of his different organizations

COMMENT

In an editorial by Senator R.W. La Follette covering the August number of this magazine, Mr. La Follette contends that the boasted American Democracy has in reality become "thoroughly monopolized Democracy." He urges that while Americans are fighting "To make the world safe for Democracy" it behooves them in the fall elections to support only those who are known to be devoted to the cause of "American Democracy." The senator asks whether there is in this country, "A man so densely stupid that he does not know that special interests, typified by the Standard Oil, the Morgan combination, U.S. Steel, International Harvester Trust, the Packers, etc., have in defiance of every principle of American Democracy, per capita annual income of 65 percent of the American people and their government for more than a generation only $200. while 2 percent of the population owned the great bulk of the wealth."

The senator speaks of Wisconsin as one of several states - but the one in particular in which the best fights have been made - on the cleanest cut issue, the great issue of bringing the government back to the people. Fights in Wisconsin, he states, were won, for just taxation of corporations, for control of rates of railways, etc., for adequate service, in short, fights for real democracy. Wisconsin voters must beware in the coming elections, lest they be led into voting against real democracy. Record of candidates must be minutely searched as to where they stood in the former fights for the same ends.

In conclusion the writer says: "When we shall have gotten through with the somewhat large undertaking of making the world safe for democracy, we shall find something to do for democracy at home."

Q. How did this document get from the Government archives into Henry Ford's files?

had worked up. This cross index of Mr. Leon's is momentous. He began by picking out one conspicuous New York Jew—Jacob Schiff. He then took the index of the New York Times and made a list of all the public functions Jacob Schiff attended. One step further enabled him to find out who else was at each one of these functions. He then took each Jewish name and applied the same treatment to it that he had applied to Schiff. For example, at one of the public luncheons which Schiff attended was present also Miss Lillian Wald. Miss Wald then became the center of more cross indexing. Everyone who attended the functions attended by Miss Wald came in turn under the index. By this simple device it was not long before a world conspiracy was adequately constructed. There is good reason to believe that the Dearborn Independent vision of the Jewish World Conspiracy, headed by a few dictators at the top, had its origin in this elaborate cross index of Mr. Leon.

Before carrying along this anti-liberal side of the Ford work a little further by introducing a new sleuth, 55-D, I wish to say a few words about one F. Hunter Creech. Mr. Creech is a cultivated, refined Southern gentleman, who has exercised a good deal of influence on the course of Mr. Ford's Jew-baiting enterprise, perhaps as much influence as anyone in Mr. Ford's employ, except Liebold, the general secretary, must stand first. He is universally conceded to be the sub-boss at Dearborn and the person of strongest personal influence on Ford. Liebold has such a strangle-hold on his [Continued on page 110]

THE GREEN-STRIPED fourteen ball was frozen against the cushion less than six inches from the corner pocket. Florian Slappey chalked his cue, inhaled deeply of a Turkish cigarette, placed the stump gently on the edge of the pool table, and set himself for the deciding shot of a decisive contest.

Bud Peaglar, proprietor of the Barbecue Lunch Room & Billiard Parlor, Florian's opponent, stood on the inner edge of the human ring which clustered about the table. Above the spell-bound crowd floated a miasma of rank cigar smoke. Boston Marble, stakeholder for the principal wager and a majority of the side bets, edged closer.

A faint smile creased Florian's lips—giving the lie to the internal seethe which set his hands to trembling. The shot was an easy one for a player of his skill, and the fourteen ball meant victory in this all-important match. The well-powdered cue slid easily between the thumb and forefinger of his left hand. The cue butt was held delicately in the thumb and first two fingers of the right.

The cue tip thumped against the ball. The white sphere leaped forward, clicked against the object ball . . . and a groan of disappointment arose from those who had bet on Mr. Slappey.

The fourteen ball headed straight for the corner pocket, left the cushion momentarily, reached the pocket, took the cushion again and failed to drop in. Florian had failed—although his supporters derived some little satisfaction from the fact that he left the sphere frozen against the end of the table.

Bud Peaglar, unperturbed, played the cue ball off the side cushion. It caromed back at precisely the correct angle, caressed the fourteen ball and sent it tumbling into the webbed recess. From Boston Marble, Bud Peaglar collected the sizable stakes and flashed a commiserating grin upon his defeated opponent. A hum of comment arose. . . . And when the crowd would have disintegrated, a massive figure forced its way through and confronted the victorious proprietor of the billiard hall.

At sight of the stranger interest was instantly diverted from the recent pool match. And, in truth, it was no wonder, for he was no mean figure of a man.

In the first place he was tall and he was broad, his complexion was colorado-claro. His haberdashery was calculated to put an ordinary rainbow to shame. And now, as he towered above the wizened Mr. Peaglar, the crowd about the table became more dense and ears were strained for his words.

They came; came in a deep, rumbling voice which struck terror to the heart of the little pool-room proprietor.

"RECKON you think you is some pool-playin' fool, don't you, Mistuh Peaglar?"

Something in the stranger's belligerent attitude implanted the germ of modesty in Bud's bosom.

"Reckon they's some folks c'n shoot a better cue."

"Huh! Reckon they ain't ha'dly no folks which cain't."

"I ain't sayin' you ain't right."

"You ain't said I is right."

"Ain't said you is, is jes' 'bout the same as not sayin' you ain't."

The stranger glowered upon the glib Mr. Peaglar.

"You knows who I is, cullud man?"

Bud nodded quickly. "Co'se I does." Mr. Peaglar pointed a trembling forefinger toward the sky-blue throw-away which was tacked upon the wall of his billiard parlor. "You is him."

Immediately there was a general turning of eyes toward the designated type display:

A cloud of anger floated across the face of the tall gentleman. He fired a question in a voice surcharged with menace.

"Which him is I?"

It was obvious that it would be well for Bud Peaglar to make a correct guess. Fortunately, Bud's establishment was a Mecca for the sport-inclined gentry of Birmingham's colored persuasion and he had long since received accurate descriptions of the two great wrestlers who had descended upon the city to exhibit their athletic wares.

"Zebulon Harrow," retorted Bud. "Ev'ybody knows you mus' be him."

"How come?"

"On account you is name' the Bone Breaker—an' which muscles you has coul'n't he'p breakin' bones."

Zebulon warmed to the eager flattery. "You has mo' sense than you looks, Brother Peaglar."

"Me an' sense went to the same school, Mistuh Harrow." Bud ran a speculative eye over the other's massive frame. "Bet you is the bestest wrastler which ever wrestled a wrastle."

"You tell 'em, brother. When I finishes with wrastlin' this heah Memphis Choker they ain't gwine be enough lef' of him to grease a 'luminum skillet. But"—and the Bone Breaker suddenly remembered the business of the moment—"I ain't near so good a wrastler as what I is a pool player."

By dint of superhuman effort Bud Peaglar stifled the groan which strove for utterance. He realized that Zebulon Harrow was not without ulterior motive.

"Says which?" inquired Bud mildly.

"Says I is one hell-bendin' pool player."

"Reckon you is, Brother Harrow."

The monster wrestler extracted from his trousers pocket a frayed five-dollar bill. "Bets you five dollars I c'n beat you shootin' pool."

"Also I bets the same thing!" Bud beamed this strategic retort.

The expression which crossed Zebulon's face indicated clearly that Bud had committed a tactical blunder. "You bets you beats me?" suggested Zebulon.

"I don't make no foolish bets."

"You bets like I says."

Bud sighed miserably. "Reckon you knows mo'n what I does, Brother Harrow."

They bet. They played.

The dusky sports who clustered about the table gasped with amazement at the exhibition of pool dexterity displayed by the wrestler. For, until this moment, Bud Peaglar had been regarded as invincible. The match was close, but at its conclusion Mr. Zebulon Harrow was two games and ten dollars ahead.

Bud maintained a thoroughly tactful rigidity of expression until the newcomer had swaggered from the place, followed by the crowd. And then Mr. Peaglar's face underwent a metamorphosis. The look of bland quiescence was supplanted by one of malevolent hate. It wasn't that Bud fell short of being a good sport, but he didn't relish being held up. It was one thing to be trimmed by a superior player—and quite another to be forced unwillingly into an unequal match. Bud raised a skinny fist and shook it at the door.

"Zebulon Harrow," he sizzled, "one of these days you is gwine be awful regretful you puck on me."

Someone heard the remark and chuckled audibly. Bud whirled furiously. "Does somethin' roun' heah seem funny to you, Acey Upshaw?"

The little yellow negro ducked. "Jes' laffin'."

"At which?"

"Nothin'."

"Huh! What you ain't got is no brains—laffin' at yo'se'f!"

That evening there occurred an incident which set the long-dormant brain of Bud Peaglar to working fast. Into his place drifted a man.

At first sight he appeared worthy of scant notice. And then Bud's attention became attracted by signs of physical power which were lacking at casual glance. The man was short—scarcely taller than Bud himself. But there was an abnormal breadth to the swaying shoulders and a startling appearance of power in the long, apelike arms which dangled almost to the bowed knees. The newcomer walked from the front door toward Bud's desk in the rear, lurching heavily with each step. He, too, was dressed immaculately—and loudly. His suit was of black and white checks, his brown hat banded with silk of the same pattern. He wore patent-leather shoes and white spats. And he carried a cane.

The face above this sartorial display was ingratiatingly black—a rich, gleaming ebony; and the broad smile disclosed an array of gilt which fairly dazzled Mr. Peaglar. And as knowledge of the stranger's identity came to Bud he ducked.

"Ha'd luck," he groaned to himself, "you is sho' gittin' too feemiliar with me."

The squat black man paused by Bud's battered desk.

"Mistuh Peaglar?" he inquired politely.

Bud looked up sadly and mentally kissed his bank-roll a fond farewell. "Uh-huh!"

"My name is Mistuh Jason Flapp. Otherwise an' famously known as the Memphis Choker."

"Yeh? I reckernized you right off. Reckernizing wrastlers is the best thing I does."

"It's a stranger in Bummin'ham, Brother Peaglar."

"Yeh. So Mistuh Harrow was. An' he took me in."

A stern expression usurped the joviality of Mr. Flapp's countenance. "Says which?"

"Says that there Bone-Breakin' feller done trimmed me out of ev'y las' cent of money which I is got." Bud prayed that this seed of tactical prevarication might fall on fertile territory.

"Dawg-gone that faker," seethed the choking gentleman from Memphis. "You don't say so."

"Uh-huh. I sho'ly does. Cross my heart."

"An' hope to bust?"

"An' hope to bust," emphasized the despondent Bud.

THE MEMPHIS Choker laid a commiserating hand upon the shoulder of the depressed pool-room proprietor. "Nev' you min', Brother Peaglar. Once I gits that imitation wrastler on the mat he's gwine wish he was shootin' pool. When I finishes up with him he jes' nachelly is gwine be ain't."

Bud looked up hopefully. "I gathers, Brother Flapp, that Mistuh Harrow ain't the fondest feller you is of."

"You said it, Buddy. You sho'ly done pronounced correctly that time. You sho'ly did. Hate fo' that cullud pusson is the on'y thing I ain't got nothin' else but."

Mr. Peaglar extended the hand of fraternity. "It's a ginuwine pleasuah to meet up with a gent like you, Brother Flapp. Does you aim to th'ow Mistuh Harrow when you wrastles him?"

The Memphis Choker chuckled. "Th'ow him? I's gwine th'ow him so high that when he hits the groun' he's gwine knock a hole right th'ough the yearth so deep they ain't gwine be no need fo' no undertaker. They ain't nothin' I ain't do better'n that feller, Mistuh Peaglar. I wrastles better, I plays pool better. I——"

"You whiches?"

"I plays pool better."

"Better'n Mistuh Harrow?"

"Heaps."

Bud rose, extracted from a private rack a very special cue and placed it in the huge, muscular paws of the Memphis Choker. "C'mon," commanded Bud. "Us plays."

"Plays which?"

"Pool." Then, as an afterthought, "But not fo' no money."

They played—played French pool. Bud broke and lucked the nine ball. He clicked off the one. Then he missed. Mr. Jason Flapp squinted at the table and proceeded quietly and efficiently to run off the remaining balls in order.

Bud racked them; Jason broke, making two on the break, and then cleared the table. At the end of an hour Bud had not amassed sufficient points to win a single game. He stood back and surveyed Mr. Flapp with a worshipful stare.

"You is the champeen pool player of the world," pronounced Bud solemnly.

"Also wrastler."

"Also wrastler." Then Bud stepped closer and lowered his voice. "You hates Mistuh Harrow?"

"Wuss'n tripe."

"Well, listen at me!" Bud proceeded to unfold a scheme for revenge; a plan so delectable as to beget anticipatory wriggles of sheer glee from the two conspirators.

MANY spectators had witnessed the humbling of Bud Peaglar by Mr. Zebulon Harrow. The pill had been a bitter one to swallow, for Bud had been inordinately proud of his dexterity with the cue and had long held sway as king of Birmingham's duskypool sharks. There were few ebon gentlemen in the city who had not—at one rash time or another—essayed to defeat Mr. Peaglar. And the number of those tallied precisely with the number who had contributed to the Peaglar coffers.

It was this very supremacy at the art to which his establishment catered that insured its popularity. But now all had changed. Where before there had been an atmosphere of sovereignty about the place, there was now only the dank and clammy air of disgrace. Bud was an "ex" and he knew it.

He knew that it was beyond his powers to reverse the order of things in a return match with Mr. Harrow. But any device by which that tall and powerful gentleman could be made to eat humble pool-pie promised balm to the soul of Bud Peaglar. And so he explained his scheme to this supreme wizard of the cue—this ne plus ultra of the cushioned table, this genius of chalk and tip.

Bud planned to invite Mr. Harrow into a return match. Swiftly and accurately he intended losing three games to that gentleman. Among the spectators was to be the squat, sinister figure of the Memphis Choker. And when Bud had been sufficiently humbled and Mr. Harrow was riding on the crest of a wave of triumph—the Choking gentleman—Mr. Jason Flapp—was to step forward and hurl a defiance into the golden teeth of the victor.

They were to play for high stakes. And Bud agreed to back this new-found wonder with cash and plenty of it.

"You cain't lose," postulated Bud, with the wonders of his new friend's performance still fresh in his mind. "Tain't no ways possible. An' which you wins I diwides with you fifty-fifty. So thataway you don' stan' to lose nothin' an' you wins half of what I does."

Jason Flapp agreed readily.

"I does what you says, Brother Peaglar. I assuah you that it is bofe a pleasuah an' likewise a delight to meet up with a spo't like you. Also I ain't sheddin' no tears over winnin' money fum that fo'flushin' imitation of a wrastler which calls hisse'f the Bone Breaker."

"N'r neither you don' see me wearin' no lily over the same," said Bud.

"We wins mos' of the money which he has got," went on Mr. Flapp cannily. "An' then we bets it all on the wrastlin' match, which he sure lose."

Bud's eyes narrowed. "Does you aim to th'ow him when you wrastles?" he asked, significantly.

"Huh! I's gwine th'ow him so ha'd he's gwine break his own bones," Mr. Flapp assured him.

"He says he's gwine th'ow you."

"Says ain't never got nobody no eatments. An' I ain't astin' you n'r neither nobody else to bet money on me. But I craves to know this: If'n I wa'n't sho' I was gwine th'ow him I woul'n't go bettin' all my own money on myse'f, would I?"

"No-o-o. . . ." Bud was forced to admit.

"That's prezac'ly what I is doin'. A'ready I has bet th'ee hund'ed dollars I beats him——"

"Th'ee hund'ed dollars?"

C, "Th'ow him?" asked the Memphis Choker. "I'se gwine to th'ow him so high that when he hits the groun' he's gwine knock a hole th'ough the yearth so deep they ain't gwine be no need fo' no undertaker!"

"Cash money," the Memphis Choker said convincingly.

"Sufferin' side-meat!"

"An' fu'thermo' besides, I has got two hun'ed mo' dollars I bets on myse'f does I fin' any feller which is fool enough to take me up. An' what I wins shootin' pool ag'in' that Mistuh Harrow—also I bets me that. Does that look like I is comfident?"

Bud nodded passionate agreement. "Reckon you an' confidence sleeps in the same bed," said the delighted Bud.

Alone again, Bud's primary impulse was to hike straight to the home of Boston Marble, general betting agent for the colored community, and leave with that gentleman a sizable roll of money to be wagered upon the wrestling chances of Mr. Jason Flapp, the Memphis Choker. But Mr. Peaglar was nothing if not cautious. And he was inclined to be sceptical. After all, perhaps Mr. Flapp never actually had bet the money about which he talked so freely. Perhaps he intended to wager not a cent on the outcome of the bout. Talk was cheaper than cash—and natural discretion halted his impulse.

But Mr. Peaglar wasted no time in issuing a fresh defiance to Zebulon Harrow. And he let it be known in the sporting fraternity that he was that afternoon to seek his vengeance. A half-hour before the match the place was crowded, and the lunch counter doing a land-office business. The crowd was evenly divided in sympathy. There were those among them who bore Bud Peaglar no love—and they had come to gloat over him in his fresh degradation. Others were genuine friends of Bud's and so accredited his large boastings that Mr. Harrow was to be taught something about the gentle art of manipulating a pool cue.

BUD WAS grateful to both clans. His friends could share the triumph. The enemies might even be tricked into wagering genuine money on the tall, yellow negro who had won no mean slice of prestige by his recent victory over Bud.

The atmosphere of the pool room had become expectantly tense when the door swung wide and Mr. Harrow breezed into the midst of the assemblage.

Bud looked him over and quaked. In truth, there was something commanding about Mr. Harrow's personality—and he had dressed himself for this particularly festive occasion. He wore clothes of olive-green and a mammoth carnation spread gloriously from his buttonhole. He came forward with the easy, swinging stride of the conqueror and flashed a superior smile full in the face of his victim. But there was that in the grin with which Bud answered him which caused those who best knew Mr. Peaglar to watch with keener interest.

The match between the Bone Breaker and the slabsided pool-room proprietor furnished no thrills. True, it was not overly one-sided, but Mr. Harrow invariably managed to pocket the necessary number of points without any vast effort. And finally Bud flung his arms wide in token of surrender.

"Reckon you is the champeen pooler of the world, Mistuh Harrow."

The wrestler grinned a most superior grin. "Ain't never hearn nobody say I wa'n't." He paused: "An' I reckon I never will."

"An' there," boomed a voice from the crowd, "is where you is got another reckon comin'."

An audible stillness fell upon the spectators. The face of the victorious pool player flushed green with anger. His voice rumbled into the crowd.

"Who said nothin'?" he inquired angrily.

The spectators gave way before the powerful shouldering of the challenger, and as Mr. Jason Flapp stepped forth to face his rival, there was a general intaking of breath. Here was drammer with a large and crimson D.

THE MEMPHIS Choker stared up into the wrathful countenance of the Bone Breaker. Bud Peaglar wriggled with glee. He stood upon the threshold of triumph—a triumph not only of spirit but of finance. And the pool room was stilled: one or two overly eager young men violated house rules by clambering upon adjacent tables that they might obtain a better view of the impending hostilities.

That action was brewing could not be doubted. For two weeks now Birmingham had been riven by tales of the dire threats which each wrestler had been mouthing against the other. In hushed tones, those who had heard either man spoke of the moment when they should happen to cross paths. There was no slightest doubt of their mutual hatred, and here they had clashed in full view of a large audience.

They were as variant physically as an oyster is different from an eel. Jason Flapp, the Memphis Choker, seemed hopelessly tiny before the towering, symmetrical figure of the Bone Breaker; appeared tiny until one comprehended the enormous span of shoulder, the massive chest, the tremendous arms which hung loosely so that the tips of forefingers rested lightly against the kneecaps. Then it was that one sensed the awful power of the Memphis Choker and grew to pity the tall and handsome Zebulon Harrow. But Zebulon did not quail as Jason's eyes squinted evilly into his and the Choker sibilated a challenge:

"What you is, Mistuh Harrow—besides the wust pool player in the world?"

The Bone Breaker staggered under the verbal impact. "Also I's the champeen culud wrastler in the world."

"Fumadiddles! Who you ever wrastled?"

"Which mens I has wrastled all sleeps in cemeteries now," commented Zebulon menacingly; "an' you looks so't of sleepy yo' own se'f."

"You says words—but they don' mean nothin'. On'y thing I reckernizes the langwidge of is money."

"Says you does?"

Furiously, the muscular hand of the Memphis Choker plumbed his pants pockets. When it came forth five- and ten-dollar bills fluttered upon the pool table. "Two hund'ed dollars says I th'ows you best two out of th'ee wrastlin'."

Mr. Harrow's maddening insouciance did not lessen one iota. Quietly, firmly, he produced a wallet and then quite deliberately counted out ten twenty-dollar bills. "Covers yo' money. Mistuh Flapp," he murmured, "an' also I is got two hund'ed dollars mo' which says I th'ows you."

"Two hund'ed dollars mo' . . ." The face of Mr. Flapp became the color of polished ebony which has been breathed upon and he turned uncertainly toward the crowd. "Anybody heah want to loan me a lil money? I ain't got no mo' cash with me—"

Zebulon Harrow chuckled nastily. "Reckon yo' bluff has done gone an' got itse'f called." He spread out the second two hundred dollars. "Ain't nobody heah cravin' to git two hund'ed dollars closer to the poorhouse, is they?"

Bud Peaglar ducked into the crowd. He clutched the arm of Boston Marble. Mr. Marble was notoriously tight-lipped. Safe in a corner with Boston, Bud Peaglar spoke swiftly and straight to the point.

"Heah's two hund'ed, Boston. You cover that money of Zebulon Harrow's. But don' you never, under no succumstances whichsoever, let nobody know that you is doin' same fo' I."

BOSTON Marble nodded and delivered what was—for him—a lengthy retort.

"Uh-huh!" he said.

The spectators were furnished a new thrill when Boston Marble covered the two-hundred-dollar bet of the tall wrestler.

"You is bettin' that two hund'ed dollars on Jason Flapp?"

"Uh-huh!"

"Bettin' that he th'ows me?"

"Uh-huh!"

"Then," snapped Zebulon, "you better had never let the keeper of the crazy house git a good look at you."

Immediately it became evident that Mr. Flapp was a purposeful gentleman. He sneered a vivid sneer into the face of Mr. Harrow.

"Now that you has contribbited two hund'ed dollars to me an' two hund'ed dollars to that slim-talkin' gen'leman, Mistuh Harrow, does you crave to pay me fo' a pool-shootin' lesson?"

"You mean," challenged Zebulon, "that you is crazy 'nough to desiah bettin' with me?"

Jason produced fifty dollars—one-third of the total amount of the Bud Peaglar money held by him in trust. "Shoots you one game fo' fifty dollars."

"Took!"

And as they shot, Bud Peaglar edged in close to the table and allowed his smile of satisfaction free play. Here was revenge a-plenty. For, although there was no denying the fact that Zebulon wielded a sinister cue—it was equally apparent that Jason Flapp was his master.

"Fifty dollars winner," exulted Jason at the conclusion of the game. "You ain't aimia' to play double or nothin', is you?"

"I is!" snapped Zebulon. A murmur of applause went up.

"Goodness Gawdness!" breathed one colored gentleman.

"That Bone Breaker sho'ly is a losin' fool."

The second game went the way of the first—a gross of three hundred dollars reposed in the pockets of Mr. Jason Flapp. And then it was that Zebulon Harrow proved himself to be a sport par excellence.

"You has done did me out of a hund'ed an' fifty dollars, Mistuh Flapp. I plays you one game fo' th'ee hund'ed!"

Three hundred dollars! A single game of French pool with three hundred dollars as the stake! This was more than the crowd could stand. From somewhere came hysterical laughter. Then came a surging closer—until the rival wrestlers were forced to shove the spectators back.

The faint ghost of a triumphant smile creased the lips of Mr. Jason Flapp and he winked confidentially at Bud Peaglar. Bud, intoxicated with the measure of his triumph, returned the wink. This was indeed a vengeance superb.

"I takes you," murmured Mr. Flapp easily. He counted the

C A smile creased Florian's lips—giving the lie to the internal seethe which set his hands trembling. The shot was easy for one of his skill. The cue tip thumped against the ball. The white sphere leaped forward, clicked against the object ball . . . and a groan of disappointment arose from those who had bet on Mr. Slappey.

three hundred dollars placed on the table by Zebulon Harrow and ostentatiously covered it with the hundred and fifty which he had won and the hundred and fifty which constituted the original stakes furnished by Bud Peaglar. And he sidled close to Bud.

"Us wins heavy, Brother Peaglar."

The crowd was on edge. It realized that it was being privileged to gaze upon billiard history. Unfolded to its eyes was an exhibition of sporting spirit which was unique in the wagering annals of Birmingham's colored fraternity.

They tossed for the break and Jason won. Quietly, deliberately, he broke. The ten and the thirteen clicked into two of the pockets. Zebulon stepped forward.

"Rule says you has got to hit the one ball fust off, Mistuh Flapp. You di'n't do it."

The spectators gasped. They knew that Jason had failed to touch the one ball on his break, but it was unlikely that he would fail to register a protest. Jason appealed to Florian Slappey, who had been appointed stakeholder and referee. Florian nervously rendered his decision.

"Spot up them two balls. One ball never was hit."

BUD PEAGLAR waited for an outburst from Jason. But none came. Bud shook his head doubtfully. He continued to shake it as Zebulon clicked off forty-two of the sixty-one points necessary for victory.

Then the Bone Breaker missed. Smiling slightly, Jason took up his cue, sighted at the balls, made one—and then missed a shot so easy that it had already been conceded.

But Zebulon, too, missed his next—a difficult carom, and once again the Memphis Choker was left with a well-cleared table.

And once again Jason Flapp missed!

Grinning triumphantly, Zebulon Harrow, the Bone Breaker, run off the required number of points—and added twenty-seven for good measure before laying aside his cue. Grandiosely he collected six hundred dollars from Florian Slappey. Magnificently he swaggered from the pool room.

Jason Flapp appeared strangely unconcerned. He volunteered a single remark to Bud.

"Kinder reckon us loses, Brother Peaglar."

Bud stared at him fixedly. "Uh-huh! Sort of reckon us does."

And then, as the crowd disintegrated, Bud sank wearily into a chair. His head was pounding. Bud's cosmic scheme had gone suddenly flooie. Where, a few moments before, he had risen to the zenith of beatitude, he now plumbed the nadir of misery. Sheer shock begot acute physical agony. Through a haze of calamitous bewilderment stalked the wraith of doubt. Finally he dropped into miserable soliloquy at memory of Mr. Flapp's utter indifference.

I DON' HA'DLY understand all I know 'bout that pool game!"

If only those shots which Jason missed had not been so elementary—so absurdly easy! The exhibition had been crude. What if Jason wrestled no better?

Swiftly, the news of the epochal pool match in Bud Peaglar's place became bruited about Darktown. The magnitude of the final wager was staggering—so, too, was the sudden collapse of the theretofore adroit Mr. Flapp at a moment when steely nerves were required. All in all, it sent the wrestling stock of Zebulon Harrow soaring.

Too, the thing provoked a veritable orgy of betting on the forthcoming match. At first there was no Flapp money to be found, until it became noised abroad that Mr. Flapp himself had raised an additional two hundred dollars which he had wagered against a like amount produced by Mr. Harrow. With that there was a general veering in the direction of the Memphis Choker. Such superlative confidence in oneself could not possibly be entirely misplaced. After all, the pool débâcle had been due, in all probability, to shaky nerves—and it was not nerves but brute strength that counted in a wrestling match.

And so, as the day of the bout drew closer, wrestling fandom found that profers of money on Zebulon's chances found takers among those who believed that Jason Flapp was his catch-as-catch-can master.

With it all, Bud Peaglar was nervous. Instinct told him that all was not as it should be. And he feared for the two hundred dollars which he had bet so impetuously upon Jason Flapp. His confidence in Mr. Flapp's ability was shaken, and so, four days before the date of the match, he sidled down Twenty-third Street and slid into the boarding house where the Memphis Choker was domiciled. He craved [Continued on page 146]

Q Mrs. Marconi is accompanying her distinguished husband in their sea-going yacht while he is making scientific observations.

MARCONI TELLS OF THE

Q Probably few of us realize how rapidly our world is changing. This distinguished scientist shows how much simpler and more enjoyable life will soon be WHOEVER wishes to live long should go to see Marconi and get him to give his vision of what he sees in store for this world. Length of life has some relationship to the desire to live—and who would not want to live to see the world that Marconi says is coming?

"Science will transform the world within fifty years," he said to me. "Life on this planet will be so changed that we who are here now would have difficulty in recognizing it. It will be a better and a happier world."

Nor will you have to wait fifty years to see the changes that Marconi forecasts. They will not come all in a bundle on the last day. Instead, they are coming day by day. The radio-phone came yesterday. What will come tomorrow? Marconi told me that the disintegration of the atom might come tomorrow, which means that infinite sources of power would be released. "That may come any day or it may not come for a long while," he added.

We were talking in the cabin of Marconi's yacht as it tugged at its anchor in a swift outgoing tide in the Hudson River, off New York. Marconi, one of the greatest miracle-makers in all human history, talked for an hour about scientific miracles—mostly those that are to come. He is a fascinating man to observe. Half Italian and half Irish, the two strains of blood that flow in his veins mingle but do not blend. His courtesy and politeness are Italian, but his humor, his subtlety, and his capacity to dream are Irish. He has a dry humor that is always just beneath the surface, ready to rise to the top. When I asked him if he believed it to be possible to send light-rays by wireless, so that one could see the person to whom one might be talking on the radio, he replied:

¶ An Interview by Allan L. Benson with

"It may be possible, though I don't know how to do it. But would it be desirable? A lady in her bath might find it inadvisable to telephone if she could also be seen. Also, one may now be courteous over the telephone when, if the other person could see his face it would be plain that his manner belied his feelings."

Marconi believes not only that the world will be transformed within the next fifty years, but that, until the end of time, invention and discovery will shower benefits upon the human race at a constantly increasing speed.

"People have a wrong idea about progress," he said. "For thousands of years there was little. A thousand years made not much difference in the world. Then came the invention of the steam engine and machinery for it to run. The electric telegraph followed. People began to speak of the nineteenth century as the age of invention and to speculate on the awe with which a decadent posterity would look back to it. Nobody believed the pace could long be kept up. Everybody believed that the electric light, the telephone, the phonograph, and the moving picture were marvels, the like of which would not be produced again for a long while. And when the world believed the scientific mind must soon become exhausted, the greatest marvels of all were produced—the airplane, the X-ray, and the radio-phone.

"This incorrect view of scientific achievement arose from the fact that the forces behind invention and discovery were not understood. The scientific mind cannot work without knowledge of natural laws. In the beginning, the human race had no such knowledge. Men had to learn from observation that wood would float before they could make ships, as they also had to learn that fire could be struck from flint before they could cook food. The single fact that wood will float or that fire will burn is enough to enable an inventive mind to go a certain distance, but a great number of such facts are required to give scientists and inventors an ample field for their faculties.

NOT UNTIL the nineteenth century had the world accumulated enough knowledge of natural forces to enable inventors really to get down to work. The inventive flame burst out then because inventors at last knew enough facts about natural laws to make it possible to conceive and to create certain things. It is of no value to conceive, of course, without the ability to create. It would do no good to invent a steam engine without the knowledge necessary to smelt ore, make steel, and fashion it into the desired forms. The progress of science and invention are therefore dependent both upon knowledge of natural forces and upon shopcraft.

"It is a peculiarity of such knowledge that every additional fact that is learned makes more valuable every fact that we already knew. A seemingly insignificant fact learned today may make it possible to make new and important uses of facts long known. The larger our store of knowledge, the more important becomes each new fact learned, because there is always a probability, with so many facts at hand, that the new knowledge may be made to fit in somewhere in a useful way. That is why science and invention must forever go on at a constantly accelerating pace, because the more we know of natural laws the more we can do with each new thing that we learn.

"The age of what are known as scientific miracles is not in danger of coming to a pause. It can never pause and it has only just begun. The speed that will be attained during the next fifty years may be judged by what has been accomplished in the last half-century. It seems to us that great progress was made from 1872 to 1922—and there was. That period saw the coming of the electric light, the dynamo and motor, the telephone, the phonograph, the moving picture, the automobile, the X-ray, the wireless, the discovery of radium, and the invention of the airplane. These were great achievements for so short a period—unexampled in the history of the world. But they will seem almost if not quite insignificant in comparison with what will be brought about during the next half-century. It is inevitable that this will be so. We have more knowledge of natural laws now than ever before and are searching for more knowledge as never before. Scientific research is proceeding with great speed in all of the civilized world. America, taking up this task with her usual energy, has already accomplished much and will accomplish more."

MARCONI'S manner, when he is talking, is a combination of nervousness and ease. At times he slides down in a big upholstered chair, clasps his hands over his head, half closes his eyes, and speaks softly. The next moment, he may straighten up, run his fingers through his hair, and talk rapidly. No mood lasts long. He is always changing.

"We are just entering," he continued, "what may be called the field of vibrations—a field in which we may find more wonders than the mind can now conceive. Most of the great inventions of the last fifty years have been in this field. The telephone, the electric light, the dynamo, the electric motor, the phonograph, the moving picture, and the radio are all based upon vibrations. Science is turning from what primitive man considered to be the great forces of nature to explore the infinitely little.

"We are learning that what once appeared to be the great forces of nature are not, in the real sense, great at all. An earthquake is perhaps the most tremendous physical force on this earth, but it is without possibilities for human use. The tides of the sea and the waves have great power back of them—power that we have tried, without much success, to utilize. Savages made a god of the winds and their successors used them to turn wheels, but modern man finds even a tempest more impressive than potential.

"Scientists are now beginning to realize that the really great forces with which we may deal are locked up in vibrations so gentle that we cannot feel them—though we can feel a summer zephyr as it blows upon our cheeks. I do not think I ever mentioned it before, but the wireless is the only device ever made by man that can carry around the world a sound created by a human being. If all the explosives in America were to be exploded in New York, the sound could not be heard in England.

"Nobody has enough imagination even to suggest all that we may yet find in this great field," he continued. "Marvels are difficult to conceive. Nobody could have thought of a machine that could speak and sing, or of pictures that seemed alive—or of sound carried around the world without wires. But I can think of one tremendous thing that might come out of vibrations. We might learn how to obtain electricity direct from the sun. There is no doubt that the sun is a great electrical powerhouse. If we could tap the energy that the sun is sending forth we could make power almost as cheap as sunlight. I believe it is only a question of time until we shall obtain an abundance of electricity direct from the sun. The discovery how to do this may be made any day, or it may not come for a long while. We know how to convert electricity into light. If we knew how to convert light into electricity the trick would be done. But Nature seems usually to work one way. She seldom turns back on her track."

I asked Marconi what he thought about the possibility of utilizing the enormous power supposed to be contained in atoms.

"I sometimes think," he replied, "that we are a great deal nearer than we realize to the making of this discovery. It might be made tomorrow. On the other hand, it may not be made for a long time. But it will be made."

The next question was a request for his opinion as to what invention the world now needs most.

"Power is our greatest requirement," he replied, "and immediately after it comes transportation. We are still obtaining power in a primitive way. We use electrical wires to carry it, but our electricity is derived either from the falling of water or from the burning of coal. Power obtained in this way costs too much. Considering that the earth is swimming in an enormous ocean of power that is coming to us in the form of vibrations, it is indeed primitive to create relatively small amounts of electricity by damming little rivulets and burning little piles of coal dug from the ground. The world will not much longer dig or burn coal. We shall get our power direct from the sun or from atoms—sooner or later in both ways.

OUR METHODS of transportation are still antiquated, notwithstanding the airplane. The first railroad was built about a century ago, but railroads still carry all of our freight and most of our passengers. The railroads are better than they were a century ago, but they are still railroads. I look forward to an enormous increase in the use of aircraft. It is quite possible that planes will be propelled by electricity derived directly from the sun and sent to the machines from stations on the earth by radio. I should not be surprised if the day were not far distant when airplanes will be as numerous as automobiles are now. Each of us will have his own machine and travel about as he pleases."

The possibility of flying with electricity obtained direct from the sun seemed so interesting that I asked Marconi if he was working on the problem of how to tap the sun's energy. He said he was not. I asked him if he knew of anybody who was at work at it.

"No, I don't," he replied. "The attention of scientific men is for the moment taken up with other things. But a discovery may be made any day that will shift attention to this problem. Sometimes a very insignificant event will turn a man's attention to a very fruitful field."

Here Marconi drew near to a fascinating subject—the part that fortuitous circumstance often plays in invention. Edison's mind was turned toward the phonograph because of certain little paper dolls that he had placed upon the diaphragm of a telephone in order that he might observe the strength of its vibrations. When the vibrations made the dolls dance, Edison's mind leaped to the possibility of recording and reproducing the vibrations made by speech. Lee De Forest obtained the clue that led to the invention of the famous grid that makes the radio-phone "go" by noting that a gas-mantle beside which he was working glowed more brightly when exposed to high-frequency electrical waves, thus becoming a sensitive and accurate detector of sound-waves.

So I asked Marconi what little thing had ever shifted his attention.

"My mind was turned to wireless," he replied, "by the fact that about twenty-five years ago, several consecutive days in Italy were cloudy. I was experimenting in signaling by the reflection of the sun's rays. When the sun did not shine I could not experiment. There were so many [Continued on page 112]

THE big car glided swiftly down the long descent and took the hairpin bend at the hill foot over-fast. There was a loud report followed by an expiring hiss and a jolt-jolt-jolt as the rim of the off-side rear wheel thumped against the road.

"Oh!" said Jill. "What's a good word to use?"
"Having already had recourse to both our spare wheels," replied Lord Louis, "I doubt if a single word would adequately define the situation."

"I suppose I want tea more than ever I wanted it before."
The car slowed up under the lee of a wind-riven oak growing in a distraught fashion from the fissures of a moss-covered rock.

"There should be a village hereabouts, m'lord," said the chauffeur.
"We might try."

They alighted and the chauffeur pointed to a wire nail firmly driven through the tire.

"It'll take best part of an hour, m'lord, to get the cover off and repair the tube. The solution they sold me is a bad dryer."

"Well, do your best," said Lord Louis. "Come, Jill, we will endeavor to find you some tea in the meanwhile."

A turn in the road revealed a village snugly nestling under the shoulder of a hill. An ideal village it proved to be—simplicity run loose. Roses rioted on the cottage fronts, chickens fluttered from the windows, and pigs walked in and out of the open doors in the friendliest way imaginable.

"Was there ever such a primitive little place? Look at the people! Aren't they just the simplest, duckiest folk you ever saw in your life?"

The tearoom was in a very humble cottage, clotted with climbing fuchsias and roses. A narrow flower bed ran alongside the wall, margined with scallop shells and all alight with polyanthus. In the window was a slant bearing apples, oranges, and a cardboard box of cough tablets, and above this a narrow shelf of glass bottles filled with transparent sweets with lovely old-world names. A few slate pencils and a hank of leather bootlaces completed the stock, but faintly within shone the polished handles of an old elm dresser and bright specks of light from luster candlesticks on the mantelpiece.

"It is worth bursting a tire for this!" exclaimed Jill.

If the house itself delighted them, the charm was not comparable to that aroused by the appearance of its owner. Of all sweet old ladies in the world, Jill vowed she was the sweetest. The gentle lines of her wrinkled features seemed to have been drawn by the kindliness of all the ages. And her hands! They held together the black lace of her shoulder shawl with a touch that could only have been learnt from the cradling of a sick child. Her hair stole from beneath her cap in serene lines as though it were a pattern of the smooth progression of her years.

"MRS. O'DONNEL?" Lord Louis ventured, as the door opened. He had read the name written in simple characters with the n's upside down over the shop window.

"'Tis bether known as Mother, I am," she said, with a rise and fall cadence—a sound such as the sea makes when it rustles the shore on a blue-calm day—then added, with a sadder note, "though small enough raison they have to name me so."

And Jill's quick intuition led her to see that Mother O'Donnel were no ring upon the third finger of her left hand.

"If 'tis tay ye'll be afther wanting, enter and welcome, for the kettle has been singing visitors this half an hour past."

"Oh, what a darling shop!" exclaimed Jill, ecstatically.

Mother O'Donnel smiled at their obvious delight.

"Small but clane, m'dyurr," she said, "for 'tis mesilf would niver slape av nights if dust or tar-r-nish kept me company."

"You must be happy here with this for your very own."

At these words a flicker of sadness passed over the old features.

"I could be hannier if it were more me own; but Mother O'Donnel was niver one to airr her gravances to a stranger. 'Sides, 'tis tay ye'll be saking and not a tale of flint-hearted landlords nor mortgage overdue."

She opened an inner door and led them into a tiny parlor—so small that there was barely room to approach the shiny-topped table which formed its center of interest. In endeavoring to do so the pocket of Lord Louis's heavy motoring coat caught in the handle of a cupboard and pulled it a trifle ajar.

"Wisha!" exclaimed Mother O'Donnel, coming quickly to the rescue and closing the cupboard. "Were there iver four walls so close together! There! Give me the coat and I'll set it in the shop out av harm's way."

So Lord Louis divested himself of his motoring coat. Mother O'Donnel departed to the kitchen.

"Of course," said Jill, when he had closed the door upon the old lady with great civility, "of course she's an angel, Louis, and all the things she has around her are straight from heaven."

"Were I to believe that remote destination were half so attractive, I should contemplate the future with livelier satisfaction," he returned. "Religious historians, however, persuade me that the decorations were conducted under some such supervision as that of the late Sir Joseph Lyons."

AS HE spoke he was cruising slowly round the miniature apartment, assessing its contents with an approving eye.

Jill did not interfere when the connoisseur side of his nature became uppermost. She had married a man who was wedded to the antique, but he had never allowed this trait to lead him to infidelity to the modern.

He stopped short before the mantelpiece, his right hand raised and rubbing the tip of his nose. Jill had learnt the meaning of that action and followed the direction of his gaze. His eyes were held, it seemed, by a small round teapot with a straight spout which stood upon a greenish plate of no pronounced color. The teapot was decorated with a panel representing, in many bright tints, a group of Chinese figures variously employed.

"H'm!" ejaculated Lord Louis, and again, "H'm!" He threw a quick glance over his shoulder, then turned again to the object of interest.

"Kien-lung?" said Jill, who was very painstaking.

Lord Louis removed the lid—examined it inside and out—replaced it—glanced at the greenish plate, nodded, then carried the teapot to the light, held it near the eye and at arm's length.

"Kien-lung?" repeated Jill.

He turned and smiled at her over his shoulder.

"What it is," he remarked, "to be the wife of a collector!" And with that he set it down again upon the plate.

"Oh, how exciting!" exclaimed Jill. "Louis, you must buy it for me, whatever it costs! I simply must have it." [Continued on page 131]

Germany Turns to Religion

By

Gerhart Hauptmann

Even the political upheaval in Germany is not greater than the religious revolution. In the land of Luther there is worship at the shrine of Buddha; there is a mystic interpretation of Bacchus and Walt Whitman

THE WAR has undoubtedly done much to awaken a desire for a return of religious intensity in the field of art.

The same tendency is to be observed in the literature produced during and since the war. Some of it is found in men like Reinhold Sorge, Walther Hasenclever, Reinhard Goehring, and above all, Fritz von Unruh.

It is true that Germany has not enriched the world literature with a Homer, a Virgil, a Dante, a Cervantes or a Shakespeare, but our Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, our philosophers Leibnitz, Kant, Hegel, and Schopenhauer, are cultural possessions of the entire world. Why have Gottfried Keller's novel "Der Grüne Heinrich" and other wonderful creations of this author not also become the property of the world?

Our literature would possibly be richer than it is had it not been regarded by our rulers as a fungous growth to be fought against. Every work, the sheer truthfulness of which was opposed to servility, was looked upon as a crime. Thus was the innocent poet Schubart condemned to pass his life behind prison bars.

Since the war, we can as yet speak only of seed time and growth, not yet of a new harvest. Nor is there anything surprising about this, as the civilized world has passed through the most devastating storm ever known. It is but natural that Nature should be still holding her breath after a terrific storm, with the heavens still covered by the lowering and muttering clouds. Those who lived through this storm with a full consciousness of its meaning are forced to keep silence that they may live. They avoid even the memory of it as far as may be.

The war was so appalling, so universal a human phenomenon that probably no poet will ever be able to master the material. It is more than probable that all will avoid the subject. I know of only one man among the younger German writers, Fritz von Unruh, who has the heart, the brain, the blood, and the nerves for such a stupendous task. His drama, "Ein Geschlecht," with its somber, gigantic, superhuman shade-figures, has looked into the eye of the Gorgon. Here alone are to be found elements and tendencies worthy of being placed side by side with the tragic figures of the Greeks.

Franz Werfel and Max Brod also belong to this group of younger writers. Also Carl Stern-

G. Gerhart Hauptmann and Mrs. Hauptmann. All Germany is planning to pay honor next month to the writer who stands first in the esteem of his countrymen.

heim and Georg Kaiser, neither of whom would have been possible without Frank Wedekind.

Not one of these three men, Sternheim, Kaiser, or Wedekind, has participated in the newly awakened literary intensity. Wedekind, in whose work a genuine fervor is nevertheless to be found, died during the war.

We were young together, Wedekind and I. As young men of twenty-two, we exchanged ideas about the Europe of that time, about Germany, about European and German literature, and outlined our plans for the future. It is my conviction that Wedekind is the most original, the most bizarre figure that has appeared in the literature of any country.

ALL GENUINE intellectual life was robbed of its significance by the war. It was thrown into the discard along with civilization. Those of us who had believed in civilization and its perfect flowering felt as if we had been lulled to sleep by some incomprehensible illusion, and rudely awakened to life. In the place of the gentle Christ who exhorted us to love one another stood a demon commanding us to hate one another. And stricken, shattered, filled with dismay, it seemed to us as if war were, indeed, the real aspect of humanity. It seemed as if in our work of scientific research, in painting, in writing, in our belief in the progress of humanity, we had been victims of delusion, playing trivial games while the real business of life had been going on around us wholly unnoticed.

There was a melancholy awakening from the vitiating poison. It was a state of soul in which humiliation, repentance, desperation followed each other in rapid succession. The pride of the epoch was broken. Arrogance was replaced by gray misery. But as nothing in the world—God willing!—is without cause and purpose, searching grew out of the gray misery, and metaphysical longing grew out of the heart-searching, and the broad masses of the German people are today dominated by heart-searching. There is a longing extending from this world into the world beyond, from the finite into the infinite, from the bitterness of suffering forward to joyfulness.

It was in this mood that the music and art world welcomed Hans Pfitzner's musical drama of "Palestrina." Those who were longing for a deepened meaning for purity saw in this work the battle of the soul. Religious solemnity and the deepest artistic sincerity combine to make this work a faithful reflection of the present.

The tremendous gain in strength and prestige made by the Catholic Church since the war has unquestionably the same origin. The impetus has also stimulated the world of occultists and theosophists, many of them of questionable character. The universal thirst for reading—not of trashy books but of serious literature—is another manifestation. And finally, this thirst unquestionably shows itself in the progress made by Buddhism. Profound interest is now being displayed in the German translation of the collective wisdom of Gotama Buddha, a work of truly classical proportions, which has crowned with success the painstaking labors of its great translator, Karl Eugen Neumann. The effect is as when Shakespeare was discovered and made a German poet, but here is greater still. An incomparable book of fate has been made accessible to Occidental civilization. To my mind, the time will come when this book will be considered of infinitely more far-reaching consequences than Martin Luther's Bible. Once the statue of the heathen god Svantewitt reared itself in the midst of Germany. Now this has been replaced by the gigantic picture of Buddha. There it stands, unassailable as throughout the centuries and strangely suggestive of the far-reaching influence of the spirit and philosophy of the East.

With the appearance of Luther's Bible, the center of the intellectual world shifted from Rome to the little city of Wittenberg, from the south to the north, from the Tiber to the Elbe. The light radiating from Wittenberg brought about the purification of the entire Christian world, including the Catholic religion. The England of today, as well as the United States, was born in Wittenberg.

I shall not live to see the verification of my prophecy, but the present century will not have drawn to a close before the world has taken cognizance of what Buddhism signifies to Germany. When once the German soul experiences a deep religious awakening, which it will most assuredly do through this new evangel, it will signify an intellectual and spiritual revolution for the whole of Europe. The first Buddhist monastery is to be established not far from Hamburg in the Lüneburg Moor.

ANOTHER literary feat of similar importance, worthy of being placed side by side with the German Buddha, is the German Veda, translated from the Sanskrit text by Paul Duesen. Buddha issued from this world of the Vedas. The chief feature of this work is the translation of the Veda Commentary of Cankara, the great reformer and restorer of the Upanishad doctrine.

The Brahmanism of these two works forms a direct contrast to Buddhism. Buddhism seems to teach the deadening of the senses and a complete negation of the world, including even God. The Brahmanism of the Vedas and of Cankara recognizes God everywhere, and tears away the error which hides

Him from the world. The poet, the world affirmer, will of necessity find himself drawn irresistibly by this doctrine. America's great poet, Walt Whitman, says: "Everything which I call mine you shall compare with what you call yours; otherwise it would be time lost to listen to me."

This I say also.

It is due to no fortuitous circumstance that I mention Walt Whitman in this connection. I have been familiar with his "Leaves of Grass" for twenty-five years. But it is only just now that we have been given our best translation of his poems. I do not know whether the translation by Hans Reisiger will succeed in making him as popular as he deserves to be in Germany.

In song of the loftiest form, Whitman sings the praise of the world. Farseeing, he embraces this world and the next. For the first time in centuries, the terrific, the wild, the gentle, the mild, the somber and the radiantly bright, the Samsara of the Buddha and the Vedas, have created a great psalmist who sings a song of life triumphant. This new Whitman translation is only another evidence of the tendency of the present, of the thirst for ardor, which has seized upon Germany since her awakening from the dream of devastating war.

DAVID GALT was a pet child of Destiny. A slender youth he was, with the fire of genius flashing from a pair of pure blue eyes, who, amidst the clang and clatter of thundering hydraulics, used to dream that the dirty mud-sluiced creeks of far northern Alaska were seas of azure crystal. The first time old man Lane spotted him, David was standing on the shoulder of a bedrock pit. Daddy Lane pushed his white whiskers into David's face and shouted, "Who the hell are you, to be standing here on my ground—dead on your feet?"

"Look, Mr. Lane," the dreaming youth said, pointing far up Ophir Creek, "it's over there against the mountainside. It's all over there. Here, where you are cleaning up the new creek bed it's been flowing for only a few thousand years. But there, over against the mountain, is the old stream bed. Move these elevators over there!"

"Move these elevators! Why—"

¶ Hagson's cordial greeting froze in his throat at the flash of blue steel in David's hand.

"So you're Shep Galt's boy? Well, no wonder you savvy what goes on underground. Your father was the same as you. Why, your father and I used to ramble from one range to another crossing deserts, burrowing buttes and chasing more rainbows than any two men in California. No wonder; so you're his Davy. Well, you're my Davy, now."

The old man didn't live more than two years after that—but he passed on, knowing that the Ophir hydraulic giants had spurted into the mountainside creek bed.

The day Daddy Lane died, David Galt left Eagle. For a year no one heard a word of him. Then one midwinter day, Bob Corbersier, the U. S. open trail mail carrier, brought word that he had met Galt down at Isaacs Point on Norton Sound. David was with a clean-looking outfit of Unganaktolick Indians, all rigged out in moose-skin trail gear, driving tamed wolves in his team, and tanned up like a black Mazinka.

One evening, about eighteen months later, Eagle lay in a flood of Maytime moonlight. David Galt could not have wished for a more majestic night for his return to comparative civilization. A reminiscent mood overcame him, and of their own accord his footsteps led him toward the river on whose banks the town was built.

The river stretched far away in the moonlight. It returned hardly a sound as it washed its graveled banks and sanded bars. Just then something moved into David's sight that routed his dreams. As though an afreet had placed it there, a strange canoe headed for the beaching strand. Riding the canoe was a powerful figure whose only movements came from rhythmic dip and sweep strokes of his paddle. In another instant the craft was banked high and dry, and David had descended and addressed the strange voyager.

"YOU HAVE come a long distance?" he asked. The visitor was a tribesman altogether foreign to any David had ever seen in these parts.

"Oong," affirmed the Indian, "from the Shungnak."

"The Shungnak!"

"Yes. I am Mataro, son of Kugarah, ruler of the Shungnaks," the man explained proudly.

Galt then knew the thrill that comes with crooking the knee in the presence of royal blood. This youth, as he stood there in the moonlight, appeared to him a sovereign prince if ever one had existed. His golden skin lay lightly drawn over imperial features of striking male dignity and beauty. His feet were small as are all Indian feet, and his hands were correspondingly slender and lithe.

"And you," he was quietly asked by Mataro, "you are——"

In replying, "Kit-mon," David immediately felt that he had interrupted the Shungnak in the sentence that would have included his Unganaktoick sobriquet. But he was proud to speak his Indian nickname, because, among the tribe who had given it to him, it meant "a right man." Upon hearing it Mataro for a moment disregarded David's presence and, turning his face heavenward, muttered unintelligible words.

Reports had drifted to the realm of the far north Shungnaks that their allies the Norton Unganaktoicks had living with them as a brother a man of the pale race whom they hailed as "Kit-mon." It was an exceptional tribute in the manner of conferring earned tribal titles, Mataro told Galt; it signified for them what power and strength backs one after whose name "The Just" had been added by common custom. So the son of the Shungnak chieftain had agreed to make the hazardous pilgrimage across the entire peninsula—and endeavor to have Kit-mon return with him to the land of the Shungnaks.

This isolated tribe, of which but a pitiful fragment was still alive, was in tragic need of a friend among the whites. Kugarah had divined that the "right man" of the Unganaktoick was destined to preserve them from a calamity which Mataro could not definitely describe. But his people were so stricken with insidious terror—and David would retrace with him? When Mataro had finished, David placed his hand in the young Shungnak's and they clasped in a grip of wordless understanding. That night the American and his Shungnak friend slept side by side on the dry moss bank of the river.

BEFORE noon the next day, David, on the bow thwart of Mataro's canoe, was already ten miles on the journey toward the Shungnak. That night by the campfire many questions that had been consuming the white man all day were somewhat cleared. Thus far Mataro had not had to lure David with the promise or evidence of countless riches. But, strapped to his person for this purpose, he had several specimens of rough greenish gold that he had stripped from their ancient bed in his native land. Later that night he did reveal these bits of virgin metal to David and the Shungnak was elated that they had been regarded with but passing interest.

David felt himself dropping to sleep. But he was roused by hearing his companion mutter incoherent sentences and oddly disconnected words. Mataro spoke directly into the embers of the alder coals. One sentence he repeated over and over again, "Hagson only teach Jesus, and d—o—g, dog." Then in caressing tones David heard the feminine name "Tai-lonah;" and suddenly came the name "Wolf Ladue" with the Indian epithet "Et-zir-ruck."

Galt was now electrified not only because his guide seemed to be in mental agony, but because the name Wolf Ladue was very familiar. Ladue was a notorious character who had been blue-ticketed out of every district from the upper Yukon to the Ophir diggings on the Neukluk River.

"So that's where the Wolf has finally turned up. Whew! Now I have it," Galt exclaimed.

At which Mataro, as if shocked from a delirium, turned a malignant face upon the white man. Speaking in a pidgin English, he said:

"Yes, Wolf Ladue, in Shungnak now with Doctor Hagson, missionary. Wolf bad man."

"But why haven't you run him out of your country?"

"Why? Because now Shungnak respect white man law. My father Kugarah want one time tie Ladue in canoe, with little hole in bottom, and send down-river. But missionary hear and say no. Also say beside vengeance of white man law Ladue spirit come back by 'n' by and bring sick plague on Shungnak."

"The missionary told your people that, Mataro?"

"Oong," the Indian affirmed. "Once I make up will to kill Ladue myself."

"What has he done?" David demanded.

"He try for Tai-lonah!"

"Tai-lonah—who is that?"

"My sister—the daughter of Kugarah, ruler of the Shungnaks!" Mataro uttered in all the majesty that his own language permitted.

"Oh!" was the only answer David could make.

A silence ensued between the pair that endured for nearly eighteen days.

David knew his native deserts like the back of his own hands. But when he beheld Mataro's home with the twilight creeping over the top of the world, he had his first real shock of God's power to attract the involuntary worship of man.

BENEATH him in the valley of the Shungnak the sinking sun had rolled a painted base of the purest amethystine red that crept upward to the jagged crown tips of a dead volcano crater. These fingered into shafts of silver-white and burnished-copper greens, reds, brass-yellow and glancing blacks. A galaxy of metallic luster proclaiming their precious riches, for David knew that no flood had ever washed away the gold from these bronzed-taloned crags. Now he understood why the specimen gold that Mataro had shown him was copper greenish and shot with a native white metal. He wasn't certain, but it was much like platinum, that dull white impregnation. The prospect had evidently been torn from an immense parent lode. For Galt felt that he looked upon a tremendous crucible in which the world's precious metals had been fused, suddenly chilled into bullion—and thus abandoned for all eternity.

Mataro broke upon his amazement by saying: "My father owns all that high ground beyond there—on the other side of the river. Here on this side where you see smoke coming from the cabins the white men have made their camps. There are but two. The larger one you see is the missionary school. What English I know, Doctor Hagson teach me in that building. Tai-lonah also. Every summer the missionary comes up the Shungnak, and returns to the Kotzebue coast before the freeze-up."

"Why didn't he build his school nearer his pupils, Mataro? On your side of the river?" David asked.

"Shungnak do not permit white man build on home land. No let sleep there. Look—you can see. Someone watch always. Night time—day time. Last summer Wolf Ladue try drive stakes. We put in canoe and land this side. Now we do not let him come across river at all. Down there now, unless go while I have been away. He live in cabin next school."

"So he tried to stake your land," David said half to himself. Then after a pause he reached over and, gripping Mataro's hand, said: "That's your ground, Mataro, your father's, his children's, and their children's after them for all time to come—I'll help you."

"I knew that. That is why I came for you. We need you—a friend. Missionary teach your law. That is why we do not kill the white man any more. Long time ago Shungnak kill every white man who come—all speak lies."

"Did the missionary tell you anything about locating your own home-sites and stream beds? Did he speak of the water rights and how you people are wards of the Great White Father back in my country? How you should go about securing a patented title to all this domain so that for all time to come you may never be disturbed or molested? Did he ever speak of these things?" David asked pointedly.

C. When they reached Kugarah's couch the chieftain was dying. Suddenly David knew that Tai-lonah had crept close to him, and tenderly he slipped his arm around her waist.

"No. Never. Only teach Jesus and d—o—g, dog," said the Indian with grave finality.

David expected to find a tough-looking customer in Wolf Ladue. This was his first sight of the bad man. Except for a thin-lipped, cruel mouth and a shifting glint in the slanting gray eyes, the Wolf was more sly rogue than bold desperado. David thought he looked his sobriquet all over as he shambled toward him, having come with Doctor Hagson to hail the arrival of Mataro. David noticed that his friend not so much as looked in the Wolf's direction and that what warmth the reception contained in no way received a response from Mataro. If Hagson and Ladue were aggravated when they saw him return with a stranger in tow, they masked their true feelings expertly and made no comment upon the occurrence.

THE missionary and his companion began the preparations for the trip to the seacoast winter quarters. The day they pushed their loaded paterborrough into the river, as Hagson was about to give her the launching shove, he said to David:

"We have hardly had time to become acquainted, Mr. Galt. But next summer I look forward to seeing much more of you. I find that the natives like you and this pleases me, because I feel that during the winter someone agreeable should be by to help in case of emergency. You will find a medicine chest in the mission room which I trust you will not have to open for anything serious. But as you no doubt know, when the natives do have sickness, they go very fast."

Something in the way Hagson said this made David regret that he had come to bid him a farewell. He couldn't define his feeling. He saw, he thought, a revolting menace in every word Hagson spoke.

Before the river had become gleaming ice a set of house logs had been floated down from the upstream timber and by Christmas, with the Indians' help, David was snugly set up in winter quarters. During the hewing, setting up, and chinking of the timbers he had bunked in the mission schoolroom. He knew, of course, that he was welcome to live with the Shungnaks on their tribal bank of the river, for he was the one white man who had ever been a bidden visitor among them. Kugarah made this wish emphatic before David had been under his close observation two weeks. But during that time he was active in planning in his own way for the future, and setting himself up permanently with the Shungnaks did not fit into the program as he was arranging it for himself.

He saw a day, he could not definitely foretell the time, when that flat natural townsite upon which his cabin now stood would be the scene of a roaring gold stampede. All it needed to touch it off was the news that immense treasure lay up here in the very jaws of the north wind.

David asked Mataro if Doctor Hagson might by any chance have any knowledge of the deposit.

"He has never been taken into the confidence of our race," was the reply.

"But he has been in your father's quarters, through which we have just come to get to this dri t that you have driven so far into the crater side. There are many trinkets in your father's rooms made of this gold. Surely he has seen them and suspected their source to be not far off."

"Yes, that is probable," Mataro said.

"Well, we must get busy right away." And David then recalled for Mataro the awful spectacles he had witnessed along the old trail of '98.

Not many days after this conversation an absolute set of location notices was placed in a system of stakes blanketing the entire Shungnak province. David dispatched Mataro to Eagle with a similar set to be filed there in the Official Federal records. He equipped the Indian with letters to friends—fellow pioneers of Galt's—who would see that he filed the important documents with due regularity. David wanted to go himself but feared the return of Hagson and Ladue.

ANOTHER thing kept him. He was eager for the details of the Wolf's attempt to win Tai-lonah. Her brother said that he had "tried for her" and David gave Mataro's brief statement but one meaning. Since then he had seen her, though. "Whew!" Again his pet exclamation escaped him. This time it was coupled with astonishment that anything feminine could be so beautiful as the Shungnak princess—and repulsion that a rat like Ladue could have the presumption to "try for her." Tai-lonah was fearfully man-shy, David found. However, he tried by a studied indifference to her to overcome this timorous attitude in so far as it might apply to himself.

To Galt—as indeed to all regular chaps in the Territory—a squaw was a squaw. But Tai-lonah was far from that. He thought that she might well have posed for Doré's sacred Ruth as she gleaned the wheat with good King Boaz softly looking at her. The Shungnak was an amazing queen of all womankind. "And Wolf Ladue had the nerve. . . ." David nearly burst with this indignant reflection.

When the handsome Kit-mon was in her father's sitting-room, she had usually regarded him with a sort of terror. Secretly Tai-lonah disliked schooling herself to be on guard against her brother's great friend. Doctor Hagson was the only white person with whom she had got on cordial terms.

But Kugarah liked the new man—the Kit-mon—and candidly suggested that she should, too. For, "Look you," he had said to her, "this strange youth, beloved of our allies, has he not thus far vindicated their high rating of him? He has done the thing that the mission man has not: restored to us our own with the assurance that we may now finish our few remaining days in peace within its borders."

Kugarah had told her that the Royal Shungnaks were doomed to certain extinction unless the stock might be crossed by some new fresh alien strain. And now, since Mataro had gone on this long journey, the old man spoke more and more often of these things. Then he had swung to speaking of Kit-mon as a man toward whom Tai-lonah might incline her eyes.

Once she whimsically got to wondering if David's heart were by chance concerned with some maiden far off in his own world. Queer aftermath of this blink of her mind had been that, next time she saw him sitting close to her father, looking at the profound chieftain with the expression of an adoring son—she suddenly felt her knees weaken and heard her own heart-throbs.

BUT THE next visit, the girl gave him an inspection that began at his moccasined feet, went up to the thick thatch of his brown hair and came down a little to settle in his eyes. Tai-lonah was piqued that he should treat her as the merest incident. She was not accustomed to this sort of thing. But it provoked her intense interest in the man. But she kept reverting to the eyes, his blue eyes—they were the magnetic thing about him. Somehow she liked the roll of his voice, too—there was a latent force in its softness that Tai-lonah felt might contain a fatal bite should anger breathe in it. She liked this thought. Also he had a delicate chiseling to his nostrils—she noted that they quivered sensitively. They did, and she was the cause of the quiver, too, had she but known it. David's color was in a perpetual flutter of change. This she noted, too. Then deliberately Tai-lonah had to shift from where she had been watching the register of all these emotions—and go and sit on the bench right next to her father.

Now, David could not help but see her—and look at her. But the poor chap lasted about ten seconds after the blinding sun had in this unexpected way got full in his eyes. When he recovered from the shock he was home in his cabin and to save himself he could not have told how he managed to say good-night to his friends. He knew, though, that he had made an ass of himself as he grabbed his fur cap and a present that the old ruler had given him—and rushed out of the place.

The gift was something very old, Kugarah had said—older than the stars, or something like that. And David hadn't even thanked him for it. When he removed the covering and saw what it was, his heart stood still, for he recognized that Kugarah's present might be a suitable souvenir to give any king.

He stuck his head out of the cabin late the next day and squinted at the sky. A damp frost seemed to be slowly drifting down. His hearth log had burned out, so he laid another fire.

Last night he had been too flustered to appreciate the actual, intrinsic value of his treasure; for, what he had mistaken for a brazen crescent, with three steel strings, he was astounded tonight to discover was an exquisite miniature harp wrought in the purest gold—that greenish copper gold peculiar to the Shungnak district. That was why he had thought it baser metal last night. And the three strings he had thought steel he now saw were made of highly sensitized copper.

Half consciously his fingers caressed the strings and immediately a haunting melody drifted about the cabin. It was like a human plaint.

He heard a wandering wind strike into the brake of naked birch trees that surrounded his cabin. They shivered frozen snow onto his roof, that rolled noisily down to the eaves. He had replaced the Shungnak harp when he heard the crunch of footsteps. At a timid knock David lifted the latch, and opened the door to Tai-lonah! Her eyes shone—she tried to appear calm. But when she spoke her voice faltered.

"MY FATHER very ill. Wants you quickly. He speaks but in signs. You will come?"

"Ill, Tai-lonah? Yes, surely—right away." Galt stammered in astonishment. "We must first go to the mission school and get some medicines," he said.

"No. I'm afraid it is too late for medicine. Please come at once," and yielding he went with her.

She was right. For when they reached Kugarah's couch the Shungnak chieftain was in the agony of his expiring moment.

Suddenly David knew that Tai-lonah had crept close to him. He felt her slender body twitch against his. Tenderly he slipped his arm around her waist, and was ravished by the contact of her form. A wail from outside pierced the air with its abysmal misery. The wolf dogs outside already had the message that a human soul was drifting away toward the stars. . . . A sentinel left his post at Kugarah's door and began a monotonous chant as he passed into the snowy night outside. Then David left Tai-lonah with her dead.

He kept to his own side of the river all next day, although his heart was on its opposite bank. But he knew she would understand why he remained away. But about dusk he saw her racing across the ice toward his cabin. "Oh, hurry!" she gasped. "All our young men and fathers are in the agony. Same as my father last night! Oh, hurry!" She clutched at his arm and he felt as if he were going off in a dead faint. A new terror struck Tai-lonah, for she thought he, too, was being attacked by the dread ailment. "Rouse, Kit-mon! Rouse!" she cried. "See! It is I, Tai-lonah! You must not. You—must not."

"Must not—must not, what, Tai-lonah?"

"You must live. See, my people are dying—dying. Come. We shall work together, side by side. Hurry. The medicines! Quick!" she urged in desperate seriousness.

"Live? I should say so. Did you think—" He flew to the mission medicine chest and grabbed several little cardboard boxes. Not one was marked for what specific drug it might contain, but each was carefully labeled as to dosage for the ailment written on the box. He stuffed them in his pocket, and, rejoining the unhappy girl, he raced across the river.

THE Shungnak crater fairly shrieked with the cries that came from the stricken Indians. They might have proved too much for David had it not been for the courage of Tai-lonah.

The sudden death of their chief had terrified the entire tribe; and imagination had finished the job. They began doctoring themselves against Kugarah's ailment. Cramps, he had suffered. So they all fancied themselves possessed of bowel pains. Then, one after the other, they began to drop into the black valley—each convulsed and dying in agony. David exhausted the mission chest of its drugs in the frantic hope that he might strike one that would react on the victims. Now he prayed for Hagson.

The visitation seemed at last to have spent itself, for the time; at any rate, its ravage came to a halt. David and Tai-lonah by now had been firmly united by the bond of battle.

David thrilled at the beauty of Tai-lonah as she merged her voice with the sinister incessant chant sung by her brother.

"I am happy for one thing—no, two," David said, almost whispering to Tai-lonah. "But the one thing is that Mataro has been spared you—and me. What would you have done? What would I have done? Now, you must live in my cabin. I shall go to the mission school."

That night Tai-lonah slept in David's bed—and many nights after that. Mataro breezed back, bursting with exuberant health, the sleigh bells gayly ringing, but his enthusiastic joy vanished when he saw his sister. He hardly knew her.

The only way that David Galt kept his brain from breaking these days was by forcing himself to intensive mathematics! Or call it, if you like, deductive criminology. Because—the thing hadn't come gradually but rather burst upon him as a ghastly accomplished fact. It was that remark of Hagson's, that last suave farewell, "When the natives do have sickness—they go very fast!"

And in a manner that he had never before employed in addressing Tai-lonah, he demanded that she bring him what medicines, if any, remained, that her dead father had used. She brought him but one little empty gray box. "For Cramps—Take one at bedtime, and after meals," the label read. He gathered all the drug boxes that had been left by the missionary with the dead Shungnaks. Not one had a formula of any sort. They were all the same. Galt nearly collapsed when he thought of the many times he had given these drugs, thinking them the cure. Why shouldn't he have taken them himself—or worse, given them to Tai-lonah! It was here that David for self-preservative reasons got busy with his progressive figuring. He began working out chemical formulas, visualizing the ring and classifying the elements from the basis and viewpoint of a mining engineer. He regretted that he had left his field kit down in his Unganaktolick camp. Now he needed his blowpipe, the platinum forceps, the spoons, the little agate mortar; a block of charcoal with the analyzing flame playing over its surface. Now he was oxidizing an ore that fumed the air with odors of decaying horseradish. "I have you," says the metallurgist in his abstract assaying. "You are Selenium, and your beautiful blue light compensates your stench." He tries another. This time in his visionary treatment he shakes a white powder from a gelatine capsule. With his lips applied to the horn mouthpiece of the slender blowpipe, he directs a gentle flame upon the powder; almost instantly it volatilizes, it gives off a vitreous luster—and David's nostrils are this time assailed by the smell of garlic. "Ha!" he gloats. "I know what you are. You can't fool me—no, sir. You are Arsenic!"

AND SITTING there in the schoolroom, with the old sea-chest where the drugs had been kept—now its massive top is thrown back, and all sorts of queer flames, shooting dartlike fangs, leap into the room—David swings his feet under his bunk, looks through the wall—and mentally shrieks: "The cramp medicine is—Arsenic!" The monster hammered like mad at his will—his reason!

The Shungnak had long been running in spring-time flood. Hagson was expected any day now. David, Mataro, and Tai-lonah sat on the river bank, all three dejected. Even a Malemute dog stretched out before them was unable to enjoy the lovely spring sunshine.

Tai-lonah clung closely to David, who had become inexpensively dear to her. Mataro sat off a bit from them—moody looking downstream. David felt that the Shungnak youth was willing the missionary's canoe to break into his sight any minute. The time had come for David to act a dramatic scene that he had carefully rehearsed for the last month. The climax of the drama was in doubt—that had not been rehearsed.

Like a professor about to lecture, David said, "Mataro, Tai-lonah, my friends, pay strict attention, please." He unrolled a package of chopped caribou meat and made a little ball of the flesh. Then he jabbed a depression in the meat ball. From his pocket he took two little gray pill boxes. David shook a white powder from a capsule he took from one of the boxes into the pocket he had made in the meat. He plugged the cavity with a bit of the flesh.

The emaciated-looking beast stopped its restless fidgeting upon scenting this raw food, jumped to its feet and began sniffing the air ravenously. David held the morsel in his extended hand and chirped to the dog, which bounded to him and gulped down the meat ball. In ten minutes the wretched Malemute lay doubled up in fearful agony. Within an hour the beast died a spasmodic death!

"TAI-LONAH," David said, now exhibiting the empty box, "this, you brought me from the bedside of your dead father. See! This one I took from Ak-too-rah's table, after he died. The labels you see, are identical. I have many such boxes in my cabin. You both know where I gathered them. Now must you thank your gods—as I praise my God—that every living human being in the Shungnak was not thus exterminated this winter. My people have a saying they no doubt adapted from one of your own. 'Dead men tell no tales!' You understand me, I perceive."

Mataro had already begun chanting in low sinister tones—and David saw that his face had taken on the eagle expression that had settled on Kugarah's face as he died—but on the son's features it had the glitter of a live, hating eagle. Tai-lonah instinctively loosened the folds of her raven hair and it fell in a cascade over her shoulders. David beheld her again with the same thrill at her splendid beauty as on the night she appeared in the pale snow-light, after Kugarah had passed to his gods. Tai-lonah merged her voice—Galt caught a metallic note in it—with the chant her brother kept going, incessantly.

Mataro was grimly gathering supple young saplings, bending them as if they were twigs. With no let-up in the chanting, he entwined and interlaced the poles, and David saw a circular bargelike float taking shape. At last he had the diminutive raft finished, and he began stacking a heap of dry twigs and shrubbery in its center. Under this kindling Mataro stuck a roll or two of inflammable birch-bark. Atop the pile he heaped an armful of dampened reindeer moss. He fired the kindling and immediately there arose a pillar of dense blue-gray smoke. He carried the barge altar to the river's edge and pushed it out into the current. As it drifted down the river Mataro turned his face full on the midday sun. With head thrown back and arms folded, he stared unflinchingly into the dazzling disc. David saw Mataro begin to sway on his feet and started toward him, but he was too late. The fierce orb had already delivered its inevitable blow. Struck senseless, Mataro pitched forward to the ground.

"THAT is the battle oath of the Shungnak chiefs. Only the ruler makes this vow!" David could not believe that this cold-blooded speech was uttered by Tai-lonah. The words came to him as he bent over his friend, with the measured fall of a sentence spoken in profound judgment. He looked over his shoulder at Tai-lonah and she seemed changed to an angel of vengeance. She continued as though in a trance, "The sun tells the tribe He has heard, by taking the chief's mind away for a while. When it is again restored by the power that took it, the ruler's subjects must all be arrayed in battle front and prepared for the royal command to attack. . . ."

Then there came a change in the spirit of her pronouncement—a smoldering membrane seemed to have filmed her black eyes, she became suddenly soft with tender endearment. Her words fell in ineffable sweetness now. "Kit-mon—David. . . ." For the first time Tai-lonah used his Christian name in addressing him. She went on, "The Shungnak's war oath was against your entire race. When Mataro's mind and sight are restored to him he begins his work of killing your brothers. No power exists that may alter or swerve him from the fulfillment of this vow." She now crept close to him once more, and David rose to receive her into his eager arms. He heard the classic "thee" and "thou" sanctify her speech as she said, "Thou only shalt be spared, David, for how could I, Tai-lonah, sister to the Shungnak ruler, endure without thee?"

WHEN Mataro was lifted from his sunstroke, it was in the arms of four old Indians—there were no young ones left for the task that according to the lore of the Shungnaks falls to youth. Each of the aged tribesmen wore a hammered greenish bracelet. They were four royal kin of the stricken monarch whose reign over them had run scarcely into the third moon.

David nodded in approval as the cartridge disc of a forty-one Colt's that he was rolling up over his palm clicked with healthy precision. He dropped five slugs in the shell chambers and carefully let the hammer down on the empty barrel one. Your plainsman always leaves the detonating shock nipple on an empty chamber. David spoke to the weapon. Yes, it had a neat little job before its muzzle. Might have to have it over with any minute. That very night, perhaps. What a pleasure to do this bit of man-killing! Galt's own mother would not have recognized the slaughter mask that had spread over his fine features.

Now he falls to thinking of Tai-lonah again. She is across the river. She has another bitter vigil to keep, this time with the spirit of her beloved brother. Already his remains have been hoisted to yet another stilted cache to hear the whispering of his winged gods as they swirl among the branches of the sighing birth sentinels. Unbidden, David felt Tai-lonah's breath and person hover about him, sitting here in the glow of his hearth. What a fragrance seemed to float about the very chair in which he sat! She had curled up in it so often the many lonely nights she must have spent in his quarters, while he sat staring at the yawning sea chest where Hagson had placed his diabolical drugs. How perfectly would the conspiracy have been consummated had Mataro not come across the wilderness for him! And had it not been a full success, after all? Yes, but not from Hagson's way of thinking. He of course never thought to find a white man still alive, when he should have returned for the spoils. That was the gambler's chance he had taken when he left in the fall—leaving Galt on his prey-ground.

How bland and insidious, David reflected. "There is more joy in heaven over one that is saved. . . ." And so on.

And then again . . . ever again, Tai-lonah is back once more in the vague summary. How softly she had spoken, with what dignity had she shown a great spiritual passion for him, and in the same breath indicated that she verged near the point of utter yielding to David's care. "David," she said, as the tribesmen were about to begin the cortège bearing Mataro's remains to its newly hewn cache. "David, beloved, when two nights have passed, come to thy Tai-lonah— [Continued on page 151]

C, Mary did not want to be free from Bud. Their marriage had something that lots of marriages lack; Bud was like one of those gallant ships which, having set sail for the Port of Heart's Desire, would go down in the high seas rather than take shelter in any other—a husband whom a wife could look up to always and in all ways. But suppose—she fell in love with some clean, strong American like Fred Jessup and suppose he loved her? Mary asked herself.

Here was love knocking at the door—love, hungry, beautiful, passionate and beseeching. And she must give no sign.

The Better Wife

A new novel, by the author of The Penalty, which asks and answers the question of whether marriage can redeem a "bad" woman

Illustrated by Henry Raleigh

IT WAS hard for the newly awakened Captain Highland to believe. The bedraggled sick girl told him flatly she was his wife. He stared his amazement. It was true, she insisted; they had been married the evening before at Greenwich, Conn., and were united for better, for worse. Worse, was the only thing of which Bud Highland could think. The girl was not only sick—she, he discovered, belonged to the most wretched sisterhood. To Bud, a promise was a promise and he had sworn to love and protect. He determined, after the first flush, to keep his promise to protect. But not in New York—at this his pride rebelled. At once, he made plans to take his new wife his first wife had divorced him for the other man and gone away with the two boys—to the West where he and she were unknown and where she might win back squandered health and youth. Strength and happiness came to the second wife but the past crept after them and they were forced to flee farther West, to the coast—in the effort to escape the inescapable. Gradually, there emerged the real woman back of the sick creature who was now Mrs. Highland and from whom Bud was losing his desire to escape. Mary had regained her good looks along with her health. She was happy for the first time in her life. The Jessup family, with whom she and Bud were staying in the West, made much of her—Mr. and Mrs. Jessup and their son Fred, who was laid up with a broken arm. Bud was called East through the illness of one of his boys, and during his absence a great friendship ripened between Fred and Mary, which, on Fred's part, rapidly threatened to become something more serious.

SUPPOSE it was all a dream, Mary Highland asked herself—the old life, her marriage with Bud and everything? Suppose the only true things were the Jessups's house, the Cape Cod garden, the dunes, the ocean beyond, the kindly Jessups, Fred Jessup himself, and she herself, and all the good, innocent, friendly times they were having together?

But that was impossible. In any high imagining this person may be what you please and that person, but you yourself must journey into that wonderland with the need upon you of explaining away to yourself that handicap under which you labor.

It is best to face facts precisely as they are and see what may be done with them.

Mary soon saw this for herself. So she began to accept herself as she was, and her limitations as they were, and to dream no dream that was impossible of fulfilment.

Bud Highland was very well known. He had been a marked athlete. He belonged to exclusive clubs. Wherever he went, recognition was possible. It was known that he had got drunk, and in his drunkenness had married a girl of the streets.

So long then as she remained Mary Highland, her past stood ever at hand, scowling and angry, its fist clenched, ready to strike her down.

But, obscure, each bedraggled thing that she had been, if she ceased to be Mary Highland—if she became Mary anything else, and if she stuck to this side of the continent, and if she kept on looking as she looked now, how should her past ever find her?

Now Mary was not thinking any evil, or plotting any evil. She was merely reasoning, facing facts as they were, and trying to think clear.

Bud did not want her. He did not need her. It was only his chivalry that kept him to his marriage vow, and only his innate tact and good feeling that kept him from showing her how little he wanted her or needed her. If there was anything true in this world it was that Bud would be glad to be a free man. He would never say so; and unless she wronged him, he would never become so upon his own initiative; but if she made him feel that it was she who wished to be free, wished to go back on her bond, wished to have a chance to live her life in her own way, real gladness would live in him again, and he would at once set about arranging for the freedom which she had asked of him.

But she didn't want to be free. She was only supposing. Their marriage had something that lots of marriages lack; a wife who is truly grateful to her husband because he provides for her, and is good to her; a husband who—well, Bud was like one of those gallant ships which, having set sail for the Port of Heart's Desire, would go down in the high tempestuous seas rather than take shelter in any other—a husband, whom a wife could look up to always and in all ways.

But just suppose! Suppose she were free now; free to call herself Mary Smith, or Mary Montgomery; free to say that her parents were both dead (her mother really was, and her father had long been dead to her); free to say that she had no sisters or brothers (only a few half ones); free to do anything that she wanted to do; and she only wanted to do kind, happy things!

And then suppose all this being the case, that the Jessups had asked her to pay them a visit, and that Fred was at home (just as he really was) with a broken arm to be nursed, and—well, suppose she were free to do so, and fell in love with some clean, buoyant, strong, upright, honest-to-God young American like Fred Jessup, and he with her? Suppose it were to come slowly and gradually after many weeks of companionship, whole days together during which neither of them had ever been even the least mite bored with each other? Was that the way it did come? As the spring had come to Farmer Jessup's garden? There had always been flowers in it, even in the heart of winter; then there had been more, more of the kind that were always there, and a beginning of the other kinds, and an increase in the number of those other kinds, and the addition of still other kinds, of all other kinds, new shapes, new colors, new perfumes. Was that the way love came, a putting out here, and unfolding there, until at last all became one fragrant riot of delight?

How should they know? And which would tell the other? Or would there be no need of a telling of that which was already known to both?

Would she have to tell Fred (if she loved him and he had asked her to marry him) about all that dreary, starving ugliness of a life that she had once had to live? He would never know unless she did tell him. But perhaps he would just naturally know; perhaps men have some secret way of telling? Of course they haven't. She wouldn't tell him that she had never really been her husband's wife; because that would be cause for wonder, and a great plying of questions. He would always think and believe that she had been her husband's wife, and he would be thinking and believing and being a little hurt perhaps by a thing that was not so!

She had proved that she had in her all the makings of a good wife. She was loyal to Bud; she would die rather than be disloyal to him. (There was no disloyalty in just supposing things.) There was nothing that she would not do if he asked her to. She had learned to mend his things. She loved to mend them; to fold his things, to hang his things, to keep his things in order. He had never told her to. It was all her own original, unpoised contribution to marriage. And now Mrs. Jessup had taught her to press his things; to put beautiful crisp creases in his trousers, and to make his ties, especially the stretchy, woven kind look like new. She had learned how to blanco his white shoes, and to run black varnish along the edges of the thick, red rubber soles. She had learned to wash out his breeches, to pack his suitcase, ever so much better than he could do it himself, to see that his socks either matched his tie, or did not swear at it, and, when at last the paragon was fully groomed, caparisoned and ready to sally forth, to halt him at the threshold, face him about and remove something altogether imaginary from the lapel of his coat.

They had been together so much that it seemed a little uncanny now, this lying in the dark, and not hearing him breathe. She missed him. If he went out of her life for good and all, she would always miss him.

But suppose he did go, for good and all, without reason, and she was married to someone like Fred? It needn't be Fred. He was handy to imagine things about. That was all. Well, nearly all!

SHE would have first, then, a real husband. Real because she loved him, and because he loved her. In lieu of those parents, one of whom was dead to her in particular, and the other to the world in general, she would have Father Jessup and Mother Jessup. And she would have friends. All Fred's friends would be hers. She would meet them without fear. Once Mother Jessup had taken her into Fred's room. It was different from the Father and Mother Jessup rooms. It was so much more shipshape and workmanlike. The narrow bed was painted iron instead of wood. The chairs had wicker seats, instead of plush. The lights were on each side of the looking-glass, and one at the head of the bed instead of in the middle of the ceiling. Here was no carpet, but a couple of cheap, clean, quiet-colored rugs.

Fred had been away at the time of this visit. You could have told because there was a water mug on the bureau with Johnny-Jump-ups in it. They were his favorite flower. But he wouldn't let his mother put any flowers in his room when he was in it himself; only when he was away. And then the windows were shut, and that was never allowed to happen when he was at home.

There were some books on a table, a work on engineering, a volume of Barrie's plays, an Oxford Bible—to Frederick Jessup from his Mother—a Dictionary of slang, a book called Diddle Dumps and Tob, a Fifth Reader, Maude and other Poems.

The walls were clean white plaster. There were no pictures on them. The only pictures visible were one of his mother and one of his father. These stood on the bureau in twin oval frames of plain silver. He had bought the frames as soon as he had saved enough out of his first earnings.

But there were pictures in a drawer; cabinet size photographs, mostly, lots of them. Mrs. Jessup had pulled the drawer open. She wanted Mary to know how many friends Fred had.

He had them all over his own state, it seemed, and in lots of other states. He might seldom had to put up at a hotel no matter where he went. He had college friends, of both sexes, and army friends, and all sorts, kinds and conditions of railroad friends. He was on his way up, Fred was, but the rungs of his ladder were deeds. He never stepped on a friend. The president had wanted to know who had disobeyed a fool order and saved a trainful of school-teachers, on an excursion, from running head-on into a trainload of hogs. It was Fred! Fred who had saved the teachers from the hogs and the hogs from the teachers! It was almost the first time he had ever saved anybody (except of course from drowning, and a little child from a mad dog), and the president had sent for him, and thanked him, and given him a cigar out of his own pocket.

Yes, siree, Fred stuck to his friends and Fred's friends stuck to him. It was all she could do to shut the drawer.

So there would be the friendships with Fred's friends. . . . yes. . . . she guessed if they had a honeymoon and it didn't cost so much that they'd take in Santa Barbara, Monterey, 'Frisco, and perhaps Yosemite.

They would live with the Jessups; because she would need them when he was away. It would be a little like being married to a sailor; but that wouldn't last forever. He was on his way up, with all his friends boosting him for all they knew, instead of being stepped on. He would be a high officer in the company some day. He would have his business being in a highly polished office. They would live in Los Angeles.

There were two letters from Bud in the morning's mail, today's, and the one that ought to have come yesterday. He hoped she was well. She was. He was mighty glad she had that firm, clean-cut, young Fred Jessup to play around with. . . . His son was getting along. The trouble had subsided. . . . awfully pulled down. He couldn't be coming West just yet. He was seeing his boys every day and Bud Junior kind of clung to the idea of his staying round a while longer. And he doubted if he'd have money to get him back till after the first of the month.

Suppose she were free now—and the Jessups had asked her to pay them a visit, and Fred was at home and she fell in love with him. She would have a real husband then; real because he loved her.

She laid the letter aside, and smiled across the table at Fred. She wondered what he would say if he knew what liberties her imagination had been taking with his future life. What perfect nonsense darkness sometimes puts into people's heads! She and Bud would go away one of these days and very likely they would never see the Jessups any more. This thought occurring in the middle of the night might have caused her a guppy pang. But not now with those hot sizzly sounds from the kitchen in her ears, and that heavenly aroma of fresh-made coffee in her nostrils. Husbands who were not husbands, pasts that could never die, love matches, homes, children, respect, friends, parents—these perplexities were but dust down the wind. An empty stomach is an empty stomach, and a hot waffle is a pretty thing!

They did not drive that afternoon but walked, over the fields and over the dunes, and settled down there, in a cup-like scooping of white sand, to watch the fiery sun.

Fred Jessup had been talking about himself. He had never done that before. She was immensely flattered. It had the effect of making her feel very experienced and wise; one from whom sound judgment, and good advice is counted on. He had told her things that he might or might not have told his mother. And now in a halting, troubled sort of way he had begun to tell her about a problem which affected him very nearly.

He had two friends. They were both splendid. He admired the husband as much as he admired the wife.

"He has a very strong character, Mrs. Highland. He is a man's man. . . You could go to him with any problem, and be sure of a judgment which had put down its best to look at the problem squarely and without prejudice on both its sides. . . . He is one of the few men I have known who seems to have a definite scheme in life. I should say, the young man poised his words one by one. That he made little effort to drown out things from among his natural likes and dislikes but that he did his best to take good care of whatever happened to be put in his way to take care of. If his name were Vere de Vere he would take no better care of it than if it happened to be Smith. Whatever name it was, it would be his name, his to take care of. He would keep it honorab'le and clean. . . . I think there is nothing that he would not do, kindly, clearly and courageously, if it seemed to him that the doing of it was his obligation. I am not telling you what he is, only what I think he is. I don't know him very well. I know her better than I know him. I didn't grow up with them, nor in the same part of the world. Maybe father would understand them better than I do. They are Eastern people. I'm not, though father and mother are. Eastern people are more contained than Western people. Even if they are just as interested in themselves, they don't seem quite so interested in having other people know it. We know that we haven't made as many mistakes as they have. And that makes us a little bumptious and then a little shy. They know why they have made more mistakes than we have, and we don't. It's because they have been in existence longer, and have had more chances. We laugh at their farming methods. But if they had had land smooth as a billiard table and with no rocks in it, maybe they'd have come to farm it the way we do, and sooner than we did. The West is big and generous and fresh, but it doesn't know these things. And that is why it has no sense of humor about itself and such a big chip on its shoulder."

"First you tell me that the West doesn't know things, and then you, a Westerner, tell me what those things are."

"This man," Fred went on, "that I am telling you about once set me thinking."

He turned a little against the sea-wind and lighted a cigarette.

"Are you cold?"

She shook her head.

"This man," Fred continued, "and this woman, are the pair that I'd pick out of all the people I know—the man for my ideal of what a husband ought to be like, and the woman, she isn't much more than a girl, for my ideal of what a wife ought to be like. . . ."

"And that, Fred," she interrupted gently, "seems to make you feel sad."

"That's me all over," Fred laughed. "I don't get serious about things. I get lugubrious. . . . I can't imagine him losing his temper with a woman, or being mean or selfish about anything, or ever anything but polite and gentle—and still a tower of strength if she ever needed one."

He became as if lost for a few moments in his thoughts, and said no more until Mary, who was getting interested in this paragon and his wife, urged him to go on. He tossed the end of his cigarette away.

"They smoke quick in a wind," he observed, and then said, "I don't know what your judgment of the wife would be; but I think she is beautiful. . . ."

THIS was a new Fred, a solemn, puzzled person; very young. He would ordinarily have described a beautiful woman with a breezy "peach" or "pippin." If she were wise as well as beautiful he would be apt to say of her "when the brains were passed around she got both hands in the bucket."

She guessed then that slang and facetiousness were his barrier against sudden intimacies. Now that he had gained confidence in her, the barrier was down, and he was letting her see what he was really like.

"And she's your ideal, too, Fred, of what a wife ought to be?" she asked.

"In her generation," he qualified, as though he had thought it all out. "Yes, but my mother, in hers."

"It's strange, that out of all the people in the world the two who would be your ideals should have found each other."

He made no comment.

"She is beautiful," he said, "and she is good. . . . But I don't think I can describe her very well. I think words were only made to describe men with, and thunderstorms, and waterfalls. . . ."

Good, he was going to be facetious!

"And earthquakes and devils and angels, but not women!"

He laughed gaily.

"But if I want to know."

"I'll try to answer any questions, but you'll not get at her looks, or her qualities that way." He leaned his back against the sand, crossed one leg over the other, and fixed his eyes on a point midway between the horizon and the zenith.

"Tall?"

"Five feet seven. That's a guess."

"Eyes?"

"Blue."

"But are they light or dark or big or little?"

"Dark and big."

How foolish it was!

"Face?"

"Oval."

"Skin?"

"Like the petal of a magnolia."

"Mouth?"

"Not small. Very sweet."

"Teeth?"

"All of them, I think, white but small. . . . Do you begin to see her?"

"Of course not."

"Well, what did I tell you?"

YOU might answer all the questions the same way about hundreds and hundreds of women; and no two of them would be even one little bit alike."

"Is that the fault of the questions or the answers, Mrs. Highland?" . . . Fred asked; and without waiting for her answer, he went on: "she carries her head the way Marie Antoinette carried hers when she went to have it cut off. She would be too sweet if she wasn't so proud and reticent. She would be too reticent and proud if she wasn't so sweet. . . . A strange dog would want to share his bone with her. . . . She wouldn't hurt a fly. . . . She would be hurt to the death without a whimper. Do you see her any better than you did?"

Mary shook her head.

"But I'm excited about her now."

"Well," laughed the young man, "so am I."

"And now," she said, "I want to know why you started telling me about these people. . . . the ideal husband, and the ideal wife."

"It's because," said he, slowly, his eyes still fixed on some point in open that was about midway between the zenith and the horizon. "It's because they don't love each other."

Mary had gathered a handful of sand. She let it slip and ripple through her fingers.

"Not very reticent of them to tell you that," said Mary after the sand had all trickled away, and she had gathered another handful.

She was a little troubled. Except about the wife's beauty there was something of a personal application to herself and Bud in much that he had been telling her.

"They never told me. They'd hate to have anyone know. They never let on for one moment. That's one of the things that is so splendid about them both."

"Then how do you know?"

"I may even tell you that. But not now. Anyway I know. I know and I think maybe there is something that I could do about it, and that's why I'm asking your advice."

He couldn't possibly be referring to Bud and herself after all. They didn't love each other, it is true; but Fred was just about the last person in the world who would do anything about that.

"They never did love each other," said Fred.

"Then what made them get married?"

"That part puzzles me a lot, but it would have been for some reason that seemed to them obligatory. It makes me almost wild sometimes trying to guess what sort of a reason could make marriage obligatory for two people like that, when they didn't love each other. And if they were obliged to marry, what obliged them to stick together, and be unhappy?"

"You didn't say they were unhappy."

"And married, and not loving each other! Of course, they are unhappy . . . not close-up stuff, you know, but just patiently, smilingly, laughingly, and jokingly and everlastingly unhappy."

"The woman, Fred. . . . she means a lot to you. Is that it?"

"She means a lot to me," he said, "a whole lot."

C. Mary and Bud had been together so much she realized that if he went out of her life she would always miss him.

She had too much sweetness not to give him her whole sympathy; but the woman in her felt a little dashed at being relegated to a subsidiary plane in the conversation.

"Have you ever talked with her about herself and her husband?"

"Once."

"And about their not loving each other?"

"Yes."

"Did she admit it?"

"She said nothing. It was almost as good as admitting. I didn't put the case very distinctly, not right bang up; but she knew what I was driving at. She must have known."

"And she listened to you, and when you hinted that she didn't love her husband, and they weren't happy together, she didn't deny it? I thought she was the ideal wife?"

"She is."

"But she was disloyal."

Fred let this sink in.

"It wasn't," he said, defending his ideal, "as if she really let me talk about them. I gave a hypothetical case and then kind of jumped things on her all of a sudden. If she was disloyal, it was because she was taken by surprise. And I didn't say any more about her not loving him, because I was ashamed."

"Was that how you found out? Guessed, and set a trap for her?"

He shook his head.

"I know, Mrs. Highland, because I love her. That is how I know. I want her to divorce her husband and marry me. That is how I think I could help them both. I would make her happy; and he would be happy, because he would know he had made others happy. He is like that. He's a man."

"But they wouldn't have any grounds for a divorce, if they are all the things that you say they are to each other."

He faced her now, suddenly, with a kind of savage elation in his eyes.

"They don't need a divorce," he cried, "all they need is an annulment. The marriage has never been. . . ."

He faltered and blushed hotly.

"It has never been a marriage. . . . How do I know? I don't know how I know. I guess it's just the loving so. Love would have to know. I've watched them, and watched them, and put this together, and that together, and I know. . . . Her eyes are like a baby's. I look in them, as I am looking into yours, now, and they look as a girl's eyes look before she is married, and never afterwards. . . . Tell me, Mrs. Highland, please tell me what I ought to do?"

No question now. It was Bud and she he had in mind. But how could he know, what he most certainly did know? And if the love that he had for her could reveal that much to him; if it could reveal to him the thing that had not happened, why did it not also reveal to him the things that had. And he wanted to know what earthly reason could have made a marriage between them seem obligatory. Whisky!

She rose slowly to her feet as if cramped after sitting so long in one position. "I'm glad," she said, "that you have confided all this to me, Fred. It won't go any further."

She felt unutterably weak and weary. There was love knocking at the door, love, hungry, beautiful, passionate and beseeching. And she must give no sign, make no answer. She had never imagined that it would be a terrible thing to have a man love her, and believe that she was good.

Was she going to let him make love to her, he wondered? Did she see, as he saw where her happiness lay? What was the mystery that surrounded them? Married and not married? As far as the poles apart and yet one and indivisible! They walked half the way home in silence. He was cruelly disappointed in [Continued on page 102]

The Vitamin Craze

By Dr. Paul H. De Kruif

C. Doctors, some of them—and sometimes—help their patients. Many times they act blindly—and the patient, or his survivors, pay. Some drugs help and some drugs don't. You want to know what to expect of a doctor and what to expect of a drug. Here is the truth, furnished by an expert connected with the leading research institution in the world

NO ADVERTISING campaign of drug-mongers has been so complete, so insistent, so expensive, or so gaudy as the one now being conducted by the vendors of vitamins. The virtues of vitamins clamor at us from the display ads in reputable and sedate daily newspapers. They bellow their importance from subway advertising cards, drowning out the roar of the underground expresses. They shriek their excellences from the ornate sky signs of the Broadway toy shop. Their strident shoutings efface the beauties of natural landscapes.

We are assured that "IF IT ISN'T MASTIN'S IT ISN'T VITAMON." Vitavim, Vitazest, Vitayeast, and Vitamon sing discordant quartets to us. Each member of the chorus raucously extols his own virtues, the while he attempts to drown out the competitive hallelujahs of his brothers. These songs beguile us with promises of health and beauty and success. They sing threatening adagio lamentosos of the dire things that will happen to us if we do not heed their warnings.

This does not mean that vitamins are not necessary to us. They are as needful as the air we breathe. It is true that we could not be beautiful or strong or energetic or successful without them. But there is no more necessity of buying them from Mr. Mastin or Mr. Fleischmann than there is of purchasing some special grade of compressed oxygen, sold in handsome and imposing cylinders, to satisfy our need for air. An enterprising fellow who would go about advocating the use of his special air for breathing would be jailed as a crook or confined to a lunatic asylum. Still, his commerce would be only slightly more absurd than the present highly successful traffic in vitamins.

What are the origins of this astounding hoax? To explain these, it will be well to tell you something of the history of our knowledge of the much heralded vitamins.

It has been recognized for centuries that sailors on long voyages were apt to be the victims of a disease known as "scurvy." People with scurvy have swollen and ulcerated gums. Their teeth become loose and may fall out. They may have irregular fevers. Red spots appear on their skin, because of the breaking of the small blood vessels underneath it.

It has been known, too, for more than a hundred years, that no drug or medicine could cure this disease. If, on the other hand, a patient with scurvy were fed the juice of lemons or oranges, or a raw potato, his affliction would vanish, as if by magic. Further, it was known that if such things were included in the food of a healthy man, he would never get scurvy. So it was logical to believe that this malady was due to something lacking in the diet. Not in amount, mind you! For a sailor might have at his disposal unlimited amounts of hard bread and salt pork and tea, and still get scurvy. But it had been demonstrated that were he to add some lemon or orange juice or raw potato, even in small amount, no scurvy would appear.

The doctors of the British navy knew this more than a century ago, and so made a ration of lemon juice compulsory to sailors on long voyages. For this reason, British sailors go by the name of "Limies" to this day.

In the Japanese navy, many years ago, the Japanese sailors were afflicted with a serious disease known as "beriberi." This is a far worse trouble than scurvy. The legs become rigid and may have very painful convulsive spasms. The sufferer often becomes anemic, that is to say, thin-blooded. He loses his muscular power. He may have intense neuralgic pains. The disease very often ends in death.

A Japanese doctor named Takaki noticed that the diet of the sailors consisted largely of polished rice. This is the ordinary white rice we use in America. Polished rice is rice freed from its husk by milling. Dr. Takaki urged that the rice be replaced in part by barley. His advice was followed by the naval authorities, and at once beriberi disappeared from the Japanese navy.

Two American scientists, Osborne and Mendel, were experimenting upon the feeding of purified foodstuffs to guinea pigs. They fed these animals, not with grain or meat or vegetables, but rather with the proteins, starches, and sugars which they had obtained from these sources in a pure state.

On this diet the guinea pigs developed a severe disease of the eyes. It was found that this trouble could be cured by the simple addition of a little butter fat or cod liver oil to

The apple was good but obviously it lacked the nutritive value of the milk. A switch of diet made the little one grow until it was the larger of the two. The fault of the diet "was partly in its Vitamin content." (From Sherman, Rouse, Allen and Woods, 1921, by permis. on of the Journal of Biological Chemistry.)*

the diet. Other workers found the same to be true of dogs when these animals were fed in a like manner.

In the early eighties an investigator named Lunin was studying the effects of feeding purified foodstuffs to young mice. He found that these little animals failed to grow when they were fed on pure albumen, starch and sugar, and fat. If, on the other hand, he added small quantities of milk to this diet, natural growth took place.

This important discovery, though announced in a textbook of chemistry, failed to arouse surprise or general notice until in 1906 an English scientist, named Hopkins, found the same thing to be true in regard to the feeding of rats. He stated that in reality milk contained two substances which were necessary to growth. One of these could be dissolved in water. The other, curiously enough, was dissolved in the fat of the milk.

The experiments of Hopkins were remarkable. He would take, for example, two baby rats from the same litter. To one of these he fed a diet of purified foodstuffs for twenty-five days. The amount was ample to keep the rodent from starving, yet he did not grow, except slightly in the first few days.

The other little rodent he fed exactly the same diet, plus a small amount of milk, and as in the first case continued thus for twenty-five days. The rat began growing at once, and nearly doubled its weight in this time.

Then the doctor switched diets on the two animals. That is, he transferred the milk ration from the second to the first. At once, the second stopped gaining weight and the first one began growing in a perfectly normal manner. So that in twenty-five days she actually weighed more than her sister.

In the first decade of the present century a Dutchman named Eijkman discovered that he could produce a disease exactly like beriberi in fowls. All he had to do, to bring about this result, was to feed them on polished rice. Scientists are fond of using long names. It would have been simple to have called the disease "beriberi of pigeons or chickens" as the case might be. But we must be scientific, so this experimental beriberi was called "polyneuritis," and you will have to think of it thus.

To his astonishment Eijkman discovered that his birds never became sick if he fed them on unpolished rice, that is to say, rice which had not been milled, and whose white kernels were still enclosed in the husks. What is more, by merely feeding with rice husks the birds that were almost ready to die with beriberi, he brought about most remarkable cures.

These experiments stirred up a great furor of activity among scientists. One of them, named Funk, thought that he had found the exact chemical nature of this mysterious thing in the husk or rice, the lack of which caused men and birds to contract beriberi. Funk believed that this substance was a compound of a complicated organic substance with ammonia. Such compounds are technically called "amines." Since life could not exist when the food lacked this stuff, Funk coined the name "vitamine" from the Latin "vita" life and the chemical term "amine."

It was later found that Funk was probably mistaken in the belief that he had really identified this substance chemically. But the name has stuck, with the modification of dropping the e.

AS THE labor in this field grew more and more intense, it became evident that there were at least three of these mysterious substances.

The one whose absence from food causes eye disease in dogs and guinea pigs is called "Vitamin A."

The one whose absence from food gives rise to beriberi is called "Vitamin B."

The one whose absence from food gives rise to scurvy is called "Vitamin C."

The majority of men who are concerned with this study think that "A" and "B" are identical with the things in milk which promote growth. But very careful studies, carried on in a quantitative manner, will be needed to prove it.

Despite a great amount of research, we do not know the chemical structure of vitamins. If we did, we could make them in the laboratory. But so far that has not been accomplished.

If "A" is absent from the food of a dog, he gets eye disease; or if it is lacking in the diet of a baby rat, it fails to grow.

If "B" is absent from the diet of man or fowls, beriberi results.

C. Night and day this billboard tells Broadway how to get "the original and genuine Yeast Vitamon Tablets."

Q. "You make me sick, Marge," said Wanda. "You're simply maximizing your ego at the expense of that poor dub. He looks as gaunt and three times as unhappy as that cat of yours. If I were in his shoes I'd demand a show-down."

Married Once But Lovers Now

By Royal Brown

Illustrated by Everett Shinn

Q. Marge's idea was that the holy bonds of matrimony should be tied with a slip-knot. And after a while Richard became broad-minded too ENGAGEMENT there was none. They came to what Marge called a mutual agreement at lunch, which they ate together, not at the Brevoort but not far from it, on as raw and gray a day as November can devise. As for Richard Lee, party of the second part, he was in love, and love had left him white and twenty-eight, but no longer free. He was more than in love with Marge, he was mad about her. And so they were married; married at three o'clock of that same November day by a Justice of the Peace. Marge would have preferred no ceremony at all; of herself—as she told him frankly—she would have gone to his apartment and shared that with him while they worked out a temperamental test.

But this was impossible, of course. Laws—silly laws, but potent—prevented it. Marge had just written a sob-story about a girl who had discovered this. Accordingly:

"I," said she, at three o'clock, "promise to honor this man as long as—he deserves it."

Even at three o'clock the Elevated's shadowing structure darkened the parlor in which they were married, so that the Justice of the Peace had switched on lights. The glare of these revealed his professional smirk surrendering to a stare of sheer surprise.

"I'm sure it's perfectly legal," Marge assured him, amusement flickering in her lovely eyes. "Please, go on."

"Er hum," he managed. Then he looked at Richard. "Er—the ring, please?"

"There is no ring," murmured Richard, in a voice as low almost as that reputed to conscience.

Everything about the ceremony seemed to him fantastic and utterly inadequate. Yet they were married. The Justice of the Peace said so and, accepting his fee with a final professional smirk, reserved his private opinion until they had gone. Then:

"I GUESS," he told his wife, who had witnessed the ceremony, "that there's no doubt who will wear the pants in their home."

This low had love brought Richard—Richard who had been a 'varsity end and a "Bones" man once. They were married, yet he had never kissed her.

"Spooning," Marge had told him—back in August—"spooning is an atavism. I—I detest it."

This of a languorously lovely evening, when they had driven up to the Drive on the top of a Fifth Avenue bus and then had walked a little ways. They paused presently, and she had stood, her eyes turned across the river, dyed with the flaming sunset's prodigal spendthrifteries.

From under her smart sailor the ends of her hair gleamed. Fair, with tawny depths, it was hair such as would have curled in little ringlets around the base of her neck had she not bobbed it because bobbing, she said, was sensible. The fact that she looked anything but sensible with it bobbed—as Richard's eyes bore constant testimony—had absolutely nothing at all to do with it.

The eyes she kept turned so steadfastly across the river, to the changing hues of the hazy hills of Jersey, were blue-gray and very lovely. Some of the color that the sky poured so prodigally down into the river seemed flung up into her face. Watching her, he was guilty of a bromidiom.

"It looks," he thought, "like rose leaves——"

Even as he let his mind run on that, their shoulders had touched. To him the brief contact was electric. She, turning, caught his eyes and her own had widened. Then she had smiled.

"Why, Dicky-Bird!" she had protested—he hated that name but she persisted in it, without realizing that for all her determined lack of sex consciousness she scratched at him with it as a kitten scratches at a terrier—"You look almost spoony!"

The loveliness of her voice, the mirth in her eyes, saved the words from banality. And before he could speak she had added:

"Spooning is an atavism and I detest it!"

Richard might have retorted that so is the need of food, air and water. Instead he proved himself a man, a lover—and a liar.

"I detest it, too!" he had agreed.

This in August. Subsequently Marge had been psychoanalyzed by the Village specialist. Said specialist never wore a hat, apparently never combed his hair and seldom had it cut, and he generally appeared in public in an old brown corduroy coat that Richard, who was not without humor save in love, dubbed his Carte de Jour for obvious—quite obvious—reasons.

"Some people mate on the intellectual plane, some on the spiritual or the soul-mate plane, others on the so-called physical plane," he had told Marge, in a voice as languorous as a cat's purr.

"You," he went on, "are physically cold——"

He paused, to give her opportunity to deny this, should she choose. She did not. "You detest physical contacts," he resumed. "And so you will mate on the intellectual plane."

The Village psychoanalyst did not say, in so many words, that he needed an intellectual mate. He merely shook his mane—and looked intellectual and receptive.

A real psychoanalyst could have told her, doubtless, why girls like to be told that they are cold physically. And he might have told her other things that would have pleased her less. He might even have told her that she suffered from esthesiomania. This is an awful thing to say of anybody, but Marge deserved it. Or perhaps her Aunt Elizabeth Follansbee was to blame.

Marge's Aunt Elizabeth Follansbee had lived in Brookline, Massachusetts. From the time Marge had been orphaned at eight until Aunt Elizabeth had "passed on," Marge had been called Margaret, had worn black moire, spring-heel shoes and the sort of hats one would expect Aunt Elizabeth to select for her.

"What you are suffering from," a competent psychoanalyst would have told Marge, "is a revulsion of feeling—an irresistible desire for freedom from all restraints that is found in leading an unconventional life."

RICHARD who, as the summer waned and fall set in, had become physically attracted to Marge—this being Marge's own term for what he was willing to lay himself down and "dee" for under the mid-Victorian impression that it was love—tried to make her see that.

"The trouble with you, Dicky-Bird," she replied, sweetly, "is that you are too conventional to understand."

Richard had flushed and looked annoyed. He always looked particularly attractive when annoyed. And physically cold though she was, she did like the way he wore his hair close cropped. But she only told him perversely that he didn't look the least bit like an artist.

"Thank the Lord for that," he commented.

Nor did he pretend to be one.

"Comics," he explained, when pushed to it. "Six strips of tripe a week and a colored spread for the Sunday supplements——"

They were good, nevertheless, and they made him a scandalous amount of money. If Marge had been anything but what she was, he might have married her and had a place in Westchester, say. That was what he needed. He was the domestic type. Marge told him so on that raw, gray November day when they took lunch together, not at the Breevoort—but not far from it.

"You're a born bourgeois," she had added. "All you need is an adoring young wife—any adoring young wife."

Richard looked pestered, but stubborn. "I want you——"

"Physical attraction, Dicky-Bird!" scoffed Marge, lighting a cigarette with the indolent grace that comes of long practice.

Richard's frown deepened. He hated to see her smoke so many cigarettes. But it would be useless to tell her so.

"All right—call it whatever you choose," he acquiesced, with a deadly calm. "I'm through."

The smoke she was exhaling hung around Marge's lovely mouth. "What do you mean?" she asked, lightly enough, yet with a quickened interest in her eyes.

"Whatever you call it, I can't stand any more of it," he explained. "Seeing and being with you——"

Emancipated though she was, Marge felt a suspicion as old as Eve. But she hid it admirably.

"Poor boy!" she murmured, and considered him, sitting there, his eyes glowing, his lips firmly compressed. "I've told you that's the best thing——"

"Don't rub it in, please," he protested, and glanced about for their waiter.

A faint frown appeared between Marge's eyebrows. The man looked absolutely determined! And though she might be physically cold she was none the less feminine and this sudden change in his mood made her think furiously.

"I wonder," she suggested, suddenly, "if perhaps seeing and being even more with me wouldn't cure you more effectually?"

His eyes came back to her with a flash. "What do you mean?" he demanded.

MARGE hesitated. Some inhibition unworthy of an emancipated woman kept her silent. Then she mastered it and, flicking the ash from the edge of her cigarette, lifted her eyes to him.

"I'm as fond of you as I am of anybody, Dicky-Bird," said she. "And I hate to have you suffer. I'll marry you, to cure you, on certain conditions."

He should have fled then, precipitately, leaving her to pay all the check, instead of just her share, as she always insisted. But he was mad about her.

"Let's call it a temperamental test," she went on. "I'll marry you to find out just what we mean to each other—if anything. I'd live with you without marriage but it's such a silly old world, always imagining horrible things."

No one who had known her Aunt Elizabeth could doubt that Aunt Elizabeth turned rapidly over in her grave at least twice at that. Richard himself squirmed but Marge never blinked a lovely eyelash.

"I like running around with you," she added. "We are good pals, perhaps we can make a go of it on that plane. And of course we'll both be perfectly free to mate with anybody, at any time, on that or any other plane."

The idea, now that she had broached it, positively fascinated her. It was a lovely little esthesiomaniac that looked across at her victim.

"Well?" she asked.

The pity of it was that he loved her so much, so completely, that if she had suggested living in twin-tents in Central Park he must have said yes.

And so it was that a Justice of the Peace found himself twenty dollars the richer for having performed a marriage which struck him as odd, but which would have struck him as odder still if he had known that it was to be lived on the intellectual plane only. As for Richard, he was utterly overwhelmed. When they emerged he looked anything but a bridegroom.

"Are—we going to the—the studio now?" he asked Marge.

THIS SHE considered. "I'm afraid I was impulsive about that," she told him, finally. "In the first place it isn't big enough and in the second it's too expensive for me. Of course I'm going to pay my share——"

Richard swallowed. "Of course," he acquiesced, without meeting her eye.

"Let's go househunting!" she exclaimed.

The early dusk of November had descended when they came to Broadway, a misting rain blurred street, shops, and motor lights. But they kept on.

They found, in time, not what they wanted, but what Marge said must do. Accordingly Richard, who could have swung a twenty or thirty-thousand-dollar house in Westchester, began his married life—so-called—in a four-room flat in a part of New York he cared for not at all.

"But that," explained Marge, "is what you get for marrying a poor woman. Perhaps it will cure you of me all the quicker."

This being the most modern interpretation of the married estate, the "two-home" idea was to be carried out even within the confines of their tiny apartment. Here Marge took the lead. As they were to eat here, there and everywhere save at home.

C, Full of holiday and other spirits they made the welkin, and several bells from other apartments, ring. No one was as high and gay as Marge that evening. The psychoanalyst dropped in at eleven and, attaching himself to her, stayed until three. obviously mesmerized by this new Marge.

the dining-room had manifestly been miscast. To it she assigned the rôle of common living-room. The real living-room she preempted as her own private domain. Richard's refuge was to be the bedroom.

They were, of course, to keep their own friends and select their own diversions. Their first caller, the only one they had in common, appeared before they were settled; while, indeed, Richard was hanging pictures.

This was a cat, but no common house-cat. He was a D'Artagnan cat, gray and gaunt, with a cynical eye. No one encountering that eye, could doubt but what he had lived widely, without morals or scruples. The front door being open he stalked in with the self-assurance of a census taker, or a gas-meter inspector. From one room to another he passed, his tail moving gently. Then—nobody ever believed this, but both Marge and Richard swore to it—he, having seen all, heard all, returned to the front door.

This bore two names, to wit:

Marge Follansbee
Richard Lee

The cynical-eyed cat gazed at this long and steadily. One might almost have said, indeed, that he looked intrigued. Then, returning to the living-room he hopped up on the window-sill and made himself at home.

"He looks," exclaimed Marge, "as if he might write the Human Comedy from personal experience. Let's christen him Balzac!"

Richard was almost happy. But presently their next visitor appeared—appeared hatless, hair uncombed and with a general air of one who has a mind above material things such as soap and water. He greeted Richard as he might have spoken to a bus-boy, and forgetful of Marge's dislike of physical contact, kissed her hand in a way that apparently struck Balzac as funny. Anyway he grinned. But Richard did not.

That was why, perhaps, Marge took her caller to her room and closed the door. On that door was a sign Richard had not yet seen. It read:

"Not At Home."

Balzac, intrigued anew, gazed inquiringly up at Richard's stolid back.

A few minutes passed. Then Richard turned abruptly and Balzac looked interested. He had an idea that something was going to start. Instead Richard got his hat and coat and went out. Then Balzac cocked an ear toward the other room.

"I," the psychoanalyst was saying, "cannot believe that you can mate with him, even intellectually. I assure you that I fear, dear lady, that—"

Balzac hopped down to the floor and gazed around him.

"Well, I'll be damned!" he commented.

Then came the day when Marge and Richard were having their first quarrel and Marge was getting all the better of it.

"I'm sorry, Dicky-Bird," she said, with a sweetness that only maddened Richard more, "but it proves just what I said. What you want is a domestic little woman who will adore you—"

"It's plain you don't," intervened Richard, bitterly.

"My dear, when did I pretend otherwise?" she demanded, reasonably.

She had him there. She had only to remind him, always, that she had promised nothing, pretended nothing. He was free to leave at any time. . . .

FREE! Richard had reason to smile bitterly at the thought. He suffered and he saw his work suffer. And yet he went on, from day to day, snatching at such crumbs as fell his way. For there were precious interludes; trips in his car out into the country, where the season had stripped the fields but where the contrast to the city relaxed and freshened them both. And now and again they went to the theater.

Once in a tense moment of a play she put her fingers in his, unconsciously, and gripped them hard. He treasured that in his memory for days.

Little moments of happiness, as against hours when he flamed to a jealousy that was not green, but red. There were days when he hardly saw her. They each had their own friends, but Marge's seemed all masculine, Richard's were never feminine.

The village psychoanalyst was the most frequent, and, to Richard, the most irritating of Marge's visitors.

"I'll be damned," fumed Richard—two nights before Christmas, this—"if I can see what she sees in him or any of the rest of that long-haired bunch that is forever dropping in."

It was a pity, indeed, that Richard had no feminine visitors.

A woman—almost any woman—could have given him sound advice had she so chosen—Wanda Soule, with whom Marge had shared an apartment before her intellectual marriage, for instance. The day before Christmas she dropped in to see Marge.

"You make me sick, Marge," said Wanda. "You're simply maximating your ego at the expense of that poor dub. He looks as gaunt and three times as unhappy as that damned cat of yours. If I were in his shoes I'd demand a show-down."

"You talk like your grandmother! We had a show-down before we were married. I didn't lure him into it."

"There are more ways of luring a man than making eyes at him," retorted Wanda.

"I have thought myself of leaving him," she said. "This isn't going to work out—"

Wanda cast a cynical eye at her. "You're a great self-kidder!" she commented. "What you actually mean to do is to hold onto him until you've sucked out the last bit of satisfaction your vanity can get from his sufferings."

She paused to hurl a pillow at Balzac. "That damned cat gets on my nerves," she explained. "He looks as if he heard every word I say."

Balzac had gotten the idea that his company wasn't desired but he could not resist the temptation to pause for a last word.

"What do you think I am, anyway, deaf?" he demanded, from the door.

"Hear him swear at me!" commented Wanda. She turned back to Marge. "I'd give anything to hear your Dicky-Bird swear at you. Or better still, take a stick to you. You need it!"

The sound of a key turning in the front door intervened.

Wanda sprang up and picked up her fur from one of the chairs. "I'm on my way," she said. "I'm humane and I can't stand seeing dumb animals suffer."

RICHARD was hanging up his coat and hat in the hall as she passed out with that casual word that was all any of Marge's friends ever seemed to have for him. He came into the living-room a moment later.

"Snowing out?" demanded Marge.

"Quite hard," he said, without looking at her. "Going to be a white Christmas I guess—"

Marge, curled up on the couch, graceful and indolent with her carelessly disposed skirts showing her round knees—which she, being without sex-consciousness, would have scorned to cover—glanced up at him.

"Dicky-Bird!" she exclaimed. "You haven't got me anything for Christmas, have you?"

He picked up a letter addressed to him that lay on the table and glanced at the superscription. "Did you prefer I didn't?" he asked, evasively.

"Absolutely! I haven't got anything for you. As usual"—cheerfully—"I'm broke. And anyway I detest the so-called Christmas spirit."

Richard said nothing. He let the letter slip back to the table unopened and stood, his eyes avoiding hers, with his hands thrust in his pockets. There were certain things he wanted to say to her. But Marge moved lazily and, his eyes going to her for the first time, he saw that she was reaching for a cigarette.

"You smoke too many of those damned things!" he snapped.

In his voice was the breaking of many bonds. She paused and looked up at him. And then she laughed. Men—and especially married men—have committed murder when women laughed at them that way at such moments.

The front door bell sounded shrilly. Richard's face became more ominous still, but he said nothing. From the hall came Marge's voice, evidencing surprise.

"Why, Aunt Margaret! How did you ever find me here?"

"Telephoned your office, of course," answered a voice as lovely as Marge's. "I wrote you that I'd do just that if you did not wire me."

"Wire you?"

"My dear, didn't you get my letter? I wrote you I was coming to New York and would you put me up. If you couldn't you were to wire me—I addressed it, very plainly, to Mrs. Robert Lee—"

"Oh that explains it! I always throw letters addressed to Mrs. Robert Lee in the waste-basket. You see I've kept my own name—"

"Yes, I saw that from your doorplate," commented the lovely voice, rather dryly.

They had moved along the hall as they talked and now they stood at the threshold of the living-room.

“I hate to have you suffer,” Marge told Richard. “I’ll marry you to find out what we mean to each other—if anything.” He should have fled then, leaving her to pay all the check—but he didn’t.

"This is my husband, Richard," announced Marge, with a slight confusion in her voice.

"And I am Mrs. Nichols," explained the lovely voice, as its possessor offered him slim fingers as lovely. "I don't suppose Marge has ever breathed a word about me, but I'm her godmother—baptismal, not fairy—she calls me Aunt Margaret. Am I all explained?"

But there was more than that to her. She was forty-five perhaps and she did not look young for her age. Yet she was very attractive. The dark eyes with the shadows beneath them were beautifully shaped, full of sparkle and life and even, at times, of distinct allure.

Richard warmed to her instantly—Marge saw that!

"Thank you," said Mrs. Nichols, as he took her furs. She subsided gracefully into a chair and turning to Marge added: "Do you know—I had a funny idea that you had a home outside of New York?"

MARGE braced herself to the plunge. "I couldn't afford my half of anything like that," she explained. "And so——"
"Oh, I understand perfectly." A smile flickered across the speaker's lips so swiftly that Marge wondered if perhaps she had imagined it. "And I suppose I'm a sort of white elephant on your hands."

Now in Marge's own set, where truth is ever naked and unashamed, this direct question would have brought the frank answer that the unexpected guest had indeed spoken sooth. But Marge hesitated for once—and was lost.

"It isn't that," she temporized. "But you see I've got to go out of town for several days. A special, secret assignment, you know——"

This was news to Richard; manlike he looked surprised. Mrs. Nichols did not miss that.

"And you're going to leave Richard——" She glanced up at him. "Do you mind if I call you that?"

"Please do!" he said, eagerly.

Her smile thanked him graciously as she turned back to her namesake again.

"—All alone?" she concluded.

"Naturally," commented Marge, flushing in spite of herself.

"When do you go?"

"Tonight," said Marge, hoping that did not sound too inhospitable.

Evidently her inquisitor got no such an idea. "Then why," she exclaimed, brightly, "can't I look after this nice husband of yours while you're gone? I'd love it."

This was the first time any of Marge's friends had called Richard her nice husband. Perhaps that was why Marge looked up, startled. But her godmother had interpreted her expression otherwise.

"Dear child!" she cried, with the silveriest of laughs. "Don't tell me that you are so old-fashioned as to object!"

"I haven't the slightest objection in the world," retorted Marge, too stiffly as she instantly realized. To gain possession of herself she reached for a cigarette, stopped short and actually blushed.

For that she hated herself—but she hated her godmother still more.

"Oh—may I smoke?" demanded the latter. "How jolly!"

Richard, who protested Marge's smoking, proffered her a light and she, sinking back, crossed her legs. They were as shapely as Marge's—

THE cynical cat strolled in at that instant and, recognizing a visitor, stopped short. He then walked around her and after that he jumped up on the radiator and from that vantage point surveyed her with undiminished interest. Presently he appeared to wash his face, but appearances were deceitful. He never bothered with such niceties—he was merely hiding a grin behind his paw.

Marge rose abruptly. "I'm afraid I must go and pack," she said. Richard left the apartment before she had finished. He, her godmother explained as they kissed good-by, had gone to get things for a supper she was to prepare. Marge replied that it didn't matter anyway. Outside snow was falling faster than ever; it got into her eyes and blurred her vision. . . .

Evicted from her own home by her own act, she descended upon Wanda, who wasn't at all pleased to have her there and frankly said so. Nevertheless she did evince an immediate and lively interest in Marge's godmother.

"Why not?" Marge's voice was a bit edged in spite of herself.

"Because, my dear, the first thing you know the cat will have eaten your Dicky-Bird up."

"She's forty-five if she's a day."

"Piffle! I don't care if she's eighty. A widow with a permanent wave, who is a perfect thirty-six, can do a lot to any man in four days. Especially if he's starving for kind treatment."

"She can have him if she wants him," flashed Marge, and then, as Wanda lifted her eyebrows expressively she added, "I mean it. I don't give a damn——"

"I can see, old dear," remarked Wanda, sweetly, "that you are perfectly calm about it." She rose languidly. "Make yourself at home—as of course I know you will anyway."

"Where are you going?"

"Out, my dear. Out into the cold and wintry night."

"You might bring back something to eat——"

"I'll bring something back, all right," Wanda assured her.

This promise she fulfilled—nobly! She returned an hour later, wearing such an unholy look of satisfaction that Marge was startled.

"What have you been up to?" she demanded.

"They say that curiosity killed a cat, but I'll bet the cat died happy," retorted Wanda, removing her hat. "I just dropped into your apartment——"

Marge gasped. "You didn't!"

"I registered great surprise that you were not there and explained that I came to look for a glove I thought I must have left there this afternoon. They helped me look but I don't think they were glad to see me. Your Dicky-Bird looked like a small boy discovered playing hookey, but she was sublime. I wonder where she gets her negligees——"

"Every light in the apartment was lit," she continued, serenely. "The siren was presiding at a chafing-dish. Your Dicky-Bird was waiting upon her every word and gesture——"

Marge made a pretty pretense at stifling a yawn.

"When," she cut in, "do we eat? All this description of chafing-dishes makes me hungry."

"You carry it off awfully well, old dear," said Wanda. "If I were a man, instead of your best—and worst—friend, I'd almost believe that."

NOW this was the night before Christmas. And all through the apartment not a creature was stirring—except such of the crowd as dropped in. Full of holiday and other spirits, they made the welkin and several bells from other apartments ring. Presently the janitor appeared, to ask what the torrid hereafter they thought they were doing. They cordially invited him to investigate and he, after sniffing suspiciously at the proffered glass, drank deep and with evident relish.

No one was as high and gay as Marge was that evening. The color flashed in and out of her cheeks. She drank but little, but she talked a lot and smoked incessantly. The Village psychoanalyst dropped in at eleven and, attaching himself to her, stayed until three. He was obviously mesmerized by this new Marge.

"Most beautiful one," he purred, amorously. "Come to my studio tomorrow."

"You're drunk, Tony!" Marge said.

"Drunk with you!" he corrected. "Will you come?"

"No!" was on the tip of Marge's tongue. But she reconsidered. "I'll go to lunch with you," she promised, and added, maliciously: "You'd better write it down, you're in no condition to remember!"

"It," said he, solemnly, "is 'graved upon the tablets of my hear—t'—hic!"

And with a bow that was a direct temptation to fate, considering his condition, he made his departure.

The sun shone when Marge awoke to what was, after all, a white Christmas. The stale scent of many cigarettes still hung in the air; her head was heavy, and when she arose she saw that her eyes were circled. But when, presently, she sat herself down to lunch with Tony, she had recaptured some of her reckless gaiety of the night before.

They lunched together, not at the Brevoort, but not far from it. At the same place, indeed, where she and her Dicky-Bird had come to a mutual understanding, back in November. As she entered she, by turning to the left, might have found the very table. But she turned to the right instead!

Now New York is big enough to accommodate many millions. On the other hand, as certain people take pleasure in pointing out, the whole world is a small place. [Continued on page 114]

C. "I know everything, mother," Carnac said. "And I understand all you have suffered."

DENZIL with rare speed got the letter into Carnac's hands. "Read it at once, m'sieu'." Denzil said urgently. Carnac saw the handwriting was Junia's, and he tore open the letter, which held the blue certificate of the marriage with Luzanne. He conquered the sudden dimness of his eyes, and read the letter. It said:

"Dear Carnac,
I hear from Mr. Tarboe of the lies being told against you. Here is the proof. She has gone. She told it to Barode Barouche, and he was to have announced it last night, but I saw her first. You can now deny the story. The game is yours. Tell the man Roudin to produce the woman—she is now in New York, if the train was not lost. I will tell you all when you are M. P. Junia."

WITH a smile, Carnac placed the certificate in his pocket. How lucky it was he had denied the marriage and demanded of Roudin that he produce the woman! He was safe now, safe and free. It was no good any woman declaring she was married to him if she could not produce the proof—and the proof was in his pocket and the woman was in New York!

"Come, Monsieur Roudin, tell us about the woman, and bring her to the polls. There is yet time, if you're telling the truth. Who is she, and where does she live? What's her name?"

"Mrs. Carnac Grier—that's her name," responded Roudin with a snarl, and the crowd laughed, for Carnac's boldness gave them a sense of real security and his tone carried conviction.

"What was her maiden name?"

"Larue," answered the other sharply.

"What was her Christian name, since you know so much, monsieur?"

He had no fear now, and his question was audacious, but he knew the game was with him, and he took the risks. His courage had reward, for Roudin made no reply. Carnac turned his attention to the crowd.

"Here's a man tried to ruin my character by telling a story about a woman whose name he doesn't know. Is that playing the game after the rules—I ask you?"

There were cries from the crowd supporting him, and he grew bolder. "Let the man tell his story and I'll meet it here face to face. I fear nothing. Out with your story, monsieur. Who is the woman? Tell us why you haven't brought her into the daylight, why she isn't claiming her husband at the polls. Out with it! What's the story? Let's have it now."

The truth was Roudin dared not tell what he knew. It was based wholly on a talk he had partly overheard between Barode Barouche and Luzanne in the house where she stayed and where he, Roudin, lodged. It had not been definite, and he had no proofs. He was a sensationalist, and he had had his hour and could say no more, because of Barode Barouche. He could not tell the story of his overhearing, for why had not Barouche told the tale? With an oath he turned away and disappeared. As he went he could hear his friends cheering Carnac.

"Carnac Grier lies, but he wins the game," he said to himself. "Grier's in—Carnac's in—Carnac's got the seat!"

This was the cry heard in the streets at night when Carnac was found elected by a majority of one hundred and ten.

Carnac had not been present at the counting of the votes until the last quarter-hour, and then he was told by his friends of the fluctuations of the counting—how at one time his defeat seemed assured, since Barode Barouche was six hundred ahead, and his own friends had almost given up hope. One of his enemies, however, had no assurance of Carnac's defeat. He was too old an agent to believe in returns till all were in, and he knew of the two incidents by which Carnac had got advantage—at the Island over Eugene Grandois, and at the Mill over Roudin the very day of polling; and it was at these points he had hoped to score for Barouche a majority.

PRESENTLY there were fluctuations in favor of Carnac, and the six hundred by which Barouche led were steadily swallowed up; he saw that among the places which gave Carnac a majority were the Island and the Mill. He was also nonplussed by Carnac's coolness. For a man with an artist's temperament he was well-controlled. When he came into the room, he went straight to Barouche and shook hands with him, saying they'd soon offer congratulations to the winner.

When the Returning Officer announced the result, Barouche went to Carnac and offered his hand.

"We've had a good straight fight, Grier, and I hope you'll have luck in Parliament. This is no place for me. It's your game, and I'll eat my sour bread alone."

He motioned to the window with a balcony, beyond which were the shouting thousands. Then he smiled at Carnac, and in his heart he was glad he had not used the facts about Luzanne against this son of his. He gave thanks to the Returning Officer, and then with his agent, left the building by the back door. He did not wait to hear the public announcement of Carnac's triumph, and he knew his work was done forever in public life.

Soon he had said his say at the club where his supporters, discomfited, awaited him. To demands for a speech, he said he owed to his workers what he could never repay, and that the long years they had kept him in Parliament would be the happiest memory of his life.

"We'll soon have you back," shouted a voice from the crowd.

"It's been a fair fight," said Barode Barouche, and advised his followers to "play the game" and let the new member have his triumph without belittlement.

"It's the best fight I've had in thirty years," he said at last, "and I've been beaten fairly."

In another hour he was driving into the country on his way to visit an old ex-Cabinet Minister, who had been his friend through all the years of his Parliamentary life. It did not matter that the hour was late. He knew the veteran would be waiting for him, and unprepared for the bad news he brought. The night was spent in pain of mind, and the comfort the ex-Minister gave him, that a seat would be found for him by the Government, gave him no thrill. He knew he had enemies in the Government, that the Prime Minister was the friend of the successful only, and that there were others, glad of his defeat, who would be looking for his place. Also he was sure he had injured the chances of the Government by the defeat of his policy.

AS THOUGH Creation were in league against him, a heavy storm broke about two o'clock, and he went to bed cursed by torturing thoughts. "Chickens come home to roost—" Why did that ancient phrase keep ringing in his ears when he tried to sleep? Beaten by his illegitimate son at the polls, the victim of his own wrong-doing—the sacrifice of penalty! He knew that his son, inheriting his own political gifts, had done what could have been done by no one else.

"There's nothing left for me in life—nothing at all," he said, as he tossed in bed while the thunder roared and the storm beat down the shrubs. "How futile life is—'Youth's a dream, middle age a delusion, old age a mistake'," he kept repeating to himself in quotation. "What does one get out of it? Nothing—nothing—nothing!"

He got out of bed soon after daylight, dressed, and went to the stable and hitched his horse to the buggy. The world was washed clean, that was sure. It was muddy underfoot, but it was a country where the roads soon dried, and he would suffer little inconvenience from the storm. He bade his host good-by and would take no breakfast, and he drove away set to reach the city in time for breakfast. He found the roads heavy, and the injury of the storm was everywhere to be seen. Yet it all did not distract him, for he was thinking hard of the things that lay ahead of him to do—the heart-breaking things that his defeat meant to him.

At last he approached a bridge across a stream that had been badly swept by the storm. It was one of the covered bridges not uncommon in Canada. It was not long, as the river was narrow, and he did not see that the middle pier of the bridge had been badly injured. Yet as he entered the bridge, his horse still trotting, he was conscious of a hollow, semi-thunderous noise which seemed not to belong to the horse's hoofs and the iron wheels of the carriage. He raised his eyes to see that the other end of the bridge was clear, and at that moment he was conscious of an unsteady motion of the bridge, of a wavering of the roof, and then, before he had time to do aught, he saw the roof and the sides and the floor of the bridge collapse and sink slowly down.

With a cry, he sprang from the carriage to retrace his way; but he only climbed up a ladder that grew every instant steeper; and all at once he was plunged downward after his horse and carriage into the stream. He could swim, and as he swept down this thought came to him—that he might be able to get the shore. It was a hope that died at the moment of its birth, however, for he was struck by a falling timber on the head.

When, an hour later, he was found in an eddy of the river by the shore, he was dead, and his finders could only compose his limbs decently. But in the afternoon, the papers of Montreal had the following head-lines:

DEFEAT AND DEATH OF BARODE BAROUCHE—THE END OF A LONG AND GREAT CAREER

THE WHOLE country rang with the defeat and death of Barode Barouche, and the triumph of the disinherited son of John Grier. Newspapers of mark drew antagonistic lessons from the event, but none failed to admit that Carnac, as a great fighter, was entitled to success. The press was friendly to the memory of Barode Barouche, and some unduly praised his years of work and only a few disparaged his career. All said that in Carnac Grier Parliament would have a man who was an orator, and who had characteristics of the late member. But none of them knew the truth concerning Barouche's kinship to Carnac Grier.

When the news of the tragedy came to Mrs. Grier, she was reading in the papers of Carnac's victory, and there was in her mind an agonizing triumph, of a stern blow struck for punishment. The event was like none she could have imagined. She was, indeed, the sport of destiny.

At that moment a letter came from Carnac telling of Barouche's death, and it dropped from her hand to the floor. The horror of it smote her being and, like one struck by lightning, she sank to the floor.

For long she lay there unconscious, but at last the servant, not knowing why she was not called to remove the breakfast things, found her huddled on the floor, the letter beside her, her face like that of death.

Mrs. Grier forbade Carnac to be sent for, and presently in her bed, declined to have the doctor brought. "It's no use," she said. "A doctor can do me no good. I need rest, that's all."

Then she asked for note-paper and pen and ink, and so she was left alone. She must tell her beloved son why it was there never had been, and never could be, understanding between John Grier and himself. She had arrived at that point where naught was to be gained by further concealment. So through long hours she struggled with her problem, and she was glad Carnac did not come to see her during the vexing day.

The letter she wrote gave her trouble in her weak state. It ran thus:

"My beloved Carnac,

Your news of the death of Barode Barouche has shocked me. You will understand it when I tell you that I have lived a life of agony ever since you became a candidate. This is why: you were fighting the one who gave you to the world!

Let me tell you how. I loved John Grier when I married him, and longed to make my life fit in with his. But that could not easily be, for his life was wedded to his business, and he did not believe in women. To him they were incapable of the real business of life, and were only meant to be housekeeper and comforter to men who made the world go round. So, unintentionally, he neglected me, and I was young and comely then, so the world said, and I was unwise and thoughtless.

Else, I should not have listened to Barode Barouche who, one summer in the camp on the St. Lawrence River, opened up for me new ways of thought, new springs of feeling. He charmed me,

C. At that moment Barouche was conscious of an unsteady motion of the bridge. With a cry he sprang from the carriage to retrace his way, and all at once he was plunged downward after his horse into the stream.

Carnac. He had the gifts that have made you what you are, a figure that men and women turn twice to see. He had eloquence, and he was thoughtful in all the little things of life which John Grier despised. In the solitude of the camp he wound himself about my life, and roused in me an emotion for him which was false to duty and to laws of society. And so it was that one day—one single day, for never but the once was I weak, yet that was enough, God knows. . . . He went away because I would not see him again; because I would not repeat the offense which gave me years of sorrow and remorse—even until this day when he lies dead, beaten at the polls by his own son, stricken by the hand he never clasped in love and friendship.

After you became a candidate, he came and offered to marry me, tried to re-open the old emotion; but I would have none of it.

He was convinced he would defeat you, and he wanted to avoid fighting you. But when I said, 'Give up the seat to him,' he froze. Of course, he could not have done so; of course, his seat belonged to his party and not alone to himself; but that was the test I put him to, and the answer he gave was, 'You want me to destroy my career in politics! After all these years, that is your proposal, is it?' I don't think he was honest either in life or conduct. I don't think he ever was sorry for me or for you, until perhaps these last few weeks; but I have sorrowed ever since the day you were made possible to me—every day, every hour, every minute; and I sorrowed the more because I could not tell John Grier the truth.

It may be I ought to have told the truth long ago, and faced the consequences. It might seem now that I should have ruined my home-life, and yours, and Barode Barouche's life and career, and John Grier's life if I had told the truth; but who knows! There are many outcomes to all life's tragedies, and none might have been what I fancied. It is little comfort that Barode Barouche has now given all for payment of his debt. It gives no peace of mind. And it may be you will think that I ought not to tell you the truth. I don't know, but I feel you will not misunderstand. I tell you my story, so that you may again consider, if it is not better to face the world with the whole truth about Luzanne. I am sure that is the only way. We can live but once, and it is to our good if we refuse the way of secrecy.

It is right you should know the truth about your birth, but it is not right you should declare it to all the world now. That was my duty long ago, and I did not do it. It is not your duty, and you must not do it. Barode Barouche is gone; John Grier has gone; and it would only hurt Fabian and his wife and you now to tell it. You inherit Barode Barouche's gifts, and you have his seat, you represent his people—and they are your people, too. You have French blood in your veins, and you have a chance to carry on with honor what he did with skill. Forgive me, if you can.

Your loving Mother.

P. S. Do nothing till you see me."

RETURNING from a call at Barode Barouche's home to his mother's House on the Hill, Carnac was in a cheerless mood. With Barouche's death, to Carnac it was as though he himself had put aside forever the armor of war, for Barouche was the only man in the world who had ever tempted him to fight, or whom he had fought. The spice of life seemed to have evaporated, to have been entirely dissipated.

There was one thing he must do; he must go to Junia, tell her he loved her, and ask her to be his wife. She had given him the fatal blue certificate of his marriage, and the marriage could now be ended with Luzanne's consent, for she would not fight the divorce he must win soon. He could now tell the truth, if need be, to his constituents, for there would be time enough to recover his position, if it were endangered, before the next election came; and Junia would be by his side to help him! Junia—would she, after all, marry him now? He would soon know. Tonight he must spend with his mother, but tomorrow he would see Junia, and learn his fate, and know about Luzanne. Luzanne had been in Montreal, had been ready to destroy his chance at the polls, and Junia had stopped it. How? Well, he would soon know. But now, at first, for his mother.

When he entered the House on the Hill, he had a sudden shiver. Somehow, the room where his mother had sat for so many years, and where he had last seen his father, John Grier, had a coldness of the tomb. There was a letter on the center table standing against the lamp. He saw it was in his mother's handwriting, and addressed to himself.

He tore open the letter, and began to read. Presently his cheeks turned pale. It was the letter to him about Barode Barouche. More than once he put it down on the table, for it seemed impossible to go on, but with courage he took it up again and read on to the end.

"God—God in Heaven!" he broke out when he had finished it. For a long time he walked the floor, trembling in body and shaking in spirit. "Now I understand everything," he said at last aloud in a husky voice. "Now I see what I could not see—ah yes, I see at last!"

For another time of silence and pain he paced the floor, then he stopped short. "I'm glad they both are dead," he said wearily. Thinking of Barode Barouche he had a great bitterness. "To treat any woman so—how glad I am I fought him!"

Then he thought of John Grier. "I loathed him and loved him always," he said, with terrible remorse in his tone. "He used my mother vilely, and yet he was himself; he was the soul that he was born, a genius in his own way, a neglecter of all that makes life beautiful—and yet himself, always himself. He never pottered. He was real—a pirate, a plunderer, but he was real. And he cared for me, and would have had me in the business if he could. Perhaps John Grier knows the truth now! I hope he does. For, if he does, he'll see that I was not to blame for what I did, that it was Fate hounding me, guiding me. He was a big man, and if I'd worked with him, we'd have done big things, bigger than he did, and that was big enough."

With a moroseness at his heart and scorn of Barouche at his lips, he went slowly up to his mother's room. At her door he paused. But the woman was his mother, and it must be faced. After all, she had kept her faith ever since he was born. He believed that. She had been an honest wife ever since that fatal summer twenty-seven years before. She had kept faith her whole life but once, when Barouche had wronged her.

"She has suffered," he said, and knocked at her door.

AN INSTANT later he was inside the room. There was only a dim light, but his mother was sitting up in her bed, a gaunt and yet beautiful, sad-eyed figure of a woman. For a moment, Carnac paused. As he stood motionless, the face of the woman became more drawn and haggard, the eyes more deeply mournful. Her lips opened as though she would speak, but no sound came, and Carnac could hardly bear to look at her. Yet he did look, and all at once there rushed into his heart the love which he had ever felt for her. After all, he was her son, and she had not wronged him since his birth. As he looked, his eyes filled with tears and his lips compressed. At last he came to the bed. Her letter was in his hand.

"I have read it, mother."

She made no reply, but the look in his face was good for her eyes to see. It was not the look of hatred or repulsion.

"I know everything now," he added. "It is better so. I see the whole thing, and I understand all you have suffered these many years."

"Oh, my son, you forgive me—you forgive your mother?" She was trembling with emotion.

He leaned over and caught her wonderful head to his shoulder. "I love you, mother," he said gently. "I need you—need you more than I ever did. You have helped me so much that my debt to you is huge."

"I have no heart any more, and I fear for you and——"

"Why should you fear for me? You wanted me to beat him, didn't you?" His face grew hard, his lips became scornful. "Wasn't it the one way—the only way to make him settle his account?"

"Yes, yes, the only way. You must realize what I felt. It was not that I fear for you in politics. I was sure you would win the election. It was not that, it was the girl."

"That's all over; that's all finished. I am free at last," he said. He held the blue certificate before her eyes.

Her face was deadly pale, her eyes expanded, her breath came sharp and quick. "How was it done—how was it done? Was she here in Montreal?"

"I don't know how it was done, but she was here, and Junia got this from her. I shan't know how till I've seen Junia."

"Junia is the best friend——" said the stricken woman gently, "—in all the world; she's——"

"She's so good a friend she must be told the truth," he said firmly.

"Oh, not while I live! I could not bear that——"

"What nonsense! You must live through the worst or the best. I need you. How could I ask Junia to marry me and not tell her all the truth—mother, can't you see?"

THE woman's face flushed scarlet. "Ah, yes, I see, my boy—I see," she said as one forced to see.

"Haven't we had enough of secrecy—in your letter you lamented it! If it was right for you to be secret all these years; is it not a hundred times right now for me to tell the truth? I have no name—no name," he added with tragedy in his tone.

"You have my name—is not that enough? You may say I have no right to it, but I reply it is the only name I can carry; they both are dead, and I must keep the name. It wrongs no one—no one living but you, and you have no hatred of me: you think I do not wrong you—isn't that so?"

His cheek was hot with feeling. "Yes, that's true," he said.

Then a great melancholy took hold of him, and he could not hide it from her. She saw how he was moved, and she tried to comfort him as she had always comforted him.

"You think Junia will resent it all? But that isn't what a girl does when she loves. You have done no wrong: your hands are ¶ "Junia, the end of my waiting has come," said Tarboe. "I want you as I never wanted anything in my life."

clean," she told him fighting for secrecy—to keep her good name.

"But I must tell her all. I can do no other. Tarboe is richer, he has an honest birth, he is a big man and will be bigger still. She likes him, she——"

"She will go to you without a penny, my son, you will see!"

"It will be almost without a penny," he said with a faint smile. "I can't paint now—for a time anyhow. I can't earn money for a time. I've only my salary as a Member of Parliament; therefore, I must draw on you. And I don't seem to mind drawing upon you, I never did."

She smiled with an effort. "If I can help you, I shall just live on."

The day Carnac was elected it was clear to Tarboe that he must win Junia at once, if he was ever to do [Continued on page 1.

C, "So that is why I love Russia and want to go back there," writes Anna Louise Strong. "Because they are a friendly, loving people among whom I never feel lonely."

*Q Russia is discussed usually as a menace or a prophecy.
To Miss Strong it is the country of deep feeling*

Why I LOVE Russia

By Anna Louise Strong

I HAVE had typhus in Russia; four months of the five I was there were spent on a sick-bed and the rest in a dusty, sprawling city in the famine area; yet I love the country and want to go back. Naturally my friends say: "Why do you love Russia?"

Always I am puzzled. There are reasons for liking a country, but who ever had reasons for loving?

I like England, with its exquisite curving lanes and trim meadows and green-gold beeches in springtime. I like Germany, its clean little villages, its orderly ways of doing things. I am not sure that I "like" Russia at all; it is too uncomfortable. But I know that I love it. I know I am homesick for Moscow and want to go back.

"Is there a good climate?" they press. And I laugh that the climate I saw was rotten. Hot dusty winds in summer, and millions of flies; icy blizzards in winter.

"Is the scenery so fine?" "Perhaps, in the Caucasus. But the scenery I remember was a stretch of barren curving plain, set with draggled hungry villages."

"Are the conditions of living pleasant?"

"Hardly. In all the months I was there I never tasted a glass of fresh cold water—nothing but dull boiled water even during illness. I never had, in all that time, a glass of fresh milk—only boiled milk or more often milk from a can. I had reasonable food; but I don't recommend the diet in Russia."

"In the hotel where I lived the first month, the water pressure came only to the second floor, and I carried what I needed for washing up the two remaining flights to my room. When I went by night to the Foreign Office to file my dispatches, the streets were dark; I used a pocket-flash to keep from stumbling into holes that dot the street."

"To travel by rail I arranged reservations days in advance, and fought my way in the station through mobs of jostling people, any of whom might carry typhus. The trains themselves did not start when expected, nor make connections nor arrive properly."

"NO, CONDITIONS of life are not recommended as easy. But who ever loved a man (or a country) because he was 'easy'?"

"I get you," remark my friends at last; "it was the people. Is it easy to know the big people?"

Then I really do laugh. I was sick nearly all the time in Russia, and met no big people. I met housemaids and nursemaids and doctors, and famine workers and a few minor officials, and other ordinary folks. Not much excitement there.

"Then why, why—"

It is amusing to see what kind of people fall in love with Russia and what people hate her. The parlor-Bolsheviks and anarchists—it would be sad if it were not so funny to see how shocked and disillusioned the poor things are by this country. Meantime the simple God-fearing Quakers come in, without any political expectations at all, to do hard labor in disease-infested regions; and quite a number of them fall in love with Russia.

The parlor-Bolsheviks find that there aren't any parlors in Russia, and that being a Bolshevik means grubbing hard at thankless jobs in the midst of inconveniences. The anarchists find a fiendish amount of red tape and an iron discipline. The Revolution has not come up to schedule; no millennium is in sight. Even the supply of booze is very low and till recently quite non-existent; the cigarettes are of poor quality. There's nothing to do but work!

So they go home and write sad disillusioned articles about Soviet Russia. For some of them I feel sorry; they expected a grand new world and they didn't get it. For others—they'll find it pleasanter to sit in a New York flat with plenty of food and drink and bathrooms, and denounce the Department of Justice, than to sit in a Moscow bedroom and denounce the bedbugs and lice that are rather plentiful.

Meantime come the Quakers, not revolutionists at all, but folks accustomed all their lives to working for the general good of human beings. Always they have found their work unappreciated and blocked by private interests, government grafts and general slowness of society. Well, Russia is slow enough in all conscience; and graft is of ancient lineage there. But—

THEY FIND a government that hails them with joy and says: "Bless you, my children! Do you really want just to feed folks fairly and equally? You're as good as any government department; better, in fact, because you have the money which we haven't. Want a warehouse? Here's one. Want a flat? Take any there are. Transport? Well, we haven't a lot, but whatever there is you get first shot at it. Here's a hundred million paper rubles to buy hay with in Tashkent for horses, just for a starter, so that you can use your good dollars and pounds to buy food with abroad. Any other little thing we can do for you?"

It overwhelms them; they aren't used to being considered the most important citizens in the nation; just because they want to do an honest job for the public good. And when the president of the biggest republic in the world crosses the street especially to shake hands and tell you what good work your society is doing—well, even Quakers are human enough to like appreciation.

Nobody will love Russia who doesn't love hard work, work under difficult conditions, work with every imaginable handicap in the way of material lack. Unless you can make a bully good job take the place of meals and regular sleep and comfort, you had better stay out of Russia.

But if you happen to think, as I do, that the two best things in life are comradeship and work, then your chances are good in Russia. Comradeship that is sincere and joyous and self-forgetful; work at a job so big that no matter how much you grow it will always be still beyond you. These things are everywhere and for everyone who wants them, in Russia.

And the people—let me tell of a few of them, very simple people. Perhaps I can make you also love them.

There was Dunia, the housemaid in the flat where I lay ill in Moscow.

No beauty of face or form was in Dunia, shabby, tousled Dunia with draggled heels, except the beauty of a happy smile and a childlike affection. We could only talk in the few dozen words of Russian that I picked up slowly. Yet she brought joy and variety into very monotonous days.

Even the bringing of a glass of water was to her an amusing game. She would hold it out and then pull it back, saying, "Do you love me?"

"I haven't decided yet," I would answer; she would turn haughtily away and march out of the room. But, nearing the door, she would go slowly and ever more slowly, to give me the chance she knew I would take before she quite vanished. "Yes, I love you now!" I would cry.

"No," she would pout, "you only love a glass of water." So the game would go on. But if she saw that I grew tired, she would thrust the glass into my hands, crying, "Take it, please, tovarish" (the soft Russian word for comrade). She called me alternately "tovarish" and "beautiful one," which is very soothing to an invalid whose eyes are dull and whose hair has been quite cut off.

Dunia had a husband somewhere in Russia. She didn't like him; matrimony had not gone well with her. She made no tragedy of it; but she often told me that I should be glad to be a "miss" instead of a "madam," and that it was nice to have plenty of "cavaliers" but not to get married. It must have been a hard experience that gave this view of matrimony to Dunia, for her family affections were very strong; she adored her brothers.

I KEPT the news of my departure from Dunia as long as I could; for she always wept when people she cared for left. But she knew of it three days before I went.

Every morning she would come into my room and say, with reddened eyes, "Haven't you any washing you want done this morning?" Then I would give her a few clothes, and an hour later I would find her in the kitchen, scrubbing and washing and crying into the tub. It was quite heartbreaking. But I come of a repressed and colder people, and I never had relative or friend or lover cry over my departure; so I loved Dunia for her open child-like grief.

It was a child's affection, not a slavish devotion. If Dunia fancied any coat or hat of mine to wear to market, she would appropriate it for her use as simply as a child would dress up in old clothes found in a garret. That I could possibly object to her wearing them—Dunia would never have insulted me by such a supposition. I wasn't wearing them myself; so why shouldn't she wear them?

Dunia was not a Communist; her mind did not run to politics at all. But she sang little songs about speculators to herself in the kitchen, and she jeered at me most thoroughly as a bourgeois when I bought a new fur coat; and she was quite convinced that the Communists were the finest folks in the world and whatever they decreed was right. Was not her brother a Communist and a Commissar who could speak three languages? If Dunia never thought of joining the party herself it was because she felt quite humbly that she was not intelligent enough to govern. As for the Communist ideals—Dunia had absorbed them all. She adored people who went in old clothes and did high service for Russia; she mocked the possession of luxuries or unusual comforts. She was the first young girl I have ever known who thought not at all about clothes. If the kingdom of heaven is built of childlike souls, the republic of Communism may yet be built of Dunias.

EVERYWHERE in Russia I met this kindly comradeship, not always so playful as Dunia's, but just as straightforward and sincere. People offered their souls frankly as a child, or as a man who has learned that life is too short and too hard for the building of barriers between human beings.

I remember a young and busy official to whom I was introduced on a street corner, on a trip downtown late in my convalescence. He had information that I wanted. After we had exchanged addresses and telephone numbers and expressed a mutual desire for further conversation, he remarked, "I see that my house is more central and easier to reach; but for all that I had better come to you instead. It is not that you are a woman," he explained with a smile, "for in these matters men and women are equally free since the Revolution. It is because you are the little sick sister."

There was a young army officer who sat beside me in the Moscow Art Theater one evening at a performance of Gorky's "Na Dne." A Red Army officer, going to be one of the higher-ups; for he told me he had just been placed in a school in Moscow where 200 men were in training for the upper branches of the army. He was in his early twenties and a very gentle soul. The men in his school had banded themselves in groups of five and the men of each group were saving one child from the Volga famine, by sharing their rations.

The Gorky play we were watching is a very famous one; it is played in America under the name of Lower Depths or A Night's Lodging. The scene is laid in a cellar where the dregs of a city find shelter at night. The theme of the play is that even at the bottom it is still the same human life that goes on, life with laughter and weeping, with strange aspirations toward beauty, and fatal weaknesses that mock those aspirations, life with its petty spites and its exquisite gleams of love.

The Russians are good actors; they excel in all arts which depict human character, because they are sincere and open and really interested in the human soul. I could see the young officer was deeply moved by the play. He turned to me suddenly at the close of the second act: "When this goes on, you forget everything else in the world. How can one help loving a country that can produce pictures of human life like that?"

A truly Russian reason for loving one's country! Not glory, not power, not extent of territory, but true and moving pictures of human life! I remembered how in the Russo-Japanese War, when a great ship went down at Port Arthur, the Russian people in thousands turned out to mourn, not the ship, not the admiral, but the painter Verestchagin, who went down to death on the deck where he sat making war-paintings. It was like a Russian to risk his life for his art; it was like the Russians to mourn the artist more than the soldier.

"Perhaps I am prejudiced," apologized the young officer with a smile, "because Russia is my own country."

"No, no," I told him. "Even I, who understand but little Russian, can feel the meaning of this play because of the art with which it is presented."

The warm light of friendly gratitude which filled his eyes is something I shall not soon forget. Russians have been called so many names by the nations of the world that they feel pleased when a foreigner really likes them. At the end of the play he thanked me gravely for appreciating Russia. Then he kissed my hand, with the courtliness of the old régime, but the sincere comradeship of the new, and went out of the theater.

I do not know his name; I shall never see him again. He is just one of many thousands who make the Russia that I love.

If the Russians were merely a friendly people, their kindness might be amiable weakness. One might love them as one loves children, but not necessarily as one loves equals, or even as one admires one's superiors. But there is iron also in the soul of Russia, the iron of courage, and self-denial and firm purpose. It is a courage so much higher than anything I am capable of that I stand before it, not only with love, but with reverence.

We stopped in the famine region one night at a peasant's cottage. The family was eating bread made of ground bark and grass, a bread on which men die by slow stages. They offered us night's lodging and brought us the boiling samovar to make our tea. Then they withdrew from the room lest their presence embarrass our eating. We of course called them back and offered them bread and meat which we had brought with us. But they would only consent to receive it when we insisted that we had plenty to see us to our journey's end. This self-denying courage in the face of death is beyond anything that I can understand but I saw it many times in Russia.

On the train from Warsaw to Moscow I rode with the Russian courier—an elderly workman who seemed quite dull and unattractive till the morning of the second day. Then I caught him stroking the joint of his ring finger with a grave smile. "My wedding-ring was there," he said. "We Communists voted to give all our gold to the famine. I was married thirty years ago, and my son fought and died on the Polish front. But my wife is still waiting for me in Moscow. The ring was never off my finger till a week ago, and the place where it was feels strange. But my wife and I—we do not need a ring." Then quietly he went on to talk of other matters.

I met a beautiful girl of twenty-two, in charge of a train of refugees in the famine region. She had just finished at a fashionable school in Petrograd when the Revolution broke. Her family, of the old nobility, fled the country, but she chose to remain with the people, and offered her services as a Red Cross worker. All over Russia she has worked, in typhus epidemics, among wounded soldiers, and now she was in charge of a train of starving peasants, conveying them to regions of bread. She wore a dress of homemade peasant linen and a peasant's sheepskin coat. She slept with twenty others of the train crew in a box-car, on boards laid across the supplies of fuel. She was very beautiful. I know American girls who would rise, at the call of emergency, to equal heroic efficiency, but none, I think, who would treat her train crew and peasant convoy with such gentle kindness, as if they were her own children, as if she—[Continued on page 122]

Partners Again

By Montague Glass and Jules Eckert Goodman

NOT in the garment industry—any branch of it—but in automobiles, are Abe Potash and Mawruss Perlmutter, Partners Again. Mr. Glass presents them to the audience in the midst of a quarrel.

Their contentious voices are sounding outside the office of Potash and Perlmutter Motors, Ltd., whose door they are approaching. It is office and showroom combined, and on the floor, Marks Pasinski, broker and promoter, through whom the partners secured their agency, has been discussing the points of the Schenckmann Six with two workmen who have just rolled in the model car from the shop in the rear. The quarrel between the partners becomes visible as well as audible:

MAWRUSS—Did you ever hear the like? Lets the car slow up on every hill in Central Park.

ABE—Well, did I put the hills in Central Park?

MARKS—Hello, Abe! Hello, Mawruss! Well, boys, there she is—the Schenckmann Six.

ABE—Is this model the same as the Schenckmann Six what we're giving just now a demonstration to a customer?

MARKS—Just the same. Ain't it a bird?

MAWRUSS—A bird? It's a reptile.

ABE—Say, Markie, what kind of a car are you wishing on us for our first automobile agency? Four times we give a demonstration with that car and this is the first time we didn't got to get towed home.

MARKS—Maybe your demonstrator don't know how to run it.

MAWRUSS—What do you mean—our demonstrator? We had six demonstrators in one week, and they're all in the hospital from pushing the car.

MARKS—Say, I never said it was a racing car. You boys told me you was going to make a specialty to sell a nice family car for business men, not sports.

ABE—I know we did, but even a tired business man wants to

C. Hattie has just told the partners of Dan's (Louis Kimball) criticism of their business methods. "Ai, that's the way it goes," Abe says in his most sententious manner. "For years and years you work to get where you are, and when you get there, where are you?"

go once in a while, anyhow, TWENTY miles an hour, Markie.

MAWRUSS—And the way that car couldn't climb hills, Markie! You've got to put it into second speed to go over a manhole cover.

MARKS—Now, listen, boys. You've got the wrong idea about this car. Every car develops trouble sooner or later.

ABE—This car don't develops trouble. It's born in it.

MAWRUSS—On this last demonstration every time that customer looked at me, I wished I was on a bicycle.

ABE—I was hoping that a mail-wagon would hit us and take his mind off it.

MAWRUSS—And it ain't your fault that it didn't.

ABE—Is that so? And since when was you such a fancy driver?

MAWRUSS—I anyhow try to drive on one side of the road at a time, Abe.

ABE—All except when you come to a corner, and then nobody could tell what your intentions are.

MAWRUSS—Is that so? Every time you touch the wheel every straight road looks like a corner.

ABE—Traffic policemen has got throat trouble from calling you down. You try to be north, south, east, and westbound traffic all at the same time. The way you drive you would think you was being chased by a submarine.

MARKS—Now, boys, please. Tell me just what is the trouble with the car, Abe.

MAWRUSS—You ask him? He don't know enough about automobiles to be a first-class taxi starter.

ABE—All right! You know so much. You tell him.

MAWRUSS—What is there to tell? When it does run, it runs bad; and when it don't run, Henry Ford himself could speak to it and it wouldn't recognize him at all. Here's Dan, our mechanic. Let him tell you what's the matter with it.

ABE—Dan, just tell Mr. Pasinski what's the matter with that Schenckmann Six out there.

DAN—Matter with it? That car's got nothing the matter with it.

MAWRUSS—Well, what has it got—a mean disposition?

DAN—It was running all right a few minutes ago.

ABE—It wasn't running all right for me. Maybe it don't like me or something.

DAN—A twin six wouldn't like you if you tried to run it with the emergency brake on.

Later in the discussion, when the matter of gas comes up, Dan gets started on the hobby closest to his heart—a new fuel.

DAN—If this concern expects to sell cars to business men they are not going to get away with an engine that only gives five miles to the gallon.

ABE—He's right on that, Markie.

DAN—Sure, I'm right, and with gas at thirty-five cents a gallon, it's time somebody thought about running a motor with some other fuel besides gas.

MARKS—Well, what could you run it with—bromo seltzer? You could run it with gas or you couldn't run it at all.

DAN—Why couldn't you? (taking a bottle from the pocket of his overalls) Now, here is a fuel that I've been working on for some time and—

MAWRUSS—He's commencing again. Put that buttermilk away.

DAN—There are millions of dollars in that bottle, Mr. Perlmutter.

MAWRUSS—Now, listen, Dan. If some people wants to fool away their time with perpetual motion, let them go crazy. If there is concerns which would invest money in turning zinc into gold, they've got my permission. But me and my partner could find hundreds of ways to get stung without backing inventions.

ABE—There are plenty of ways for a business man to go broke nowadays, and if we go broke, we go broke legitimate.

MAWRUSS—And furthermore, Dan, gasoline may be out of date, but it's good enough for those chauffeurs out there, and if you ain't watching they'll get away with a couple of hundred gallons on you.

DAN—Just the same, some day you'll regret—

ABE—It's a whole lot better to regret before than afterwards. Leon and Mrs. Sammett, old friends of the partners, arrive to examine the sample car, which Abe attempts to demonstrate within doors, his efforts meeting with Mawruss's ill-concealed and stinging contempt.

MAWRUSS (to Abe, seated with Mrs. Sammett, in the car)—Chommer, why don't you turn the switch on? No! No! (as

C. "I did give it gas," Abe cries. "What am I—a dentist?" (Barney Bernard as Abe Potash.)

Abe turns on the lights) not that switch. The other switch.

ABE—Which switch?

LEON—I thought you said the car was fool-proof (referring to one of Abe's notorious social errors that have wrecked so many promising financial deals).

Q. "If I want to insult my partner, that's my privilege," Mawruss declares, "but nobody else could insult him while I'm around! And besides, what did he know anyway about finances, a darned fool like him?" (Alexander Carr as Mawruss Perlmutter.)

MAWRUSS—It's proof against ordinary fools, but against—excuse me—a damn fool like Abe Potash, nothing is proof. Well, come on—give it gas, give it gas.

ABE—I did give it gas. What am I—a dentist?

Mozart Rabiner, another old friend of their storms in, threat-

Q. Abe, dejected over the possibility of a prison term in Atlanta, wails, "You would be able to see me visiting days, Mommer, and you could bring me newspapers and once in a while a little soup."

Q. "That's one thing about this car," Abe tells Mrs. Sammett. "Your husband could drive it fine. It's fool-proof." "Abe!!" Mawruss shouts. "He means it's perfectly safe for anybody to drive, Mrs. Sammett."

ening to sue the partners for the price of his car, which "ain't a car at all, but a reaper and binder." He has driven it only two weeks and has had three blowouts, a broken front spring, the battery has gone dead, and he has used 200 gallons of gasoline.

MAWRUSS—(indignant) Well, could we help it if you had hard luck with the car?

MOZART—What do you mean, could you help it? Didn't you say it made fifteen miles to the gallon? [Continued on page 119]

Q. "Eve," painted by Gabriel Domergue, attracted attention in a Paris salon because of its daring symbolism of the vanity of women.

French Art Mocks Convention

By Willard Huntington Wright

IT HAS often been said contemptuously that academic painting—that is, the traditional painting of the schools—is very much the same the world over. But this is far from true. To be sure, the principles of composition and form, the laws of perspective, and the rules governing linear balance and chiaroscuro, have never changed, and never will; for they are founded on certain permanent needs and fundamental reactions in mankind. The earliest primitive artists were guided by them; and Leonardo da Vinci, in his "Trattato della Pittura," set down and defined an esthetic rationale by which even the most iconoclastic of modernistic painters are necessarily governed. In these basic particulars does all art—modern as well as academic—possess a uniformity.

That which chiefly distinguishes academic painting is its strict adherence to the formulas and conventions of the past, its avoidance of originality and novelty, and its lack of any tendency toward experimentation and research. But in the painting of the schools and the official salons—as in all other branches of human endeavor wherein the creative instinct of man plays a constructive part—there is to be found unmistakable evidences of individual and national traits. The academic painting of America differs, in its general aspect, from that of England-Germany's differs from that of Russia. And the exhibits in any French academic salon have, as a whole, distinctive qualities unlike those of any other nation's art.

American academic painting is still under the classic influence, and belongs, in the main, to that pre-Impressionist era when nudes were either goddesses or symbols, and when any suggestion of naturalism was regarded as an esthetic vulgarity. In England academicism has taken a decidedly anecdotal turn; and there are few scriptural, allegorical, literary or historical episodes of any conspicuous note which have not received idealized visualization at the hands of some eminent British R. A.

In Germany we find a pronounced philosophic attitude animating that nation's academic art; and German canvases abound in symbolic, mystical, imagistic, figurative and ideographic conceptions. Russia still reflects in its traditional painting an intense national consciousness, and combines a sombreness of motif with a disorganized brilliancy of execution.

France, which leads the world today in creative activity and artistic competency, presents a far more varied and individual aspect in its academic painting than

Babbitt

By Sinclair Lewis

GEORGE F. BABBITT was forty-six years old now, in April, 1920, and he made nothing in particular, neither butter nor shoes nor poetry, but he was nimble in the calling of selling houses for more than people could afford to pay.

His large head was pink, his brown hair thin and dry. His face was babyish in slumber, despite his wrinkles and the red spectacle-dents on the slopes of his nose. He was not fat but he was exceedingly well fed; his cheeks were pads, and the unroughened hand which lay helpless upon the khaki-colored blanket was slightly puffy. He seemed prosperous, extremely married and unromantic; and altogether unromantic appeared this sleeping-porch, which looked on one sizable elm, two respectable grass-plots, a cement driveway, and a corrugated iron garage. Yet Babbitt was again dreaming of the fairy child, a dream more romantic than scarlet pagodas by a silver sea.

For years the fairy child had come to him. Where others saw but Georgie Babbitt, she discerned gallant youth. She waited for him, in the darkness beyond mysterious groves. When at last he could slip away from the crowded house he darted to her. His wife, his clamoring friends, sought to follow, but he escaped, the girl fleet beside him, and they crouched together on a shadowy hillside. She was so slim, so white, so eager! She cried that he was gay and valiant, that she would wait for him, that they would sail—Rumble and bang of the milk-truck.

Babbitt moaned, turned over, struggled back toward his dream. He could see only her face now, beyond misty waters. The furnace-man slammed the basement door. A dog barked in the next yard. As Babbitt sank blissfully into a dim warm tide, the paper-carrier went by whistling, and the rolled-up Advocate thumped the front door. Babbitt roused, his stomach constricted with alarm. As he relaxed, he was pierced by the familiar and irritating rattle of someone cranking a Ford: snap-ah-ah, snap-ah-ah, snap-ah-ah. Himself a pious motorist, Babbitt cranked with the unseen driver, with him waited through taut hours for the roar of the starting engine, with him agonized as the roar ceased and again began the infernal patient snap-ah-ah—a round, flat sound, a shivering cold-morning sound, a sound infuriating and inescapable. Not till the rising voice of the motor told him that the Ford was moving was he released from the panting tension. He glanced once at his favorite tree, elm twigs against the gold patina of sky, and fumbled for sleep as for a drug. He who had been a boy very credulous of life was no longer greatly interested in the possible and improbable adventures of each new day.

He escaped from reality till the alarm-clock rang, at seven-twenty.

SO MR. LEWIS introduces Babbitt, the central figure in his latest novel. The "realtor's" dream is easily forgotten in the flare of business, in his daily life with his wife, son and two daughters. The members of this family quarrel mildly but diligently. The eldest, the "dumpy brown-haired" Verona, was out of school and working in the expectation of becoming a private secretary. Ted was in high school but he didn't like it; he wanted to be a machinist in spite of the fact that his father was determined he should be a lawyer. Tinka, the baby, was only ten, and she didn't count much in the general scheme of things. Babbitt, as a real estate broker, drove some hard deals, but it was always his desire to keep on the right side of things and he generally found an excuse for questionable practices. Of course he was a member of the Athletic Club and one of Zenith City's Boosters. So far as his affections went they were centered on Paul Riesling—Paul, who was in the roofing business, but at heart a fiddler, and married to the impossible Zilla. They had been class-mates and Babbitt, "Georgie," the Boosters called him, had always felt himself responsible for the smaller, temperamental man. Paul, of course, brought his grievances to George and at luncheon their conversation went thus:

"I ought to have been a fiddler," said Paul, "and I'm a peddler of tar-roofing. And Zilla—Oh, I don't want to squeal, but you know as well as I do about how inspiring a wife she is. . . . Typical instance last evening: We went to the movies. There was a big crowd waiting in the lobby, us at the tail-end. She began to push right through it with her, 'Sir, how dare you' manner. She kept elbowing through the crowd, me after her, feeling good and ashamed, till she's almost up to the velvet rope and ready to be the next let in. But there was a little squirt of a man there—probably been waiting half an hour—and he turns on Zilla and says, perfectly polite, 'Madam, why are you trying to push past me?' And she simply rips out at him, 'You're no gentleman,' and she drags me into it and hollers, 'Paul, this person insulted me,' and the poor skate, he got ready to fight."

"I made out I hadn't heard them—sure! same as you wouldn't hear a boiler-factory!—and I tried to look away—I can tell you exactly how every tile looks in the ceiling of that lobby; there's one with brown spots on it like the face of the devil—and all the time the people there—they were packed in like sardines—they kept making remarks about us, and Zilla went right on talking about the little chap, and screeching that 'folks like him oughtn't to be admitted in a place that's supposed to be for ladies and gentlemen,' and 'Paul, will you kindly call the manager, so I can report this dirty rat?' and— Oof! Maybe I wasn't glad when I could sneak inside and hide in the dark!"

"After twenty-four years of that kind of thing, you don't expect me to fall down and foam at the mouth when you hint that this sweet, clean, respectable, moral life isn't all it's cracked up to be, do you? I can't even talk about it, except to you, because anybody else would think I was yellow. Maybe I am. Don't care any longer. . . . Gosh, you've had to stand a lot of whining from me, first and last, Georgie!"

"Rats, now, Paul, you've never really what you could call whined. Sometimes—I'm always blowing to Myra and the kids about what a whale of a realtor I am, and yet sometimes I get a sneaking idea I'm not such a Pierpont Morgan as I let on to be. But if I ever do help by jollyng you along, old Paulski, I guess maybe Saint Pete may let me in after all!"

"You, you're an old blow-hard, Georgie, you cheerful cut-throat, but you've certainly kept me going."

"Why don't you divorce Zilla?"

"Why don't I! If I only could! If she'd just give me the chance! You couldn't hire her to divorce me, no, nor desert me. She's too fond of her three squares and a few pounds of nut-center chocolates in between. If she'd only be what they call unfaithful to me! George, I don't want to be too much of a stinker; back in college I'd've thought a man who could say that ought to be shot at sunrise. But honestly, I'd be tickled to death if she'd really go making love with somebody. Fat chance! Of course she'll flirt with anything—you know how she holds hands and laughs—that laugh—that horrible brassy laugh—the way she yaps, 'You naughty man, you better be careful or my big husband will be after you!"—and the guy looking me over and thinking, 'Why, you cute little thing, you run away now or I'll spank you!' And she'll let him go just far enough so she gets some excitement out of it and then she'll begin to do the injured innocent and have a beautiful time wailing, 'I didn't think you were that kind of a person.' They talk about these demi-vierges in stories——"

"These whats?"

"—but the wise, hard, corseted, old married women like Zilla are worse than any bobbed-haired girl that ever went boldly out into this-here storm of life—and kept her umbrella slid up her sleeve! But rats, you know what Zilla is. How she nags—nags—nags. How she wants everything I can buy her, and a lot that I can't, and how absolutely unreasonable she is, and when I get sore and try to have it out with her she plays the Perfect Lady so well that even I get fooled and get all tangled up in a lot of 'Why did you say's' and 'I didn't mean's.' I'll tell you, Georgie: You know my tastes are pretty fairly simple—in the matter of food, at least. Course, as you're always complaining, I do like decent cigars—not those Flor de Cabagos you're smoking——"

"THAT'S all right now! That's a good two-for. By the way, Paul, did I tell you I decided to practically cut out smok——"

"Yes you—— At the same time, if I can't get what I like, why, I can do without it. I don't mind sitting down to burnt steak, with canned peaches and store cake for a thrilling little dessert afterwards, but I do draw the line at having to sympathize with Zilla because she's so rotten bad-tempered that the cook has quit, and she's been so busy sitting in a dirty lace negligée all afternoon, reading about some brave manly Western hero, that she hasn't had time to do any cooking. You're always talking about morals, meaning monogamy, I suppose. You've been the rock of ages to me, all right, but you're essentially a simp. You——"

"Where do you get that 'simp,' little man? Let me tell you——"

"—love to look earnest and inform the world that it's the duty of responsible business men to be strictly moral as an example to the community. In fact you are so earnest about morality, old Georgie, that I hate to think how essentially immoral you must be underneath. All right, you can——"

"Wait, wait now! What's——"

"—talk about morals all you want to, old thing, but believe me, if it hadn't been for you and an occasional evening playing the violin, and three or four darling girls that let me forget this beastly joke they call respectability, I'd have killed myself years ago and got out of the mess."

"And business! The roofing business! Roofs for cowsheds! What's the use of it? You know my business isn't distributing roofing—it's principally keeping my competitors from distributing roofing. Same with you. All we do is to cut each other's throats and make the public pay for it."

"Look here now, Paul! You're pretty darn near talking socialism!"

"Take all these fellows we know, the kind right here in the club now. I'll bet if you could cut into their heads you'd find that one-third of them are sure enough satisfied with their wives and kids and friends and offices; and one-third feel kind of restless but won't admit it; and one-third are miserable and know it. They hate the whole peppy, boasting, go-ahead game, and they're bored by their wives and think their families are fools—at least when they come to forty or forty-five they're bored—and they hate business, and they'd go—— Why do you suppose there's so many 'mysterious' suicides? Why do you suppose so many Substantial Citizens jumped right into the war? Think it was all patriotism?"

Babbitt snorted, "What do you expect? Think we were sent into the world to have a soft time and—what is it?—float on flowery beds of ease? Think Man was just made to be happy?"

"Why not? Though I've never discovered anybody that knew what the deuce Man really was made for!"

"Well we know—not just in the Bible alone, but it stands to reason—a man who doesn't buckle down and do his duty, even if it does bore him sometimes, is nothing but a—well, he's simply a weakling. Mollycoddle, in fact! And what do you advocate? Come down to cases! If a man is bored by his wife, do you seriously mean he has a right to chuck her and take a sneak, or even kill himself?"

"Good Lord, I don't know what 'rights' a man has! And I don't know the solution of boredom. If I did, I'd be the one philosopher that had the cure for living. But I do know that about ten times as many people find their lives dull, and unnecessarily dull, as ever admit it; and I do believe that if we busted out and admitted it sometimes, instead of being nice and patient and loyal for sixty years, and then nice and patient and dead for the rest of eternity, why, possibly, we might make life more fun."

BUT THE two men needed each other—the one who dreamed of his violin and the one who dreamed of the golden girl whom he never found. So they planned to spend their vacation together in Maine. Naturally, the wives would go along, but George and Paul wanted a few days alone in the North before the women joined them. Mrs. Babbitt consented after she realized her husband's nerves were near the breaking point but Zilla was a harder problem and her attitude led to a scene:

"GEORGIE and I were just saying," said Mrs. Babbitt to Zilla, "how hard Paul has been working all the year and we were thinking it would be lovely if the boys could run off by themselves. I've been coaxing George to go up to Maine ahead of the rest of us, and get the tired out of his system before we come, and I think it would be lovely if Paul could manage to get away and join him."

At this exposure of his plot to escape, Paul was startled out of impassivity. He rubbed his fingers. His hands twitched.

Zilla bayed, "Yes! You're lucky! You can let George go, and not have to watch him. Fat old Georgie! Never peeps at another woman! Hasn't got the spunk!"

"The hell I haven't!" Babbitt was fervently defending his priceless immorality when Paul interrupted him—and Paul looked dangerous. He rose quickly; he said gently to Zilla:

"I suppose you imply I have a lot of sweethearts."

"Yes, I do!"

"Well, then, my dear, since you ask for it—— There hasn't been a time in the last ten years when I haven't found some nice little girl to comfort me, and as long as you continue your amiability I shall probably continue to deceive you. It isn't hard. You're so stupid."

Zilla gibbered; she howled; words could not be distinguished in her slaver of abuse.

THEN THE bland George F. Babbitt was transformed. If Paul was dangerous, if Zilla was a snake-locked fury, if the neat emotions suitable to the Revelstoke Arms had been slashed into raw hatreds, it was Babbitt who was the most formidable. He leaped up. He seemed very large. He seized Zilla's shoulder. The cautions of the broker were wiped from his face, and his voice was cruel:

"I've had enough of all this damn' nonsense! I've known you for twenty-five years, Zil, and I never knew you to miss a chance to take your disappointments out on Paul. You're not wicked. You're worse. You're a fool. And let me tell you that Paul is the finest boy God ever made. Every decent person is sick and tired of your taking advantage of being a woman and springing every mean innuendo you can think of. Who the hell are you that a person like Paul should have to ask your permission to go with me? You act like you were a combination of Queen Victoria and Cleopatra. You fool, can't you see how people snicker at you?"

Zilla was sobbing, "I've never—I've never—nobody ever talked to me like this in all my life!"

"No, but it's the way they talk behind your back! Always! They say you're a scolding old woman. Old, by God!"

The cowardly attack broke her. Her eyes were blank. She wept. But Babbitt glared stolidly. He felt that he was the all-powerful official in charge; that Paul and Mrs. Babbitt looked on him with awe; that he alone could handle this case.

Zilla writhed. She begged, "Oh, they don't!"

"They certainly do!"

"I've been a bad woman. I'm terribly sorry! I'll kill myself! I'll do anything. Oh, I'll—— What do you want?"

She abased herself completely. Also, she enjoyed it. To the connoisseur of scenes, nothing is more enjoyable than a thorough, melodramatic, egoistic humility.

SO BY means of heavy and cruel words, Mr. Babbitt and Paul won their vacation. Though they fished industriously and tried seriously to enjoy themselves, the freedom did them no good. The deep-rooted restlessness and uncertainty in the mind of each remained. They returned to Zenith City with nothing cleared. True Babbitt found a certain escape in his newly cultivated oratorical powers. He campaigned against the radical candidate for mayor, a lawyer, named Doane, and won some reputation and saw his speeches quoted and his picture published in the local papers. He even reached the height of being elected vice-president of the Boosters' Club. Just at that instant came the calamity that threw his life into turmoil.

Babbitt drove away from the Club in a blur of wonder. He lounged into his office, chuckling to Miss McGoun, "Well, I guess you better congratulate your boss! Been elected vice-president of the Boosters!"

He was disappointed. She answered only, "Yes— Oh, Mrs. Babbitt's been trying to get you on the 'phone." But the new salesman, Fritz Weinger, said, "By golly, chief, say, that's great, that's perfectly great! I'm tickled to death!"

Babbitt called the house, and crowed to his wife, "Heard you were trying to get me, Myra. Say, you got to hand it to little Georgie, this time! Better talk careful! You are now addressing the vice-president of the Boosters' Club!"

"Oh, Georgie—"

"Pretty nice, huh? Willis Ijams is the new president, but when he's away, little ole Georgie takes the gavel and whoops 'em up and introduces the speakers——"

"George! Listen!"

"——it puts him in solid with big men like Doc Dilling and——"

"George! Paul Riesling——"

"Yes, sure, I'll 'phone Paul and let him know about it right away."

"Georgie! Listen! Paul's in jail. He shot his wife, he shot Zilla, this noon. She may not live."

ZILLA DIDN'T die; but she was unrelenting and very shortly Paul was convicted and sentenced to three years in the State Penitentiary. Perhaps Babbitt never knew until then how dependent he had been on Paul. At any rate, his restlessness grew, unchecked by another trip to Maine. But this trip had far reaching results. On the way home he fell in with the radical Doane and his talk with the lawyer gave him a broader [Continued on page 152]

C "Won't you please tell me who you are?" asked Peggy. "Never mind who I am," came back the voice that had interrupted her conversation with Bobbie. "I'm just a plain philosopher, but I know the game you two are playing, and I tell you, Bobbie, she's fooling you!"

C George Ferguson was forty-five years old, which, as an age, is neither one thing nor the other, declares Mr. Lessing. But you might call it the dangerous age

MOST individuals manage their lives rather badly. As they grow in wisdom and pause, from time to time, to review their past, they usually are willing to admit that they might have done much better. And, even after such meditative pauses, they rarely mend their ways.

Nevertheless and notwithstanding all this, most people manage their lives better than you could manage it for them. In witness whereof, George Ferguson.

George Ferguson was forty-five years old, which, as an age, is neither the one thing nor the other. He was no longer young and he had not begun—or, what amounts to the same thing, he thought he had not begun—to grow old. He was a writer, a thinker, and a bachelor.

He often had thought of marrying and, in a dim way, he felt that sooner or later he was bound to marry. It was the proper and intelligent and comfortable thing to do. He had merely failed, hitherto, to meet the right girl or to feel the proper temptation or attraction or provocation—or whatever it is that leads a man to marriage.

He was a philosopher and he knew human nature. He was well-to-do, passably good-looking, rather lazy and possessed a fair sense of humor. One day he undertook to play Providence.

It was a rainy afternoon. He had some writing to do but did not feel in the mood to do it. He lacked inspiration. It occurred to him to ride through the Park in the rain in the hope that some scene, some happening, or some intangible current of outside influence would bring to him the inspiration he needed.

He took the telephone receiver from its hook with the intention of calling for his car and, before he could even utter a "Hello," realized that he was on a crossed wire.

A young man and a young woman were talking.

HE—How about Wednesday then?

SHE—I can't on Wednesday. I have an engagement.

HE—Will you come on Thursday?

SHE (hesitatingly)—I'm afraid I can't, Bobbie. (Long pause.)

HE (with a short, low note of bitter laughter)—Do you know what I think, Peggy?

SHE (calmly)—What?

HE—I don't think you care a rap for me.

SHE—Oh, don't say that! You know I do.

HE—You say you do but I think it's all bunk. I've asked you to go out with me six times and you've always got some other engagement. And the last time you came out you rushed away so early I didn't have any chance to talk to you alone.

SHE—I think you're unreasonable, Bobbie.

HE—No, I'm not. When are you coming out with me?

SHE—As soon as I can. Honest, I will.

HE—Do you really care for me, Peggy?

SHE (slightly annoyed)—Of course I do.

Ferguson, chuckling to himself, intruded upon the dialogue.

"Bobbie," said he, "she's just playing with you."

"Who's that?" cried both voices, simultaneously.

"Never mind who I am," said Ferguson. "I'm just a plain philosopher and a very old man. I'm eighty-nine. But I know the game you two are playing from beginning to end. Why, bless my soul, I've been through it a dozen times myself. And I tell you, Bobbie, she's fooling you."

"I think you're very impertinent," said the indignant Peggy. "Wait a minute," cried Bobbie, excitedly. "Let's hear what he's got to say."

"I know I'm impertinent," said Ferguson, calmly, "but, to the young, age and philosophy are always impertinent. But, first of all, let me talk to Bobbie. You can listen, Peggy. Bobbie, you're a young man—twenty-six or twenty-seven or thereabouts, I take it—and you've got a nice, honest, clean mind and you've had a good education and you have plenty of money and you are really crazy about Peggy, and while she tells you she is fond of you she hasn't shown enough enthusiasm. Am I right?"

"Gosh! That's wonderful! Go ahead, old man," said Bobbie. "Won't you please tell me who you are?" asked Peggy. "Any fool could have said what you just said."

"No, my dear, I'll not tell you who I am," said Ferguson, "but if you'll just be quiet for a moment, until I get through with Bobbie, I'll address myself exclusively to you."

"Let him talk, Peggy," said Bobbie. "I want to get his dope."

Now, Bobbie," said Ferguson, solemnly, "I told you she was fooling you. The reason I know it is this: I know the way of a woman when she really loves. If Peggy really were as crazy about you as you are about her, you wouldn't have to coax her to meet you. You would have more trouble keeping her away, if you had any work to do. When a woman is in love she does not care a rap about other engagements. She does not care a rap about anything in the world excepting the man she loves."

"When a woman really loves a man, the man never has any doubt of it—if he has any sense. Now, whenever Peggy can't come out to meet you, she would be so eager to explain all the reasons to you that you would immediately be convinced."

"Take my advice, Bobbie. Drop Peggy for a while and see what happens. Or, better still, tell her you'll meet her at a certain place, at a certain time and that, if she loves you, she's simply got to be there. Then go there and wait. If she doesn't turn up, drop her. If she really loves you she wants you to boss her. So, the sooner you start in bossing, the better."

"You said a mouthful," cried Bobbie, eagerly.

"How dare you talk like that, Bobbie?" demanded the girl, indignantly.

"I don't care," said Bobbie. "He's got the right idea. If you want me to believe that you care for me you've got to prove it. Say, old man, thank you a thousand times. Gosh, I'd like to meet you."

"All right," said Ferguson. "Now, Peggy, just let me talk to you for a second. I don't know whether you're blonde or brunette, tall or short, slender or stout. And, as long as you're not my girl, I don't care a hang. But I've got an idea that you're pretty and very bright and that you're a delightful companion and that most men like you and that your head has been slightly turned. And I've got a further idea that you like Bobbie but that you're not quite sure how much you like him."

"You don't feel yet like tying yourself down to one man. You may even like Bobbie the best but you want to have a chance to see what the others are like. You probably have half a dozen Bobbies calling you up and trying to make engagements with you and you put them off the same as you did this Bobbie."

A long-drawn gasp came from the girl's lips and Ferguson clearly heard Bobbie chuckling in unrestrained and vivid delight.

"Won't you ple-e-ease tell me who you are?" asked Peggy.

It was now Ferguson's turn to laugh.

"Is that the way she always coaxes you, Bobbie?" he asked.

"Say, you're a wizard!" exclaimed Bobbie. "You've got her down pat."

"Now, listen, Peggy," Ferguson went on. "I've got other things to do and I'll have to cut this short. So just listen to an old, old man who wishes you well."

"You're a nice girl but you've been spoilt. You're entirely too wilful and selfish. You're under the great delusion that if you pout and coax sweetly it is a man's duty to yield to you. You have much to learn. Now take my advice and leave Bobbie alone until you have made up your mind that he is the one you want. Don't experiment on him. The experiment may be enlightening to you but it may also destroy his peace of mind for many years. Don't be impatient. Sit still, remain tranquil and, sooner or later, the knowledge will come to you as to the man you love best. And then be true to yourself."

"But do not play with men for the purpose of enlightening your own soul as to your own desires. With these few words I have the honor to say good-by."

"That's just wonderful," cried Bobbie. "Say, old man——"

"Just a moment, ple-e-ease," began Peggy. "Won't you——"

But Ferguson hung the receiver upon its hook, sat back in his chair and laughed long and softly to himself. And then, with a start, he sat bolt upright in his chair. Why go out into the rain in search of inspiration when inspiration had gone out of its way to call upon him?

"Jiminy crickets!" he exclaimed, delightedly. "I can make a dandy story out of that."

THE WAY he met her was this:

His story had been a great success and Mrs. Wilmot, notorious for her lion-hunting maneuvers, had entrapped him into a dinner at which he was to be the guest of honor and meet quite a number of people whom he did not know and did not care to know. He had been introduced, had mumbled proper acknowledgments and, seated at his hostess's side, was waiting impatiently for the ordeal to end, when he caught a glimpse of a pair of twinkling, gray eyes calmly surveying him from the lower end of the table. He found, upon investigation, that these gray eyes belonged to a rather attractive-looking young woman. He whispered to his hostess.

"Why, that's Miss Preston," she replied. "I introduced you. Have you already forgotten?"

"You know how it is when you meet so many people for the first time," said he. "And my memory is not of the best."

"I'm afraid that wouldn't make a terrible hit with her," said Mrs. Wilmot, laughingly. "She's very pretty and quite a belle. That kind, you know, expect men to remember them."

After dinner Ferguson went straight toward her. He had a nice way with women.

"I think it's a crime," he said, "that I couldn't sit beside you during the dinner. It spoiled all my appetite for me."

The girl laughed and showed beautiful teeth. Her laugh was merry and captivating.

"And yet I'm absolutely sure that you leaned over to Mrs. Wilmot and asked her my name," she replied.

Ferguson's eyes opened wide. "My, but you're a shrewd and quick observer," he said. "But you're right. I get so mixed up when I meet a lot of people at a time, that——"

"That you don't pay attention to any of them," said she, mischievously. "You didn't even take the trouble to look at me when we were introduced. Most men think I'm not so bad to look at, you know."

For a moment Ferguson felt embarrassed. Then:

"I agree with most men and with your own estimate," he said, and laughed.

"There!" said she. "I like that much better. It's frank, anyway. I read your story."

"Let's not talk of the story," said Ferguson. "They're having some music in the drawing-room. Let's go in and chat. I'm weary of being an author and a celebrity. I'd just like to be human for a little while."

She gazed at him for a moment and then burst into a peal of merry laughter. It was quite disconcerting to Ferguson. But, before he could say a word, she took his arm.

"Come. I know a nice little nook off the drawing-room where we can talk. And I've really got to talk with you."

She led him to a roomy alcove, half hidden by heavy curtains from the rest of the room, pointed to a huge armchair, and then cuddled herself upon a footstool and smiled sweetly up at him.

"That's the way we common people should sit, isn't it?" she asked, gaily. "At the feet of genius."

Ferguson felt a vague sense of discomfort.

"A young girl like you should not try to poke fun at a poor old man like me."

"Mr. Ferguson," said she, "will you do me a big favor? Will you answer one question truthfully?"

"My life is an open book," replied Ferguson, with a wave of his hand. "Unless the answer to the question would land me in jail, I promise."

WHERE did you get the idea for that story of yours?" inquired Miss Preston. "I mean the part about overhearing the telephone conversation. Was it an actual experience of your own or did someone tell you about it?"

Ferguson laughed and leaned back luxuriously in his chair.

"If I've answered that question once," he replied, "I've answered it a hundred times. I cross my heart and solemnly swear to you that it actually happened to me, George Ferguson; myself. I wanted to put in a telephone call and found myself on a crossed wire. The rest happened pretty much as I wrote it; that is, the conversation between the girl and the young man. Now, what shall I answer next?"

He looked down at her. Seated upon the low stool, her knees clasped between her hands, she presented a delightful picture. But now she turned her head and looked him full in the face.

"My name is Peggy, you know," said she. "Margaret Preston—but everybody calls me Peggy—including Bobbie. I suppose I ought to be thankful that you called your—your character, Alice, in the story."

And now Ferguson gaped at her, blankly. His face grew red.

"You don't mean——" he stammered.

"But I do," said she. "Ever since I read your story I had the feeling that, some day, I'd meet you. I just wanted to let you know what I thought."

Ferguson had the feeling that his forehead was getting damp. "It's—it's unexpected," said he, falteringly. "A remarkable coincidence."

"Don't you think you were rather rude in intruding upon a private conversation?" she asked, bluntly. "And don't you think it was rather unpardonable to make it public afterwards?"

Ferguson was not accustomed to being embarrassed and now, at the direct question, he regained his poise.

"I really never thought of it in that light," said he. "In fact, to be candid with you, I did not give a single thought to the ethics of the situation. But now that you put it to me I'll tell you, honestly, that I think you're right. It was not only impertinent. It was rather beastly. You see, we writers are so keen for material that, often, we accept the grist that comes to our mill without pausing to inquire whether it is rightfully ours. We make all the blunders of enthusiasm. Still, all that is no excuse. Now, I'll tell you, Miss Preston, that I feel ashamed. That's really true. I had a vague idea that the young woman and the man belonged to a different sphere—I never dreamt that I'd meet them."

WHICH does not alter the situation at all," said the girl.

"Again you're right," said Ferguson. "I'm willing to apologize, to crawl on my knees and to shout my penitence from the housetops. What shall I do?"

The girl rose.

"I can't see that there's anything to be done," she replied. "Anyway, you're frank about it. So let's drop it."

"I'll tell you what I'll do," said Ferguson, eagerly. "I'll send you a check tomorrow for all the money I got out of the story. And you indorse it over to any charity you like. That's only fair because, you see, you and—er—Bobbie are entitled to a share of the profits. But say, as a coincidence, doesn't it just beat the dickens?"

And now she laughed.

"For such a very, very old philosopher," she said, "you really know how to be very nice. But please don't do that."

"It's settled," said he. "I insist upon it."

It was a substantial check and Ferguson experienced real pleasure in sending it to her. A few days later he received a profuse letter of thanks from the superintendent of the Chelsea Home for the Aged, thanking him for his contribution. He chuckled over it.

"She certainly has a sense of humor," [Continued on page 150]

It is a mistake to sic a salesman on a man as soon as he enters a place of business, unless the man seems intent on buying something right away. There are thousands of us leisurely old birds who like to look at things in silence and alone before we make up our minds whether we are going to buy. Mr. Bonehead, being entirely ignorant of all the symptoms of human nature, can never identify us when we drop in; in his blatant way he sets us down as "prospects," and tries to harvest his corn before it is planted. Borrowing fifty cents is one of the oldest industries in the United States, and at the present time it seems more active than ever before, probably because of unsettled conditions since the war. Every day I meet people who are extremely anxious to borrow fifty cents; and one can see at a glance that they have been in the business a long time. Their rigmarole has become like a phonograph record, it has been worked so long. It begins and ends with the same old whine. It does seem strange that men can pursue this borrowing stunt for years and years and never discover that their methods are all wrong. They all have the same story of undeserved afflictions, of harrowing experiences in a hospital, of dying aunts and batty grandmothers, and of man's inhumanity to man. They have framed up a long and tedious story, and, being of the Bonehead family, fail to realize that it's a poor policy to bore a victim to death in an effort to borrow from him. I have been waiting for years for the coming of the masterly handler who makes it known in ten words that he is suffering for fifty cents; and when I meet him he will get seventy-five cents.

IF MR. BONEHEAD is active in the slums and alleys, he also is industrious in the higher places. For many years I have read the works of a celebrated essayist and philosopher with increasing admiration. His skill in the use of words never failed to astonish me, and his knowledge and wisdom were evident on every page. I had a mental picture of him as a serene old man, majestic and dignified; and I longed to sit at his feet and hear his golden words filtering through his long white whiskers.

Last winter it was announced that he would lecture in our town. The appointed night was a beastly one, and I, who seldom leave the house after dark, donned the family umbrella and walked a mile and a half through mud, rain, and wind, to hear this lecture. Such a disappointment as I experienced that night ages one, and takes all the elasticity from soul and body.

Bonehead

By Walt Mason

IT WAS late in the evening when I set forth for the drug store, to purchase a pound of mothballs to lend zest to the Volstead punch I was brewing. I remember passing the Come Again laundry, which stands flush with the alley, and then starless darkness overtook me. The laundryman found me there, lifeless but beautiful, and he had poured a bucket of soapsuds over me before I regained consciousness, and was able to take an invoice.

Somebody had sandbagged or blackjacked me. My money and bangles and other valuables were gone, and my best hat was jammed down over my head, and totally ruined. I make no complaint of the injuries to my head; a man can poultice a damaged head and make it as good as new, but where is the poultice that will restore to its pristine beauty a new and valuable hat? And all this violence was so unnecessary! Had the robber stepped in front of me and demanded my money and gewgaws, I'd have handed them over without argument, and wished him many happy returns of the day, and the event would have seemed amusing and instructive; for I rejoice in anything reasonable that breaks the monotony of life.

But the miscreant stepped up behind me and spoiled my hat with a pump-handle or crowbar or some lethal weapon, and stirred up my wrath to such a degree that I have offered a reward of one dollar for his arrest and conviction. So many similar tactless outrages have occurred in our town that sentiment against the outlaws is at white heat, and when they are overtaken their punishment will be severe. If burglars and hold-up artists would conduct their business politely, their pranks might be regarded with good-humored tolerance, for we are always glad to hear that our neighbors have been victimized; but the robbers are so given to shooting and clubbing that we lose our patience with the whole tribe, and insist that steps should be taken. Doubtless there are many charming burglars who detest violence and all kinds of boorishness, but they must suffer for the sins of the boors.

BOOTLEGGING is being brought into such disrepute by the dishonesty of some that many high-minded members of the profession are abandoning it in disgust. Recently when the train from the West stopped at Emporia for refreshments, a traveler alighted and paced the platform. Journeying across the arid wastes of Arizona and New Mexico he had accumulated a thirst that baffles description. A bootlegger approached him and offered to get him a pint for five dollars. The traveler told him to do his worst, and in a few minutes he returned with a bottle, for which he received the money. Then the traveler repaired to a secluded place to sample the life-saving bitters, and found he had paid five dollars for six cents' worth of cold tea. Such tricks bring the whole business into disfavor, and are vastly discouraging to earnest and thoughtful men who are trying to build up a family trade in hootch.

We meet Mr. Bonehead in every branch of business. In one way or another he manages to stir up resentment, and we, being human, and not always fair, are prone to charge up to a class the sins of an individual. There was a Mr. Bonehead in the plumbing business about five hundred years ago. Being called to the residence of Mr. Mark, to repair sundry pipes, he found he had forgotten certain essential tools, and had to go to his shop for them, charging up to Mr. Mark the time thus employed. Then he discovered that he needed some other tools, and made a second journey to his shop, assessing the costs of the excursion to Mr. Mark. And when this gentleman got his bill he naturally was incensed, and said bitter things about Mr. Bonehead the plumber, and these bitter things were passed around, and handed down from generation to generation, and we have grown up in the belief that plumbers always forget their tools when hired to do anything, and have to go to their shops for them, charging fabulous sums by way of mileage.

I HAVE engaged various plumbers to repair my automobile or overhaul the kitchen sink, and they always had the necessary tools with them; and I have found them conscientious men, some of them being teachers in the Sabbath school; but they all labor under the unsavory reputation of Mr. Bonehead, and it is not surprising if they burst into tears when they present their bills.

There are representatives of the Bonehead family in every business. Recently I quit patronizing an admirable restaurant because the head waiter was overwhelmingly solicitous for my welfare. It would have been a privilege, rather than an ordeal, to eat at this restaurant, if the head waiter had been abolished; for the victuals were fine and well cooked, and the service was excellent, and the prices reasonable. But the head waiter wouldn't let me alone. Every two or three minutes he'd slide up to my table, with his greasy smile and rubbing hands, to ask if everything was satisfactory. Was the steak underdone? Were the potatoes poached the way I liked them? Would I like a few drops of Mrs. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in my coffee? Were the waiters properly attentive? He seemed so anxious to make me happy I couldn't find the courage to denounce him; it was easier to go to some other restaurant.

Probably that head waiter is wondering why he sees me there no more. Being Mr. Bonehead, he never will understand that there are people—and many of them—who like to be let alone. It makes my blood boil in my veins to have people fussing around me. And the Boneheads in business always fuss around me and thereby drive me away.

I am a confirmed auto fan. There is nothing that interests me more than a fine car, and nothing entertains me more than to visit the salesrooms and inspect the new models. But I have been obliged to discontinue this harmless pastime. The auto people won't allow the soulful stranger to look at their cars in peace. I read in the Sunday papers that a new model of the Side-winder car is now on exhibition, and on Monday morning I drift around to the Side-winder salesroom to see this latest offering. I buy two cars every year, and in good season I might buy a Side-winder if they'd just let me look at it by myself. But as soon as I approach a car up steps a breathless young man who has sized me up as a "prospect" because there is a red band on my cigar and gold filling in my teeth. He wants to tell me all about the new fan belt, and the plate-glass spark plugs, and the balanced crank shaft, and back spacer, and marginal stop release, and all the other patented features; and he just begs me to get in, and he will take me fifty or five hundred miles to show me what the car can do. I am ashamed to tell him I just came in to rubber at the car; and I fade out of the back door as quickly as possible feeling humiliated and embarrassed.

It is a mistake to sic a salesman on a man as soon as he enters a place of business, unless the man seems intent on buying something right away. There are thousands of us leisurely old birds who like to look at things in silence and alone before we make up our minds whether we are going to buy. The man I had admired so much and so long was a silly-looking old chap whose false teeth wouldn't stay in place. He evidently was contracting the fluorsome kindred disease, and he would speak a sentence, and then sneeze a sentence, and then cough a quotation from Huxley or Darwin. Everybody felt sorry for him, and we all wondered why a man of his fame should appear on the lecture platform when he must have known he couldn't lecture.

Few great writers are good talkers, but it takes a lot of painful experience to convince them of the fact.

I never like to meet a favorite author, for I know I'll never be able to enjoy his books again. He will make me tired in one manner or another; he will talk through his nose, or quote his own writings, or wear side-whiskers, or have a boil on his neck.

I meet scions of the princely house of Bonehead in all my comings and goings. For a year Dr. Bonehead has been treating me for a disease I didn't have, and overlooking one I did have. Bonehead, the druggist, in filling one of the prescriptions, used arsenic instead of plaster of Paris, and my sufferings are indescribable; and one of these days Bonehead, the sexton, will dig me an unsanitary grave, in a damp location where I won't be able to keep warm.

W. A. Gathering of the Clans

WHEN the bugle's clear notes tremble over mountain, over lea, bidding Bonehead clans assemble for the great corroboree, Boneheads come in mighty legions from the far uncharted lands, delegates from Arctic regions, delegates from burning sands. Some are clothed in costly ermine, some in beggars' rags appear; one prepared to preach a sermon, one to bootleg home-brewed beer. For there is no clime or nation, there's no river, lake, or sea, and there is no creed or station that from Bonehead boys is free. Every trade is represented in this bright triumphant band; all professions yet invented have their delegates at hand. From the shores of ancient rivers, they arrive, by any means, in their rusty henry flivvers, in their shining limousines. Oh, I see them marching proudly, see their gorgeous caravan, and I cheer them bravely, loudly—I'm a member of the clan.

The Man Who Didn't Play Fair

Henry would not call her up. She weighed that, and went to the telephone and called him so she could be sure.

"Are you coming home to dinner?" she inquired. Her cheeks at his voice had grown hot with her resentment. She had to wait several moments, as though he were collecting himself, before he made reply.

"Do you want me?"

"I think it will be best," she told him.

But when he came home at his usual hour of six, she felt in his arrival the same unbelievableness that all other events of the day had held.

"The reason I thought you ought to come home," she explained to him, "is the servants. I couldn't tell you that over the telephone. It's imperative that they should not suspect that anything is wrong."

"I UNDERSTOOD," he said. "I guess that's all I do fully understand about it." He was looking at her over the towel with a sort of bewilderment; he had pulled down the pillars of the temple and the temple, for the time being, had delayed its fall. "What I want to know is what we're going to do after dinner. Are we just going to sit around? I don't imagine we can do that."

"I thought of that. You'd better telephone up and get some theater tickets."

The strangest part was that, as she sat opposite him at the dinner table, she was worried at the thought of his honesty.

He was silent beside her in the theater until, seeing acquaintances near them she made him talk about the play. They came home late, and she undressed in her own dressing-room, and he in his. She did not ask herself why, as they lay side by side in their two beds, the realization that he could not sleep helped make her somnolent; but when she awoke, his empty bed and the closed door to his dressing-room showed her that he was already up.

He came out, fully dressed, just after she had had her bath.

"I told her—" he commenced.

She turned to face him. "You mean—that girl?"

"Yes; I told her that I had had to change the plans, and that I would send someone to her to make arrangements. So she understands and has agreed. Of course, she doesn't know that I've told you. I suppose you'll attend to sending someone. Here's the address and the name she is using at present."

He held a card out to her, and she took it and put it in a drawer of the dresser without looking at it. But after they had breakfasted and he had left the house she came back upstairs and took out the card and read it. "Mrs. Leila Brown," he had written on it, and the address was an up-town hotel.

She opened the closet and looked through her clothes. There was nothing, she thought at first, of the sort she wanted, but she found finally a suit that she had worn the year before upon a motor trip and then discarded. She put it on, went out, and took a surface car uptown. At the hotel, whose tarnished lobby left on her only the impression of men smoking, the desk clerk told her that Mrs. Brown was in and got the room upon the house-phone for her.

"Mrs. Brown?" she asked.

"Yes." The voice was petulant.

"I'm from the home of which Mr. Burroughs spoke to you."

"Well, then—come up."

The elevator boy pointed out the door to her; she paused outside of it, shivered, drew herself together; then she knocked.

"Come in," the voice said.

She opened the door. The unhomelike hotel room gave view through a doorway of another room with an unmade bed and of a bath where towels were scattered on the floor. Roses were on the marble-topped center-table; there was a new, shiny trunk. The girl sat by a window that looked out upon a court, not reading, doing nothing at all, with her hands laid one upon the other in her lap. She looked up at Laura with an anxious, partly defiant gaze. Her face was pretty, but characterless except for youth, with extraordinarily large eyes; her hair was bobbed.

"I came to make arrangements."

"Listen," the girl answered. "What I want to know is this. I'll have a place there by myself, won't I?"

"You'll have your own room, nicer than you have here."

"That sounds all right."

"We'll send someone here to talk with you—Dr. Grant it probably will be—to tell you when you'd better go there."

"Oh, I'll go any time, if it's like what you say. My God, I'm tired of this place."

"Then we'll send a nurse," said Laura, "to help you with your things and to go over there with you."

THE DEFIANCE had gone out of the girl's eyes. "You're nice," she announced. "I hope the rest of them are like you." She got up and went to the trunk and took out a checkered coat. "Look," she said, "isn't this lovely? I'm crazy over it. I got it because I'm going on a trip."

A guarded look came suddenly into her gaze. "He's a friend of Mr. Burroughs," she stated. "That's how Mr. Burroughs came to tell me about your place."

She threw the coat over the trunk and then came back toward Laura.

"My God," she said, "I wish I was out of this. A girl has a lot of trouble, doesn't she? Afterward I've got to go to South America with him. I don't know anybody there, neither does he. He's funny."

She moved about the room, still talking. "Do you want a flower?" she asked. "He sent them to me."

"No," Laura answered. There was something terrible and terrifying to her in the fact that the girl had so little attraction except prettiness and youth. Did mere youth mean so much to men that an older woman could not war against it?

In the evening she said to Henry, "That girl—it's arranged about her. She'll let you know, I suppose, when she goes over there. She's seen me but she doesn't know who I am; she thinks I am an agent of the Home. All they know at the Home is that she is someone in whom I take an interest.

So it's all right for you to go to see her there; they'll think you come from me."

"Very well," he said.

After that, there was nothing to be done except to wait until her relatives had come and gone. She had complete control of herself on the day she went with Henry to meet her sister and her husband.

The next day they went, all four together, to the pier to meet her mother. They waited in a group outside the barrier until they saw her coming toward them through the crowd, in a new dress, plainly bought in Paris. Mrs. Walton, for her age of fifty-six, looked extremely young; it was marvelous, everybody said, how her complexion had been kept.

THE HOUSEHOLD took on the sort of programmed irregularity that such guests entailed. Friends called on Mrs. Walton there. Jessica, freed for ten days from her three children, demanded afternoon tea at the hotels, evenings at the theaters, after-theater suppers in the noisiest cafés. The last evening of their visit, when the trunks were already partly packed in preparation for the train, was the first time Laura and her husband dined at home. Ted and Jessica had an engagement with some friends and Mrs. Walton had been going with them, but at the last moment she had changed her mind.

"I stayed at home," she announced to Laura after dinner, "because I wanted to talk to you and Henry. Has Henry told you why it was that Ted came East?"

Laura looked uneasily at her husband. She had been conscious throughout the week of some increasing strain between Henry and his brother-in-law.

"No," she replied.

"Ted has been terribly disappointed and hurt," Mrs. Walton declared. "Jessica spoke to me about it first and then I spoke to Ted. It is some business matter that I don't pretend to understand myself. Henry can tell you that part of it."

Henry moved to the mantel; he rested his elbow on it and looked down at them.

"It's an international corporation for exporting automobile and tractor parts," he said, "and assembling them in the countries where the machines are to be used. It's a merger of the export departments of a lot of manufacturers. There's international legal business connected with it, of course, and Ted wanted me to take charge of the American end of that."

"There!" Mrs. Walton asserted. "That is it. Ted spoke to Henry about it almost a year ago when it was first beginning to be planned, and Henry was enthusiastic about it then. So Ted worked hard for Henry's benefit; he says he had to pull a multitude of strings before he could get it finally arranged that the offer would be made."

"Henry must know how much more business he can take on," Laura said placatingly.

"He could take on the business. Ted knows that. But he has practically refused even to talk it over with him."

That Dainty Bread Lends More Charm to Your Table—and More Nourishment to Your Meals

IT'S the finer touches, now and then, that make the meals delightful and especially remarked in certain homes.

A luscious raisin bread, for instance, breaks monotony and whets new appetite. Many women's tables are famous for no more than little variations such as this.

For there's art, remember, not only in the making but in the choice of foods.

Delicious raisin bread served plain with butter or as a crisp, brown toast!—what else is so enchanting to one who has fine tastes?

The flavor of the raisins permeates the loaf. And there's the incomparable zest of fruit.

Just try a dainty raisin bread occasionally and hear what your family says. Serve it to your luncheon guests. Hear their comments.

Remember, too, that raisin foods supply more nourishment as well as flavor.

For raisins furnish 1560 calories of energizing nutriment per pound in practically predigested form.

Also a rich content of food-iron.

You need but a tiny bit of iron daily yet that need is vital. Raisins will help to insure an adequate amount.

In fact, don't think of raisins as merely delicious natural confections—which they are—but also as a healthful food which should be served with regularity in scores of attractive ways.

Note two tempting recipes in the column to the right. Try one today.

Then mail coupon and we'll send our free book, "Recipes with Raisins," suggesting 98 other luscious raisin foods.

When buying raisins for home use always ask for Sun-Maids, the finest raisins grown.

"But Henry has no right," Mrs. Walton stated, "to leave the matter like this. Ted is going back without knowing what to think or say. It's bewildering and it's ridiculous. It's not as though Ted were a stranger; he's a member of the family."

"Mother, why can't you let Ted and Henry settle this?"

"Because they're not settling it."

"For God's sake, tell her!" Henry suddenly shouted. "I can't stand this indefinitely." He became all at once white and very still. "I'm sorry, Laura," he said apologetically. "I guess things have been going on too long with me. But they're all going tomorrow anyway."

HE HURRIED out of the room and up the stairs. Mrs. Walton had stiffened.

"Laura," she questioned, "what did he mean? Something about Ted?"

Laura's throat had swelled and tears had rushed to her eyes. "Mother—please!" she begged. "It's nothing about Ted."

"Not about Ted? Is it about you?"

"Please, Mother!"

"Is there trouble between you and Henry?" A sort of pitying triumph had come over Mrs. Walton.

"Mother, please don't! I don't want to talk about it."

Suddenly Laura felt her mother's arms about her. "My child! My poor, betrayed, unhappy child!"

Laura fought herself free. "Mother, this is our affair, not yours."

"Not mine? You are my daughter. Deny to me that there is a woman. Deny to me that Henry is unfaithful to you and I will say nothing more. If you cannot deny it, Henry must leave this house. Thank God, I am here to be with you through all this. I shall remain with you, of course. I shall give up all my other plans and be here to give a mother's comfort and support to you through all the strain of the divorce."

"There is not going to be any divorce."

"Laura, you are not clinging weakly to a man who has discarded you?"

"Mother, you simply cannot understand. It didn't mean anything real to him or her. It—just happened."

"Laura! My poor, misguided child!"

"Mother, I am not a child. I am a woman. I will not allow a chit of an immoral girl to tear down what I have built."

"Built?" Mrs. Walton said a little dazedly, before she gathered energy again. "Built! On the faithless word of a man who was unworthy to marry you!"

"Mother, I can't explain if you act this way. I have built. This offer that Ted brought to Henry—would he ever have done that, if he had not been married to Jessica and Henry to me? . . . Well, that isn't exactly what I mean. . . . You remember the little house Henry and I had first outside of Detroit, where I did my own work, when we couldn't afford to live even in that town? Well, then we came here and we had to live over in Jersey where everything is cheap. Then we moved across the river and we had to live at 165th Street. Now we live here in this house with servants. . . . It isn't those things themselves; it's what they mean. We've made a place for ourselves together in the world; we have friends and are respected for the things we've done; and we can look back on that—those struggles, and value each other for what we've been to one another through them. . . . That isn't the only way things have changed. We've changed each other living together. We've given up things we liked because the other one didn't like them. We've got so we understand. I couldn't build like that again. I'm thirty-two years old. A person has only one life."

"Laura, it does no good for a woman to forgive a man. He takes it merely as permission given him to sin again."

"He hasn't asked me to forgive; he doesn't assume I will. But, Mother, I will not tear down my life because of that virtueless girl. You tore down yours and you have been unhappy ever since."

MRS. WALTON had grown very white; something almost malevolent had come into her eyes. "I divorced a man who had been unfaithful, because no self-respecting woman would have lived with him."

"I knew you couldn't understand. There are more important things than that."

"Laura, the other day Jessica said a strange thing to me. She said that you meant to adopt a child."

"I didn't tell her that. I was wondering what there was that I could do. I asked her if she didn't think it would be better for me if I did. But it's quite true. I have decided to do that. The room that Jessica and Ted have now, as soon as you're gone, is going to be turned into a nursery."

"Laura, what child?"

Her daughter did not answer.

"Laura, is it Henry's child?"

"Please, Mother!"

"Laura, you are an immoral woman. It is women like you who destroy the sacred rite of marriage. Marriage is a holy sacrament, which binds together one woman and one man. Will Jessica, will women of her sort, associate with you when they know of this?"

"Mother!" Laura could hardly breathe. "I don't want to hurt you. I love you. But if you ever hint to Jessica your suspicion that this might be Henry's child, you'll never come inside my house again."

Suddenly she fled from the room and up the stairs. She was choking and stifling with her sobs. Upstairs, Henry lifted to her a ghastly face.

"I'm sorry, Laura—" he began.

"It doesn't matter. Listen. We are going to adopt that baby. Only, I make conditions: I must have it from the very first—the first. That girl must never see the child. It must come direct—from her to me. And she must sign away all right in it, without her knowing who it is that's going to take it, if that's possible."

He had arisen, facing her. "Laura, you can't do that! It wouldn't do to have it here, reminding you—growing up maybe to resemble some one else—"

"I can. It can be made perfectly simple. At the hospital they will believe I sent the girl there because I intended to adopt a child and wanted to have it from the beginning. I'll send a nurse there, who can come here afterwards. It doesn't matter if the nurse suspects; I know her well and trust her. There is another thing that you must do. You must wait up tonight till Ted comes in, and tell him that it is all right about that business."

"Laura, you really want to do all this?"

"Yes. I've decided. Please, let's not talk about the matter any more now."

She flung herself face down upon the bed and lay there. "It was terrible with mother," she declared—"just terrible!"

She heard him moving aimlessly, nervously about the room. "Laura," he said, "I feel as if I'd killed you."

The next morning Laura breakfasted in bed. The train the others were taking left in the early afternoon, and about one she dressed and went downstairs. An icy figure which had her mother's features greeted her among the others. She was silent as they drove all together to the station; but when the train had gone, she choked. Mrs. Walton had not kissed her daughter good-by.

"I've got a hundred baby things to buy," she told her husband.

All afternoon and throughout the next day she was busy with her purchasing.

"I'm only just in time," she said to him, the following night. "Not that. Half of the things I bought are not delivered yet, and they've just called me from the hospital. I want the limousine, and I must have it warmed."

He went out with her to the car, and stood on the steps looking after it as it rolled away. It swung through the darkened streets and stopped before the entrance to the hospital.

"This is all," she told the driver. "We must merely wait."

Lights in the hospital and in surrounding buildings winked out one by one. Stars became plainer overhead as the city went to sleep. The chauffeur, tired of sitting in his place, got out and paced about. After some hours the door of the hospital opened and a nurse came out carrying something in her arms. She handed the bundle to Laura and got in. The car started, rolling swiftly on its way. Laura sat holding the bundle. Something small and alive and warm was in the blankets. What impressed her was its helplessness. It had needs that it could not supply; it had no one to turn to but herself; it was completely dependent upon her. She did not disturb the blankets to look at it, but she felt that small, helpless warmth within her arms and upon her lap and against her body.

She got out when the car stopped and, still carrying it, went up the steps into the house and then up the inner stairs to the room that had been converted so recently into a nursery.

"Will you ask Mr. Burroughs to come here?" she said to the nurse.

Left alone, she laid the bundle on the nurse's bed, turned the electric heat-reflector towards the bed and switched it on. In the warm current of air that it sent out, she unpinned the blankets and spread them open. Then she knelt, looking and touching. It was very small; it had strange unseeing eyes, a puckered mouth, and small bent legs. She put her finger against the palm of one of its incredibly small hands and the minute fingers closed like the leaves of a sensitive plant upon it.

Then she heard Henry coming. She looked up with a brilliance in her face.

"Look at her," she said. "Isn't she wonderful, Henry!"

Even his wife wouldn't tell him

OF COURSE, she loved him—loved him dearly and looked to his future just as ambitiously as he did. There was nothing she wouldn't have done for him.

But they were both sensitive young people and this subject seemed to be one she could not bring herself to discuss.

The position he held, with a firm of excellent standing, had promised much. Yet he did not seem to progress as he should have—as they had hoped. Other men constantly stepped ahead of him into the better positions. He seemed to be giving satisfaction, yet he was standing still.

The thing that held him back was in itself, perhaps, a little thing. But one of those little things that rest so heavily in the balance when personalities are being weighed and measured for the bigger responsibilities of business.

A big, little thing that even his wife never mustered courage enough to mention!

Halitosis (the medical term for unpleasant breath) never won a man promotion in the business world—and never will. Some men succeed in spite of it. But usually it holds them back. And the pathos of it is that the person suffering from halitosis is usually unaware of it himself. Even his closest friends don't want to mention it to him.

Sometimes, of course, halitosis arises from some deep-rooted organic disorder; then professional help is required. But usually—and fortunately—it will yield to the regular use of Listerine as a mouth-wash and gargle.

Listerine, recognized for half a century as the safest antiseptic, possesses properties that quickly meet and defeat halitosis. It halts food fermentation in the mouth, and leaves the breath sweet, fresh and clean.

Its systematic use this way puts you on the safe and polite side. Then you need not be disturbed with the thought of whether or not your breath is just right. You know it is.

Your druggist will supply you. He sells lots of Listerine. It has dozens of different uses as an antiseptic. Note the booklet with each bottle.—Lambert Pharmaceutical Company, St. Louis, U. S. A.

himself, and ashamed . . . a guest in his father's house . . . a woman whom he loved for her loyalty, and of whom he had begged for disloyalty.

"The man, and the woman, Fred—" she began suddenly.

Good! Very good! She was going to keep it on that basis.

"—may have had some sort of a conundrum put up to them, and they may have solved it in what seemed to them the best way, and the most honest way. It's all guess work, isn't it? When it comes down to facts you think you know a lot of things that you may not know at all. I wouldn't be sure that the woman is unhappy. Suppose she didn't love her husband; but suppose she would gladly die for him, work her hands to the bone for him. Happiness is very beautiful, like the moon . . . for most people it's out of reach. There's more than one moon. Love, money, health, children, being young, that's a white moon, and it's way up high, a way, way up . . . Having something given you to take care of, and taking care of it the very best you know how—that's a moon that swims lower down, Fred. Most anybody could reach up and touch it, if they had the sand to try; but it's not so bright as the other. It doesn't seem worth while often, until it's swam past; but there's affection to be had for those that touch it; the sense of having been trusted, of being trusted, and of having done well what was hard to do . . . What if it is a blue moon, Fred? From what you have told me about this woman, I think it would hurt her, if you kept on saying things to her that she has no right to hear. I think if they wanted your help, they would ask it, if they thought it was right. And if you like them and admire them the way you say you do, you'll let them think that you believe what they want to have believed about them. From what you have said I am as sure, just as sure as you are that the man is a good man—so good, so kind, so honest, so straight, so considerate, that the woman would be a fool to leave all that behind for anything that wasn't so fine and wonderful as all that. Love isn't, you know, Fred, but once in a million times."

"THE reason I talked to her the way I did," said Fred, "was because—if she had wanted to go free—and if she had liked me the way I liked her—what I mean is I thought she ought to know that there was a way out in case she wanted a way out. . . . Of course when I found out that I'd guessed all wrong, and didn't know what I thought I knew, why naturally I abandoned the topic. There's such a thing as running lickety split through the dark and thinking the gate's open, and finding that it isn't. No woman has ever been the worse for knowing me, and there's never going to be one the worse for it. . . . But you think, though, it would be all right for me to let the woman know—somehow or other—that she could count on me helping her in any way she wanted me to, at any time, and coming as fast as trains run, from any place?"

"I guess she'd know that without being told," Mary answered.

Before supper ended it was hard for

The Better Wife

Mary to believe that Fred Jessup's declaration of love had been a real episode in her life, and not merely a logical continuation of those imaginings with which she had indulged herself during a part of the previous night. And it was not until she was once more alone in the dark that she felt herself confronted with a definite problem that had to be solved.

For it then became clear to her that the young man's declaration had not left her serene and untroubled; but hugely disturbed and excited. She had heard for the first time in her life of a love which sought not to dishonor her; but to honor her. She had imagined the love that an innocent girl inspires in the heart of a man.

SHE MUST all this time have been drifting into a liking for him, which differed altogether from the sort of liking she had for her father and mother. Unknown to her, until now, her youth must almost from the first have been strangely drawn toward him. It was as if at the end of a walk together she were to disavow that all the time they had been holding hands.

She was going to be hurt by this. It was hard luck. It was like one of those sudden glimpses that you sometimes have into a lovely garden, as you go rushing by in the train. And she had scolded him for making love to her! Scolded the first man who had ever told her in one and the same breath of both love and homage. She had called him down, made him think that he had offended her. It was unjust for one man to make love to another man's wife or for that wife to listen. That part was all wrong. But it hadn't been quite that. It had been just Fred trying to let her know that his love was hers, if it should ever be right for her to want it.

She wondered how she would have conducted herself if she had felt about Fred the way he felt about her? Would she have given him one of those glimpses into a lovely garden from a rushing train? Would she, while telling him that she did not love him, have let him know somehow that she did? She did not know. She did know, that even if she had felt that way toward him, she would have put a swift end to his love-making. She knew very well what sort of conduct her husband expected of her as his wife. She was glad that she had such a husband. And she was glad, too, in this matter that it was so easy for her to do as he wished. Suppose it hadn't been easy! Well, she would have snubbed Fred and called him to order just the same.

Wasn't it marvelous of Fred to have seen through the sham of her relations with Bud? But how could he see some things so clearly, and others not at all? Did he have the gift of seeing only what he hoped to see? In that case. . . . Oh, she could never be happy with a man unless he knew all about her past, and it should be to him as if it never had been! Better stick to Bud, now and forever, one and inseparable. He knew. And while the knowledge must always be an impassable barrier between them, still knowing, knowing the whole horror, he could be friendly. He did not hate.

He had begun by hating and he had passed from that to tolerance, to liking, to friendliness. That was progress in the right direction!

But another man, the man who loved her, could never pass to the other side of that cruel barbed-wire barrier of knowledge, and have left upon him one shred of his love. And if by some miracle it should seem to him that his love had come through (rent and torn but still alive and throbbing) he could not hope to keep along with it one single tatter of his self-respect.

Suppose Fred having come to her with his love, should go now and tell Bud about it? Here was a new thought! Suppose Bud should offer to let her go free; should insist upon it, even? Should command that she should go free? Well, she had promised to obey him.

But she would have to tell Fred. That was certain. Even if the chances were ten million to one, she could never be happy unless Fred knew; and if Fred did know, why of course he could never be happy. . . . It was all very well to talk so freely of having to tell Fred. She couldn't tell him. The secret was not hers alone. It belonged to Bud, too. It would be base to tell Fred. She would just have to take hands with him and go skating off over the thin ice, sure that they must break through some time, and wondering when!

It would be base to tell anyone that a man like Bud had, with his eyes open, married a woman like her.

WHY was it so hard to get to sleep? She had drunk no coffee at supper. And what was she bothering her silly head about anyway? The episode was closed . . . just an episode . . . she would tell Bud about it some day, and about all her perplexities . . . some day, long years from now . . . only an episode. It was over and must be forgotten.

And so Mary Highland fell asleep.

But there had been planted in her spirit a seed, that was to swell, and sprout, and grow, even while she slept. That was why she would wake, later in the night, weeping . . . weeping because, though that spirit of hers in which the seed had been planted was virgin soil, it was, alas, the one and only pocket of such in all her trampled garden, and by all the laws of propinquity and contamination it could never grow the beautiful puritan pansies, with their holy odor; but only the rose, which as all men know is only half beauty and sweetness and the rest thorns.

Going down to breakfast the next morning with slow steps upon the stair, wonder troubled her and fear. She was afraid of her own eyes. She could not meet them. It was they that had told him that her marriage with Bud was indeed no marriage. They had told him one grave and mysterious secret which belonged to Bud and herself alone to know. How now should she prevent the traitors from telling him still another?

Meanwhile Bud is in New York and thrown into contact with the first "wife." Will he make comparisons unfavorable to Mary? Can the two, in separation, find closer association? See Hearst's International for November.

The World War on Booze

the importation of Spanish wines containing not more than twenty-one percent of alcohol. In case of refusal the penalty was to be a prohibitive duty on split-cod, which constitutes from sixty percent to eighty percent of the total exports, and most of which was bought by Spain.

An attempt was made at once to organize prohibition sentiment throughout the world, and at the Anti-Alcohol Congress held last year in Lausanne, all sorts of schemes to force Spain to withdraw her ultimatum were considered. A boycott of Spanish fruits and merchandise was put forward by some of the European delegates, but all that was actually done was the sending of an address signed by 500 temperance leaders throughout the world to the King of Spain. No attention was paid to this, and this spring, despite official protest, the Parliament of Iceland repealed its prohibition law to permit the importation of Spanish wines. A concession, however, was won to the extent that the law was to be of only one year's duration.

IN A SLIGHTLY less high-handed way, practically the same thing is being done to Norway by France and Spain. For a number of years the temperance movement had been steadily growing stronger in Norway, until finally a law was passed limiting the sale and importation of wines and spirits of more than twelve percent alcohol.

To French and Spanish wine exporters this twelve percent limit is an unfortunate test. Many of their most exportable wines contain up to fourteen percent alcohol and consequently they were excluded. So the economic screws were applied to Norway.

Not only is she being forced to permit the importation of wine fourteen percent alcohol but must buy 400,000 liters of spirits from France and 500,000 liters of wines from Spain annually. Norway is learning her wet lesson.

But Spain, France, and Italy are not the only countries that are laying on the heavy hand of economic pressure and the threat of trade boycott in behalf of their wine exporters. At the end of June of this year Austria, broken, helpless, and hopeless, decided on a desperate attempt to balance her budget by tremendous increases in taxation of wine, spirits, tobacco, and a number of other articles. This included great increases in import duties, as well as local excise taxes.

Now Austria imports the greater portion of her foreign wines from her neighbor Hungary, and the minute that Hungary heard of the proposal to increase the duties on her wines—and consequently by greatly increasing the price decrease the consumption—she announced that it would be impossible to permit the further exportation of her cattle and her flour into half-starving Austria.

She wasn't going to permit—and she DIDN'T permit—any tampering with her wine exportation. She had a method of trade reprisal in her hand and she did not hesitate to make use of it.

To one who has made even the most superficial investigation of world temperance conditions, there is not the slightest doubt that the wine-growing nations of Europe—and especially France, Spain, and Italy—are working in close harmony to keep anti-wine legislation from being passed in other countries, and to break down any legislation that may have already been enacted. In all these countries the wine and spirits interests are splendidly entrenched in both political and governmental circles. With the exception of small groups of anti-spirits deputies in both the French and Italian chambers, their legislators stand out against any genuine temperance legislation.

Practically all the great papers and magazines of Europe—with the exception of the Socialist press—are under the inspiration of the anti-Prohibition interests.

TODAY the temperance idea is slowly penetrating across every border, into every forgotten valley, and to the farthest backwaters of Europe and the world. Its strength lies in the power of an Idea—a determined Idea that is being blown about the world by every chance wind.

The interference of American prohibition "fanatics" and "cranks" is after all a small factor in this world movement. A little enthusiasm, a little push ahead, a little genius for organization, and money is all that American prohibition interventionists are giving and can give. Their influence has been tremendously over-estimated by the anti-temperance forces. These wet interests saw the thing growing and like an angry bull they saw nothing but the red flag waving in front of their eyes.

I went to considerable pains to find out just how many American prohibition organizers had been busy in Europe, and as near as possible how much money had been spent here. Following is a list of the American men and women who have done either paid or voluntary lecturing and organizing in Europe in the interest of world prohibition during the last three years:

Pussyfoot Johnson; D. Leigh Colvin; Harry S. Warner; Mrs. D. K. Livingston; Judge Pollock; Bishop James Cannon; Dr. H. H. Russell; Dr. David Ostlund; Henry Beach Carre; V. G. Hinshaw; E. L. G. Hohenthal; Dr. Clarence T. Wilson; John G. Woolley.

OF THESE men only John G. Woolley and Pussyfoot Johnson are doing active work as I write. Mr. Woolley is lecturing in the Scandinavian countries and Mr. Johnson has just returned to London from the United States, en route to Australia and New Zealand. Mr. E. L. G. Hohenthal returned to America the last of June from several months' active organizing work in Central Europe. In connection with V. G. Hinshaw—both working under the Prohibition Foundation of Illinois—Mr. Hohenthal organized national temperance committees in Vienna, Prague, and Budapest and did considerable lecturing and temperance organizing in Germany.

In Austria the Temperance Committee, under the leadership of the President of the Austrian Republic, is to receive $1,000 from the Prohibition Foundation and $1,000 from the Methodist Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals. A sum of $500 a year was promised the Hungarian Committee to carry on its dry propaganda and assist in paying a dry organizer.

Other sums of money are being contributed from American sources toward the international dry propaganda in France and Italy, and toward the upkeep of an office by the World League Against Alcoholism in London, but nowhere is it any considerable amount: probably the total amount of American money spent during any one year in Europe would total little more than $25,000—a small figure in comparison to the hundreds of thousands of dollars that are claimed by the West to be pouring into Europe to make it dry. And a small figure, likewise, in comparison to the quarter of a million dollars the American prohibition enthusiasts themselves declare they are about to spend.

From a long article in the February 18, 1922, number of the American Issue on the plans of the World League Against Alcoholism under the title of "World Prohibition Campaign This Year Will Be Extensive, Asserts Secretary," I cull this paragraph:

"The budget for World Prohibition this year is $250,000, of which $145,000 will be provided by constituents of the Anti-Saloon League, and the remainder will come from other countries."

This is extremely interesting—but that is all. It is part of the dry propaganda. From my own investigations I question if twenty percent of that amount was spent by American prohibition organizers in all the world in 1921—or will be spent this present year.

Behind this whole world dry movement lies a certain unquestionable missionary fervor and determination. Men go into it as they might go into a holy crusade. In the same number of the American Issue from which I quoted the paragraph on estimated expenditure, I find this:

"As the church was compelled to carry the gospel into other lands to save its soul, so America must carry the prohibition gospel into other nations to save Prohibition at home. If the movement of world Prohibition is to take organized form in the nations, the sentiment that now exists in every part of the globe must be crystallized into public opinion."

That is an open declaration of war.

What will be the result?

The dries claim they will capture the world in 10-20-30 years. Their slogans vary from "A Dry World In 1930" to "A Dry World in 1950."

The wets, like the Magyars of Hungary, cry, "No! No! Never!"

In his next article Frazier Hunt will tell of the exact liquor status in France—what the French drink and how much. His report upsets the ancient fable of wine and nothing else, and gives a clear idea of the present fight between the dry and wet forces. See Hearst's International for November.

Making Your Hair Improve Your Looks

How To Have Beautiful Hair—and Make Yourself More Attractive.

EVERYWHERE you go your hair is noticed most critically.

People judge you by its appearance.

It tells the world what you are.

If you wear your hair becomingly and always have it beautifully clean and well-kept, it adds more than anything else to your attractiveness and charm.

Beautiful hair is not a matter of luck, it is simply a matter of care.

Study your hair, take a hand mirror and look at the front, the sides and the back. Try doing it up in various ways. See just how it looks best.

A slight change in the way you dress your hair, or in the way you care for it, makes all the difference in the world in its appearance.

To caring for the hair, shampooing is always the most important thing.

It is the shampooing which brings out the real life and lustre, natural wave and color, and makes your hair soft, fresh and luxuriant.

When your hair is dry, dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy, and the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, it is because your hair has not been shampooed properly.

When your hair has been shampooed properly, and is thoroughly clean, it will be glossy, smooth and bright, delightfully fresh-looking, soft and silky.

While your hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali in ordinary soaps soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why discriminating women, everywhere, now use Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure, and it does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

If you want to see how really beautiful you can make your hair look, just follow this simple method:

A Simple, Easy Method

FIRST, put two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a cup or glass with a little warm water. Then wet the hair and scalp with clear warm water. Pour the Mulsified evenly over the hair and rub it thoroughly all over the scalp and throughout the entire length, down to the ends of the hair.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance or rich, creamy lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips, so as to loosen the dandruff and small particles of dust and dirt that stick to the scalp.

After rubbing in the rich, creamy Mulsified lather, rinse the hair and scalp thoroughly—always using clear, fresh, warm water.

Then use another application of Mulsified, again working up a lather and rubbing it in briskly as before.

Two waters are usually sufficient for washing the hair, but sometimes the third is necessary.

You can easily tell, for when the hair is perfectly clean, it will be soft and silky in the water, the strands will fall apart easily, each separate hair floating alone in the water, and the entire mass, even while wet, will feel loose, fluffy and light to the touch and be so clean it will fairly squeak when you pull it through your fingers.

Rinse the Hair Thoroughly

THIS is very important. After the final washing, the hair and scalp should be rinsed in at least two changes of good warm water and followed with a rinsing in cold water.

When you have rinsed the hair thoroughly, wring it as dry as you can; finish by rubbing it with a towel, shaking it and fluffing it until it is dry. Then give it a good brushing.

After a Mulsified shampoo you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it is.

If you want to always be remembered for your beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This regular weekly shampooing will

Dress Your Hair To Emphasize Your Best Lines Only

Begin by studying your profile. If you have a short nose, do not put your hair on the top of your head; if you have a round, full face, do not fluff your hair out too much at the sides; if your face is very thin and long, then you should fluff your hair out at the sides. The woman with the full face and double chin should wear her hair high. All these and other individual features must be taken into consideration in selecting the proper hair-dress. Above all, simplicity should prevail. You are always most attractive when your hair looks most natural—when it looks most like you.

keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage—and it will be noticed and admired by everyone.

You can get Mulsified at any drug store or toilet goods counter, anywhere in the world. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months.

What a Child's Hair Needs

CHILDREN should be taught, early in life, that proper care of the hair is essential.

The hair and scalp should be kept perfectly clean to insure a healthy, vigorous scalp and a fine, thick, heavy head of hair.

Get your children into the habit of shampooing their hair regularly once a week. Put two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a cup or glass with a little warm water. Then wet the hair and scalp with clear warm water. Pour the Mulsified over the hair and rub it in vigorously with the tips of the fingers. This will stimulate the scalp, make an abundance of rich, creamy lather and cleanse the hair thoroughly. It takes only a few seconds to rinse it all out when through.

You will be surprised how this regular weekly shampooing with Mulsified will improve the appearance of the hair and you will be teaching your child a habit that will be appreciated in after-life, for a luxurious head of hair is something every man and woman feels mighty proud of.

The Pale Woman

hands, the only uncompleted gesture he had ever seen her make, palms outward, as though to guard herself against him.

"No, no, Gregory—I!"

He seized her hands.

"Anna! My dear. . . . You must care for me a little. I'm sure of it. Several times. . . . we've been so close to each other. As though our minds had touched—"

"No. You must not—it is not for me!"

"Love is not for you?"

"No!" She drew away from him; looked at him with a passionate defiance. "What is love? It is something that conquers one—that drags one down. It is only a trick of life to cheat one of one's soul. I will not be cheated. I will not be beaten—"

"Tell me this," he said. "Are you free to love?"

"Yes, I am free. I am free to do, and be what I choose. And I choose to be what I am—a disembodied spirit if you like."

"Anna!"

"You think I am cruel—perhaps mad? Then listen, I will tell you. . . . In a moment."

SHE WALKED to the window, whose iron bars were silvered with the touch of moonlight. Finally she came back to him, and stood by the table, facing him. "Yes, I will tell you. . . ."

"I married when I was quite young. It was in Paris. I had gone there to finish my education. I met Raoul, my husband. He was charming and romantic. I was dazzled by his talk and his manner, by his fine ideals. I have told you that he was a painter. . . . He had ideals of the highest. . . . I married him."

"At once I knew that I had made a mistake. In spite of his ideals, and his wonderful talent, he was a beast. He put love on a plane that made it horrible. . . . Perhaps love is always horrible. . . . No, wait! Let me go on."

"When he found that I refused to debauch myself, he tried to drag me down to his own level. He tried in a thousand ways—subtle, clever ways—to break my resistance and to destroy my spirit. It became a struggle—a terrible, hidden struggle. I might have left him. I had reasons enough. But I was proud. I had made up my mind to stand out against him, if necessary, till the Judgment Day. That struggle was my life. Everything else was absorbed in it. I only lived to defeat him, to prove to him that I was stronger than he. . . ."

"He had other women—many of them. That was one of his ways of torturing me. 'You are too pure, Anna!' he would say, 'You don't know what love is. You wear pearls around your throat. . . .' And he would go off to his other women, hoping that it would drive me to take a lover. . . ."

"And all the time he was painting his exquisite abstractions. I used to say to him, 'Why don't you live as you paint? If life is a mood, a spiritual gesture, why don't you try to prove it?' But he would only laugh and say, 'You are too pure, Anna. You wear your immaculate pearls around your neck.'

"Then came the war. He was called to his regiment. He spent the last night in Paris drinking in a café."

"He was wounded at the Marne, in one of the first battles of the war. They sent him back to Paris. I went to see him in the hospital. I was with him at the end. . . ."

JUST before he died he opened his eyes and looked at me. He had been out of his mind, but now his mind was clear. 'Anna,' he said, 'you are still pure. . . . You have beaten me. But you can't beat life. It is stronger than you are. Some day you will know what it is to be conquered, to have your soul trampled by passion, as mine has been trampled. You think you are strong. But you are weak. All flesh is weak. Some day you will find out—and I will know. Koko will watch for me and tell me. Koko will be my ambassador.' He died saying, 'You are too pure, Anna, you are too pure.'

"I drove home and swore an oath. Koko heard me. I got down on my knees in front of his cage and swore an oath. 'I will never give in to life. I will never be conquered. I will be what I am now till I die,' and I swore by the crucifix. Koko heard me."

"But—Good God!" said Morel—it was with difficulty that he kept his voice in control; he wanted to shout. "You don't mean to say you'd keep a promise made—a promise like that!"

She said, slowly and distinctly, "You will think I am mad, but I know! I know that the soul of Raoul is in that little beast, Koko. I know it as well as I know that I live. If I broke my vow, he would see. . . . He would know and laugh. . . . I should hear his laugh through eternity, as I used to hear it. . . ."

She had covered her face with her hands. Morel stared at her. He had a feeling that they were both mad. Two mad figures in a room of shadows, with bars of moonlight at the window. But he forced himself to accept the unbelievable, to speak quietly and reasonably of it.

"Even if it were true," he said. "Even if"—he could hardly bring out the sentence—"the spirit of your husband is in that—that animal, as you say it is—aren't you strong enough to defy it? What is it that keeps you bound to your oath but pride?"

"Yes. It is pride. And that pride is the dearest thing in my life. I live for that pride!"

"Anna! You can't—you love me! I'll make you love me!"

"Ah, no! Let me go. . . . Let me go. . . . Gregory. . . ."

But he held her in his arms. And gradually he felt her yielding. Her body relaxed. The words she poured out in protest became more and more confused. . . .

Then he was aware of a small gray shape huddled on the table by the lamp. It was the monkey. How it had got there he didn't know. But there it was, its little eyes brilliant, its teeth bared in a repulsive and shocking grin.

In spite of himself, Gregory grew cold. The strength seemed to go out of his arms. It was only for a moment; but in that moment he knew that he had lost her. She stepped back from him, her slight figure grew tall.

"No. I do not love you. I will never love," she declared.

She was magnificent, proud and serene. He felt utterly hopeless as he looked at her.

"You want me to go?"

"Yes, go."

It seemed to him as if an age passed. He had lost touch with time, with any reality. Then he picked up his hat, said, "It's utter nonsense," and walked out of the house.

When the door had closed on him, Anna turned and bent over Koko, squatting on the table.

"See! I have done it. You beast, you devil—!"

The monkey lost its grin. Its eyes, which had been peering impishly into hers, shifted and glazed. The furry body appeared to shrink in the lamplight.

"Beast! Devil. I have sent him away—I have kept my vow. Beast! Devil—"

GREGORY sat in his armchair in the living-room, with a light beside him. He was neither smoking nor reading. He simply sat there—had sat there for hours, it seemed—struggling against a vague and persistent horror. He had a fearful sense of unreality, as if he had been living a nightmare. The very walls of his house seemed unsubstantial, filmy, letting in the figures of his dream. Anna, with her white face and red mouth. . . . Her husband, an unknown monster, wounded and laughing. . . . The monkey, with its brilliant eyes. . . .

"I must go to bed," he told himself. "I must sleep. It will all be gone and I can be rational tomorrow."

But he knew that it would not be gone. It angered him. It made him furious. He got up and walked about the room, raging. . . . How was it that a man could not fight such things? How was it that such things could be—?

They were not—and yet they were. The whole mad business was a superstition of her mind. Yet, having fixed itself upon her mind, it was real. More real, he knew now, than reality itself.

A line from Shakespeare beat insistently through his brain:

"There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio—"

Then, in the stillness of the late night, he heard a step on his porch and waited, breathless, for the knock that he knew would come. It came. He sprang to the door and opened it.

It was the Spanish woman, Anna's servant. She exclaimed in Spanish:

"Senor, come at once. The Senora wants you."

Gregory did not wait for explanations. He plunged past her, running out of his gate and down the sidewalk—it was only a few steps—to Madame Courbet's gate. The servant ran after him, crying shrill phrases into the air.

He found Anna in a room off the main entrance way. Her bedroom. She was dressed as he had seen her last, but she had let down her hair. It fell below her waist, almost to her knees. Amazing. . . . And she had put around her neck the string of pearls the monkey hated.

She was bending over a box filled with straw. In the box lay the shriveled form of Koko.

She stood erect as he came into the room. She seemed dazed.

"He is dead. Koko is dead. He crawled into his box and died. Very slowly. . . . He was a long time dying. I watched him."

He said, "Anna!" But he did not move toward her. He was afraid to move, almost afraid to speak.

Suddenly she stooped and lifted the box in her arms. "Come! We will go bury Koko. We will dig a grave for him in the garden." And she laughed.

Gregory followed her, walking past the Spanish woman, who stood crossing herself and muttering incoherent prayers. . . .

Then he was in the garden, under the white glare of the moon, and someone was putting a shovel into his hands. That was absurd. A fire-shovel.

He was kneeling by the poinsettia bush, in the moonlight, digging a grave for Anna's husband's soul. No. For the monkey, dead in the box there.

The soil was sandy. It gave easily to his frenzied digging. He must hurry. He must get done with this job. He had helped more than once to dig a trench under shell-fire. It was like that, digging Koko's grave. The same need for haste, the same fear. . . .

The hole was deep enough now. Surely it was deep enough. He spoke to Anna. She lifted the body of the monkey out of the box and gave it to him. It was stiff and cold in his hands. Horrible. . . .

Anna broke a blossom off the poinsettia bush, tore the petals, and dropped them into the grave.

"Adieu, Koko! Little beast—Devil!" she murmured over the grave.

She laughed, uncertainly; and he furiously scraped the dry earth back into the hole, patting it down with the shovel. It was done. He stood up, breathing hard.

Anna put her hand to her forehead, vaguely, as if to brush away a cobweb. The pale mask of her face cleared as a fog clears from the sea when the wind blows.

"My friend—?" she said, in a low tone. "My friend!"

He put his arms around her, gently, as one might touch a person whom one finds walking in a sleep.

"Anna, I love you. I love you!"

She said, "Did I send you away tonight? No, that is something that never happened. Look, I give myself to you. . . . I give everything. I want to be yours, to crush, to drag down, to trample into the earth. . . ."

"Anna!"

The moon was on her face. She was suddenly tender, childlike. Her body was small in his arms. He trembled to touch her. They were both trembling.

"It's all right. . . . It never happened. . . . I love you. . . . It's all right. . . ."

Henry Ford's Jew-Mania

employer that he practically decides whom Mr. Ford shall see in all of these matters that are outside of regular business, and is likely to remain in the room during any conference in which he wishes himself to determine the outcome. I have reason to believe that both Mrs. Ford and Edsel are opposed to the anti-Jew crusade, and have been opposed to it from the beginning, but that Liebold has been furiously in favor of it.

Creech's power is at the New York and Washington end. There was much scrambling between C. C. Daniels, C. W. Smith, Natalie De Bogory and others, when dissension began, as to who was to keep the inside track in the Ford detective work. In the end Creech emerged on top, where he still remains. While Miss De Bogory was in the office of Daniels the Russian connection was more exact, although no more real than it is now. It was through the influence of Creech that Miss De Bogory finally lost her position with Daniels. Her present relations are more closely with the Russian monarchists than they are with the American Jew-baiters.

The sleuth that now comes on our scene is 55-D.

55-D was Paul E. Tuthill. He was on the Daniels-Ford payroll; he also ran an expense account with the organization; and much of his gray matter was spent on literary and dramatic study. Especially he went over the radical magazines with a comb in order to find something to view with alarm. Likewise he kept track of more prominent publications, such as the Nation and the Survey, to see what they were doing to endanger those foundations of society held to be sacred by Brasol, Easley, Leon, and in general by the safe and eminently sane.

In the course of his literary wanderings 55-D found himself in the Rand bookstore in New York. There could be no pleas-anter place for a sleuth seeking expressions which could be viewed with alarm. The bookstore is part of the Rand School, which became a well-known storm center when a famous, or rather notorious, New York legislature was engaged in keeping the world turning safely on its axis. This legislature undertook to prevent duly elected citizens from taking their seats as representatives, because they belonged to a minority party. One of its committees, immortal under the name of the Lusk Committee, made a report in several large volumes, full of warning, rhetoric, and absolute proof that there were contained in the United States a number of liberals and near radicals whose views on the perfect organization of society varied somewhat from those of Mr. Lusk.

PERILOUS among those liberals and near radicals was the Rev. John Haynes Holmes who has already appeared in this series. Mr. Holmes is one of the most popular preachers in New York. I know him well. I frequently speak in his church. I like to compare notes with him. He strikes me as being about as gentle, peaceable, and friendly a soul as I know. His most terrifying belief is that peace is desirable, and that force is not the way to obtain either peace or progress. He regrets force, used as a substitute for persuasion, whether it is used in Moscow or resorted to in Washington.

Mr. 55-D had a somewhat different impression of Mr. Holmes. He deemed him so dangerous that a mere announcement of sermons by him was enough to show the peril lurking in the Rand bookstore. He writes:

"The Rand School bulletin board contains a permanent announcement card of the various lectures and sermons delivered at the Community Church and at the Lyric Theater, situated in a prominent place on said bulletin board.

"Likewise while the undersigned was in the Rand School bookstore he found one of the leaflets of J. H. H. announcing forthcoming lectures. He seems to be popular there."

These scares are imbecile, of course, and would not be worth reporting, except that when the wheels get turning the sense of reality and freedom is gone, and we are on the road that led to the assassination of Rathenau and Erzberger. Much of the Ford information came from this Lusk Committee, and it is all of equal value.

We arrive now at a letter from which we omit a sentence. Our reason for omitting that sentence is characteristic of the whole series. It refers to a relative of Mr. Ford who happened at one time to find himself in an unpopular position. In our opinion this relative did no wrong, and we do not intend to appeal to mob psychology in this or any other case. In this omitted sentence, however, lay the cause that set the Ford sleuths to doing something which I leave to our readers to judge from the point of view of right and wrong.

The letter is addressed to Mr. Ford. It is from an American veteran.

It was written on the stationery of the Army and Navy Union, Brooklyn. The letter runs in part:

"Mr. Henry Ford,
Dearborn, Mich.

"Dear Sir: We read the lines in your Dearborn Independent and note that the main trouble you have is the Jew. Kindly be advised that the Jew is not in the way of any one in the United States, only to the coward and traitor."

Then come the lines in the sentence we omit. The signature is not decipherable, but seems at any rate to be Nath. Fried.

This letter went from Ford's office to Mr. Daniels's office in New York. Within a short time a New York lawyer and payee of Daniels joined the General George A. Custer Garrison No. 2 of the Army and Navy Union, Brooklyn, New York, and shortly thereafter there appeared in Mr. Daniels's files a notice for a meeting of the Garrison, addressed to Paul E. Tuthill, 55-D, Daniels's friend, signed by the same name Fried that was put on the letter to Mr. Ford. Thus the Ford investigator wormed himself into the heart of the organization of war veterans. We find on Fried's invitation to a meeting the words signed by Tuthill: "I will attend this meeting—55-D." 55-D had the right to join the organization of veterans, but was it honorable to do so in order to get into touch with and spy on a fellow member.

Operator 25-H was assigned to the Civil Liberties Union. 25-H is struck by the fact that this organization has as its motto, he says, a phrase credited to Thomas Jefferson, which runs, "It is time enough, for the rightful purpose of civil government, for its officers to interfere when principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order." The detective, in a report dated April 19th, 1921, informs his employer, among other things, that, on the national committee of the union were Jane Addams, Lincoln Colcord, Andrew Furuseth, Arthur Garfield Hays, John Haynes Holmes. He also turns up the fact that Helen Keller is a committee-woman of the Union.

"Charles P. Recht and Frank P. Walsh are often employed as lawyers by the civil Liberties Union," reports 25-H. Even the detective can't bring Walsh into the race he pursues, but he strives to prove that Charles Recht is a Jew.

He says also that the Chicago office of the union is run by H. Austin Simons, and adds, "Simons looks like a Jew and has a Jewish sweetheart."

Likewise 25-H reports that members of the Civil Liberties Union brought about the Congressional committee investigation of the Department of Justice. An increasing number of Americans think Palmer, Garvan, and Dougherty need investigation. Even our good President seems to have left the safe moorings of punishing people for acts and gone over to the camp of those who punish for opinion.

But the mildest exercise of reason offends our detectives. One of them got on the trail of Herbert Hoover. He did not accuse Hoover of being a Jew, but placed him in the class of General Suspects, and so the Ford detective sent to his employers a copy of a speech which Congressman Wood of Indiana had made against the Secretary of Commerce. Some people don't think Hoover radical enough to be dangerous to the extent of needing the attention of Ford detectives.

But such is the nature of persecution.

Next month's article will show how Henry Ford forced his automobile agents to sell his anti-Jewish literature to American citizens. It will contain a lead pencil sketch by Boris Brasol, which will indicate Brasol's belief that Beiliss and two other Jews should have been convicted of murdering a child in order to drink its blood. It will also show that the so-called Russian Embassy in Washington spent money in keeping Russian monarchists busy at their propaganda in this country.

As if across a desk

"New York is calling!" says the operator in San Francisco. And across an entire continent business is transacted as if across a desk.

Within arm's length of the man with a telephone are 70,000 cities, towns and villages connected by a single system. Without moving from his chair, without loss of time from his affairs, he may travel an open track to any of those places at any time of day or night.

In the private life of the individual the urgent need of instant and personal long distance communication is an emergency that comes infrequently—but it is imperative when it does come. In the business life of the nation it is a constant necessity. Without telephone service as Americans know it, industry and commerce could not operate on their present scale. Fifty per cent more communications are transmitted by telephone than by mail. This is in spite of the fact that each telephone communication may do the work of several letters.

The pioneers who planned the telephone system realized that the value of a telephone would depend upon the number of other telephones with which it could be connected. They realized that to reach the greatest number of people in the most efficient way a single system and a universal service would be essential.

By enabling a hundred million people to speak to each other at any time and across any distance, the Bell System has added significance to the motto of the nation's founders: "In union there is strength."

The Wonder World to Come

cloudy days that I began to wonder whether I could not set off certain electrical discharges that would travel through the air and be felt a short distance. The first time I tried, the discharges were felt a hundred miles away. Then I knew I had something. I could see the vision of electricity traveling by wireless around the world."

The more one sees of great inventors and great discoverers, the more one becomes impressed with the fact that an important part of such greatness is the ability to observe little things, and to speculate as to why mysterious things happen. The little things oftentimes seem the most important. It is as if great scientific possibilities always leave the tips of their tails out. The great scientists and the great inventors are the ones who see the single hair, wonder what it is attached to, and trace it to the main trunk. The earth must be strewn with clues—clues to all the inventions and discoveries that are to come—but most of us walk over them and through them without seeing. If it were not for the sharp-sighted and the inquisitive—particularly the inquisitive—we should get nowhere. Fate often plays a part, of course, as she did when she shut off the sun and made Marconi think.

MARCONI sees a certain danger to the world in the great progress that he expects during the next half-century.

"The conditions of life will be made so easy," he said, "that if people are not careful they will deteriorate. People work now because they are compelled to do so to earn a living—and it is good for them to work. But it will not much longer be necessary for a person to work more than a fraction of his time to earn a living. Then will come the danger of deterioration."

This brings up a very interesting question. Marconi says that science and invention will within the next half-century transform the world, making it a much better place in which to live.

"What do you mean by 'better'?" I asked him.

"I mean," he replied, "a place in which our control over natural forces will make life here safer, easier, and more enjoyable."

But if a scientist, fifty years ago, had declared that the invention of the telephone, electric light, the motor and the dynamo, the moving picture and the phonograph, the airplane, and the radio would transform the world, could we have doubted the result if we had believed the prophecy?

These inventions have, in a sense, transformed the world, it is true. But are people, as a whole, any happier? Does any young man say to his aged grandfather, "You should have been a young man now instead of sixty years ago?" Does any grandfather say to his grandson: "I regret that I did not live in your world when I was a boy. You are so much happier than I was in my world?"

What is the truth? Is it impossible materially to increase the value of human life as measured in the things that satisfy?

Has the electric light done little more than light factories so that men may work at night? Has the telephone only speeded up business so that men may work harder and create more wealth? Has the electric motor done little more than draw larger street cars into which more persons may be packed? Have any of these things materially increased the satisfactions of life? Have science and invention served chiefly to promote commercial ends?

AT FIRST glance it would seem so. Happiness is the only real test of the value of life, and the people as a whole are probably no happier than they were in George Washington's time. Science and invention, in serving chiefly commercialism, have brought the people more comforts, but comforts are of value only in removing discomforts. If a man is sitting on a knotty rail fence, he will find it more comfortable to move to a heavily upholstered chair. But an upholstered chair can make no man happy. At best it can only prevent him from longer enduring a certain kind of misery. Happiness is positive, not negative. It does not consist of an absence of anything. It can consist only of the presence of something—the presence of a state of mind, to be exact.

Was the world transformed by the scientific and inventive achievements of the last half-century without materially improving the mass state of mind? Are the discoveries and inventions that Marconi expects to come about during the next fifty years to leave general happiness no greater than it is? Is the world merely to be cleared of more discomforts—and perhaps be threatened with racial deterioration as the result of decreased necessity to work?

LET US analyze this situation a little. Perhaps we may be able to discover why human happiness, as a whole, was not materially increased by the achievements of the last fifty years. Is it not partly because the people have had but a limited opportunity to enjoy the things that modern achievements have created? How much increased is the happiness of the man to whom the application of electricity to transportation means only that he can ride to and from his work in an electric train and live twenty miles from his job instead of but a mile? He dislikes every foot of the twenty-mile ride.

But whose life would not be happier if he were in a position fully to enjoy all that science and invention have already made possible? There are excellent ships, running to all parts of the world—but the great majority never see them. America alone is a wealth of natural beauty—that only a few see. Motor boating is fine, automobiling is a great pleasure, and a good radio-telephone is a delight—but most persons never have any of them. And if all persons had these things they could not enjoy them without doing much less work—and Marconi fears that if we work less we shall deteriorate.

What is work? Is it making pig-iron?

Is it digging ditches? Is it driving a street car or plowing a field? These things are work—but they are also drudgery. Who need fear deterioration because he ceases to dig ditches or perform any of these tasks? Did any of these tasks ever develop anybody—make him a brainier man with a finer nature? Do we ask for our best-developed examples of the human species among those who do the bulk of the world's work? Does not desirable development come to those—and only those—whose work enables them to express themselves? Who ever expressed anything beautiful in his nature by driving a truck?

I ventured to differ from Marconi, but he held to his ground. It is ground that bears the footprints of centuries. The idea that he uttered was an old idea. I have heard Edison say the same thing, many times. From one point of view it is true. Work keeps bad men from being bad. It keeps mischievous persons out of mischief. But so does chloroform.

MARCONI was asked to consider a line of reasoning that might account for the fact that unflagging industry appears to be good for people. The reasoning followed this line: Man was born upon an inhospitable planet. The struggle for existence was intense. In the course of thousands of years he learned how to work, but he did not learn how to play—to employ leisure in a rational manner. When brief moments of leisure came to him he did not know what to do. He was as unprepared for recreation as he would have been unprepared for work if he had loafed since he came out of savagery. A certain familiarity with leisure is necessary to its best use. Marconi is not compelled to work for a living; nor are Edison, Madame Curie, Sir Oliver Lodge, Camille Flammarion and many others that might be mentioned. Such persons prefer to use their leisure in a profitable manner. They play when they want to and then go back to work, which is more play.

These men and women, it is true, are highly developed specimens. Few are prepared to follow in their footsteps. But we are all prepared, to a certain degree, to follow them in one particular. We have something useful in us that we should like to express. We should like to make a living while expressing it. That is what men and women are doing who say they like to work. Marconi was told that it was not difficult to understand why he likes to work when his work consists, to a considerable degree, in sailing the Seven Seas in his own yacht and taking note of the phenomena that he runs across. It is work worth doing, and such men as he are the only ones who can do it; but the world is for all of us and life is for all of us, and just as surely as the way to learn how to swim is to get into the water, the way to learn how to use leisure is to have leisure to use. If the necessity for working at all were suddenly removed, we should doubtless have trouble, but the amount of time in which we may do what we like and thus express our real selves should be constantly increased. Otherwise, how can science and invention, however they may transform the world commercially, do much to increase the value of human life?

Marconi listened with attention. His mind did not appear to be inhospitable to the reasoning advanced, but he seemed rather to prefer his own conclusion.

Marconi is quite a different type from any that one sees in America. He has a refinement of manner that we shall some time attain but have not yet reached. He is temperamentally so elusive that it is difficult for a stranger to feel that he has a clear view of his mind.

As a close observer, and as a curious, inquisitive person, Marconi is in a very small class.

How many persons know, for instance, whether an automobile seems to make the most noise when it is approaching a listener or going away from him—or is there no apparent difference in the noise?

If there is an apparent difference, how many who have observed it have given a serious moment to reflection as to the cause of the difference?

MARCONI is an expert on noises—on sound. He has an ear that is remarkably acute; made so, probably, by long years of listening to small vibrations in a telephone receiver. He has observed that there is an apparent difference in the amount of noise that an automobile makes on different occasions, and that the noise appears to be the greatest when the machine is approaching the listener.

Marconi not only noted this apparently insignificant fact, but immediately began to speculate as to why it appeared to be so. Always alert to anything new concerning the laws that govern the traveling of sound-waves, he turned the matter over in his mind.

If Marconi were not employed as a scientist and an inventor, he would make a great teacher. He knows the importance of noting little things and speculating as to the cause of those that he can not explain.

Also, Marconi has great patience. One can see that in his eyes. Think of sticking a lifetime to wireless, gaining instead of losing interest the while! He feels that the wireless art is yet in its infancy, and as its father he is doing his utmost to speed it on its way toward full development.

Notwithstanding Marconi's belief that we must keep at work to keep sweet, he is a great optimist. It is not that he has a blind faith in progress. He speaks rather as one who tells of what he sees coming—of what is already within his view. What he says seems to be prophecy, but he considers it simply as advance information from one who happens to be able to see certain approaching developments before they are apparent to the rest of us.

Centuries used to come and go with everything pretty much the same, but the human mind has at last got under way. The radio came yesterday. What will come tomorrow? Marconi believes we are so close to a number of things that any one of them may come through at any time.

Do you want to keep up with scientific thought? Then you will want to read Allan L. Benson's next article on the Radio in Hearst's International for November.

Married Once But Lovers Now

To Marge, who had anticipated no danger of encountering her godmother, this fact became at once apparent. To the left of the entrance sat the latter and Dicky-Bird, at the very table she and Dicky-Bird had always looked upon as their own.

Into her mind—the mind of a woman who had shaken herself free from the shackles of sex—crept the traitor thought, "He might have chosen another table!" But aloud, she said to her companion, "Please change seats with me."

This placed her with her back to the tête-à-tête at the other end of the room. She might still, if she chose, watch it, for she now faced a mirror.

Her eyes went frequently to the mirror. . . . They were tremendously self-absorbed, utterly oblivious of their surroundings.

"I," reproached the Village psychoanalyst's velvety voice, "fear that you are not listening."

"I beg your pardon," admitted Marge. "Something has changed you!" he told her. "I am psychic, I can feel it. In you the physical has suddenly awakened; you are electric with it."

He was deliberately wooing her—physically. He paused, irritated by the knowledge that her attention had again escaped him. She was staring at the mirror. Her godmother had stretched one playful shapely forefinger toward Richard. As she did so she smiled and spoke a command. Even if she had shouted it Marge could not have heard above the hubbub that the business of serving made. And yet she knew what was said.

"Kiss it!" the siren had commanded.

And Richard, after the briefest of hesitation, had obeyed.

In that particular place few gave such an incident a second thought. Marge had watched them many times, always amused. But she was not amused now. She thrust her chair back and rose, without conscious volition.

She left the restaurant without a plan. As she walked north, with even swifter step than usual, one came to her. She would go to the apartment, she would remove every last vestige of her personal effects, and she would send a moving van for her furniture—

Balzac was at home. He rose and stretched himself.

"Oh, my eye!" he said, cordially. "If you had seen what I've seen—"

Marge, ignoring him, saw enough. Across the foot of her bed was a pair of Richard's trousers, under it a pair of his shoes. She cast them out into the hall and then began to pack, in a very delirium of haste. She dragged out her trunk, pulled out bureau drawers and transferred the contents of these without care, higgledy-piggledy.

Presently a key clicked in the front door. Richard entered alone.

"Hello!" said he. And then he added quickly, "What's the big idea?"

Marge fought to keep her voice cool, impersonal. "I'm leaving you. That was the understanding, remember. Without question—"

Richard gazed at her until her eyes fell. Then, "So I recall!" he said, coolly.

He passed along the hall. She heard him in his own room and then in the kitchen, drawing a glass of water. She had not quite expected this. She turned, grabbed up a last armful of clothing and thrust it into the trunk. Then she struggled to close the lid.

"Let me do that for you," suggested Richard, from the doorway.

"If you say one word," threatened Marge, "I'll throw this at you!"

"This" was a book.

"Don't be a little idiot," he began.

The book left her hand and, let those who libel a woman's aim take witness, it struck him full on the forehead. He paused on the threshold an instant, absolutely glaring at her, and then, for the first time during their married life, he entered her room.

"Go out!" she commanded wildly.

Nevertheless he came on. She retreated until the physical limits of the room brought her to a standstill and then she struck out at him and would have slapped him, had he not caught her wrists.

"No, you don't!" he said, grimly. "I've taken everything else you've handed me but there's a limit."

"You needn't think I didn't see you!" she flashed, breathlessly. "Sitting at our—our own table with that woman—"

"I saw you—or rather she did—sitting with that damned long-haired psychoanalyst," he flashed back.

"If you're trying to play innocent and injured don't bother. I found your trousers and your shoes in this room—"

"I slept here last night—"

"I know you did!"

"Because," he went on hotly, "I've been sleeping rotten for a long time. That damned cubby-hole you stowed me into hasn't a breath of air in it."

"Oh!" said Marge, faintly.

This was lame, but she felt suddenly let down—and afraid. He looked so hard, so terrifyingly masculine in his anger.

"I'm glad," he added, "that it's come to a showdown."

He freed her wrists then. There were marks of his fingers on them, but neither saw them. He still glared at her as she, evading his eyes, saw him search his pockets. One by one he brought out certain articles, a small lumpy package, a long legal-looking envelope and a much smaller envelope. He tucked the envelopes under his arm and opened the package. The outer wrapping disclosed two smaller jewelers' boxes. He snapped them open.

In one was a plain platinum band, in the other a solitaire in a platinum setting.

He placed them on her bureau and opened the legal-looking envelope.

"I've bought a house," he said, his voice still vibrant with that curious finality. "It was to be a Christmas present to you—with the rings."

This she did not answer. She watched Richard pick up the rings and move as if to restore them to his pocket.

"You—you kissed her finger!"

"She told me to," he explained. "Because—" He paused, and suddenly remembering the smaller envelope, handed it to her. "She told me to give you this note."

Marge took it. It was addressed, plainly, to Mrs. Richard Lee. But she opened it, nevertheless, and apparently with no compunctions, and read:

Dear Child:

I'm scribbling this, hastily, in the restaurant you just left in such a hurry. And I'm hoping—many things. One is that the emancipated woman does not differ, after all, from Eve, that even nowadays one touch of jealousy still makes all women kin. And if what I hope is so, I should be an intruder if I returned to your apartment now. Will you have my things in readiness for a messenger who will come for them presently?

And that's all, except this: May you live happily forever after, or better still, may the inevitable quarrels but serve, like a thunderstorm, to clear the domestic atmosphere. That's the wish of her who is now, I hope, justified in signing herself,

Your fair godmother.

P. S. Having him kiss my finger was the inspiration of the moment. He was surprised—but he is quick-witted for a man.

Marge read this through twice.

"What did she say?" demanded Richard.

"Nothing—much," murmured Marge.

And then, almost against her will, she looked up at him, exquisitely shy. His eyes widened at what he saw.

"Marge!" he breathed.

In his voice now there was the age-old note that is ever new, and in spite of herself, Marge thrilled to it.

"Let's," she suggested, breathlessly, "go out and see—the house."

The light in his eyes all but blinded her, but she knew that he was offering her the rings. She hesitated and then, blushing to her pretty ears she held out her finger.

"You put them on, Dicky-Bird."

"Don't ever call me that again," he said, sharply. "I hate it."

She looked up, momentarily surprised.

"I—I won't, Richard." And then, swiftly and in spite of herself, she added, "You—you didn't care for her? At all? I—"

The rest of that was left unspoken. He crushed the words back against her lips. And thereupon Balzac rose and stretched luxuriously.

"Well," said he. "There's that!"

They planned to move him out to Westchester with them but he met a cat from the Village and—

THAT was the opinion, in fact it was the consensus of many and varied opinions which greeted the A. D. S. pioneers when they said they would eventually produce a dentifrice that would become first in the mouths and minds of the American public.

But, expert as the people were who gave these opinions, they did not know the calibre of the men they felt obliged to discourage.

Fifteen years ago this same A. D. S., the American Druggists Syndicate, was a very small organization of determined men banded together with little more than an idea. The idea was that the small druggists of this country could, with faith, coöperation and hard work, get together and make their own products to sell in their own stores. They would become independent of the undesirable manufacturers and jobbers who were in those days dominating the retail drug industry and sacrificing the little drug store 'round the corner.

Since then they have overcome every kind of opposition that big, powerful, aggressive competitors could put in their paths and have grown to an organization of 26,000 members. Every member is part owner, and sells his own merchandise, in his own store to his own customers. They collectively own four big factories, over a million dollars in tangible cash assets and owe not a dollar to the banks.

All this from the efforts of plain business men like your druggist and mine in the neighborhood store. They built on an iron clad policy of protecting the customer first.

Men like these see romance in such prosaic matters as tooth paste.

They knew from experience gathered in their own 26,000 stores that something better than the dentifrices then on the market could be produced. When the skeptics said it couldn't be done they smiled a little, sent their own chemists to their laboratories and said, figuratively—Watch us.

The fight with the problem was not easy. It brought heart-aches and head-aches. It brought days, nights and months of long weary hours spent in the big laboratory in Long Island City when success seemed to knock at the door and refused to enter.

But success came. It came in the early hours of a Spring morning when the sun was shaming the electric bulbs. It came in the form of a wonderful combination of ingredients based upon an application of the cleansing and germicidal action of oxygen which, when used properly, cleanses the most secretive corners of the teeth and gums. With the combination, there are other ingredients, gentle in action but highly efficient in removing film.

It was a wonderful day for the A. D. S. when the Chemist in Chief walked into the office of President C. H. Goddard and announced simply, "We have found it." And Goddard knew that it was found, that there was not an iota of doubt, because this quiet, soft-spoken man of science had said so.

It was then that the series of tests began—tests so exhaustive in thoroughness as to amaze the layman at the earnestness of this unique organization.

When it was proved to every one within the organization that this dentifrice would cleanse every available crevice in a tooth and that it would help to keep the gums healthy, it also had to be proved that it had no suspicion of grit that might injure even delicate enamel. Along with these advantages it had to leave a pleasing taste in the mouth of the user, and, just as important, it had to flow freely from the tube, to insure economy to the last brush full.

That was the ideal set by the A. D. S.

To make a long story short—they proved these points. They proved them even to the satisfaction of their own skeptics. Office boys, factory girls, executives, even the president himself were used as subjects for try-outs. One or two trials were not enough. They extended over periods of months.

Nor were private opinions allowed to influence judgment of results. Only the white, shining, healthy teeth were entered as evidence. And they furnished brilliant testimony in every mouth which was tested.

When congratulations were tendered officially to the Chief Chemist his reply was characteristic of his profession.

"All the credit," he said, "belongs to the basic products we use for our Chlor-E-Dixo—they are mild agents that good doctors have been using for years as mouth antiseptics. Our achievement was simply the combination of these into an ideal tooth paste."

It is one matter to satisfy people who know you, of the worthiness of a product you make, but it is another matter entirely to satisfy the general public. So these 26,000 men who own the A. D. S. set about the task with their usual thoroughness. They relied chiefly upon the ability of the American public, who have the finest teeth of any people in the world, to judge for themselves.

Without any of the usually expensive preliminary advertising, thousands of tubes of this new tooth paste were given away free of charge. Men, women and children in all walks of life received samples.

In every case possible the recipient was asked to use it and give an honest opinion. Frankness without reservation was invited. In many cases, the A. D. S. druggist who was giving away the tube did not let his customer know that he had more than the usual interest in the dentifrice.

It was the impressive shoal of letters from the American public telling of healthy white teeth as a result of Chlor-E-Dixo which convinced the A. D. S. that they were right in trusting to public judgment. These letters came from all parts of the country, from people in every station in life. From hundreds who could afford a more expensive tooth paste, and from other hundreds whose circumstances compelled close economy.

Though these people represented thousands of families and would make a total requiring many cyphers, it was only a small part of the hundred and ten million people of the United States.

How to get the story across to the great majority was another problem until some one thought of the actors and moving picture stars. If such people, the most particular in the world, when choosing toilet preparations, were to become convinced that Chlor-E-Dixo was among the best tooth pastes to be found it would be wonderful advertising value for the A. D. S.

Audiences of millions see their smiling teeth every day. Thousands of people follow their leads in toilet preparations.

Therefore, Chlor-E-Dixo was given this supreme test.

A list of actors and actresses whose talent was combined with charm of appearance was sent an ordinary trial tube. They were invited to give it a trial and though they were also asked to give an expression as to results there was not much hope of these busy people being able to comply. Every hour of their day is filled.

Along went a week, two weeks and nothing happened. There was no surprise or disappointment. Nothing better was expected. But imagine the joy in the A. D. S. offices when letters from the Pacific Coast began to trickle in. The first one was clutched and opened with eager anticipation. Then more came. Then more. Before the end of the month the greater part of all the actors and actresses written to had answered.

Summed up they said that Chlor-E-Dixo had scored a smashing victory. It began to look as if it were to become the favorite dentifrice of the profession.

Here is what they said—in their own words:

The Chemist in Chief walked into the Office of the President and announced simply, "We have found it."

Hope Hampton

"Night and morning when an acid mouth will do much damage to the teeth, I brush my teeth with Chlor-E-Dixo Tooth Paste. It keeps them pearly white."

Pearl White

"Chlor-E-Dixo is my choice because I know it is the tooth paste for an acid mouth and also that it never hardens in the tube."

Anne Luther

"I use Chlor-E-Dixo and strongly recommend it to all my friends. I find it most refreshing, leaving a pleasant taste, keeping gums firm and teeth white."

Carmel Myers

"I have never found anything to equal Chlor-E-Dixo Tooth Paste as a cleanser and as a pleasing mouth antiseptic. It has proved valuable."

Rockcliffe Fellows

"I have never found anything equal to Chlor-E-Dixo Tooth Paste as a cleanser and as a mouth antiseptic. It keeps my mouth in fine condition."

Alice Terry

"I use Chlor-E-Dixo Tooth Paste because it leaves a most refreshing taste in the mouth and always keeps my gums in perfect condition."

Dorothy Phillips

"I use Chlor-E-Dixo Tooth Paste regularly night and morning because it keeps my teeth pearly white which is so essential in my profession."

Oscar Shaw

"I consider the care of my teeth of utmost importance and I give it the most careful consideration, so I use Chlor-E-Dixo Tooth Paste."

As the A. D. S. druggists displayed
CHLOR-E-DIXO

With success comes success. Now that users of Chlor-E-Dixo with teeth unusually white even for actors are being flashed on screens throughout the country, more and more people are adopting it every day. The 26,000 drug store men of the A. D. S. are explaining its advantages to their customers. Sales are growing by leaps and bounds. Even those who said it couldn't be done are admitting they were wrong.

There is another story behind Chlor-E-Dixo which your A. D. S. druggist 'round the corner will enjoy telling you the next time you drop in. It is a story about price. Ask him to tell you what a tooth paste of this quality would cost you per tube if it were not for the grand scheme of co-operative effort behind it. It might mean only a few cents per tube to you, but to him it is a big victory in the drug store business. Ask him about it.

Partners Again

MAWRUSS—The gasoline we admit, but blowouts? Say, who told you to drive on streets where there's laying around beer bottles?

In the end the partners decide to give up the agency of the Schenckmann Six.

MARKS—But what am I going to tell the Schenckmann Company?

ABE—When Mrs. Sammett goes we will tell you what you can tell them.

MARKS—Well, Rabiner, this is a nice thing you are doing for your old friends.

MAWRUSS—Speak for yourself, Markie, not us. If the Schenckmann Six is no good we want to know about it, and we are much obliged to Rabiner for telling us.

MOZART—Maybe I could have been a bit more considerate of you boys.

MAWRUSS—That's all right, Mozart. Whatever you have lost, we will see it is made good.

ABE—Come, Markie, don't look so rachmonos. You could easy find somebody to take the agency of the Schenckmann Six.

MARKS—But I don't want to find anybody else. I want to get from under myself, and I would do it, too, if you boys would keep the agency for a month.

MAWRUSS—Another month? No, we wouldn't keep it for another hour. Every minute, every second, something is happening to them Schenckmann Sixes.

ABE—And he expects that we should sit here for another month while all over New York springs is breaking, tires is blowing up, batteries are dying, and we've got to be the undertakers yet.

MOZART—Why don't you get them the agency for a decent car?

MARKS—That's what I want to do. Listen, boys. In a month at the latest there is going to be a car marketed which will revolutionize the automobile business.

MARKS launches into an enthusiastic description of the new car, its engine designed by a high-class inventor, and about to be vouched for by an expert assigned by Feldman, the partners' own attorney. The conference is interrupted by Officer Miller, patrolman on the beat, to complain that Marks's car has been left too near the fire hydrant. Marks and Rabiner depart, all having agreed to resume the discussion of Marks's project at one o'clock, when he will produce inventor and expert despite Abe's "Inventor! Expert! Ai, tzuris!" Officer Miller waits to give another bit of information, which is that the partners' handsome, honest-eyed frank-voiced foreman is a former pick-pocket, discharged seven or eight years ago from the Elmira Reformatory.

MAWRUSS (summing up the morning's findings)—Well, Abe, when you pick 'em, you certainly pick 'em right. For a car you pick a wheelbarrow and for a foreman you pick a pickpocket.

But these two soft-hearted employers cannot bring themselves to discharge their accused foreman, though Mawruss at first strongly urges it. Then comes Rosie, called always fondly by Abe, "Mommer," followed soon by Tillie Friedman, a cousin by marriage of the senior partner. Tillie's daughter, Hattie, has come with them. She is no longer the awkward little girl with the crooked teeth that Abe remembered. Her grace and beauty are enough to disturb even the seldom susceptible Mawruss out of his almost never-failing poise. Hattie is engaged on the spot as stenographer, receiving as her first assignment the task of hiding behind the screen with her notebook when the partners take up again at one o'clock Marks's project of the new car and the new company. Rosie and Tillie have gone, Marks and Rabiner returned, with Bates, the inventor, and Gibbs, the expert. Abe's instructions to Hattie were to "go behind the screen there and just put down what you think would sound favorable to us if it ever comes to a show-down in a bankruptcy office." (It was in a bankruptcy office that Hattie had formerly been employed). Bates praises his new engine, Gibbs indorses it, Mawruss and Rabiner are impressed, but Abe holds back. A hunch warns him not to go in.

MOZART—You mean to say these gentlemen don't know what they are talking about?

ABE—I don't mean to say anything. They know automobiles, but they don't know me. Some people, if they get shot with a gun, the bullet is made of gold and it hits them in the pocket, but with my luck, a strong swimmer could drown from a hot-water bag busting.

After further unavailing discussion the others leave, to get the new scheme immediately under way. Bates is delayed, gathering together his papers and drawings. The junior member of the firm fires a shot:

MAWRUSS—Any swimmer that can drown from a hot-water bag should try his luck in the sink.

ABE (disconsolate)—Ai, that's the way it goes. For years and years you work to get where you are, and when you get there where are you? (He takes his hat and calls the new stenographer.)

HATTIE—Yes, Mr. Potash.

ABE—Bring your pad and come with me to Feldman's office.

HATTIE—Then you have changed your mind?

ABE—I ain't changed my mind. I ain't got no mind. I lost it when I went into business with Mawruss Perlmutter. I wish I was dead—God forbid! (Dan has just come in.)

HATTIE—Dan says that your record of the sales are just as incomplete as your gas sales.

MAWRUSS—In future, Dan, if you have something to say like you said to Miss Friedman, tell us and not her.

Dan goes out but returns suddenly to find the office empty, except for Bates, who is still fumbling papers on Abe's desk.

DAN—Dumbwaiter Joel! What are you doing here!"

But Dan does not give Bates away. He insists he is now on the level, and the two men work together in the shop, while in the office the partners and Hattie are busy selling stock in the new company. The collapse of the Schenckmann was utter and complete, its end marked by a suit for $8,000 brought against the manufacturer. On the day that the first model of the new car is to be assembled and exhibited, while Abe, Mawruss, and Hattie are busy with correspondence, one item of which has been a bitter letter to one Small, dictated by Mawruss and returning a proffered check for $200 with the stinging information that the firm is making automobiles, not shoe-laces, Marks Pasinski and Mozart Rabiner enter, in a state of great and delighted excitement.

MARKS—Boys, boys, we've got great news for you!

MOZART—This is the best yet.

MARKS—I never thought we could put it over, but we did.

MAWRUSS (impatient)—All right, all right. Cut it for aces low. Only tell us what it is. Nobody gets heart trouble from good news.

MARKS—Well, who do you think is coming here?

MAWRUSS—Lloyd George. No. Charlie Chaplin. No. We should know who is coming. Tell us.

MARKS—Schenckmann.

ABE—And what should we do, hire a brass band? Four of his rotten cars we got on hand now, and $8,000 we had to pay back to our old competitors.

MAWRUSS—Never mind; as soon as Feldman's clerks can serve him with the summons we'll make that rosher pay up.

ABE—He's hiding on us. Them summons servers had been laying for him day and night, and so far they ain't succeeded in even seeing him.

MAWRUSS—It's all right; they'll get him yet. He ain't got a defense in the world and he's good for any judgment.

MARKS—But boys, you don't know what Schenckmann is coming for.

ABE—And we don't want to know. A highwayman, a robber! Let him come. I'll kick him out.

MARKS—Now I got to laugh—ha, ha! Maybe you'd drop this out, too.

MAWRUSS—What's this?

ABE—It's a check for a hundred thousand dollars.

MOZART—Yes, and he's coming around in half an hour to watch the assembling of the Climax Four, and if he's satisfied with it he'll invest nine hundred thousand more.

INTO this tense atmosphere, while the partners are waiting the arrival of Schenckmann and the assembling of the Climax Four, Rosie and Tillie inopportunely project themselves, Tillie shedding torrents of tears because of the fact that Dan has been calling every evening to see Hattie. Tillie has other plans for Hattie's future, and Abe must do his duty.

DAN (whom he has summoned)—You want me, Mr. Potash?

MAWRUSS (unstrung by Tillie's tears, which have begun to flow again)—Come, Rosie, take her outside and dry her off.

PETER B. KYNE'S

Great Novel of California as a GIFT

HERE is one of the year's greatest books offered to you without charge while it is still a best-seller. It is a book that will live—that you can read today and again ten years from now with equal enjoyment and inspiration—but we want you to have it now while it is being discussed as one of the significant books of our generation. So we are making the usual offer described below for securing a copy.

The PRIDE of PALOMAR

IT'S a glorious fight that an American—and one with Celtic ancestors!—will make to defend his home against invaders. Don Mike's story in "The Pride of Palomar" is full of romance and amazing courage and bluff, but aside from the fascination of the story itself, the book brings you face to face with the big problem of the American West today—the Japanese question. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., says of it, "I believe it to be a volume that will not improbably have a direct bearing on future legislation, as a few other great books have had on past legislation. Almost certainly it is one of the present-day books that future generations will read and love."

How to Get the Book

Send us the subscription of a friend to Hearst's INTERNATIONAL Magazine and we will send you a copy of this book. The subscription must be other than your own as we do not give premiums. Enclose remittance at the rate of $3.00 per subscription—you may send in more than one and we will send you a book for each.

Abe and Dan are at length left alone, and Abe begins the ordeal by offering Dan a cigar. When he admits that somebody has been advising the partners to get rid of their foreman, Abe is startled by Dan's admission that this is not the first place he has lost for the same reason. Dan is still more startled by the information that it is not his prison record to which objection is now made.

ABE—Say, say, all this we knew three months ago.

DAN—You knew it three months ago! And you never said anything!

ABE—Say, what is vorbei is vorbei.

DAN—And you let me go on working here when you knew I was an ex-convict?

ABE—What you used to was don't concern us.

DAN (rising)—I'm not good at thanking people, but I hope there'll come a time when I'll be able to show you how I feel toward you and Mr. Perlmutter.

ABE—Don't mention it.

DAN (resuming his seat)—I won't. And now what am I getting fired for this time?

ABE—Who said you are getting fired?

DAN—Well, what am I getting—a raise?

ABE—If you work hard the way you have done you'll get a raise before long, but just now you're getting a call-down.

When the facts are brought forward, Dan insists that he and Hattie are merely good friends.

DAN—Hattie and I have a good time talking over things.

ABE—Now, listen, Dan, don't throw me no bluffs. Even if you took a dictionary along, in three nights you'd get talked out.

HATTIE (who has been summoned into the presence of Mr. Potash to help him prove to Dan that his accusations are well grounded)—What is it, Mr. Potash?

ABE—Now, Hattie, in the first place, I suppose you know that this young feller has been calling on you night after night?

HATTIE—I ought to—I was there.

ABE—And you have a lot to say?

HATTIE—We should have! We were both there!

ABE—Then he has told you all about himself?

HATTIE—He has.

ABE—See, what did I tell you? Why, no sensible girl in her right mind would take any chances on marrying a man like you.

DAN—Mr. Potash, for heaven's sake, don't go any further! There hasn't been the slightest idea of such a thing.

ABE—Hasn't there? Well, there's going to be right here and now. Hattie, I want to ask you black on white: would you consider such a thing as marrying a feller like this young feller?

HATTIE—But he has never asked me.

ABE—Did I ask you if he asked you?

HATTIE—But how can I answer you, unless he did ask me?

ABE—All right, ask her.

DAN—But, Mr. Potash, you don't understand.

ABE—I understand everything. If you don't ask her, I'll ask her for you. Speak up, Hattie. Nobody's going to blame you for throwing him down. Now then, what's your answer? You ain't going to marry him, are you?

HATTIE—Yes.

ABE—You mean, yes, you ain't.

HATTIE (throwing herself into Dan's outstretched arms)—I mean, yes, I am, I will.

In gratitude to Abe and in sympathy for his dismay at the sudden overturning of his plans, Dan brings out his beloved bottle of patent fuel.

ABE—Say, put that away before I smash it.

DAN—Don't smash it; it's your last chance. Your only hope is to stake us to a few hundred dollars' worth of furniture in exchange for a half-interest in this.

ABE—I wouldn't give you ten cents for a whole interest in it.

DAN—Why not? You're protected. I've got a patent on it from Washington. Right now it is being considered by all the big oil people.

But again Abe can be nothing but gentle. He gives the young couple a check for $500 on the pledge that they will not get married for at least three months, and that they will say nothing about their engagement, "especially" to Hattie's mother, in the meantime.

DAN—And shall I write you a formal assignment of your half-interest?

ABE—Don't write nothing. For that machshovos your word is sufficient.

BUT all these things, terrible as they are, make but the beginnings of Abe's troubles. The great Schenckmann comes; Abe is almost successful in avoiding all errors of conversation. The lawsuit against Schenckmann is forgotten. But a young man enters hastily, supposed to be the awaited expert, and in the midst of the hearty introductions, captained by Abe himself, the young man turns out to be the process-server, and lays firmly and fondly into the palm of Schenckmann's outstretched hand, the long-avoided summons. There is a furious storm. Schenckmann departs in a rage, followed by Rabiner and Marks.

Abe descends again to the depths of anguish, and Mawruss again blames him for all their disasters: "If you was a partner in the Otis Elevator Company it would be a dumbwaiter." But Schenckmann returns, soothed by his two companions. Abe and Mawruss convince him of their good intentions. Mawruss tears the hated summons to bits. But just before the new car is rolled in, another unwelcome stranger arrives, in the person of Smith, a detective, who brands Bates as a crook, and declares the whole enterprise to be fraudulent from top to bottom. Bates breaks away, followed furiously by Dan.

PASINSKY—Ai! Abie! Ai! Mawruss! I'm bankrupt! Ruined!

MAWRUSS (to Abe, after all have gone)—Well, Abe, what do you think of your foreman now? Locks the safe after the horse has flown away.

ABE—But, Mawruss, the boy acted to me like my own son.

MAWRUSS—Your own son! A pick-pocket! a crook! And for such a swindler you do everything and your own partner you don't give a damn about. Such a tender heart you got. We was garment operators ten years ago and we got over it, he says. Well, we'll be garment operators again. We are ruined—bankrupt.

ABE—Mawruss, why did you drag me into this?

MAWRUSS—Why? Why do I do everything, Abe? To make a living for me and you so your family and my family could have some of the little pleasures out of life. And now that things have gone wrong you act like I would have robbed you.

ABE—But listen, Mawruss—

MAWRUSS—For twenty-five years now I've been working night and day to get you somewhere—to make you somebody—and you've held back. Something didn't suit you. This wasn't right. That wasn't right. For twenty-five years you've been a grindstone around my neck and at last you've got me down—and out. I hope you're satisfied.

ABE (in deepest dejection)—All right, Mawruss, you said enough. I guess you're right. I lost my nerve. I'll go back to East Broadway—or an old man's home. Get yourself another partner—a good, live, up-to-date fellow that can keep up with you. I ain't got it in me no more. I'm through.

MAWRUSS (pacing the floor)—Listen, Abe. After all, what's the use of talking like that? We all make mistakes. You must remember we've been partners twenty-five years. After twenty-five years (tenderly) a partner ain't only a partner. He's (hesitating) a habit. Of course I could swear off from a habit—like you—but it is not so easy to do that. Say, I could go into business for myself, but we're so used to each other now—and—who the hell am I going to fight with?

SIX WEEKS later the entire group is herded into the sumptuous chambers of the United States Commissioner, before whom Schenckmann is pressing suit involving ten criminal charges. Beside his own claim for $100,000, he represents other investors and creditors of the exploded corporation. Abe laments the gloomy prospects of the Atlanta penitentiary. Rosie arrives with the tearful Tillie, more tearful than ever, for Hattie has followed Dan, God knows where. Abe, in the periods of despair that follow occasional gleams of hope at some optimistic remark of lawyer Feldman, instructs Rosie as to what she shall send or bring him to cheer up and make safe his prison life.

ABE—You would be able to see me visiting days, mommer, and you could bring me newspapers and once in a while a little soup.

Hattie arrives breathless, and with a special word to Abe from Dan that he will always be grateful for what the senior partner did for Hattie and himself. Then the secret comes out, that it was Abe himself who brought to a climax their innocent friendship, and that Dan had verbally made over to him a half-interest in his patent.

Hattie has brought with her the notes of the first conference with Bates the engineer, taken while she hid behind the screen. Feldman declares these will exonerate Abe.

Almost immediately, however, Feldman destroys Abe's hopes by saying that the fact of Hattie's marriage to Dan may rob her the notes of their value. She has also brought a formal assignment from Dan to the partners of a half-interest in his patent.

Suddenly Schenckmann offers to discontinue all proceedings in return for a general assignment of all stock in trade, fixtures, book accounts, if any, trademarks—and patents. All are delighted with the offer, except Mawruss.

FELDMAN—Oh, Perlmutter, don't look a gift horse in the mouth.

MAWRUSS—Say, once in a while a gift horse has false teeth. Also, Feldman, you could dry-clean a tiger till you got gasoline poisoning, and he wouldn't change his stripes, so what I want to know is, what happened in the last five minutes that made this tiger all of a sudden such a beautiful turtle dove.

COMES Dan himself. And with him the news that the Vulcan Refining Company has offered him $400,000 for his patent. The sudden radiance of the situation is changed to blackness again by the further announcement from Dan that he has received a summons in a suit to set the patent aside, and that it isn't worth a cent.

ABE—Mommer, don't forget to send me a big bottle of bromo seltzer, if I go to prison. My head is splitting right now.

MAWRUSS—And if it wasn't, someone ought to split it for you. Buy a patent fuel with my money (it was the firm's check that Abe had given to the happy pair)—and it turns out to be Bevo.

But the Commissioner angrily interrupts the quarrel and faces Schenckmann with the accusation that the company suing Dan is part of the same company that is trying to buy his patent, and that Schenckmann represents both.

SCHENCKMANN—I'm not here to defend my business methods. My offer of five hundred thousand stands.

DAN—And I have an offer of what amounts to a million from another corporation.

COMMISSIONER—Then these men are not bankrupt at all. They're perfectly solvent.

ABE—Well, in that case I would like to ask you a question.

COMMISSIONER—Ask Feldman, not me.

MAWRUSS—But he wants his answer in English, not Latin.

ABE—We've got money in the bank, two hundred thousand, tied up by this bankruptcy. Can I draw on it to pay any of the firm's debts?

COMMISSIONER—This isn't official, but if you are solvent, I'd take a chance.

ABE—Mawruss, have you got a blank check?

MAWRUSS—What do you want to do with it?

ABE—Always asking questions! Here, give it to me. Give me a pen, somebody. Today is the 8th, ain't it? (Hattie nods.) September 7th (Abe is writing). Schenckmann, how do you spell your rotten name?

HATTIE—It's on the affidavit.

ABE (handing check to Schenckmann)—Nah! Take it, and may it bring you nothing but bad luck.

SCHENCKMANN—I refuse to take it. I'm going through with this proceeding.

FELDMAN—Go through with it and I'll get it dismissed with costs and extra allowance which you will have to pay.

ABE—Well, Mawruss, we owe all this to Dan, and only to think that you wanted to fire him.

MAWRUSS—I wanted to fire him! You wanted to fire him.

ABE—Who wanted to fire him? Didn't I say when you said—

MAWRUSS—I said! Why it was you that said it.

ABE—I said it! When did I said it?

Why I Love Russia

loved them and could never weary of service.

Russia is poor; she has suffered more from foreign war and civil war and revolution than anyone in America can dream. Russians have no illusions about revolution; it is not something to be smilingly advocated in parlors. It is a grim force that tears families forever asunder, and sends fathers out to slay sons and sons to slay fathers, that hurls thousands of guilty men to death and thousands of innocent men also. It is an explosion that comes forth from oppression; and what it shall end in no man can say. But it is also fierce energy which can be organized and ridden to great ends, if men are found who are strong enough of soul.

THE Communists of Russia did not make the explosion; it occurred while most of them were in exile; but when the explosion was tearing Russia asunder, they harnessed and organized it, and now they are driving it toward a goal. I love Russia, most of all perhaps, because of the courage and high daring to achieve which have come out of the Revolution.

There was a barefoot boy collecting for famine relief who came into our train at Minsk. He wore a shirt and trousers of homemade linen; it was quite clear that he had no other garments on at all. Yet he held himself with dignity as a regular official. He presented proper papers with the seal of the city; he was a member of the League of Youth, charged with public business. It was quite clear that he did not consider himself in need; he was no beggar; he was collecting for others.

Barefoot soldiers I saw also, between Moscow and Minsk. Not in winter-time; all soldiers I saw in winter-time were well clad; but in summer some of the Red guards at the stations seemed to be saving their clothes and shoes, like the rest of Russia. One youth I remember, with the red star of the army on his cap, barefoot, carrying his rifle by a piece of rope. A Polish official en route to Moscow sneered at him as we passed; but I remembered that we also in America had had our Valley Forge.

Out of the energy of revolution there have grown in Russia, right in the midst of poverty and war and famine, plans and attempts and even part successes in big, new, constructive things.

THE GREAT drive against ignorance and illiteracy was one of these. Before the war eighty-five per cent of the Russian army could not read or write. Today, eighty-five per cent can read and write; the proportions are exactly reversed. The entire army, during the time when it is not actually repelling invasion, has been used as a school. All over Russia now, you go into villages and find village soviets transacting their business in writing, filling in records and even making out statistics. You assume now that people in Russia can read and write, and this was something you did not assume before the war.

Another thrilling project! I pick up a paper in Moscow and see a dry account of the return of the Kara Sea expedition, which has been through the Arctic Ocean to establish a northern trade-route by sea to Siberia. The great rivers of Siberia are among the longest in the world, but they flow into an ice-bound ocean. The mouths of the Ob and Yenesei, two of the greatest of them, are open only for six weeks in the year.

Once in a long time some adventurous trader of the past has sailed to those rivers but no regular trade route had ever been established. There is no town at the mouth of the rivers, only a marshy waste; and there is no time to sail up them and return before frost sets in. Yet the new Russia planned and carried through a trade expedition. Five ships set sail from London and seven from Archangel. They met in the Arctic Ocean off Murmansk; they were guided among the ice-floes by a set of Government wireless stations set up for the purpose; they went single file through the bergs while the ice-cutter Lenin led the way.

At the mouth of the rivers they were met by river barges, which had come downstream laden with Siberian products; they trans-shipped cargo three miles from land, and then ocean freighters and river barges returned with their loads of goods to the place from which they had started. They had opened to regular annual trade a vast region of thousands of square miles.

IN THE same paper I read the plans for building within the city of Moscow a great river port, in order to connect the capital with the upper reaches of the Volga, and thence with all southeastern Russia, by water freight. Moscow is also constructing a new central market and a municipal cold-storage plant. In the small city of Samara, I found a municipal farm supplying the children's homes with milk—only the cows were dying off from famine. All over Russia 277 new electric generating stations have been built in the last four and a half years, mostly small-town and village stations which are thus raising the standard of life in country districts. And this keeps going on while Russia is cut off from all her old sources of supplies.

Most stirring of all, in the very midst of the greatest famine the world has ever known, Russia at once undertook, not only far more famine relief than all the rest of the world together, not only a stupendous sowing campaign, but also an irrigation survey over the whole of the famine region, to determine ways and means of preventing such catastrophes in future. The experts were brought together, conducted the survey and made the report during the months of the famine.

It is startling in its daring, that report. It deals not with creating one rich district out of desert, by the waters of one great river, as do our irrigation projects in the West. Russia's problem is not so simple; she must provide for thousands of villages scattered over hundreds of thousands of square miles of territory—a rolling country of many plateaus and valleys and swampy places. It means a plan for reclaiming an entire empire of fertile but sun-baked soil.

The Russian plan calls first, for the retaining of the spring floods on the watersheds and plateaus by means of improved methods of cultivation, instead of letting them sweep all at once down barren hillsides to the streams. It calls next for small artificial lakes and reservoirs along all these little streams, some merely the size of village ponds, where the cattle may drink. The report talks daringly of 9,300 miles of rivers to be banked and regulated, thrice the distance across the United States. It deals in 50,000 gorges and gulches, in 70,000 artesian wells.

MUCH of this work must be done by the local peasants, but the report calls for immediate construction of certain experiment irrigation stations by the central government, in order to teach the peasant the benefits of such work. It goes on to plan the distribution of the water, not to make a few favored spots of rich production, but so that every village shall have a plot of irrigated land sufficient to preserve its life in the bad seasons. For ordinary crops the farmers must still rely on the weather; but irrigation can safeguard the emergency food and seed crops for the bare needs of the village.

I do not know when Russia will be able to afford the $250,000,000 which she needs for the central government's part of this work. She has many more such necessary plans, which will bring great returns, but they await capital; and it is for this reason that Russia is making advances to the western world. But I am thrilled by a people which has courage to make calmly and scientifically and constructively a gorgeous plan like that, at the very moment when they are all living on black bread, without enough of that to keep millions from death.

It is the Communists of Russia who are making these plans. Not all the experts who do the work are Communists, far from it; but it is the energy and hope produced by the Revolution which gives the driving force and it is the Communist group which organizes and directs that force. I might as well admit that I love Russia because of her Communists. Not because of her communism, for communism has never yet been tried in Russia, any more than socialism has been tried in Milwaukee by the Socialist mayors there, or Christianity has been tried by the "Christian" rulers of the world. The day-by-day acts of the government of Russia have been dictated first by revolution, then by war emergency and the need of reconstruction. Communism exists only as the goal toward which they drive.

They are still driving toward it; make no mistake about that. In spite of concessions to foreign capital, in spite of free trade for the peasants, in spite of the return to capitalism in many, many forms. They know the extent of their retreat; they do not conceal it, but announce it openly. They announce and discuss publicly their next plans for [Continued on page 124] reaching the goal toward which they yearn.

Under the stress of war conditions, the Communists took control of far more than they find themselves able to operate; they know that they need foreign capital and foreign trade. They will pay for what they need by concessions in the wealth of Russia; and what they promise to give, they will give. But they will give no permanent possessions to capitalists, only lease-holds profitable for the time, but in the end to return to the people of Russia.

It is a gamble, of course, the biggest gamble on earth today. It is the great dramatic struggle of our age. That is why a newspaper friend wrote me, when I said I was returning to Russia (and he is by no means a Communist): "I give you good luck. You are going back to the Center of the World!"

On the one side are the holders of foreign capital, the greatest forces of world finance. They have subjugated all the nations of Asia and made of them mere payers of tribute. On the other side is a great people, hungry and in desperate need of capital, willing to pay for it at whatever rates they must, but determined not to pay for it by the sale of their independence. They will give oil, they will give coal, but they will not give their souls.

It's a gamble. The Communists know it's a gamble. They know they must put off for many years, perhaps for generations, the fulfilment of their plan. They know it will be not for them but for their children, to bring into being the new form of world order for which they have carried on a revolution and given their lives by the millions in war. They know that what they have bought by blood must be bought all over again by education and the slow tasks of productive labor, to transform the most backward country in Europe into a conscious communist state. . . . They have begun to know that they cannot ever tell what forms this state of the future may take, but can only plan, and go forward, and fail and make retreats, and learn from their failures and plan again.

That's why they are so open in confessing failures; because they want not only themselves, but the whole of the world, to learn from those failures. That's why they go up against the platitudes of European diplomats with a straightforward sincerity which smashes through pretense after pretense, and causes consternation in the ranks of those who use words to play politics and to conceal intentions. That's why they work on, in their hundred thousands, living on meager rations and with one set of clothes, obeying an iron discipline which may assign them to service in a typhus hospital or on a battle front, or as special workers to increase production in factory and mine. They are doing it to build a world for their children that they will never themselves see.

It is very simple, the way it works out in the little towns of Russia. The factory manager who went as interpreter with me on one or two trips from Samara was a very ugly man. A little Russian Jew from the East Side of New York, speaking English with a vile accent, and altogether unattractive. Then one day he took me through his factory, a little place in two half-ruined buildings making doors and windows and chairs for Samara.

He was very proud of the machines he had succeeded in putting together from pieces of old ones. He had learned the trade of machinist in New York and it came in handy. But he was proudest of all of the wages of his workers, the highest paid in the city, since he had succeeded in getting the authorities to put his factory on piece-work. They made fifteen dollars a month, which is ridiculously small for America, but is good wages in Germany and all countries east; and they got also their rations, their lodgings, and the services of the factory tailor and cobbler.

"What do you get yourself, as manager?" I asked. I learned that he got the same ration as his men, but no money wages at all. He was a Communist, mobilized for factory service, and he drew the regular Communist wage, which was once fixed at several thousand rubles, but is now so low, because of the falling currency, that he never troubled to go and get it. It was only a cent or two per month. He thought there would be a change soon. Changes have taken place rapidly and much larger money wages are in existence; but the "Communist wage" is still below that of many skilled workers who work under the Communists.

"How do you live without money wages?" I asked.

He took me to visit his home. His wife drew the town ration, which wasn't enough to live on, so the man gave her part of his. He explained that as he did office work and the ration was planned for a manual worker, he didn't really need it all. His two children went every day to a Government children's home to be fed. Lodgings he got free, and sometimes some clothing, when there was any. "I get my share," he said firmly. "We will all get more when we produce more."

Among the men and women who are building the future Russia I seldom heard personal complaints of any kind. Other forms of complaint were plentiful—howls over the amount of red tape in the Government, the slowness of transport, the general laziness and inefficiency, howls at anybody or anything that seemed to be standing in the way of achievement. But never any one of them who complained of his own meager portion of bread. No doubt there are these complaints also, for Russians must be human; but I never heard them.

That's the group of men who stand on one side, staking their lives on a faith in the future. On the other side stands every other power on earth and all the ancient disorder of the world. It's the greatest conflict of the age, perhaps of many ages.

So that is why I love Russia and want to go back there. Because they are a friendly, loving people among whom I never feel lonely! Because they are doing fine new things with high courage! Because they are honest in confessing failures and deal in sincere plans, not platitudes! Because it is the heart of a great conflict, which affects the future history of the world.

French Art Mocks at Convention

does any other nation. France has mastered the tools of art: her temperament is highly cultured: she is rich in tradition and prolific in production: and her esthetic nature, stemming from a combination of Germanic and Latin impulses, possesses a sensuousness and a plasticity which makes possible the conception and projection of intense and colorful images.

Consequently, there is manifest in French academic art a pervasive spirit of non-conformity, which has resulted not only in a fecundity of conception, but in an individuality of treatment. Where America possesses one John Alexander (with a characteristic flowing line), and England one Augustus John (with a distinctively decorative imprévu), France possesses a score of attractive and particularized talents, each distinguished by some intrinsic and individual quality of idea, subject-matter, spirit, or manner.

Regard, for example, the work of Jean

Gabriel Domergue. Here is a pictorialism essentially piquant and, at the same time, distinctive. Nor is it freakish in the sense that is Duchamp's "Nude Descending the Stairs." A layman, having studied one of Domergue's fantasies in paint, could identify almost any of his other works. Yet, his painting is academic throughout. In fact, Domergue is a well-known and familiar exhibitor in the Paris official salons. In 1920 three of his canvases were hung; and his "Fernande Cabanel" was reproduced in the official catalog.

"EVE" (from the 1921 Salon), which is shown herewith, despite the whimsicality and almost grotesquerie of its subject, is a conscientious attempt at linear decoration and balance of light and dark masses. Nowhere has the esthetic purpose been subordinated to the document. Indeed, it is the charming arrangement of curved and slanting lines (the oval of the mirror, the circular folds in the gown, the silhouette of the coach, and the outlines of clouds)—together with the balanced juxtaposition of masses (as in the dark foliage, the skirt, the white torso of the woman, and the cloud formations)—which confers upon the picture its cardinal significance, and lifts it immediately out of the realm of mere diverting illustration.

However, much of its fascination and interest is due to its fantastic and somewhat unconventional subject.

The figure of Pan, the coach, the mirror, the monkey—all represent literary ideas in the painter's visualized fable of fair woman's vanity; and the treatment of the theme—the delicacy of detail, the idealized sky, the exaggeration of forms, and the like—lends it the necessary allegorical and unreal atmosphere. Were the picture treated naturalistically, the illusion would entirely be lost.

Where Barnum Went Wrong

TOR twenty years or so we've all been hearing Barnum's classic remark—"The public likes to be fooled."

The public has always enjoyed this biting comment, because it came from America's best loved showman.

But probably many of us had our fingers crossed even as we nodded approval.

* * *

The past two years in the tire business has been a pretty good test of Barnum's famous saying.

If the public liked to be fooled, here was its heart's content. "Big Discounts" to the right. "Special Sales" to the left. "Bargains" on every corner.

Certainly no man who kept his eyes and ears open missed seeing the attempt to fool the public by drawing its attention away from the essentials of real value.

Why did car-owners refuse to lower their quality standards—why did more people than ever go to quality tires?

Especially U. S. Royal Cords, which they used more and more to measure the market when they wanted a test of value.

* * *

In one way of speaking, Royal Cord leadership grew out of the confusing conditions put upon the tire-buyer.

The car-owner, being a practical person, as a rule, did the practical thing.

He bought U. S. Royal Cord quality—and stuck to it.

The legitimate dealer lined up with the U. S. Royal Cord policy—and stuck to it.

The makers of Royal Cord Tires said "Go to a legitimate dealer"—and stuck to it.

Perhaps Barnum intended his remark about the public to be taken with a grain of salt. Note that he always gave his customers a whale of a money's worth.

Her Own Life

which faced the lake. The moon had set, leaving an opaque mist upon the unruffled water. It was a still, brooding, mid-summer night. How she loved the lake, the fields, the freedom of earth and air! Suddenly a keen desire to plunge her hot body into the tranquil lake possessed her. Quickly without putting on a wrap she went downstairs, treading softly not to arouse the sleepers. As she passed the room on the ground floor where her cousin slept she could see his form on the bed through the open door, lying on one side. It made no impression on her, none at all. It was like anybody else there asleep. He meant nothing to her, nothing at all. . . .

SHE crossed the strip of lawn, feeling the grass refreshingly cool under her bare feet, and sped more rapidly down the long flight of steps to the beach. The lake was utterly still, the night so calm! As if waiting for something to happen, waiting watchfully. . . . She did not remove her nightdress, which was open at the breast permitting the cool, misty air to touch her hot skin, but began slowly, deliberately to wade out into the deep water, pausing now and then to wait and listen—for what? A faint streak of gray crossed the northern waters—the first pencil of reflected light from the rising sun. She looked at it curiously; this was but one of the myriad details of life which were so lovely. Then she resumed her slow progress, thinking what she meant to do. The water was cooling, softly lapping and soothing her heated body. Into it she meant to dive, forever—soon, very soon. But she paused. There was plenty of time. It could not be four o'clock, and the night was so beautiful, so perfectly her own. . . . Lilla never knew exactly what she would have done, whether she would have drowned herself or taken a cooling plunge and swum back to shore: the mystery remained hidden for always in the depth of her erratic nature.

Steps clattered down the wooden stairs, and her cousin's voice, trying to make itself heard and yet apparently afraid of making a noise, whispered hoarsely out of the dark: "Is that you, Lilla? Lilla! Lilla!"

He'll wake mother, thought Lilla. So he wasn't sleeping after all!

"What do you want?" she replied.

Lambert rapidly waded into the water in the direction of Lilla's voice, with a great splashing indicative of his excitement.

"What is it?" Lilla asked composedly.

"Are you trying to drown yourself?" the young man demanded, grasping her wet arm.

"What if I did?" she said, trying to free her arm. "A lot it would mean to you!" She laughed mirthlessly.

"Don't be a damn fool, Lilla!"

"Of course I could marry you!" she said tauntingly.

"Yes"—his voice was less vibrant—"if you feel that way."

"I don't want to marry you," she said with finality.

Lambert was somewhat taken aback.

They slowly walked back to the shore. Lambert dropped his hold upon her arm, and they stood facing each other in the dim light at the edge of the lake.

"Why not?" he asked.

"I don't love you, not the least bit," she said quietly.

"It's a little late for that sort of talk, isn't it?" he suggested sullenly, and continued his own train of thought. "Of course we couldn't be married right off. But I could come back here next spring and then we might."

"Don't talk any more about it! I won't ever marry you, Lambert!" Lilla said.

"What are you going to do then?" Lambert asked after a time. Lilla made no reply. Instead she moved a little farther from him. "I don't see what has come over you," he complained. "Lilla, do you hate me?"

"I don't hate you," Lilla admitted. "And I didn't—mind—until—until—I knew!" She shuddered at the memory. "Don't talk about it any more."

"You'll feel differently later," he said with returning confidence.

Lilla turned her head and looked at him coldly. She said nothing, however. She could not make him understand the confusion in her mind and spirit. She realized how inexplicable, how purely whimsical her actions must seem to him. . . .

He put his arm around her wet body gently, protectingly, and she did not repulse him, seemed grateful for his tenderness, his nearness. They sat there for some time in the misty dawn, without words, each one thinking, near and yet very far apart. . . . When he tried to draw her closer to his embrace, to kiss her lips, muttering fiercely, "Lilla, you love me, you love me!" she roused herself and struggled free, protesting, "No, no, no, let me alone, Lambert!"

Wrenching herself free from his embrace she sped up the stairs to the house.

THE MORNING was hot and sultry; dull humid clouds hung over the lake, veiling the sun. Lilla stayed with her mother after breakfast, avoiding her cousin. At dinner Lambert said that he was leaving by the afternoon boat for Chicago. Mrs. Vance made only a feeble protest to his departure. Lilla had gone to a neighbor's after dinner, and the young man, after waiting until the last moment in the hope of seeing her, left a note for her with her mother. Mrs. Vance gave it to Lilla on her return and watched her daughter uneasily as she stood reading it. Lilla merely closed her lips more tightly and, tearing the sheet up, dropped the pieces into the stove.

There was a stifling consciousness between the two of something unsaid, something hanging in the air.

Mrs. Vance was plainly miserable, not daring to put the fearful question that had been eating into her since yesterday. Lilla was too miserable, being unable to tell what had passed to this austere, repressive mother. If it had only been her father! So both sat after the evening meal, silent, with the something between them growing. At last as they were putting out the lights Mrs. Vance asked in a strained, yet determined voice: "Lilla, did Lambert ever—ever make—ever do anything he shouldn't?"

Lilla looked straight into her mother's face and answered calmly, "No!"

Then they kissed each other good-night.

The thing between them hung heavy during the next weeks. Lilla was more at home, sometimes taking long walks into the country by herself. Once when her mother asked where she had been, she replied, "To the Grove." What possessed her to tramp the six miles to the Grove on a hot August Sunday, she could not explain. She had sat under the sycamore where Lambert Wells had first kissed her, thinking, brooding, wondering what was to happen to her, what it had meant.

THAT evening Mrs. Vance was emboldened to talk of men and love between the sexes more freely than Lilla had ever remembered, and Lilla listened to her mother's views more closely than ever before. Men, according to Mrs. Vance, were sharply divided into two classes—the moral and the immoral. The latter were all libertines, sensualists, and selfish, to be shunned by women who wished to avoid disaster. Even moral men had an entirely different nature from that of good women. They were by instinct coarser, more animal, and women must take great precautions if they wished to preserve their ascendancy with them.

"But don't women sometimes care the same way men do?"

"No," Mrs. Vance pronounced unhesitatingly. "Never the same way! They have not the same natures."

Lilla was silent, puzzled. She was in too humble a frame of mind to question her mother's dictum, and yet she was too honest, too clear-headed to accept it wholly as universal truth. Already in her brief experience of life it did not exactly tally with her own observation. She thought again of her frank, pleasure-loving father, and wondered what his relation with his wife had been. Had he been checked, repressed, because of his exuberant nature? She seemed to remember that he had been, in many little ways.

"If a girl likes to be kissed, if she feels that way—" Lilla ventured.

"No good girl likes to be kissed by a man unless she loves him, and even if she loves him and he appeals to her, on that side, there must be something wrong in her—something coarse, depraved," her mother pronounced firmly.

Lilla was silent. There was but one conclusion, and that was that she herself was far from "nice." The power in her over men which she liked to exercise, the tiptoe thrill she felt in her body, which made her want to dance instead of walk, was evidence of depravity.

Gradually the life of mother and daughter settled back into their normal routine. But the thing still remained between Lilla and her mother, pushed into the background and ignored, but always in the deeper consciousness of the two, as a division. Another letter came from Lambert

Wells, who was waiting in Seattle for his steamer, a light letter with scarcely a hint of what had been between them. Lilla read it carefully twice, taking in all its implications. If she had been condemned to go to Alaska with him! To be alone way off there, shut up with him! She was almost convinced that her mother was right—there were but two sorts of men, and the bad sort was altogether worthless.

IN A curious reaction against Cousin Lambert and all that he stood for in her memory, Lilla obstinately refused to consider going east to college. She decided in a hurry that instead she would go to normal school as several of her high school friends intended to do.

"I don't want to be shut up with a lot of girls at college," she said. "I want to get out into life as soon as possible, and the quickest way is to teach!" So it was settled that in September she would make daily the long journey from Lawndale to the normal school in Chicago. . . .

When the grapes were ripe, Lilla went over to one of the vineyards and hired herself out "for something to do," as she explained. In fact she found the easy, idle life of the little cottage in close proximity to her mother, with that gulf between them, intolerable. She did not want to think, and hard physical labor was a great relief. The mechanical task in the heat and dust, with the sweat dampening her thin garments, gave her a happiness she had not known for weeks. She mingled freely with the other pickers, chiefly girls from the tenements in Chicago, off for a profitable vacation and a lark. She listened to their talk, which was not "nice" or reserved, and in spite of her mother's categories she found that she liked them. Perhaps, she thought, it was because she was no better really than they were, only more timid and less frank. They made no secret of their love affairs, which they did not take tragically. Nevertheless, her mother's doctrine of sex relations had sunk deeply into her consciousness. It was the accepted truth of books and society, which she must fit herself to accept. She began to think of herself as abnormal because apparently she had something of her father in her, of that more brutal man's nature with its coarse appetite for what was forbidden to a woman, instead of the instinctively pure woman's nature. When she found herself laughing freely with the grape-pickers, joking with the men, she would check herself, frightened. And when the thrill of her plunge into the lake subtly stirred her body, and she drove her breasts through the waves tingling and excited by their caress, she said unconvincedly:

"I'm not nice. . . . There's something wrong with me. . . . What is it?" . . .

Before she left Pitcher's Landing Lilla knew that she was not to become a mother, and gradually the experience of the summer faded into the softer background of memory, as something inexplicable and remote. But it had left its irregular mark on her consciousness, which later was to turn the balance of her life.

Normal school was a sort of treadmill like high school, though rather more exacting, through which Lilla pushed her way with fair gusto. Something told her it was not to be for always. She liked the liberty which the long days away from Lawndale gave her, and she took the opportunity of half-holidays to explore the big sprawling city near which she had lived so many years without knowing it. She went to theaters, discovered the library and the concert hall, and began to read and think a little outside of school work.

In the middle of winter, one of the younger teachers in the Lawndale High School fell ill and asked Lilla to take her place for a fortnight. Lilla found herself sitting behind the desk in the same room where she had recently recited as a pupil trying to keep in order fifty boys and girls many of whom still called her Lil or Lilla Vance. She met them with a broad grin of understanding and did not hesitate to laugh with them over her own inexperience and mistakes. In two days, she was voted a great success by the pupils, and though her room may have been noisier than the regulations permitted, it was sufficiently industrious. Discipline was democratic and direct. As Lilla put it to her family:

"I can't throw a bluff with those kids I've known always, and I am not going to try to. I like them and they like me, and we'll work it out together. . . . It's great fun, best ever!"

WHEN she stepped on the platform with her confident, elastic tread, everyone in the room looked at her approvingly. She was conscious of her power, and it excited her in a new way. Very quickly she felt sure of herself at her desk among her fifty pupils. She knew that they were keen to find her tripping in algebra or Latin, and she enjoyed the joke of being caught. She was not afraid of admitting error and laughing at it, which is a sure sign of a competent teacher. So all went well until the happy fortnight was drawing to a close and Lilla expected to be obliged to return to the dull treadmill of Normal. Then one morning she was conscious that the big door beside her desk had opened and that someone was standing there watching her at her task. She divined that it was the new superintendent, a young man who had come to Lawndale from the neighboring university with a reputation for learning.

Lilla's face flamed, but she obstinately refused to turn to look at the intruder. He had come no doubt to notify her that she was no longer needed, or perhaps to see what she could do. Well, he should see; and she proceeded with the problem she was working out on the blackboard.

The young man stood by the door, supporting his chin thoughtfully in the palm of one hand as a certain distinguished university professor had the habit of doing before delivering judgment. A thin black beard completed the severity of his narrow white face. He cleared his throat. What he said was unexpected to himself as well as to the audience.

"Very good, Miss Vance. . . . Very good indeed. . . . You make a difficult subject interesting, which is a mark of the good teacher. And you secure coöperation between pupil and instructor. . . . Will you come to my office at the close of the session?"

The Little Green Teapot

The door opened and Mother O'Donnel, bearing a tray, came into the room. She looked toward Lord Louis, whose hand was still resting upon the teapot. A flicker of alarm furrowed her brow and, setting down the tray with an odd protective gesture, she placed herself between her guest and the mantelshelf.

"Ah, now forgive me, but it's frightened I am lest an accident might befall it."

The old lady took the teapot and the little plate and set it upon the table, and while she measured out some tea from a Coronation caddy she said:

"It has been me only friend these forty-seven years."

"TEA," observed Lord Louis, offering a scone to Jill, "is a great comforter, and not the least of the blessings which come to us from the East."

But Jill had her own methods of approaching a subject.

"You were speaking of the mortgage on this cottage," she remarked innocently. "Won't you tell us more about it?"

"What more is there to tell, me dyurr? The mortgage is as old as me tinancy and past a doubt will survive it. For where would an old woman turn for twenty-five pounds with which to pay it off?"

"You might sell something, you know," said Jill, throwing a glance of awful meaning at her husband.

Mother O'Donnel shook her head.

"Ah, now, don't fret yourself with another's troubles."

"Yes, but——"

"Is the tay to your liking?"

"Lovely—but—Mrs. O'Donnel, my husband is very interested in old things. I'm sure he'd buy something of yours as a souvenir of our visit. He said he would while you were boiling the kettle—didn't you, Louis?"

He smiled engagingly from one to the other. "Covetousness is the curse of being a collector," he said. "If my wife were to perform her duty she would upbraid rather than encourage me."

"He wants to buy the"—a sudden flash of craft changed the order of the phrase—"that little green plate and perhaps the old teapot. He'd pay you—ten pounds—wouldn't you, Louis?"

"A good husband invariably agrees with his wife," came the rejoinder.

"Wouldn't you like to sell them for that?" queried Jill.

BUT MOTHER O'DONNEL had dropped her eyes and her old hand was plucking at the tablecloth in a queer aimless fashion. When she looked up they saw that her eyes were misted with tears. "Mebbe it's just a joke ye're having. Tin pound for an old taypot and a bit of a plate to kape the heat from milking the polish!"

"But it's a lovely teapot."

Jill looked at Lord Louis, but his eyes were coldly fixed upon the ceiling. For the first time she understood how hard the collector spirit can make a man. Quite obviously he was freezing his subject and for that reason alone she took up the reins and jumped the price.

"Fifteen pounds," she said. "Fifteen."

"Seventeen ten," said Lord Louis, raising his hand as if it were at an auction.

And then they received the surprise of their lives, for the old woman struck the table a clean smart blow.

"Stop it!" she cried. "Phwat sort of people are ye to run a sale unasked in a poor woman's house and timpt her to the greatest of sacrifices. Would ye sell the hair of a dead child for a sthranger's money? Would ye barther a packet of love letthers for any sum of gol' or siller? Nay, thin let me be—let be!"

"I am sorry," said Jill; "we didn't know how you felt about it."

As quickly as it came the tempest departed and the old woman laid a hand on the sleeve of Jill's gown.

"Nay, nay. I shouldna have spoken so—ye touched me raw, that was it. Sure, and av course ye wouldna be exshpected to undershtand. 'Twas kindly mint and the A'mighty knows the blissing the money would ha' proved, but there's things beyont money—there's mimories."

THEN please forget our indiscretion," said Lord Louis. "We betrayed, I fear, a great want of gallantry which I deplore."

"It's over and forgotten."

"You teach us a lesson in civility, madam, but will you allow me, before we put the matter finally aside, to s'ate that had your feelings been otherwise, I should have been prepared to increase my offer to the sum of twenty pounds? . . . Thank you, I should enjoy another cup," he said, leaning back and stretching his legs.

It is probable the matter would have ended at this point had not Jill been struck by the curious similarity in shape between the teapot and the first fruit mentioned in the Bible.

"Standing on that plate," she said, "it looks just like a pippin on a green leaf. Doesn't it, Louis?"

"Where the apple reddens never pry," he quoted with a smile, "lest we lose our Edens, Eve and I."

They were hardly conscious that the old woman had begun to speak; her voice fell gently on their ears, like down-drifting leaves in autumn-time. With hands resting upon the rough white cloth and eyes that looked across a valley of years, she spoke, and an infinite sadness trembled through the simple sentences of the tale.

"And iverywhere ye heard it said that me faither was a hard man. For many years he had followed the sea and the salt av it bitthered his spache long after he abandoned the tiller for the handle of a plow. Me mither, she uphild him, mebbe for raison of the prosperity they shared together. own that naither folk nor adversity can conquer. I would run from it all and lie in the deep grass meadows and dream."

"Um-um!" said Jill.

"It was naither prince nor king who found me so, but a simple hireling lad—a teamster from a farm two valleys distant. Six feet he shtood, a shtray black lock twishting from under his hat and falling athwart the brow av him. His breast was burnt like the brown sail av a fisher's boat caught by a shlant of sunlight at the end o' day. Wish! wish! I can see him now, his feet square-planted and the blue wide-open eyes looking down upon me as I lay. I had been ashlope and, taken unawares, put out a hand to draw the shkirt over me ankles for viry modeshty. 'Be aisy,' he said, quick to read the shyness av the movement. 'Would ye cover a beauty that no dacint man could choose but reshpect?'"

"And, being young, we laughed at that and he sat beside me on the grass and we fell into talk.

"THAT WAS the beginning av it. 'Twas a secret friendship of the twilight.

"Me faither came to know. It was the night he first kissed me. A dog fox barked in the valley—an ill omen that! We met me faither where the woods turn to meadows. 'Very pretty,' says he, and though the wind set gentle from the south we could feel the aist cut across our faces like a whip thong. 'And phwat is my Sheila doing on the arm of a dung-cart driver?' With that Mishael, for so he was named, loosed his hold upon me and shteepped a pace forward. 'The divil shtrike the legs from under ye,' he cried with a fury of which I could never believe he was masther. And he repeated it while me faither leant upon his blackthorn and shmiled. 'Pretty phrase,' he says thin, with an eye cocked toward me. 'Does he favor ye with love talk on such illicit lines? Be it so, thin his absince will improve upon his company. Take the hedge-gap yonder, Misther Muckcart, for I'd remind ye this meadow is mine and I've no taste for trespassers.' And he took me arm and shtarted homeward. But me Mishael had the courage of a rigiment and barred the path wi' arms folded across the breast av him. 'Shtand aside,' meniced me faither with a grip upon his blackthorn. 'Phwat sort of a tay party is ut whin a man cannot choose his own company?' 'Tis like to be the sort ye'll have to saison yoursel' to,' came the answer; 'for she and I ha' chosen ours already and naither divil nor spirk will wrest her hand from the taypot I mane to drink from.' 'And phwere's the money to come from that will fill ut? Is ut five or four shillin's a wake O'Mara pays ye to fork his midden?' Mishael's face wint dull crimson like the sun falling on a mishty evening. 'Thru, 'tis, me fortune's yet unmade,' he whispered, low and ominous. 'But I've a clane heart and a shtrong arm and, Mother of Mary, there's no dade I'd not perform to put a ring on Sheila's finger.' Achone! But he was a crafty man, me faither, and the words set a thought to work in the cold brain av him. 'That's a bether spirit,' says he. 'We'll walk to the farm and talk the question out.' Not a word was shpoken on the way but whin we enthered the kitchen he tould me mither and added: 'Lay a cloth, o' woman, and set four cups and plates.' At me faither's direction she brought from the cupboard the bist taypot, a piece he cherished oncommon high, having brought ut from China seas whin little more than a lad."

Lord Louis raised the lid of the teapot and examined it with an added interest.

"As I told ye, me mither set it by Mishael's elbow and wint to the shtove for the kittle while he sat there, a dishpairful look upon his face. At the sight av him me faither laughed. 'Was iver so long-faced a lover!' says he. 'I wud ha' thought so mittle some a lad wud ha' sat wi' an arm about his swateheart's waist. Afther all, it may prove a long parting, for fortunes are not gathered like shards upon a highway.' 'I court in me own fashion,' replied Mishael with a show of bravado, 'but since ye suggest it—'"

She stopped and thrust the palms of her hands over her eyes.

"'Twas just that shmall action! The slave of his coat fouled the spout av the taypot and with a crash it shtruck the brick floor and shmithered into atoms. Will I iver forgit the scane that followed! Sudden as it come, the shtorm ceased and me faither pointed a finger to the fragments on the floor. 'Twas wan av two,' he says, 'in a praste's house back o' a little temple at Mansing on the Yang-tze. I tuk a knife thrust in me shoulder to pay for ut—aye, and was pursued a hundrid miles down river before I shook off the yallow divils who were afther me. And now 'tis smithered by a reeking rabbit snatcher who shovels dung for a livelihood! Ye try to shteel me daughter and ye smash me home. By God, ye shall right that sicnd wrong 'fore iver ye shall clap an eye on her ag'in.' 'Twas an accident,' shtammered Mishael. 'Show me the way to right ut and I will.' And, shtill pointing at the floor, me faither answered. 'There were two of them—go aist and bring the second.' 'I'll do ut,' he cried, and me faither shmiled, his thin lips curling down.

"The saisons came and wint. Ten years passed by, but naither word nor sight av him. Other lads came courting me but I wud ha' none av 'em. In the fall of the ninth year me faither died, and me mither followed six weeks later.

"TWAS a bitther winter that followed—the snowdrift in the valley yander was six feet deep and more, the shky leaden, and the wind knife-edged. Night was settin' in and I mind dhrawing a stool to the fire, and warming me hands and thinking how chill and lonesome the world could be for a woman alone. And, settin' there, I heard a knock to the strate door. 'Twas onlikely anyone wud be abroad and I hesitated to belave me ears. But prisintly the sound rep'ated and above the timpest I heard a voice which cried, 'Opin, for the love av God.' In a thrice I had the bolts drawn and the wind threw back the door upon its jambs. Leaning against the house side, his back toward the night, stud a man. But merciful Mary! 'Twas more like a corpshe he looked. Clutched to his breast was something wrapped in a bit of sacking.

"'Who are ye, so ill clad in such a weather?' says I. He made to answer but a fit of coughing took him and niver have I seen a man so shaken. 'Whoever ye are, come into the warmth,' says I, and putting an arm about him I led him here and set him in a chair before the fire. All the while his eyes rested upon me with a look indishcribable—'twas as though his hunger for something were being appeased by the very sight av me. 'There!' says I. 'Sit ye quiet while I put a kettle to boil and fetch ye a blanket.' Thin it was he laughed—a queer laugh—more av a cough it was—and spohke. 'Aye, boil the kittle, mavourneen, and we'll dhrink our tay together.' And with shaking hands he drew the wrappings from the object he had held to his breast and set this little taypot upon the table."

"And what happened?" said Jill.

"We dhrank our tay together that night," she said, "and afther, I tuk him upon me lap like the child av me own I shall niver nurse and cradled him. He died as dawn broke—forty-seven years ago."

There was a low, mechanical hum outside the shop and a moment later the door opened and the chauffeur entered.

"The tire is O. K. now, m'lord," said the man, touching his cap.

Mother O'Donnel roused herself from the reverie and lifted her eyes to the level of his hands.

"Ye think me a foolish o' woman?"

"On the contrary, a memory such as yours could hardly be sold for twenty-five pounds."

"With twinty-five pounds I could buy the mortgage—I—"

Lord Louis laid five bank notes upon the table and picked up the small green plate.

"THIS I can carry in my pocket."

"As you please! But go—go quickly."

Mother O'Donnel turned slowly into the house and entered the parlor beyond.

She moved across the room and opened the cupboard door. On the shelf was a row of china teapots identical in design to the one Lord Louis had purchased. She took the nearest and placed it in the center of the mantelpiece.

Jill did not address a word to her husband until they had covered nearly three miles and then her remark was crisp and to the point.

"I hate you—I think you are a beast."

"Don't say that," he replied, "for I was about to increase your scope of knowledge." He paid no attention to her silence and proceeded. "The Imitation Oriental China Factory of Newcastle, which started its inglorious career four years ago last autumn, distinguish their wares from those of any other firm by placing two cobalt dots on the under side." He undid the paper parcel and inverted the little teapot for her inspection. "There they are, you see?"

Jill opened her eyes very wide. "Louis!" she exclaimed. "But if that's true—"

"The old devil!" said Jill—then: "But you were deceived as well—or why did you give her the twenty-five pounds?"

For answer he drew from his pocket the little green plate and remarked:

"A piece of really good quality Caladon is always worth buying. Of course I paid highly, but she gave us an excellent tea."

Dr. Paul H. De Kruif's Series on Doctors and Drug-Mongers—Continued from page 70

The Vitamin Craze

In collaboration, appeared the names of seven other medical men and scientists of more or less note. They were apparently persons of distinction, since the letters following their monikers showed them to be Doctors of Medicine, Doctors of Philosophy, Masters of Science, Doctors of Science.

GLANCING at this imposing list of scientific and medical talent, the interest of the reader was bound to be aroused. But to his amazement and dismay, reading on, he found himself present at the launching of a new panacea, a new elixir of life, a new Ichtyol.

First, an imposing list of cases to which yeast had been applied in treatment. Seven diseases, comprising a grand total of seventy-six cases, had been attacked by this marvelous healing agent.

Second, another list, equally imposing, showing that all but ten of the seventy-six had been improved or cured. The diseases were of great variety and varying degrees of seriousness. Boils and swollen glands, acne vulgaris and acne rosacea, duodenal ulcer, and psoriasis, bronchitis, constipation and pruritis, one and all had been improved or cured.

It is interesting that every one of the diseases enumerated may get well of itself.

What is more, it is interesting that there is no mention of this in the entire article.

It is particularly interesting that in several instances only one case of a given disease was treated with yeast.

It is most interesting of all that conclusions in regard to the beneficial effect of yeast were drawn on the absolutely inadequate basis of the improvement of one case, which might have got well of itself!

Here is the old error, blossoming in all its glory; namely, the error of post hoc, propter hoc. The strange belief that, when a doctor gives a patient a dose of a remedy, and the patient improves, the improvement is necessarily due to the remedy.

To make a long story short, this article was not a carefully controlled impartial report of a scientific investigation. Instead it turned out to be the credo of a group of men who manifestly wanted to believe that yeast was a cure for many ailments. The piece was a veritable laughingstock, a humorous tract, to any careful scientific man. It was a supreme illustration of the way in which unreliable medical folklore arises.

THE commercial use of this "authoritative" paper was not greatly delayed. For in a short time a handsome yellow-bordered pamphlet was sent out, with the compliments of the Fleischmann Company. This pamphlet consisted of a report of the paper just described, together with a valuable and informing story of how Fleischmann's yeast is made and distributed. This pamphlet, except for its gaudy yellow border, had the appearance of a scientific treatise. It was evidently for doctors.

Then followed the inevitable broadcasting and popularization. Booklets were got out for the public. One is entitled "The Healing Power of Compressed Yeast." It blandly states that Fleischmann's yeast is not offered as a "medicine." It compares its values to the natural ones of pure air, water, sunshine, and wholesome food. Then it proceeds to the directions for "dosage" and "treatment," with all the gravity of a textbook on materia medica. It states that "every case of ulcer and swollen glands was improved or cured," but neglects to announce that Dr. Hawk listed only one of each.

And this was the beginning of the avalanche. In this case the crime against the nation's pocketbook was not a great one. Yeast is cheap, and the doses of this new wonderful food cost but a few cents a day. What is more, the blame is not to be laid entirely on the Fleischmann Company. These gentlemen are not medical men, much less critical scientists. They doubtless took the dithyramb of Hawk and his associates in good faith. They doubtless were eager to, and who can blame them?

THEY HAD become rich in the making and selling of a meritorious product, indispensable in the manufacture of a nation's bread. Now, suddenly, they are told that their yeast has remarkable healing virtues, as well as nutritive ones. They are told this by Doctors of Philosophy and Doctors of Science, by a writer of textbooks and a teacher in a medical college of repute. Dazzled and overwhelmed by this unexpected good fortune, who could ask them to be critical and to withhold their advertising claims?

The burden of blame is to be laid at the door of the eminent "scientists" who so freely lent their names to the commercial exploitation of a curative agent, the status of which is entirely experimental—for the genuine merit of which there is no decent proof up to now.

The crime against the purse is small, let us repeat. But the danger of the wide exploitation of such pitifully half-baked evidence lies in arousing false hopes of the cure of many diseases; in inducing people to treat themselves in conditions which really demand the aid of a sound physician; in befouling the already sufficiently muddy and sluggish stream of knowledge in regard to the treatment of disease; and finally in setting a bad example to scientists, who in America have held themselves to a large extent free from commercial entanglements.

In the scientific advertisement of Hawk and his co-workers, no mention was made of vitamins. The supposedly wonderful curative powers of yeast were not explained in this paper. The healing virtue, according to the doctors, might be due to the laxative effect of the yeast, or to other direct causes. Of course, it would be comparatively simple to find out if the alleged benefits were due to the laxative effect. This could have been done by dividing the patients with boils into two groups. Group A might be physicked with yeast, group B by some ordinary cathartic. If group A got well of the boils, while group B did not, it would be plain that the curative effect (if there were any) was due not to the mere laxative effect but to some other beneficent property.

The first hint that the benefits of yeast are due to vitamin is to be found in the pamphlets for public distribution. Now it is an undoubted fact that yeast is rich in vitamin "B." The lack of this in food, we have seen, gives rise to beriberi.

How does the Fleischmann Company advertise the vitamin virtues of its yeast to the public? Let us consult its pamphlet.

Turning to page 20 of the pamphlet entitled "The Healing Power of Vitamins," we find the following statement:

Some foods are known to be seriously lacking in the Vitamin element. Such foods, eaten in combination with other foods, may be highly nourishing. Under other conditions, they may have very little food value. Thus, it is possible that some individuals might actually be suffering for nourishment while eating three hearty meals a day. It depends on what is called a "properly balanced ration."

The next paragraph then proceeds to state that "people who are unable to gain flesh even though hearty eaters, will usually secure good results by taking a cake of Fleischmann's Compressed Yeast after each meal."

The innuendo here is a glaring and typical trick of the "science" of advertising. The first paragraph quoted sounds plausible enough but really juggles with the truth. It leads one to believe that there is only one vitamin.

Then it exaggerates grossly by a clever use of innuendo. It says: "Thus, it is possible that some individuals might actually be suffering for nourishment while eating three hearty meals a day." Well, it is true that they might be. But the greater proportion of such people include plenty of vegetables and fruits and milk in their "three hearty meals." So they get plenty of vitamin.

THE advertisement then goes on to state that proper nourishment "depends largely on what is called a 'properly balanced ration.'" Again, true enough.

This clever distortion of the truth has been transferred by the yeast mongers to the display advertisements of newspapers.

Here, strangely enough, the yeast mongers admit that green vegetables contain vitamins. But they nullify this statement by the claim that vegetables do not contain enough—a claim for which there is not the shadow of foundation in fact. What is more, any mention of milk, dairy products, and fruit is left out, and the advertisement, as usual, leaves the reader with the idea that the only place to get vitamin is from Fleischmann.

To sum up:

Vitamins are necessary to health and growth.

They are abundantly present in many common foods, especially in fruits, vegetables, milk and other dairy products.

A half-baked scientific report in a reputable medical journal of high standards started the idea that yeast is of great virtue in many diseases.

The report was appropriated for advertising use by the Fleischmann Company, first to doctors, then to the public. By clever advertising the erroneous idea is conveyed that yeast is the chief and principal source of vitamin, and that there is a widespread vitamin starvation.

The success of this propaganda has given rise to an avalanche of advertisement, by dozens of medicinal yeast mongers. Some of these peddle their wares only to doctors. Others outdo the wildest excesses of the patent medicine vendors of other days. There is no end to their astounding claims in the display advertisements of newspapers, or to their cynical trading on the hopes of the populace for health, for vigor, for beauty, and for success in life. They are daring and clever in innuendo; they do not hesitate to make false statements.

The most prominent of these advertisers is the Vitamon Corporation of New York. These commercialists state that an adequate vitamin supply is not to be obtained in staple foods. The advertisement neglects to state that the vitamin content of many foods is little damaged by proper cooking, and leaves out entirely any mention of the great vitamin value of milk, salads, and other uncooked foods. Finally it "positively guarantees" to put on firm flesh, clear the skin, and increase energy, with all the false assurance and indifference to the truth that any patent medicine advertisement might display.

Now it is a merit of Fleischmann's yeast that it does actually contain a large amount of vitamin B, even though, as we have pointed out, it is by no means necessary to buy yeast to obtain this vitamin.

A careful investigation, recently published in the Journal of the American Medical Association, shows that Mastin's Yeast Vitamon tablets fail to protect guinea pigs against scurvy. Such animals, fed a scurvy-producing diet, supplemented by the Vitamon in supposedly adequate doses, invariably developed scurvy in from fourteen to sixteen days. Therefore the claim that these pills contain vitamin C is not upheld. What is more, the Vitamon tablets fail to protect pigeons against a beriberi-producing diet; therefore they also lack vitamin B. The investigation states that "Mastin's Yeast Vitamon does not contain more than traces of water-soluble B, and is very inferior to most of our foods in its content of this substance."

A similar failure to contain appreciable amounts of vitamin is noted for Irving's Phos-Pho Vitamine, for Alpha Vitamine, and for Super-Vitamine. Even vitamin preparations that have the dignity and sanctity to be sold only to doctors fall far short of their advertising claims. This is the case with Metagen, manufactured by Parke Davis & Co. Samples purchased in the open market failed to protect animals from scurvy, and were therefore lacking in vitamin C. Such samples were also uncertain in their protection of pigeons from beriberi and were consequently deficient in their content of vitamin B.

A frank and instructive article on the social menace, "The Truth About Syphilis," will be the next article in the Dr. De Kruif series "Doctors and Drug-Mongers." See Hearst's International for November.

IVER JOHNSON SAFETY AUTOMATIC REVOLVER

Self-preservation is the first law

OUR forefathers who framed the Constitution of the United States recognized the right of citizens to protect their persons and property.

And so the second amendment was inserted, which says, "... the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed."

Safe protection means keeping an Iver Johnson in your home. The standard safety revolver for over fifty years. Knocks, jolts, bumps, thumps cannot discharge it. You can even "Hammer the Hammer."

Yet the Iver Johnson is always alert and ready when needed. Drawn-tempered piano-wire springs—instead of ordinary flat springs, which often break—keep this revolver ready for instant use.

Hammer and Hammerless models in all calibres. Regular, Perfect Rubber, and Western Walnut grips. If your dealer hasn't the particular model you want, write us.

They Call Me Carpenter

bundles of books and magazines tied with stout cords. I took the cords, and we bound the "pacifist's" wrists and ankles, and put a gag in his mouth, and then we felt sure he was really a pacifist. We carried him to the closet and laid him on the floor, where a humorous idea came to me. These bundles of magazines and books were no doubt the ones which the mob had confiscated from Comrade Abell. Since they were no longer salable, they might as well be put to some use, so I gathered armfuls of them and distributed them over the form of Hamby, until there was no longer a trace of him visible.

AND WHILE I was doing this, I noticed in one corner of the closet, under the bundles, a wooden box about a foot square. Upon trying to lift it, I discovered that it weighed several times as much as it should have weighed if it had contained printed matter.

"Here's our infernal machine," I whispered, and I picked it up gingerly, and tiptoed out of the room and down a rear stairway of the building. I unlocked the door and opened it—and there, crouching in the shadows alongside the door, just as I expected, I saw a man.

"Hello!" I whispered.

"Hello!" said he, badly startled.

"Here's something belonging to Hamby. He wants me to give it to you. Be careful, it's heavy." I deposited the box in his hands, and shut the door, and turned the lock again, and groped my way upstairs, chuckling to myself as I imagined the man's plight. He would not know what to make of this incident, and I had an idea he would not be able to find out, because he could not leave his post. Nor would he have much time to figure over the matter; for when I got back to the light I looked at my watch, and it lacked just three minutes to twelve.

I found that Lynch and Old Joe had shut the pacifist in the closet, and were in the ante-room waiting for me. I whispered that everything was all right. A moment later we heard a sound in the big room, and peered in, and saw a door at the far end open—and there was Carpenter, standing with his white robes gleaming in the light. After a moment I realized that they gleamed even more than was natural; I perceived once more that strange "aura" which had been noticeable at the mass-meeting; and by means of it I noticed an even more startling thing. There were drops of sweat on Carpenter's forehead, as always when he had labored intensely in his soul. This time I saw that the drops were large, and they were drops of blood!

A trembling seized me. I was awestricken before this man—afraid to go on with what I was doing, and equally afraid to back out. I remained staring helplessly and saw him approach the sleeping figures, and stand looking at them. "Could you not watch with me one hour?" he said, in his gentle, sad voice; and he put his hand on Comrade Abell's shoulder, with the words, "The time has come."

Abell started to his feet, and began to apologize. The other said nothing, but stooped and waked Moneta. And at that moment I heard the shrill blast of a whistle outside on the street! "There they are!" whispered Old Joe.

I ran down the stairs, and peered through the doorway, and sure enough, there were four or five automobiles stopped before the headquarters, having approached from opposite directions. I stood just long enough to see a crowd of men jumping out; then I ran back, and leaving Old Joe and Lynch to keep guard at the top of the stairs, I walked in and greeted Carpenter.

He expressed no surprise at seeing me. Evidently his thoughts were on other things. For my part, I was trembling with excitement, so that my knees would barely hold me up. How long would it be before T-S and his crowd appeared? I could figure the time it should take them to drive from Eternal City; but suppose something held them up? How long would the men stay out on the street, waiting for Hamby to answer their signal? Surely not many minutes! They would storm the place, and hunt out their victim for themselves. And suppose they should carry him off before the others arrived?

Suddenly the silence of the night outside was shattered by the scream of that siren which served to warn people out of the way when T-S was moving his companies about on location.

I went up to Carpenter. I didn't enjoy telling him a lie; in fact, I had an idea that one couldn't lie to him successfully. But I tried it. "Mr. Carpenter, Hamby left a message; he had to go downstairs, and said he wanted to see you. Would you come down and meet him?"

"Ah, yes!" said Carpenter. And he walked to the door and down the stairs without another word. The rest of us followed him: Abell and Moneta first, they being innocent and unsuspecting; and then Lynch, and then Joe and I.

THE prophet stepped out to the street, and was instantly surrounded by a group of men, two of whom grasped him by the arms. He did not lift a hand, nor even make a sound. Comrade Abell, of course, started to cry out in protest; Moneta, the Mexican, reverted to his ancestors. His hand flashed to an inside pocket, and a knife leaped out. One of the men had hold of him, and Moneta shouted, "Stand back, or I cut off your ears." At which Carpenter turned, and in a stern, commanding voice proclaimed: "Let no man use force in my behalf!" Moneta stood still; and of course Lynch and Old Joe and I stood still; and the dozen men about Carpenter started to lead him away to their waiting automobiles.

But they did not get very far. Upon the silence of the street a voice rang out. Ordinarily, one would have known it was the voice of a woman; but in this place, under these exciting circumstances, it seemed the voice of a supernatural being. It almost sang the words; it was like a silver bugle calling across a battlefield—glorious, thrilling, hypnotic. "Make way-y-y-y for the Grand Imperial Kle-e-eagle of the Ku-u Klux Klan!" Everyone was startled; but I think I was startled more than the rest, for I knew the voice! Mary Magna had taken another speaking part!

I was on the steps of the building, so I could see over the heads of the crowd. There were four of the big busses from Eternal City, two having approached from each direction. Some fifty figures had descended from them, and others were still descending, each one clad in a voluminous white robe, with a white hood over the head, and two black holes for eyes, and another for the nose. These figures had spread out in a half moon, entirely surrounding the little mob of men who had meant harm to Carpenter, and penning them against the wall of the building. In the center of the half moon, standing a few feet in advance, was the figure of the "Grand Imperial Kleagle," with a red star upon the forehead of the white hood, and shrouded white arms stretched out, and in one hand a magic wand with a red light at the end. This wand was waving over the group, and had apparently its full supernatural effect, for one and all stood rooted to the spot, staring with wide-open eyes.

THE grand-opera voice raised again its silver chant: "Give way, all mobs! Yield! Retire! Abdicate! Bow down-n-n-n! Make way for the Mob of Mobs, the irresistible, imperial, superior Super-mob! Harken to the Lord High Chief Commanding Dragon of the Esoteric Cohorts, the Exalted Grand Imperial Kleagle of the Ku Klux Klan!"

Then the Grand Imperial Kleagle turned and addressed the white-robed throng in a voice of sharp command: "Klansmen! Remember your oath! The hour of Judgment is here! The guilty wretch cowers! The grand insuperable sentence has been spoken! Coelum animum imperiabilis sensecat! Simila similibus per quantum imperator. Inexorabilis ingenium parasimilibus esperantur! Saeva imperatus ignotum indignatio! Salvo! Suppositio! Indurato! Klansmen, kneel!"

As one man, the host fell upon its knees. "Klansmen, swear! Si fractus illibatur orbis, impavidum ferient ruinae! You have heard the sentence. What is the penalty? Is it death?"

And a voice in the crowd cried "Death!" And the others took it up; there was a roar: "Death! Death!"

Finally the Grand Imperial Kleagle pointed her shrouded white arm at Carpenter, who stood as pale as death, but unflinchingly. "Death to all traitors!" she cried. "Death to all agitators! Death to all enemies of the Ku Klux Klan! Condamnatus! Incomparabilis! Ingenientis exequatur! Let the Loyal High Inexorable Guardians and the Grand Holy Seneschals of the Klan advance!"

Six shrouded figures stepped out from the crowd. Said the Grand Imperial Kleagle: "Possess yourselves of the body of this guilty wretch!" And to the group of staring men: [Continued on page 139]

Destroys Superfluous Hair and Roots

Look in your mirror and see if there is a tiny growth of downy hair at either side of the upper lip. Perhaps unconsciously, you have permitted these tiny hairs to grow until they are now large and conspicuous, marring your good looks.

Remove them at once, off and out, roots and all, before they enlarge the pores and before they become a subject of jest among your men and women friends.

For over seventeen years ZIP has helped women become more beautiful by painlessly destroying superfluous hair on the lip, face, neck, forearm, underarm and limbs.

ZIP is easily applied at home, pleasingly fragrant, quick, effective, absolutely harmless. It leaves the skin soft and smooth. Guaranteed.

ZIP gently lifts out the roots and in this way destroys the growth.

Ladies everywhere are recognizing that ordinary depilatories and shaving merely remove surface hair, leaving the roots to thrive and often cause the hair to grow faster and coarser—but ZIP removes hair and roots in an entirely different, yet easy way, and destroys the growth.

"Yield up this varlet to the High Secret Court-martial of the Klan, which alone has power to punish such as he."

What the bewildered men made of all this hocus-pocus I had no idea. Whatever they thought, it was obvious that they were hopelessly outnumbered. There could be nothing for a mob to do but yield to a Super-mob; and they yielded. Those who were in front of Carpenter stepped back, and the Loyal High Inexorable Guardians and the Grand Holy Seneschals took Carpenter by the arms and led him away. Apparently they were going to overlook the rest of us; but Old Joe and Lynch and myself took Abell and Moneta by the shoulders and shoved them along into the midst of the "Klansmen."

There was no need to consider dignity after that. We hustled Carpenter to the nearest of the busses, and put him in; the Grand Imperial Kleagle followed, and the rest of us clambered in after her. Sitting up beside the driver, watching the scene, was T-S, beaming with delight; he got me by the hand and wrung it. I could not speak; my teeth were literally chattering with excitement. Carpenter, sitting in the seat behind us, must have realized by now the meaning of this scandalous adventure; but he said not a word. All the way to Eternal City, T-S and I and Old Joe slapped one another on the back and roared with laughter, and the rest of the Klansmen roared with laughter—all save the Grand Imperial Kleagle, who sat by Carpenter's side, and was discovered to be silently weeping.

T-S AND I had exchanged a few whispered words, and decided that we would take Carpenter to T-S's place, which was a few miles in the country from Eternal City. He would be as safe there as anywhere I could think of. When we had got to the studios, we discharged our Klansmen, and arranged to send Old Joe to his home, and the three disciples to a hotel for the night; then I invited Carpenter to step into T-S's car. He had not spoken a word, and all he said now was, "I wish to be alone."

I answered: "I am taking you to a place where you may be alone as long as you choose." So he entered the car, and a few minutes later T-S and I were escorting him into the latter's showy mansion.

We were getting to be rather scared now, for Carpenter's silence was forbidding. But again he said: "I wish to be alone." We took him upstairs to a bedroom, and shut him in and left him—taking the precaution to lock the door.

Downstairs, we stood and looked at one another, feeling like two schoolboys. "You stay here, Billy!" insisted the magnate. "You gotta see him in de mornin'! I won't see him without you."

"I'll stay," I said, and looked at my watch. It was after one o'clock. "Give me an alarm clock," I said, "because Carpenter wakes with the birds, and we don't want him escaping by the window."

So it came about that at daybreak I tapped on Carpenter's door, softly, so as not to waken him if he were asleep. But he answered, "Come in"; and I entered, and found him sitting by the window, watching the dawn.

I stood timidly in the middle of the room, and began: "I realize, of course,

Mr. Carpenter, that I have taken a very great liberty with you—"

"You have said it," he replied; and his eyes were awful.

"But," I persisted, "if you knew what danger you were in—"

Said he: "Do you think that I came to Mobland to look for a comfortable life?"

"But," I pleaded, "if you only knew that particular gang! Do you realize that they had planted an infernal machine, a dynamite bomb, in that room? And all the world was to read in the newspapers this morning that you had been conspiring to blow up somebody?"

Said Carpenter: "Would it have been the first time that I have been lied about?"

"Of course," I argued, "I know what I have done—"

"You can have no idea what you have done. You are too ignorant."

I bowed my head, prepared to take my punishment. But at once Carpenter's voice softened. "You are a part of Mobland," he said; "you cannot help yourself. In Mobland it is not possible for even a martyrdom to proceed in an orderly way."

I gazed at him a moment, bewildered. "What's the good of a martyrdom?" I cried in bewilderment.

"The good is, that men can be moved in no other way; they are in that childish stage of being, where they require blood sacrifice."

"But what kind of a martyrdom?" I argued. "So undignified and unimpressive! To have hot tar smeared over your body, and be hanged by the neck like a common criminal!"

I realized that this last phrase was unfortunate. Said Carpenter: "I am used to being treated as a common criminal!"

"Well," said I, in a voice of despair, "of course, if you're absolutely bent on being hanged—if you can't think of anything you would prefer—"

I stopped, for I saw that he had covered his face with his hands. In the silence I heard him whisper: "I prayed last night that this cup might pass from me; and apparently my prayer has been answered."

"Well," I said, deciding to cheer up, "you see, I have only been playing the part of Providence. Let me play it just a few days longer, until this mob calms down. I am truly ashamed for them."

CARPENTER was on his feet. "I know!" he exclaimed. "I know! You need not tell me about that! I blame the men who incite them—the old men, the soft-handed men, who sit back in office-chairs and plan madness for the world! What shall be the punishment of these men?"

"They're a hard crowd—" I admitted.

"I have seen them! They are stone-faced men! They are wolves with machinery! They are savages with polished fingernails! And they have made of the land a place of fools! They have made it Mobland!"

I did not try to answer him, but waited until the storm of his emotion passed. "You are right, Mr. Carpenter. But that is the fact about our world, and you cannot change it—"

Carpenter flung out his arm at me. "Let no man utter in my presence the supreme blasphemy against life!"

So, of course, I was silent: and Carpenter turning away from me went and sat at the window again, and watched the dawn.

At last I ventured: "All that your friends ask, Mr. Carpenter, is that you will wait until this excitement is over. After that, it may be possible to get people to listen to you. But if these men see you on the streets now, they will inflict indignities upon you, they will mishandle you—"

Said Carpenter then: "Do not fear those who kill the body, but fear those who kill the soul."

So again I fell silent; and presently he remarked: "My brother, I wish to be alone."

Said I: "Won't you please promise, Mr. Carpenter—"

He answered: "I make promises only to my Father. Let me be."

I WENT downstairs, and there was T-S, wandering around like a big fat monk in a purple dressing-gown. And there was Maw also—only her dressing-gown was rose-pink, with white chrysanthemums on it. It took a lot to get those two awake at six o'clock in the morning, you may be sure; but there they were, very much worried. "Vot does he say?" cried the magnate. "He won't say what he is going to do."

"Vell, did you lock de door?" I answered that I had, and then Maw put in, in a hurry: "Billy, you gotta stay here and take care of him! If he vas to come downstairs and tell me to do some-ting, I would got to do it!"

I promised; and a little later they got ready a cup of coffee and a glass of milk and some rolls and butter and fruit, and I had the job of taking up the tray and setting it in the prophet's room. When I came in, I tried to say cheerfully, "Here's your breakfast," and not to show any trace of my uneasiness.

Carpenter looked at me, and said: "You had the door locked?"

I summoned my nerve, and answered, "Yes."

Said he: "What is the difference to me between being your prisoner and being the prisoner of your rulers?"

Said I: "Mr. Carpenter, the difference is that we don't intend to hang you."

"And how long do you propose to keep me here?"

"For about four days," I said. "If you will only give me your word to wait that time, you may have the freedom of this beautiful place, and when the period is over, I pledge you every help I can give to make known your message to the people."

I waited for an answer, but none came, so I set down the tray and went out, locking the door again. And downstairs was one of T-S's secretaries, with copies of the morning newspapers, and I picked up a Times, and there was a headline, all the way across the page:

KU KLUX KLAN KIDNAPS CARPENTER—RANTING RED PROPHET DISAPPEARS IN TOOTING AUTOS

I understood, of course, that the secret agency which had engineered the mobbing of the prophet would have had their stories all ready for our morning newspapers—stories which played up to the full the finding of an infernal machine, and an unprovoked attack by the armed followers of the "Red Prophet." But now all this was gone, and instead was a story glorifying the klansmen as the saviors of the city's good name. It was evident that up to the hour of going to press, neither of the two newspapers had any idea but that the white-robed figures were genuine followers of the "Grand Imperial Kleagle."

But of course the truth about our made-to-order mob could not be kept very long. As a matter of fact, it wasn't two hours before the Evening Blare was calling the home of the movie magnate to inquire where he had taken the kidnaped prophet. Of course T-S's secretary, who answered the telephone, lied valiantly; but here again, we knew the truth would leak.

IN THE course of the next hour or two there were a dozen newspaper reporters besieging the mansion. Before my mind's eye flashed new headlines:

MOVIE MAGNATE HIDES MOB PROPHET FROM LAW

This was an aspect of the matter which we had at first overlooked. Carpenter was due at Judge Ponty's police court at nine o'clock that morning. Was he going, demanded the reporters, and if not, why not? Mary Magna no doubt would be willing to sacrifice the two hundred dollars bail that she had put up; but the judge had the right to issue a bench warrant and send a deputy for the prisoner. Would he do it?

Behind the scenes of Western City's government there began forthwith a tremendous diplomatic duel. I called up my Uncle Timothy, and explained the situation.

"But, Billy, what can I do?" he cried. "It's a matter of the law."

I answered: "Fudge! You know perfectly well there's no magistrate or judge in this city that won't do what he's told, if the right people tell him. What I want you to do is to get busy with de Wiggs and Westerly and Carson, and the rest of the big gang, and persuade them that there's nothing to be gained by dragging Carpenter out of his hiding-place."

At eleven o'clock that morning, when the case of John Doe Carpenter versus the Commonwealth of Western City was reached in Judge Ponty's court, and the bailiff called the name of the defendant and there was no answer, the magistrate in a single sentence declared the bail forfeited.

I took up Carpenter's lunch at one o'clock and discovered, to my dismay, that he had not tasted his breakfast. I ventured to speak to him; but he sat on a chair, gazing ahead of him and paying no attention to me, so I left him alone.

T-S, NEGLECTING his important business, stayed around; getting up out of one chair and walking nowhere, and then sitting down in another chair. I did the same, and after we had exchanged chairs a dozen times—it being then about eight o'clock in the evening—I said: "By the way, hadn't you better call up the morning papers and persuade them to be decent?" So T-S seated himself at the telephone, and asked for the managing editor of the Western City Times.

It began with a reminder of the amount of advertising space which Eternal City consumed in the Times in the course of a year. It wasn't often that T-S asked favors, but he wanted to ask one now; he wanted the Times to let up on this prophet business. Everything was quiet now, the prophet wasn't bothering anybody—

Suddenly, at the height of his eloquence, T-S stopped; and it seemed to me as if he jumped a foot out of his chair. "VOT!" And then, "Vy, man, you're crazy!" He turned upon me, his eyes wide with dismay. "Billy! Dey got a report—Carpenter is shoost now speakin' to a mob on de steps of de City Hall!"

The magnate did not wait to see me jump out of my chair, or to hear my exclamations, but turned again to the telephone.

Running upstairs, I found Carpenter's door locked; I opened it, and rushed in. The place was empty! The bird had flown!

I hurried to the city, and got within a couple of blocks of the City Hall, when I came upon the thing I dreaded—my friend Carpenter in the hands of the mob!

They had got hold of a canvas-covered wagon, of the type of the old prairie-schooner. The rioters had hoisted their victim on top of the wagon, having first dumped a gallon of red paint over his head, so that everyone might know him for the Red Prophet they had been reading about in the papers. They had tied a long rope to the shaft of the wagon, and the men had hold of it, and were hauling it through the streets, dancing and singing, shouting murder threats against the reds.

Halfway down the block we came to the Palace Hotel, and some excited men came pouring out. I heard the shrieks of a woman, and put my foot on the edge of a store-window to see over the heads of the crowd. Half a dozen rowdies had got hold of a girl; I don't know what she had done—maybe she had been saucy to one of the gang; anyhow, they began tearing her clothes. Then they took her on their shoulders, and ran her out to the wagon, and tossed her up beside the Red Prophet. "There's a girl for you!" they yelled.

THE cortège came to the Hippodrome, which is our biggest theater. They have all kinds of shows in the Hippodrome, and have a driveway by which they bring in automobiles, or war-chariots, or wild animals in cages, or whatever they will. Now the mob stormed the entrance, and brushed the doorkeepers to one side, and unbolted and swung back the big gates, and a swarm of yelling maniacs rushed the lumbering prairie-schooner up the slope into the building.

The wagon rolled on; the advance guard swept everything out of the way, scenery as well as stage-hands and actors, to the vast astonishment of an audience of a couple of thousand people.

I had got near enough so that I could see what happened. I don't know whether Carpenter fainted; anyhow, he slipped from his perch, and a score of upraised hands caught him. Someone tore down a hanging from the walls of the stage set, and twenty or thirty men formed a circle about it, and put the prophet in the middle of it, and began to toss him ten feet up into the air and catch him and throw him again. And that was all I could stand—I turned and went out by the rear entrance of the theater. The street in back was deserted; I stood there, with my hands clasped to my head, sick with disgust; I found myself repeating out loud, over and over again, those words of Carpenter: "It is Rome!

It is Rome! Old Rome that never dies!"

A moment later I heard a crash of glass up above me; I ducked, just in time to avoid a shower of it. Then I looked up, and to my consternation saw the red-painted head and the red and white shoulders of Carpenter suddenly emerging. The shoulders were quickly followed by the rest of him; but fortunately there was a narrow shed between him and the ground. He struck the shed and rolled, and as he fell, I caught him, and let him down.

I expected to find my prophet nearly dead; I made ready to get him onto my shoulders and find some place to hide him. But to my surprise he started to his feet. I could not see much of him, because of the streams of paint; but I could see enough to realize that his face was contorted with fury. I remembered that gentle, compassionate countenance; never had I dreamed to see it like this!

He raised his clenched hands. "I meant to die for this people! But now—let them die for themselves!"

WITH these words he started to run down the street; hauling up his long robes—never would I have dreamed that a prophet's bare legs could flash so quickly, that he could cover the ground at such amazing speed! I set out after him. He came to a cross-street, and dodged the crowded traffic, and I also got through, knocking pedestrians this way and that. I began to get short of breath, a little dizzy. But still I followed my prophet with the bare flying legs; we swept around another corner, and I saw the goal to which the tormented soul was racing—St. Bartholomew's!

He went up the steps three at a time, and I went up four at a time behind him. I saw people in the church start up with cries of amazement; someone grabbed me, but I broke away—and saw my prophet give three tremendous leaps. The first took him up the altar-steps; the second took him onto the altar; the third took him up into the stained-glass window whence he had first descended.

And there he turned and faced me. His paint-smeared robes fell down about his bare legs, his convulsed and angry face became as gentle and compassionate as the paint would permit. With a wave of his hand, he signaled me to stand back and let him alone. Then the hand sank to his side, and he stood motionless. Exhausted, dizzy, I fell against one of the pews, and then into a seat, and bowed my head in my arms.

I don't know just how much time passed after that. I felt a hand on my shoulder, and realized that someone was shaking me. I had a horror of hands reaching out for me, so I tried to get away from this one; but it persisted, and there was a voice, saying, "You must get up, my friend. It's time we closed. Are you ill? Can I be of any help to you?"

I raised my head; and first I glanced at the figure above the altar. It was perfectly motionless; and—incredible as it may seem—there was no trace of red paint upon either the face or the robes! The figure was dignified and serene, with a halo of light about its head—and in short, it was the regulation stained-glass figure that I had gazed at through all my childhood.

Which of these two men has learned the secret of 15 minutes a day?

The secret is contained in the free book offered below. Until you have read it you have no idea how much 15 minutes a day can mean in growth and success. Send for your copy now

HERE are two men, equally good-looking; equally well-dressed. You see such men at every social gathering. One of them can talk of nothing beyond the mere day's news. The other brings to every subject a wealth of side light and illustration that makes him listened to eagerly.

He talks like a man who has traveled widely, though his only travels are a business man's trips. He knows something of history and biography, of the work of great scientists, and the writings of philosophers, poets and dramatists.

Yet he is busy, as all men are, in the affairs of every day. How has he found time to acquire so rich a mental background? When there is such a multitude of books to read, how can any man be well-read?

The answer to this man's success—and to the success of thousands of men and women like him—is contained in a free book that you may have for the asking. In it is told the story of Dr. Eliot's great discovery, which, as one man expressed it, "does for reading what the invention of the telegraph did for communication." From his lifetime of reading, study, and teaching, forty years of it as president of Harvard University, Dr. Eliot tells just what few books he chose for the most famous library in the world; why he chose them, and how he has arranged them with notes and reading courses so that any man can get from them the essentials of a liberal education in even fifteen minutes a day.

so, for Carnac's new honors would play a great part in influencing her. In his mind, it was now or never for himself: he must bring his affairs to a crisis.

Junia's father was poor, but the girl had given their home an air of comfort and an art that belonged to larger spheres. Chintz was the cover on windows and easy chairs, and in a corner of the parlor was a chintz-covered lounge where she sat and read of an evening. So it was that, with Carnac elected and Barode Barouche buried, she sat with one of Disraeli's novels in her hand busy with the future. She saw for Carnac a safe career, for his two chief foes were gone—Luzanne Larue and Barode Barouche. She understood now why Carnac had never asked her to be his wife, why that had been impossible.

There was the fragrance of roses in the room. She had gathered many of them that afternoon. Suddenly she caught a bud from a bunch on a table, and fastened it in the bosom of her dress. Somehow, as she did it, she had a feeling that she would like to clasp a man's head to her breast where the rose was—one of those wild thoughts that come to the sanest woman at times.

There came a knock at the outer door, and before that of her own room opened, she recognized the step of the visitor. So it was Tarboe had come.

"I hope you're glad to see me," he said with an uncertain smile, as he saw her look of surprise.

"I hope I am," she replied, and motioned him to a seat. He chose a high-backed chair with a wide seat near the lounge. He made a motion of humorous dissent to her remark, and sat down.

"Well, we pulled it off somehow, didn't we?" she said. "Carnac Grier is M. P."

"And his foe is in his grave," remarked Tarboe dryly.

"Providence pays debts that ought to be paid. This election has settled a lot of things," she returned with a smile. "Carnac Grier is beginning to get even with his foes at last—all of them."

"I'm not a foe—if that's what you mean. I've proved it."

SHE smiled provokingly. "You've proved only you're not an absolute devil, that's all. You've not proved yourself a real man—not yet. Do you think it paid your debt to Carnac Grier that you helped get him into Parliament?"

His face became a little heated. "I'll prove to you and to the world that I'm not an absolute devil in the Grier interests. I didn't steal the property. I tried to induce John Grier to leave it to Carnac or his mother. He left it to me. Was I to blame for that?"

"Perhaps not, but you could have taken Carnac in, or given up the property to him—the rightful owner. You could have done that. But you were thinking of yourself altogether."

"Not altogether. I am bound to keep my word to John Grier. Besides, if Carnac had inherited the property it would have got into difficulties—there were things only John Grier and I understood, and Carnac would have been flooded. But I have the business at my finger's ends. I've added five per cent to the value of the business since John Grier died. I can double the value of it in twenty years."

"If you make up your mind to do it you will," she said with admiration, for the man was persuasive, and he was playing a game in which he was a master.

Her remarks were alive with banter, for Tarboe's humor was a happiness to her.

AS TARBOE looked at her, many thoughts flashed through his mind. If he married her now, and the truth was told about the wills and the law gave Carnac his rights, she might hate him for not having told her when he proposed. So it was that in his desire for her life as his own, he now determined there should be no second will. In any case, Carnac had enough to live on through his mother. Also, he had capacity to support himself.

There was a touch of ruthlessness in Tarboe. No one would ever guess what the second will contained—no one. The bank would have a letter saying where the will was to be found, but if it was not there when they looked—

He would ask Junia to be his wife now, while she was so friendly. Her eyes were shining, her face was alive with feeling, and he was aware that the best chance of his life had come to win her.

His face flushed with feeling, his eyes grew bright with longing, his tongue was loosed to the enterprise.

"Do you dream, and remember your dreams?" he asked with a thrill in his voice. "Do you?"

"I don't dream often, but I sometimes remember my dreams."

"I dream much, and one dream I have most constantly."

"What is it?" she asked with anticipation of his answer.

"It is the capture of a wild bird in a garden—in a cultivated garden where there are no nests, no coverts for the secret invaders. I dream that I pursue the bird from flower-bed to flower-bed, from bush to bush, along paths and along the green-covered walls; and I am not alone in my chase, for there are others who pursue. It is a bitter struggle to win the wild thing."

He rose to his feet, bent over her and spoke hotly. "Junia, the end of my waiting has come. I want you as I never wanted anything in my life. I love you, Junia. I have loved you from the first moment I saw you, and nothing is worth while with you not in it. Let us work together. It is a big, big game I'm playing and with you—"

"Yes, it's a big game you're playing," she interjected with emotion. "It is a big, big game and, all things considered, you should win it, but I doubt you will. I feel there are matters bigger than the game, or than you, or me, or anyone else."

She also got to her feet, and Tarboe was so near her she could feel his hot breath on her cheek.

"You have said all that can be said, you have gifts greater than you yourself believe; and I have been tempted. But it is no use. I cannot marry you; if you were as rich as Midas, as powerful as Caesar, I would not marry you—never, never, never!" she said emphatically.

"You love another," he said boldly. "You love Carnac Grier."

She looked him straight in the eyes. "I do not love you—isn't that enough?"

"Almost—almost enough," he said embarrassed at her direct answer

ALL JUNIA had ever felt of the soul of things was upon her as she arranged flowers and listened to the church-bells ringing.

"They seem to be always ringing," she said to herself, as she lightly touched the roses. "It must be a Saint's Day!"

She looked out into the garden and saw Carnac making his way toward the house. A few moments later, her hand lay in that of Carnac, and his eyes met hers.

"It's all come our way, Junia," he remarked gaily, though there was sadness in his tone.

"It's as you wanted it. You won."

"Thanks to you, Junia," and he took from his pocket the blue certificate.

"That—oh, that was not easy to get," she said with agitation. "She had a bad purpose, that girl."

"She meant to announce it?"

"Yes, through Barode Barouche. He agreed to that."

Carnac flushed. "He agreed to that—you know it?"

"Yes. The day you were made candidate she arrived here; and the next morning she went to Barode Barouche and told her story. He bade her remain secret till the time was ripe, and he was to be the judge of that. He was waiting for the night before the election. Then he was going to strike you and win!"

Carnac's head was sunk on his breast, his eyes were burning. "It was a horrible thing for Barouche to plan!"

"Why so horrible? He was out against you, and if you were hiding a marriage for whatever reason, it should be known to all whose votes you wanted."

"Barouche was the last man on earth to challenge me, for he had a more terrible secret than this of mine."

"What was it?" Her voice had alarm, for she had never seen Carnac so disturbed.

"He was fighting his own son—and he knew it!"

The words came in broken accents.

"He was fighting his own son, and he knew it! You mean to say that!" Horror was in her voice.

"I mean that the summer before I was born—" He told her the story as his mother had told it to him. Then at last he said:

"And now you know Barode Barouche got what he deserved. He ruined my mother's life, he died the easiest death such a man could die. He has also spoiled my life. I want you to know why our ways must forever lie apart."

"Nothing can spoil your life except yourself," she declared firmly, and she laid a hand upon his arm.

"You want to cut me out of your life for a bad man's crime, not your own. Listen, Carnac. Last night I told Mr. Tarboe I could not marry him. He is rich, he has control of a great business, he is a man of mark. Why do you suppose I did it, and for over two years have done the same; for he has wanted me all that time? Does not a girl know when a real man wants her? And Luke Tarboe is a real man. He knows what he wants, and he goes for it, and little could stop him as he travels. Why do you suppose I did it?" Her face flushed, anger lit her eyes. "Because there was another man; but I've only just discovered he's a sham, with no real love for me. It makes me sorry I ever knew him."

"Me—no real love for you! That's not the truth: it's because I have no real name to give you—that's why I've spoken as I have. Never have I cared for anyone except you, Junia. I knew Tarboe had a hold on your heart. Don't think I'm so vain as to think I've always been the one man for you. I lived long and weary years in anxious fear, and—"

"And now you shut the door in my face! I'm the best judge of what I want," she declared almost sharply, yet there was a smile on her lips.

Suddenly she saw in his eyes a curious soft look of understanding, and she put her hand on his shoulder. "Carnac," she said gently, "great, great Carnac, won't you love me?"

For an instant he felt he must still put her from him, then he overcame all compunctions, and he clasped her to his breast.

"But I really had to throw myself into your arms!" she said a while later, as her hand stroked his hair.

IT WAS Thanksgiving Day, and all the people of the Province were en fête. The day was clear, and the air was thrilling with the spirits of the north country: the vibrant sting of oxygen, the blessed resilience of the river and the hills.

It was a great day on the St. Lawrence, for men were preparing to go to the backwoods, to the "shanties," and hosts were busy with the crops, storing them; while all in trade and industry were cheerful. In every church, Catholic and Protestant, hands of devoted workers had made beautiful altar and communion table, and lectern and pulpit, and in the Methodist tabernacle and the Presbyterian kirk, women had made ornate the bare interiors. The bells of all the churches were ringing, French and English; and each priest, clergyman, and minister, was moving his people in his own way, and by his own ritual to bless God and live.

In the city itself, the Mayor had arranged a festival in the evening, and there were gathered many people to give thanks. But those most conspicuous were the poor, unsophisticated habitants, who were on good terms with the refreshment provided. Their enthusiasm was partly due to the presence of Carnac Grier.

In his speech to the great crowd, among other things the Mayor said: "It is our happiness that we have here one whose name is familiar to all in French Canada—that of the new Member of Parliament, M. Carnac Grier. In M. Grier, we have a man who knows his own mind, and it is at one with the interests of the French as well as the English. He is young, he has power, and he will use his youth and power to advance the good of the whole country. May he live long!"

Carnac never spoke better in his life than in his brief reply. When he had

An Easy Way to Remove Dandruff

If you want plenty of thick, beautiful, glossy, silky hair do by all means get rid of dandruff, for it will starve your hair and ruin it if you don't.

The best way to get rid of dandruff is to dissolve it. To do this, just apply a little Liquid Arvon at night before retiring; use enough to moisten the scalp, and rub it in gently with the finger tips.

By morning, most, if not all, of your dandruff will be gone, and three or four more applications should completely remove every sign and trace of it.

You will find, too, that all itching of the scalp will stop, and your hair will look and feel a hundred times better. You can get Liquid Arvon at any drug store. A four-ounce bottle is usually all that is needed.

finished, someone touched his arm. It was Luke Tarboe.

"A good speech, Grier. Can you give me a few moments?"

"Here?" asked Carnac smiling.

"Not here, but in the building. There is a room where we can be alone, and I have something to tell you of great importance."

"Of great importance, eh? Well, so have I to tell you, Tarboe."

A FEW minutes later they were in the Mayor's private parlor.

Presently Carnac said: "Let me give you my news first, Tarboe: I am to marry Junia Shale—and soon."

Tarboe nodded. "I expected that. She is worth the best the world can offer." There was a ring of honesty in his tone. "All the more reason why I should tell you what my news is, Carnac. I'm going to tell you what oughtn't yet to be told, for another two years, but I feel it due you, for you were badly used; and so I break my word to your father."

Carnac's hand shot out in protest, but Tarboe took no notice. "I mean to tell you now in the hour of your political triumph that—"

"That I can draw on you for ten thousand dollars, perhaps?" shot out Carnac.

"Not for ten thousand, but in two years' time—or tomorrow—for a hundred and fifty times that if you want it."

Carnac shrugged his shoulders. "I don't know what you're driving at, Tarboe. Two years from now—or tomorrow—I can draw on you for a hundred and fifty times ten thousand dollars! What does that mean? Is it you're tired of the fortune left you by the biggest man industrially French-Canada has ever known?"

"I'll tell you the truth—I never had a permanent fortune, and I was never meant to have the permanent fortune, though I inherited it by will. That was a matter between John Grier and myself. There was another will made later, which left the business to someone else."

"I don't see."

"Of course you don't see, and yet you must understand me."

Tarboe then told the story of the making of the two wills, doing justice to John Grier and his business ambition.

"He never did things like anyone else, and he didn't in dying. He loved you, Carnac. In spite of all he said and did he believed in you. He knew you had the real thing in you, if you cared to use it."

"Good God! Good God!" was all Carnac could at first say. "And you agreed to that?" he demanded.

"What rights had I? None at all. I'll come out of it with over a quarter of a million dollars—isn't that enough for a backwoodsman? I get the profits of the working for three years, and a hundred thousand dollars besides. I ought to be satisfied with that."

"Who knows of the will besides yourself?" asked Carnac sharply.

"No one. There is a letter to the bank simply saying that another will exists and where it is, but that's all."

"And you could have destroyed that will in my favor?"

"That's so." The voice of Tarboe was rough with feeling, his face grew dark. "More than once I determined to destroy it. It seemed at first I could make better use of the property than you. The temptation was big, but I held my own, and now I've no fear of meeting anyone in Heaven or Hell. I've told you all. . . . Not quite all. There's one thing more. The thought of Junia Shale made me want to burn the second will, and I almost did it; but I'm glad I didn't."

"If you had, and had married her, you wouldn't have been happy. You can't be fooling a wife and be safe."

"I guess I know that—just in time. I have a bad heart, Carnac. Your property came to me against my will through your father; but I wanted the girl you're going to marry, and against my will you won her. I fought for her. I thought there was a chance for me, because of the rumor you were secretly married—"

"I'll tell you about it, Tarboe, now. It was an ugly business." And he told in a dozen sentences the story of Luzanne and the false marriage.

WHEN he had finished, Tarboe held out his hand. "It was a close shave, Carnac."

After a few further remarks, Tarboe said: "I thought there was a chance for me with Junia Shale, but there never was a real one, for she was yours from a child. You won her fairly, Carnac. If you'll come to the office tomorrow morning, I'll show you the will."

"You'll show me the will?" asked Carnac with an edge to his tone.

"What do you mean?" Tarboe did not like the look in the other's eyes.

"I mean, what you have you shall keep, and what John Grier leaves me by that will, I will not keep."

"You will inherit, and you shall keep."

"And turn you out!" remarked Carnac ironically.

"I needn't be turned out. I hoped you'd keep me as manager. Few could do it as well, and, as member of Parliament, you haven't time yourself. I'll stay as manager at twenty thousand dollars a year, if you like to make that arrangement."

Carnac could not tell him the real reason for declining to inherit, but that did not matter. Yet there flashed into his heart a love, which he had never felt so far in his life, for John Grier. The old man had believed he would come out right in the end, and so had left him the fortune in so odd a way. How Carnac longed to tell Tarboe the whole truth about Barode Barouche, and yet he dared not! After a short time of hesitation and doubt, Carnac said firmly:

"I'll stand by the will, if you'll be my partner and manager, Tarboe. If you'll take half the business and manage the whole of it, I'll sell the half for a dollar to you, and we can run together to the end."

Tarboe's face lighted; there was a look of triumph in his eyes. It was all better than he had dared to hope, for he liked the business, and he loathed the way the world had looked at John Grier's will.

"Halves, pardner, halves!" he said, assenting gladly, and held out his hand.

They clasped hands warmly.

The door opened and Junia appeared. She looked at their faces anxiously. When she saw the smiling light in them:

"Oh, you two good men!" she said joyously, and held out a hand to each.

I Saw Him Crucified

paces each way, with stones so fitted that the blade of a knife will not go between, and the soldiers say there is gold enough within to fill the pockets of the whole army. This idea puts some fury into the attack, as you can believe, but with these flames, I fear a great deal of the plunder will be lost to our legions.

There was a great fight at the temple, and it was rumored that it would be carried by storm tonight, so I went out onto the rising ground whence one sees the city best.

As I stood in the darkness, I was suddenly aware that I was not alone. A tall, silent figure was near me, looking down at the town even as I was. I could see in the moonlight that he was clad as an officer, and as I approached him I recognized that it was Longinus, third tribune of my own legion. He is a strange silent man, who is respected by all but understood by none, for he keeps his own council. As I approached him the first flames burst from the temple, a high column of fire, which cast a glow upon our faces. In the red light I saw that the gaunt face of my companion was set like iron as he gazed upon this terrific scene.

"At last!" said he. "At last!"

He was speaking to himself rather than to me, for he started and seemed confused when I asked him what he meant.

"I have long thought that evil would come to the place," said he. "Now I see that it has come, and so I said, 'At last!'"

"For that matter," I answered, "we have all seen that evil would come to the place since it has again and again defied the authority of the Caesars."

He looked keenly at me with a question in his eyes. Then he said:

"I have heard, sir, that you are one who has a full sympathy in the matter of the gods, believing that every man should worship in accordance with his own conscience and belief."

I answered that I was a Stoic of the school of Seneca, who held that this world is a small matter and that we should care little for its fortunes, but develop in ourselves a contempt for all but the highest.

He smiled in grim fashion at this.

"I have heard," said he, "that Seneca died the richest man in all Nero's empire, so he made the best of this world in spite of his philosophy."

"What are your own beliefs?" I asked. "Are you, perhaps, one who has fathomed the mysteries of Isis, or been admitted to the society of Mithra?"

"Have you ever heard," he asked, "of the Christians?"

"Yes," said I. "There were some slaves and wandering men in Rome who called themselves such. They worshiped, so far as I could gather, some man who died over here in Judea. He was put to death, I believe, in the time of Tiberius."

"That is so," he answered. "It was at the time when Pontius Pilate was procurator. Pilate was of two minds in the matter, but the mob was as wild and savage as these very men that we have been contending with. Pilate tried to put them off with a criminal, hoping that so long as they had blood they would be satisfied.

But they chose the other and he was not strong enough to withstand them. Ah! It was a pity—a sad pity!"

You seem to know a good deal about it," said I.

"I was there," said the man simply, and became silent, while we both looked down at the huge column of flame from the burning temple. As it flared up, we could see the white tents of the army and all the country round. There was a low hill just outside the city, and my companion pointed to it.

"That was where it happened," said he. "I forget the name of the place, but in those days—it was more than thirty years ago—they put their criminals to death there. But He was no criminal. It is always His eyes that I think of—the look in His eyes."

"They have haunted me ever since. All the sorrow of earth seemed mirrored in them. Sad, sad, and yet such a deep, tender pity! One would have said that it was He who needed the pity had you seen His poor, battered, disfigured face."

"WHAT were you doing in such an affair?"

"I was junior centurion, with the gold vine-rod fresh on my shoulders. I was on duty on the hill, and never had a job that I liked less. But discipline has to be observed, and Pilate had given the order. But I thought at the time—and I was not the only one—that this man's name and work would not be forgotten, and that there would be a curse on the place that had done such a deed. There was an old woman there, His mother, with her gray hair down her back. I remember how she shrieked when one of our fellows with his lance put Him out of His pain. And a few others, women and men, poor and ragged, stood by Him. But, you see, it has turned out as I thought. Even in Rome, as you have observed, His followers have appeared."

"I rather fancy," said I, "that I am speaking to one of them."

"At least, I have not forgotten," said he. "I have been in the wars ever since with little time for study. But my pension is overdue and when I have changed the sagum for the toga, and the tunic for some little farm up Como way, then I shall look more deeply into these things."

And so I left him. I only tell you all this because I remember that you took an interest in the man, Paulus, who was put to death for preaching this religion. You told me that it had reached Caesar's palace, and I can tell you now that it has reached Caesar's soldiers as well. But, apart from this matter, I wished to tell you some of the adventures which we have had recently in raiding for food among the hills, which stretch as far south as the river Jordan. The other day conversation with Mr. Flapp to restore his ebbing confidence.

To Have and Toe Hold

Voices sifting through the closed door of Jason's room halted him. Mr. Flapp was finishing a speech. Then came a pause, and an answer in a voice which caused the face of Mr. Peaglar to turn ashen.

Zebulon Harrow, the Bone Breaker, was speaking.

"Reckon I guessed good when I said us should come to Bummin'ham, eh?"

Bud heard Jason's evil, chuckling laugh. "Reckon you is the world's mos' champeen guesser, Zebulon."

"So far," went on the man who was supposed to be Jason's bitterest enemy, "us has cleaned up pretty good. Not countin' what I won fum that lopsided Bud Peaglar shootin' pool—each of us gotten sevunty-five dollars outen that hund'ed an' fifty we won when you lemme beat you. Then we's gwine diwde the two hund'ed which he bet on you to th'ow me wrastlin', which ain't so wuss when you cumsidars that not neither of us knows nothing' much 'bout wrastlin'. Wonder what Mistuh Peaglar would think was he to know bofe of us is fakes? Anyway—"

Bud's hand was pressed tragically against his throbbing brow. He groped blindly down the hall and staggered from the house. Once he paused and stared blindly and bitterly down the tree-lined thoroughfare toward the cluster of tall buildings a dozen blocks away.

He returned to his pool room and seated himself in a secluded corner, informing his assistant that he was not feeling overly well and did not wish to be disturbed. Which was no part of a gross exaggeration. Then he buried his burning face in trembling hands and gave thought to the horrible situation.

So it was a frame-up, after all. Jason Flapp and Zebulon Harrow were buddies—and worse. They were not even the proficient wrestlers they proclaimed themselves to be. And Zebulon Harrow was slated to win the match—which meant that two hundred dollars was going the way of the other unfortunate wagers made by the unwary Bud.

Bud's impulse was to seek out the committee in charge of the bout and lay the situation before them. But common sense halted him. He would not be credited. Such a situation was fraught with excessively unpleasant potentialities. Bud fancied that neither wrestler would entertain any abiding affection for the man who had thus attempted to tumble their card house, and there might—almost certainly would—be an aftermath of physical violence with Bud cast in the rôle of violence. He shuddered at the thought.

It was not until more than an hour had elapsed that Bud received his inspiration. He arose from his chair with a howl of joy and catapulted through the front door. He flapped lopsidedly down the street at a ten-second gait and came eventually to the boarding house which Florian Slappey honored with his presence, and occasionally with his cash. Into the ears of that languid gentleman he poured questions:

"Florian, you is chairman of the committee which has cha'ge of this comin' wrastlin' match, ain't you?"

Florian exhaled a cloud of Turkish cigarette smoke. "I is."

"What you says goes, don't it?"

"Uh-huh!"

"Has you app'inted a ref'ree yet?"

Florian's eyes narrowed. He suspected an ulterior motive. "Not quite yet."

"Yes, you has."

"Says which?"

"Says you has done app'inted a ref'ree."

"You talks foolishment."

"I speechifies sense."

"Who this ref'ree is?"

"Him is I!"

Florian frowned. "What says you is ref'ree?"

Bud waved five five-dollar notes under Florian's nose: "How 'bout this?"

Florian grabbed for the money. "You ref'rees!" he decided unanimously. Then: "What you knows 'bout ref'reein' wrastlin' matches?" he demanded.

"Heap."

"How much heap?"

"'Nough to know when a man is th'owed."

"Why you want to ref'ree?"

Bud shook his head vaguely. "Jes' 'cause."

"'Cause which?"

"I's got a cravin'."

"Funny cravin'."

"Man ain't 'sponsible fo' the cravin's which he gits. Cravin's is like wifes: you gits 'em does you want 'em or not."

Florian had his twenty-five dollars and was well content. "Yo' cravin's ain't gwine cause me no worriment."

THAT afternoon Bud Peaglar took a journey. He stepped aboard a North Bessemer car and rode to the end of the line. In Bessemer he rented a dilapidated flivver and drove to the gaunt, red camp of the Madoc Mining Company. Inquiries at the office sent him to the tippie and a half-hour later the monster figure of a man emerged from the mine and greeted his visitor with grim enthusiasm.

To this massive being Bud Peaglar orated with tense passion. He poured pleas and logic into the ore-grimed ears. And finally a broad grin broke out on the face of Mr. Cunjer Bill Johnson, and he crushed Bud's hand in a grip of friendship.

"You talks, Bud. I does it."

Bud winced with the agony of the handshake, but even the pain could not destroy his triumphal smile. "Reckon us is bofe good frien's to one 'nother, huh, Cunjer Bill?" he inquired.

"Yassuh—reckon us is."

When Bud returned to Birmingham that night, he found his pool room doing a boom business. And the first person to confront him was Jason Flapp, the Memphis Choker. Upon the face of Mr. Flapp there was an expression of mingled doubt and worry—

"Heahs you is gwine ref'ree our wrastlin' match, Mistuh Peaglar?"

Bud nodded. "You heahs correc'."

"How much you knows 'bout wrastlin'?"

Bud met his eyes levelly. "Much as you does."

Jason's gaze shifted uncertainly. He was afraid that Bud's words might have a double meaning. "Co'se I an' Mistuh Harrow is glad you is gwine ref'ree—"

"I kinder thank you would be."

"We is. Crost my heah. But we was wond'rin'—"

"I knows ev'ythin'." said Bud with dignity: "Even how pool should be shot."

Jason departed, shaking his head. There seemed something sinister in the appointment of Bud Peaglar as referee. Protests availed nothing. Florian Slappey was in charge and Florian refused point-blank to have his authority or judgment questioned. After all, reflected Jason, the most partial referee could not refuse to declare a fall if one wrestler lay flat on his back for five minutes. And Jason knew that the colored community had bet both ways with sufficient intensity to insure a square deal for each of the contestants.

THE day of the heralded battle found interest intensified. The thing, billed as being for the colored championship of the world, was a novelty in Darktown and the house had long since been sold out. With the immediate approach of hostilities there was an eleventh-hour recrudescence of betting on the result, so that when the doors opened that night every spare dollar belonging to any colored gentleman who boasted a drop of sporting blood had been wagered on the result. Feeling was running high and the supporters of each man were present to see that justice was done.

Bud entered the hall exalted by the feeling that upon his shoulders rested a great trust. He knew that no matter which of the fake wrestlers came out victorious, there would be intense sadness in many a colored home that night. One half of dusky Birmingham was destined to be voluminously flush with money—the other half miserably broke. And Bud was grimly determined upon a square deal.

And then he broke into a half-smile as through the doors bulked the Gargantuan figure of Cunjer Bill Johnson, star mucker at the Madoc Mines. Cunjer Bill was a giant of a man with a face which could be one moment irresistibly sunny and the next blood-curdlingly ferocious. His enormous shoulders swayed commandingly as he followed an usher to his choice ringside seat. He nodded lightly to one or two of his friends in the audience. But he gave no sign of greeting to Bud Peaglar, who sagged contentedly against the ropes.

The stage was set, the audience restless. And Bud was nervous. There was no hint of weakening, but he couldn't very well control the fierce hammering of his heart nor the twitching of his fingers. He knew that he was on the threshold of an extremely large evening.

The committee had deemed it best to dispense with preliminaries. For the edification of the restless fans they had engaged Professor Aleck Champagne's Jassphony Orchestra and the most delirious cacophony of that organization fought its way through the smoke-laden atmosphere.

Promptly at eight-thirty Florian Slappey dispatched an envoy to the dressing-room of Jason Flapp, the Memphis Choker. In a few seconds he appeared, swathed in what had once, in pristine glory, been a bathrobe. Now it hung in limp and melancholy folds about Jason's stocky figure. And as its owner slouched down the aisle cheer after cheer rent the air—cheers and cries of encouragement from the multitude whose hard-earned money had been wagered on his chances.

Then came Zebulon Harrow, the Bone Breaker. Zebulon carried a retinue and Zebulon strutted gloriously. His scarlet robe fitted tightly the perfectly muscled six feet of height; the head was thrown proudly back, his stride was that of the master.

He leaped into the ring and crossed to Jason's corner. That scowling wrestler extended an indifferent paw for the conventional handshake, and then the two wrestlers gave themselves over to the customary examination of each other's finger-nails—making quite sure that they were pared to the safety point. Florian produced a box of resin which Zebulon used unctuously and Jason disdained.

FROM his wealth of inside information, Bud Peaglar applauded the histrionic abilities of the principals. Had he remained in ignorance of the frame-up he knew that he would have been fooled by the ostentatious display of scowling hostility. Certainly he did not condemn the audience for its gullibility.

Florian Slappey did the announcing; did it in a manner which brought a green flush of envy to the cheeks of Lawyer Evans Chew. Then Bud Peaglar was introduced and he chased Florian from the ring and called the principals to him. Jason shuffled forward, Zebulon strode. Bud spoke a few low and well-chosen words:

"Reckon I is a rotten pool player, fellers; but wrastlin' is the one thing I knows the most about. I's gwine call falls when falls is threw an' not otherwise. Does you git me?"

They nodded that they got him and glanced doubtfully at one another. Both sensed the antagonism of the skinny little referee. Then Zebulon shrugged. What could that runt of a man do to frustrate their meticulously laid plans? The thing was impossible—his fear unworthy of himself. As for Bud's obvious dislike, that was not at all unnatural.

As they took their corners Bud made the final announcement:

"This heah is gwine be fo' the cullud wrastlin' champenship of the world. They is gwine wrastle catchum-anyway-you-kin without nothin' barred 'ceptin' only bitin'. Gen'lemen, is you-all ready?"

As at an awaited cue they doffed their bathrobes. One rabid fan in the rear emitted a shrill of approval:

"Hot dam! Lookit them muscles!"

It was obviously Jason Flapp to whom he had reference. Jason, stripped to the waist, was an awe-inspiring figure—a creature with huge, crawling knots of muscle. Bud Peaglar wondered whether, after all, Jason could possibly fail to throw the more symmetrical Zebulon.

The gong sounded. The house hushed. There was a nervous scraping of feet as the combatants moved slowly toward each other, arms bowed and extended, eyes focused rigidly. Their left hands groped, each finding a resting place at the rear of the other's neck. They then instituted a period of interminable sparring with their right hands, feeling for holds.

Around and around they shuffled. Occasionally there was a lightning lunge, a grunt—and again they were back at their incessant circling. Five minutes passed; ten, fifteen. The spectators grew a trifle impatient.

THEN suddenly the ebony figure of Jason Flapp dropped. The audience emitted a choky yell. Apelike arms shot forward and wrapped about the slender waist of the Bone Breaker. Then they were down, scrambling fiercely about the floor . . . and when the brief excitement was over Zebulon lay on hands and knees while Jason Flapp kneeled beside him, critically inspecting his opponent for the most likely place to fasten a hold.

Jason clamped a half-Nelson on the Bone Breaker. He twisted and squirmed and applied the full pressure of his tremendous arms. And then, at the crucial moment, Zebulon wriggled loose—amidst the frenzied howls of his supporters—and flung himself atop Jason.

And from that moment on the brum-magen character of the match became apparent to the not inexperienced eye of Bud Peaglar. For not only did he see that these men were not giving their best efforts, but it became apparent to him that they were not adept wrestlers. True, they did possess a rudimentary knowledge of wrestling and they knew more or less about the various holds—but their work as a whole was rather crude, and only the simulated ferocity of their attacks upon each other kept the crowd in a fever which blinded it to the actual wrestling merits of the two negroes.

They fought. It was hard to believe that this was all planned in advance. Through set teeth they cursed one another and gritted dire threats of absolute annihilation. The crowd screamed with excitement. But Bud Peaglar, circling above them with critical eye, saw through the sham.

And thereupon Bud Peaglar allowed himself the luxury of a triumphant grin.

The first fall came like a lightning-bolt after forty-two minutes of violent tussling. And it went to Jason Flapp, who, squirming awkwardly out of a body scissors, clamped a wristlock on his more Adonis-like opponent and pinned his shoulders to the mat.

Bud slapped Jason on the back and the wrestlers arose and trotted to their dressing-rooms for a ten-minute rest amidst howls of approval from Jason's supporters and groans from the many who had wagered their all on the chances of the Bone Breaker.

As for Bud, he lounged against the ropes and within his heart there surged a song of triumph. The first fall had gone to Jason Flapp, and Bud's money was bet that way. For one more fall, at any rate, he was financially secure. The worst that Zebulon could do was to take the second and even thirds up.

The men returned to the mat and for thirty-seven minutes mauled each other into exhaustion. And then occurred just what Bud anticipated. Zebulon Harrow won the second fall with a toehold and the match was evened.

But the contestants were honestly exhausted this time and they sank on their stools panting. The house was in an uproar. With the match horse-and-horse the betting fever was revived.

Bud Peaglar's eyes roamed across the heads of the spectators and came to rest finally upon the face of Cunjer Bill Johnson. To Cunjer Bill he nodded slightly, and the mucker from Madoc nodded agreement. Slowly, deliberately, he hoisted his massive figure from the chair and towered above the crowd. With innate dramatic instinct he raised one monster paw aloft and his deep voice boomed through the fetid air of the hall.

"Brethren!"

The chattering stilled. All eyes focused upon the Stygian giant. Quite pleased with the calcium, Cunjer Bill delivered a brief, pointed speech.

"This wastlin' match is a fake!"

There was a stir of irritation from the crowd. Bud, eyeing the wrestlers, saw glints of fear flash in their tired eyes. Again the resonant voice of Cunjer Bill resounded through the hall.

"Also I says neither of them fakes knows nothin' 'bout wastlin'!"

NOTHING but dead silence could be heard. And then the spectators became frankly exasperated. The crowd was intensely partisan and it had backed its partisanship with money. To it, the bout appeared to be on the level—and it was not to be easily convinced that the thing was a frame-up. A chorus of anger swelled.

"Who you is, Big Boy?"

"What you know 'bout wastlin'?"

"Is you ever wrestled anybody?"

This last inquisitor Cunjer Bill singled out, and he thundered a defi.

"Yeh, I is wrestled somebody. I is the cullud champeen wrestler of the world!"

The Memphis Choker looked at the Bone Breaker and the Bone Breaker looked at the Memphis Choker. There was genuine fear in the glances thus exchanged.

"You says you is!" challenged a voice.

Cunjer Bill's muscular paw dived into a trousers pocket and came forth clutching two hundred and fifty dollars in bills.

"Two hund'ed an' fifty dollars!" he roared. "That much I bets I c'n th'ow bofe them fakes in twen'y minutes. I's a champeen, I is. I has be'n a champeen wastler sence bullfrogs sang sopranner. Does I take mo'n ten minutes to th'ow either one, I loses the two hund'ed an' fifty dollars. Now what does you-all say?"

There was a stir of tense excitement. An hour and a quarter of fierce tussling had convinced the majority of the spectators that Jason and Zebulon were peerless wrestlers. It was incomprehensible that the man lived who could throw both of them in twenty minutes.

Florian Slappey arose and suggested the collection of a purse to cover the reckless wager of the big mucker. Within five minutes he held in his palms two hundred and fifty dollars. He shoved this under the nose of the giant, Cunjer Bill Johnson.

"You is took!" he piped excitedly. "Git you off yo' clothes an' c'mon an' wrestle!"

The crowd was racked by fierce agitation. Here was new drama—something unexpected and well worth while. A handicap match against both main bout principals. And then interference came from a totally unexpected quarter. Zebulon Harrow, the Bone Breaker, arose and silenced the crowd with a gesture.

"I AN' Mistuh Flapp ain't gwine wrestle that feller!"

Horried stillness fell upon the house. Zebulon hastened an explanation. "We is plumb tuckered out with wastlin' each yuther."

Scepticism became more apparent. Zebulon fought valiantly to regain the swiftly ebbing confidence of the spectators—

"Us has done wrestled fo' mo' than one hour. Does us wrestle this big boy us is gwine git th'owed on account we ain't got no mo' stren'th lef'. So I says Mistuh Flapp an' mysef goes on an' finishes our match an' wrestles him some other night."

A few stanch supporters agreed vociferously with Zebulon's suggestion. Others loudly voiced their disapproval of this procrastination. Cunjer Bill sent his voice tearing through the hall.

"I tells you this—an' I knows what I's talkin' 'bout. Not on'y neither of these wastlers ain't no wastlers, but also this whole match is a frame-up. These fellers was frien's befo' they come to Bummin'ham an' they is be'n bettin' on the match they own se'ves. One of 'em is gwine lay down to the other. Folks, you has bet on these fakes, an' you is 'bout to be played fo' a whole covey of sucker-fish."

The public is always eager to believe rumors of faked sporting events. This particular audience was far from being an exception. The crowd's demeanor became ugly and threats arose:

"Does you th'ow us down, Brother Flapp—you gits you a coat of tar to make you blacker'n what you is now."

"Better not let that cullud boy th'ow you, Mistuh Harrow. We is watchin' you close."

The situation was highly unpleasant for the players of the stellar rôles. They glanced uneasily at one another and then at the audience and its air of increasing hostility. Both wrestlers wished that they had never essayed this thing. And yet, they both knew that they had to finish the bout. Come what might, that third fall must be fought out—and the winning bets collected. They feared that they were in line for a manhandling anyway and they preferred to let the match conclude as planned rather than to be torn limb from limb by this massive interloper with the two hundred and fifty dollars.

And Zebulon Harrow—no mean orator—addressed the crowd passionately.

He assured them that no mens never was straduced more worser than what him an' Mistuh Flapp was bein' done. He appealed to their sense of fair play. Admitting that this stranger was a great wrestler, was it fair to pit him against men who were already tired?

"An' all what happens does we wrestle him t'night is that you gen'lemen which has raised the money to bet on us—loses all which you has bet. So I sigges's that we wrestles this heah big feller some other night, an' t'night I an' Mistuh Flapp goes on an' finishes our bout."

The logic of the situation was unanswerable. And so, reluctantly, the crowd agreed to allow the match to proceed. But the humor of the audience had changed. From heroes, the two battlers had degenerated into objects of dark and dire suspicion. The spectators were not positive that the match was a fake, but it was a foregone conclusion that the supporters of the loser would flock to that alibi.

Then, too, guilt was writ large upon the frightened faces of the wrestlers. Their own trepidation communicated itself to the suspicious house. There was no mistaking the dismay which had settled dankly upon their hitherto proudly swaying shoulders, nor the fear which glimmered in their furtive eyes.

But gloom had settled soggily about the wrestlers. Gloom—sudden and complete—where a few minutes before there had loomed only the certainty of triumph and financial success. They were both bewildered by the sudden and totally unexpected turn of events and their knees were trembling as the gong sounded for the third fall and they advanced to the center of the mat. Their eyes sought one another's pleadingly as arms crossed . . . and then the grinning face of the diminutive Bud Peaglar appeared between them and Bud proffered sage counsel:

"Was I you fellers, I reckon I'd see neither of me was th'owed!"

THEY flashed startled glances toward him, and he spoke again.

"Jes' keep on fakin' like'n you has be'n doin'. This crowd don' know no better."

They groaned so that it was audible to Bud's ears, and Mr. Peaglar laughed silently. This was his moment of triumph.

The crowd was growling surlily, impatient for action. And so the contestants went to the mat again.

For fifteen minutes they wrestled; the crowd more impatient, more suspicious, more intolerant with every passing moment. And the cheerful referee kept up a running fire of comment:

"Fake wastlin' is a skeery game . . . . Never know when you is gwine git caught an' kilt—like a chicken. . . . Better watch out, Mistuh Harrow—he mos' let you fall that time. . . . That woul'n't be so bad on account yo'd make a elegant-lookin' corpse. . . . Either one gits th'owed, yuther one c'n ride in the mo'ner's ca'iage at the fumral. . . . We got swell funral ca'riages in Bummin'ham. . . . An' killin' fake wastlers is the fondest thing Bummin'ham cullud folks is of. . . . We kills 'em fo' exercise. Heah that crowd yowlin'. . . . They knows you is fakes . . . an' which one gits th'owed is gwine be the fakes . . . an' the mos' deadest. . . . Reckon you-all better neither one git th'owed this time. . . . But they ain't no sayin' you-all two bofe ain't swell pool players. . . . Which remin's me, Brother Harrow, does I git back them hund'ed 'an fifty dollars you skun me out of? Does I?"

"You does!" came the chorused groan. "When?"

"T'night—after we finishes wastlin'."

the hall—when you gits yo' bets back fum the stakeholders. That bein' the case, my frien's, I agrees to call the match off in a few minutes."

Bud's task was made easy. The flagrant character of the match, the terror of a fall, became more and more apparent; the crowd more and more surly. And finally both wrestlers dropped with an excellent simulation of exhaustion. And Bud faced the audience and delivered his decision in forceful tone of authority.

"These heah wrastlers bein' all in," he shouted, "an' each havin' wonned on'y one fall, I heahby declares that this ain't no contest an' all bets is off!"

Which erudite verdict brought a howl of approval from the disgusted and infuriated spectators.

Late that night, long after the muttering crowd had unwillingly dispersed and the wrestlers had made good to Bud Peaglar the hundred and fifty dollars illegally won from him at pool—long after they had slunk to the Terminal Station and slid out of Birmingham on a Chattanooga-bound local—after all of that Mr. Cunjer Bill Johnson of the Madoc Mines presented himself before the triumphant Bud Peaglar and in Bud's hands placed two hundred and fifty dollars in cash.

Fifty of this Bud returned to his friend. "You has earned it, Cunjer Bill—you sho"—Lawd has."

Cunjer Bill grinned modestly. "I done it pretty good, di'n't I?" he asked blandly.

"I'll say you did, brother." Then a cloud crossed Bud's smiling face. "But they had me skeered one time."

"Yassuh," agreed Cunjer Bill. "They had me skeered wuss'n you."

Bud Peaglar chuckled.

"My goshness! I wonder what them two fakes would say did they know you never wrastled a wrastle in yo' whole life, an' that we was jes' bluffin' 'em? I wonder what they would say?"

"Huh!" smiled Cunjer Bill. "I knows—but I never uses that kind of langwidge!"

He Knew All About Women

¶ Bruno Lessing Describes The Wise Man of Forty-five—Continued from page 94

he remarked to himself, his conscience easy.

The girl intrigued him. He wrote her a long letter apologizing for his crime all over again and, in reply, received a humorous note which ended with an invitation to call upon her.

"So you're going to call on Peggy Preston," said Mrs. Wilmot, laughingly. "Well, you'll not be the first caller she has had. And I suppose you want to pump me dry about her to find out if you have a chance with her."

"Oh, it isn't as bad as that," said Ferguson hastily, inwardly cursing the lady's bluntness.

"Well, she's a dear, charming girl," Mrs. Wilmot went on. "She has turned the heads of all sorts of men, young ones and old ones. Though I guess you're the first author she has captured."

"You speak as if she were a cannibal chief," said Ferguson.

"I knew her mother before she was married," explained Mrs. Wilmot, "and—the apple falls close to the tree. Peggy is good and earnest and, altogether, a nice girl. But she doesn't know her own mind and—what makes it quite a problem for her—she knows that she does not know her own mind and the knowledge provokes her. She isn't a flirt and she isn't heartless. She just has too good a mind for a girl in her position and wants to find out everything for herself instead of letting her parents arrange her life."

"Who is Bobbie?" asked Ferguson.

"Bobbie Warner? Oh, dear! He's just one of a dozen whom she has captivated. I thought at one time that she would marry him—and he'd be a fine match—but, as I said, she doesn't know her own mind and has been putting them all off. Her mother was just like that, too, and made a splendid marriage in the end."

Within two weeks Ferguson realized that Margaret Preston was occupying a greater share of his thoughts than was entirely safe for his peace of mind.

She, for her part, made no effort to conceal her liking for him. She found him interesting and congenial and enjoyed the flattery of his admiration. They went to a theater one night and, while he was escorting her home, he said:

"I'm afraid, my dear, I'm getting terrible fond of you."

"I'm sorry you're afraid," she replied, laughing. "I like you but it doesn't frighten me."

"I'm really quite an old man, you know," said Ferguson.

"Yes, I know. I looked you up in Who's Who. You're forty-five. But in some things most of the boys I know are really older than you."

They had come to the door of her home. "You really like me a bit?" he asked.

"Yes," said she. "More than a bit."

He felt the light pressure of her hand against his arm and the next moment she was running up the steps.

"GEORGE FERGUSON," said he to himself, the next morning, "you're in danger of making a great fool of yourself. You had better take careful stock of the situation and make up your mind."

He began to reason the matter out and, after discovering that his mind was merely traveling in circles and always getting back to the original starting point, he came to the conclusion that it was not a subject for reasoning at all. He decided to talk it over frankly with the girl herself. He called her on the telephone.

"Did I wake you out of a sound sleep?" he asked.

"No, indeed," she replied. "I've been up two hours reading that poem of Keats' that you recommended last night. I think it's glorious."

Ferguson felt a thrill of pleasure.

"Listen, Peggy," he said. "I'd like to have a chat with you. Can I see you this evening?"

"I'm sorry," said she, "but I can't this evening."

Ferguson felt a sense of disappointment.

"How about tomorrow afternoon, then? A ride in the Park?"

"N-no, I'm afraid not," replied Peggy.

"I expect some visitors."

"Any time at all tomorrow then?" he insisted.

"I don't see how I can."

There was a long pause. Then:

"A little girl told me last night that she really liked me."

"That's the truth," said Peggy.

"But don't you think that if a girl really likes a man she would find some way of squeezing in an hour of her time to give to him, Peggy?"

"Don't you think you're a bit unreasonable?"

"I don't think so," said Ferguson.

Another long pause. And then, suddenly, Ferguson heard a peal of merry laughter over the telephone.

"What's the joke?" he asked, frowning. The laughter increased.

"I'll wait until you get through," he said, sarcastically. "But I am curious to know what you are laughing about."

"A sudden thought came to me," said she. "I was just wondering if anybody else was overhearing us on the line who might take it into his head to give us both a lecture. That would be such a great joke after—after—well, you know."

Ferguson felt a slight chill run up and down his spine. And, at that moment:

"Hello, Central," came a gruff voice, "you've got me on a busy line. I'm trying to get the Pennsylvania Station."

He heard a distinct gasp from Peggy. Then, feeling as if a pail of ice water had been doused over him, he quietly placed his receiver on its hook, put on his hat and coat and went out for a walk in the Park. Late that afternoon he departed on a fishing trip to Canada with a friend.

FERGUSON remained away from the city for three months. In a belated newspaper, one day, he read an account of the wedding of Miss Margaret Preston and Mr. Robert Warner, son of a retired millionaire manufacturer. He merely smiled.

Nevertheless, in conversation with his friend, one day in camp, mention was made of the Pennsylvania Railroad Station.

"I came across a chap," said Ferguson, "who tried to get that station."

"What are you talking about?" asked his friend.

"He was a smart man," Ferguson said.

"He had sense enough to keep still."

"Are you crazy?" asked the friend.

"No," said Ferguson. "But I was."

Nine Points o' The Law

Unless thou shalt have need of her before. Thou shalt find her ready for thee!"

Galt could contemplate no further, for tears sprang from his eyes that drenched the murder in his heart. Vengeance moved back from David's to its sacred sword—and he began gathering necessities for a journey. A malemute set up a weird howling outside and instantly the night was alive with the chorus of twenty wolf-dogs that were kenneled around the cabin. David sprang to the cabin door. It is not unusual, this nocturnal howling of the milemutes. But a canoe was due, overdue from down the Shungnak. And when the dogs cry in chorus in summer it usually announces the approach of a boat downstream, that may not appear for hours afterwards.

DAVID went to the river's edge and peered into its half-pallor, but there was no sign of any craft coming toward the landing. But the dogs still kept up their calling. He slid a canoe into the river and paddled toward the Shungnak bank. When he returned a half-hour later Tai-lonah was stroking the bow paddle. Behind her in the bottom of the canoe was a trim trail kit. She stayed by the canoe while David went to the cabin for his trail gear. This he stowed in the canoe next to Tai-lonah's.

Then Tai-lonah and David prepared for the arrival of Hagson and whomever he might have with him. For the dog sign had not stopped—someone was coming upstream. A half-hour's wait, and the vague shape of a stealthily gliding canoe became dimly discernible—two figures noiselessly sweeping the paddles as the craft came on from midstream.

"Now, Tai-lonah—now. We go to meet them. Then they are to turn in their tracks and we shall never leave the stern of their canoe until we have them safe in the power of our Great White Father. If we fail in that—you, Tai-lonah, shall kill the Wolf, while I—your David—slaughter the other beast."

They pushed out to meet the approaching craft. The canoes locked side by side. Hagson now recognized Tai-lonah and Galt. He began a cordial greeting but the words froze in his throat, for the craven collapsed when he saw the flash of blue steel in David's hand and, by the pale light, the deadly menace in his eyes. But not even Ladue could bring his eyes to look at the face behind a big-muzzled gun held on them by the Indian girl in the bow of the canoe.

Ladue made just the faintest move of his hand, after the command to remain absolutely still. David all but crushed his skull with his clubbed revolver. The Wolf crumbled up—and, when he came to, found himself bound hand and foot and strapped to the top of the dunnage and gear in the bow of the peterborough. Doctor Hagson had been strapped to his end of the canoe. And so were they towed—not trailed—down the Shungnak; and on down to the Kotzebue coast, where they had been delivered into the custody of Captain Tuttle of the U. S. Revenue Cutter Bear. The Arctic pool was headed through the Bering Strait, with a scheduled stop at Kewalick on the way down to the Bering Sea. The lookout had caught David's hail dead on the port beam, and they immediately came off their course to affect the pick up of the two canoes.

Well, that's about all there is to record of his tale of the far North. The Eagle records are available for a history of this famous trial. Of course Judge Landers had to instruct the jury that the evidence was of such nature as to leave—in law—the reasonable doubt. That the Court's instructions were not unheeded in the verdict returned seems apparent from the informal suggestion that the Eagle jurors inserted in their decision. In effect it was this wise:

"And the jury further suggests that in recommending life imprisonment for these two defendants they thereby show due respect to the Court's charge, as to the reasonable doubt. The jury suggests that these two defendants will be more fittingly punished by being allowed to live and suffer—rather than enjoy a quick death at the end of a rope. Amen!" Judge Landers ordered this irregular addendum stricken from the Federal court records. But that did not lessen its justice. And so to this day Hagson and Ladue are breaking rock down on M—— Island—unless these twenty years have been too much for them.

Some time when you have a spare year on your hands, run up to the Shungnak and look over Galt City. It spreads out with all the improvements and facilities that you will find in Eagle. Directly opposite the town are the Galt mines, estimated today to be worth around $100,000,000. Wasn't it a paltry seven million or so that we paid Russia for the entire Territory in "Fifty-seven?" They must have been blind, for surely their explorers had seen stalwart Shungnaks, wearing virgin gold trinkets. Why, the Shungnak bucks had pure gold labrets stuck through their underlips. Where was all that Tartar acuteness? But perhaps the inland expeditions never returned—who can tell?

CAN'T you picture the wonderful issue of the Shungnak Queen and her consort, David Galt? Kugarah's primeval philosophy come true? The crossing of his rare blue blood with the strain of the purest American aristocracy? Gods, what glorious children! And every time he hears Tai-lonah call him he somehow reverts to the morning down on the Eagle river bank when an Egyptian Princess crept into his embrace, calling him David as she tenderly kissed him on his lips. The singing gold harp is still up there in the Shungnak, still swathed in its magic skin. Go North, friend, and mayhap you will unearth it—and listen to its reminiscent lament!

Is there anything finer and funnier than Montague Glass's Jewish characters? You will have another chance to laugh with Mr. Glass when you read his story, "The Right Way," in Hearst's International for November.

view, for the present, of politics and labor and humanity. One or two good words for Doane, dropped by him at the Athletic Club and to the Boosters got him into bad repute and his loneliness increased. It was further emphasized by the absence of his wife. It may be she thought George would be better without her for a while; at any rate, she left in the middle of the winter to visit her sister. Then he remembered Mrs. Daniel Judique. He had met her in a business way and now he renewed his acquaintance, more than half-believing she was the golden girl of his dreams. His association with her led him into wild drinking parties and carousals with Zenith City's bohemian "bunch." He was still traveling rapidly on this route when his wife returned and he could not persuade himself to give up Mrs. Judique. Of course, Mrs. Babbitt became suspicious and things at home were crosswise. This, added to his loss of friends incident to his expression of radical opinions, made him, indeed, a lonely man. Then came a new blow that once more changed his life:

BABBITT woke at three in the morning and struggled out of bed for a drink of water. As he passed through the bedroom, he heard his wife groan. His resentment was night-blurred; he was solicitous in inquiring, "What's the matter, hon?"

"I've got such a pain—down here in my side—oh, it's just—it tears me."

"Bad indigestion. Shall I get you some bicarb?"

"Don't think that would help. I felt funny last evening and yesterday, and then it passed away and I got to sleep—"

"I better call the doctor."

"No, no! It'll go away. But maybe you might get me an ice-bag."

He stalked to the bathroom for the ice-bag, down to the kitchen for ice. He felt dramatic in this late-night expedition, but as he gouged the chunk of ice with the dagger-like pick he was cool, steady, mature; and the old friendliness was in his voice as he patted the ice-bag into place on her groin, rumbling, "There, there, that'll be better now." He retired to bed, but he did not sleep. He heard her groan again. Instantly he was up, soothing her, "Still pretty bad, honey?"

"Yes, it just gripes me; I can't sleep."

Her voice was faint. He knew her dread of doctors' verdicts and he did not inform her, but he creaked down-stairs, telephoned to Dr. Earl Patten, and waited, shivering, trying with fuzzy eyes to read a magazine, till he heard the doctor's car.

To Mrs. Babbitt the doctor said with amiable belligerence, after his examination, "Kind of a bad old pain, eh? I'll give you something to make you sleep and I think you'll feel better in the morning. I'll come in right after breakfast." But to Babbitt, lying in wait in the lower hall, the doctor sighed, "I don't like the feeling there in her side. There's some rigidity and some inflammation. She's never had her appendix out, has she? Um. Well, no use worrying. I'll be here first thing in the morning, and meantime she'll get some rest. I've given her a hypo. Good night."

Then was Babbitt caught up in the black tempest.

Instantly all the indignations which had been dominating him, and the spirituous dramas through which he had struggled became pallid and absurd before the ancient and overwhelming realities, the standard and traditional realities, of sickness and menacing death, the long night and the thousand steadfast implications of married life. He crept back to her. She drowsed away in the tropic languor of morphia, he sat on the edge of her bed holding her hand, and for the first time in many weeks her hand abode trustfully in his.

BABBITT's family physician reported Mrs. Babbitt in a serious condition and asked for a consultation. This led to the decision that an immediate operation was necessary. George protested, sought delay, but the surgeon was firm and in less than an hour the sick woman was on her way to the hospital, accompanied by her husband who had been a wanderer but who was "back again."

The ambulance whirled under the hooded carriage-entrance of the hospital and instantly Babbitt was reduced to zero in the nightmare succession of cold-floored halls, endless doors open on women sitting up in bed, an elevator, the anesthetizing room, a young interne contemptuous of husbands. He was permitted to kiss his wife; he saw a thin dark nurse the cone over her mouth and nose; stiffened at a sweet and treacherous odor then he was driven out, and on a high stool in a laboratory he sat dazed, longing to see her once again, to insist that he had always loved her, had never for a second loved anybody else or looked at anybody else and never would look at anyone else.

MRS. BABBITT recovered, but through the stress of the days of her suffering, George reverted to type. He became again the home-loving, conservative business man. The Boosters took him back to their hearts; he became a member of the Good Citizens' League and no longer had anything good to say for Doane. His wife's sickness had stopped his radical thoughts and erased from his mind the image of Mrs. Judique. Meanwhile things were happening in his own family. Verona had won her secretarial position and married. Ted was at college, under protest, and pleading to change to an engineering course. One week-end Ted came home, and in the evening he and Eunice Littlefield, who lived next door, and with whom he had been friends for years, went out together. At a late hour they had not returned. In the early dawn, Mrs. Babbitt awakened George and demanded.

"COME HERE quick and see. Be quiet!" She led him down the hall to the door of Ted's room and pushed it gently open. On the worn brown rug he saw a froth of rose-colored chiffon lingerie; on the sedate Morris chair a girl's silver slipper. And on the pillows were two sleepy heads—Ted's and Eunice's.

Ted woke to grin, and to mutter with unconvincing defiance, "Good morning! Let me introduce my wife—Mrs. Theodore."

Do YOU Do Any of These Embarrassing Things?

The man in this picture has reason to be ill at ease. He has attended an informal dinner in conventional full dress. The Book of Etiquette would have told him how to interpret the word "informal" on the invitation—and would have revealed to him important things to know regarding an informal social function. The Book of Etiquette tells you what to wear on all occasions.

His friend has just introduced him to the young woman. Instead of waiting for her to offer her hand and make the acknowledgment, he has extended his hand first and mumbled confusedly something about being "Glad to meet you." By telling you how to make and acknowledge introductions, the Book of Etiquette prevents a great many embarrassing blunders.

She has just signed her name in the hotel register, and glanced at the names above. She sees, in these other signatures, that she has made a mistake—that she has registered incorrectly. Mistakes such as these can often be very embarrassing indeed. The Book of Etiquette prevents them, as it covers the whole subject of hotel etiquette completely and authoritatively.

Without realizing his mistake, the man in this picture has followed the head waiter, preceding the young woman. It is the wrong order of precedence, and he discovers it to his embarrassment only when he notices the entrance of another couple. The Book of Etiquette tells you about the mistakes that might be made, when entering the theatre, the street car, the drawing room. And it tells you how to avoid these humiliating blunders.

Every one knows that table manners are an index to breeding. The man in this picture has taken olives with a fork, and has just realized his error, as the others have taken them with their fingers. Too bad he didn't refer to his Book of Etiquette! It tells all about table manners—how to eat corn on the cob, lettuce, asparagus, frozen pudding.

The gentleman at the right does not know how to dance. Instead of doing what he should, under the circumstances, he is making himself conspicuous by standing alone while the others dance. The Book of Etiquette would have told him how to avoid this embarrassment—and would have told him also the complete etiquette of the dance and of dancing. It is a most fascinating chapter.

How I Acquired a New Mind in 21 Days

The Most Startling Story of Success Ever Written

By Albert L. Pelton

THIS advertisement will probably shock you. If it does, I am sorry. I do not write it with that intent. I write it because I do not fear to set down what I know to be true; because I believe it is only through seeing and knowing and acting upon the truth that human advancement is possible.

On the 15th day of December, 1910, I made a discovery. At that time I was about as far down the ladder of success as a man can be. I lacked everything a successful man should possess. I possessed qualities that a successful man would be ashamed of. My spirit was broken. My health failing. I owed money to almost everyone I had dealings with. And as for friends—I had none.

It seemed that I had little to live for. I had tried to utilize what few qualifications I had—only to fail miserably. But I let myself drift on, in the dismal hope that some day my "luck" would change.

Then one day, as suddenly as a bolt of lightning flashes across the sky, something happened to me. You will not believe what I am now going to tell you. But on the honor of one who from direst poverty has risen to wealth and to the position of one who is respected by his friends and business associates, I swear that it is true—every word of it.

I tell you, with the deepest of all truthfulness and sincerity—I WAS ACTUALLY RE-BORN!

In a period of twenty-one days—only twenty-one days, mind you—I acquired an entirely new mind, an entirely new individuality! My former self completely disappeared. There was even a seeming difference in my physical appearance.

I can never forget my astonishment when I commenced an examination of my new self. Where was my former lack of ambition? Where was my indecision, my lack of concentration? Where was my brain-fag, my dull imagination—my faulty memory? Where were all those handicaps responsible for my failure?

All had disappeared. I was amazed. I did not—I could not—believe that such a sudden transformation was possible in anyone. It belonged to mysticism. It was not of this earth. It was too great—too overwhelmingly impossible—to be real.

But the proof was there! And it was so powerful, so incontrovertible, so completely conclusive, that denial of it was impossible.

I found that I had acquired an entirely new mind. I found that I possessed qualifications I never even hoped to own. I looked on life, and on the world, in an entirely new light. It seemed that everything had suddenly become clear—that the age-old problems of life and business were suddenly made amazingly transparent and easy to understand.

But my biggest surprise came when I put my new qualifications to work.

Nothing was too big for me. It seemed that some clog in my ability to think, concentrate and act had suddenly been removed, releasing a wonderful new power for success. I was literally swept on by this new dynamic personality within me. I undertook every business proposition in sight—propositions many of which I once would not dare to think of handling. And I put them through successfully—every one of them. I was filled with a seemingly inexhaustible supply of new energy. And as I began accumulating a fortune I could not believe that I was once a helpless, downright failure.

Yet as I look back on it now, my transformation—my new mind—was brought about by one of the simplest things imaginable. I discovered the one thing that had been robbing me of success—the one thing that keeps ninety-nine people out of a hundred in the small pay class.

In a few words it was simply this—my brain lacked motive power. It lacked the something needed to stir it to action. It needed something to bring out my success faculties, and set them to work. And that "something" was Will Power. Like thousands upon thousands of people today, I was struggling along using only one-tenth of my brain. And as a result I was only achieving one-tenth of the success I could have achieved.

Now the Will is just like a muscle. If it isn't properly exercised it gets weak and flabby. That was the condition of my Will. I realized that without Will power I was as helpless as a child.

Then came the discovery that changed my whole life, that made an entirely different person out of me, that gave me a mind that pushed me from the shadow of poverty to the sunshine of prosperity. I found the way to acquire a highly trained, inflexible Will.

One of the greatest psychologists the world has ever known, Frank Channing Haddock, had for a number of years been delving into the realm of mind. He realized that most people had lost—or had never known—the power to use their greatest money-making factor—their Wills. So he devoted years to finding a method that anyone could use to develop Will power.

The result of his research and study is his now world-famous book "Power of Will." It was through the amazing information contained in this book that I at last found myself. And so unbelievably remarkable was the change it made in me, that I resolved to devote at least a part of my life in helping in the distribution of this mighty work. For I felt that in helping to broadcast the money-making, success-building, information it contained I could do an incalculable good to the whole world.

Already thousands of people have written to me, telling of the wonderful results "Power of Will" has brought to them. Thousands have been able to go in business for themselves and make more money than they ever dreamt of earning. Thousands have doubled—yes, even trebled—their salaries in an amazingly short time. Stories of how people rose from $15 and $25 a week to $200 a week and more are not at all unusual.

In your own case, if you have not achieved the success that is rightfully yours, you owe it to yourself at least to examine this great "wonder book." There is nothing difficult about it. And it starts bringing results almost instantly.

It will show you a sure, quick way to acquire a new mind. By giving you a dynamic will that nothing can resist, it can change your whole life, just as it changed my life and the lives of thousands of others. Rich opportunities will open up for you. Driving energy you never dreamed you had will manifest itself. You will thrill with a new power. You'll have an influence over people that you never thought possible. Success—in whatever form you want it—will come as easily as failure came before. These are only a few things that a new mind and an indomitable will can bring you.

Let Me Prove This at My Expense

So that you may examine "Power of Will" I want to send it to you entirely free. Send no money. Simply fill in and mail the coupon below. By return mail you will receive the complete book "Power of Will."

Keep it five days. Look it over in your own home. Apply some of its teachings. If it doesn't show you how you can increase your income many times over—just as it has for thousands of others—mail the book back.

But if you feel that "Power of Will" will do for you what it has done for five hundred thousand others—if you feel, as they do, that it is the next greatest book to the bible—send only $3.00 in full payment. You risk nothing, so mail the coupon now—today.

The strongest endorsement ever given to any musical instrument

There are no better judges of performance than those who themselves perform. Practically without exception, all those who represent most in the world of musical art choose the Victrola as the one best instrument to perpetuate their achievements. The purchase of a Victrola therefore carries with it assurances of satisfaction which can be obtained in no other music-reproducing instrument.

Poincaré and the Jingoism

By Jean Longuet

UNTIL RECENTLY, Belgium alone has been sympathetic toward the policy of the French government, but now even Belgium seems to have been alienated by the impossible attitude of M. Poincaré.

Our Nationalist Press tries to make capital out of the United States attitude. Because your government has been sympathetic toward the narrow and bitter attitude of our Government toward Russia, in her alarm over Bolshevism, those papers try to create the impression that your government is also favoring the French policy toward Germany.

It is to be regretted that such a dishonest and sensational paper as Le Matin, whose connection with a number of American plutocrats is of common knowledge, should create this confusion by making French opinion believe that America is favoring M. Poincaré's policy. It has deceived even M. Poincaré himself, for it is under this influence and on the advice of the sinister M. Bunau-Varilla, proprietor of the Matin (and one of the worst inciters of hate between France and Germany before the war) that M. Parmentier, a high official of the French Finance Ministry, has sent to Washington to demand in a most indiscreet fashion the cancellation of the French war debt to America without any regard to England's position.

Of course we cannot take M. Poincaré as an isolated phenomenon in French political life. He represents in a large measure the mentality of our governing classes at the present moment. He embodies their narrow conservatism, unenti glatin unenti, jingoism, but in a more narrow and bitter sense than any other living statesman in France. He is of course a brilliant orator, a typical lawyer, with all the powerful logic of the great barrister, but living in abstract legalisms and knowing nothing of the deep realities of economics. He has always pursued a Nationalist and Imperialist policy, and everybody now in France remembers the prophetic words of the greatest of our modern orators, of the great Socialist, Jean Jaures, so tragically murdered on the eve of the war, just at the moment when Poincaré was elected as President of the French Republic in 1913: "Beware, lest you become the President of reaction and of war!"

Only when all the documents of the Foreign Offices of Paris, London and Rome are opened to the historian and the public's inquiries, as those of Petrograd and Berlin have been, can we know about the full responsibility this man had on the breaking out of the war—as we know of the responsibilities of Wilhelm II, Bethmann-Hollweg, Francis Joseph, Count Tisza, Baron d'Alenral, the Tzar Nicholas II, Sazonoff and Isvolsky.

But we do know of his acts during the War, and after. In 1916 a member of the French Cabinet, M. Doumergue, was sent to Petrograd with the offer of Constantinople to Russia, demanding in return the left bank of the Rhine for France; when some months later, from March 1917 to June, the peace offers which Prince Sixte de Bourbon had brought from his brother-in-law, the Emperor of Austria, [Continued on page 111]

Lodge

THOSE residents of Massachusetts who date from the Mayflower, the Concord School, and such favored sources, feel badly about the increase of Irish, Italians, Jews, and others of the more recent comers. These earlier arrivals think they can govern better, and they think their culture is of higher interest. What do they do to show they still deserve to rule?

They send back, every six years, Henry Cabot Lodge to the Senate of the United States. Lodge is one of them: that much is conceded. But what has he done to solve modern questions in which common men are interested? His early career was marked by his Force Bill—the waving of the bloody shirt. In one way or another he has been waving it ever since. Whatever he does is either against somebody or for some vested interest. In temper he is described in Hudibras:

“..... whose chief devotion lies
In odd, perverse antipathies,
In falling out with that or this
And finding somewhat still amiss;
More peevish, cross, and splenetic
Than dog distract or monkey sick.”

If the old residents of Massachusetts could find somebody as their permanent representative who stood for mankind, find men such as they found in the past, they might with more justice hope to keep the lead as against the new-comers. But the leader of the Senate old guard, the marshaller of the Newberry forces, the man who, voting just before Lorimer, was an example to Lorimer how to vote, the man who “never had a generous emotion”—if this official leader of dead reaction and class interest is the best the aristocrats can do, why should they rule?

Third Parties

WE SMIRK a little at the prospect of two of our contributors in the next House of Commons. H. G. Wells and Norman Angell will bother the safe and sane members, but they will sometimes annoy also those labor members who rely over-much on words. Neither is an innocent enthusiast. Both are relentless pursuers of a fairer civilization. They joined the Labor Party after many years of hard work, in which labor leaders and trained scholars worked in harmony—they joined it because in 1917 that party emerged as the representative of reform to the bottom, but reform by practical routes. The platform was drawn up not by labor men, but by the famous economist, Sidney Webb. When the labor element wished to grapple with the all-important problem of the press, the man they asked for a report was Mr. Angell. Mr. Angell's article in our September issue all who read it must vividly remember. And we have in hand another article going to fundamentals of self-government. Mr. Wells' views are shown in Men Like Gods more easily and clearly than ever before. Men of this type are going from the Liberal Party into the Labor Party because the Labor Party comes nearer to having an appropriate modern program. There is some talk of a third party in this country for 1924. Where is its program? You cannot make a third party by merely saying you want one, or by merely showing that the old parties are corrupt and stupid. There will be no third party of any importance in this country until expert thinkers, the best labor leaders, of the type of John Brophy, and some farmer interests, such as the leaders described in our next issue by William Hard, are able to construct a program on which all of them can stand.

Wake Up, Poland

WHEN the sages at Paris made Poland too large, they did her no favor. When she marched into Russia, and took away territory clearly not hers, she added to her already existing dangers. If she continues to antagonize Germany and Russia in order to quiet the fears of France, she will have a terrible awakening.

Miss Strong's account of the present temper of Poland is reassuring, although it clearly marks the dangers. Let us all wish to that perilous land the wisdom that comes with the cold gray dawn. Clemenceau, at the session of the Big Three, June 2, 1919, said: “As far as Poland is concerned, there is first of all an historical crime to repair, and in the second place we have to make a barrier between Russia and Germany.” Both of which points are a good deal worse than nonsense. The more the mind of Europe feeds on past “crimes” the further away will it be from curing itself. A good lesson, for Europe as well as for America, is in Senator Borah's article on “Intolerance” in our December number.

Russian Outlook

AS ASIA and Europe face each other, with potential menace, Russia, in the long run, holds a deciding voice. If friendly to the West she could absorb any shock, as she absorbed the invasions of the 9th and 13th centuries, and thus saved Europe. Now, as we watch many statesmen bungling and a few really seeing, we can only follow the details, hoping they lead to larger wisdom. Even Lenin's death would not create governmental chaos. Foreign statesmen see that, in spite of the famine of 1921, an increased area was planted. The peasant is adjusting himself, and many even of the larger interests would not have the reactionaries back. Where there is a decrease in sowing, it is not in crops the peasant uses himself, but in those he sells. It is in wheat, flax, barley, which he disposes of, not in rye, which he consumes. In his cottage industries he can make his own boots and shoes and rough garments. Moreover, unless our errors continue through some unforeseen new interference, Russia will in a few years export food again. Today the large industry that is nearest to being on its feet is petroleum, which happens also to be the new power behind much of the world-diplomacy. The finances will come around also. During June and July Russia went to gold and the American dollar as standards. Except the peasant, the borrower agrees to repay his loan with as many paper rubles as are necessary, on the day of payment, to purchase the gold rubles or dollars. For the peasant, the standard is a pound of rye. With 6% interest he pays back enough paper rubles, at the market price, to buy as much rye as on the day of the transaction. Russia has coal, and more than half of the hard woods of the entire world. With her iron, copper, lead, precious metals, and vast food production, she can wait for the results, whatever they may be, of Western intelligence or Western folly.

What Is In This Number

Clouds in the East

IF WE LOOK far ahead, Asia offers the largest of all world-problems. China has gone through a series of convulsions that apparently are leading her slowly toward nationality and coherence in government. But change in her economic system will not be rapid.

India, like China, hears dimly the echoes of the West, but there also changes will be slow. The Irish settlement, and the ebb of Gandhi's crusade for the primitive life have increased the confidence of Indian intellectuals in gains by parliamentary methods. Interest grows in the elections to be held at the end of 1923. More of her educated men are learning to think in constitutional terms. When India refuses to pay higher taxes as long as a third of them go to an army controlled by foreigners, she will be talking a language that must reach English liberals.

No doubt it is hard to guess ahead at the forces likely to sweep a land in which 244,000,000 people speak eleven languages, not counting dialects, and only a third speak Hindi and a fifth Bengali. Nevertheless, we know that the stirrings in India may well prove to be the most serious aspect of the ominous problem of the Turk.

The Moslems, with their militant religion, have set their hopes on India. The projected Islamic bloc is Turkey, Persia, Afghanistan, Daghestan, Bokhara, Khiva, and Turkestan, making 20,000,000, a number small enough to be managed by Western civilization, if Western civilization can stop its household quarrels. But if the Moslems should be able to set India on fire imagination balks at the result.

Russia has strengthened this Moslem bloc. While we have played ping-pong along the lines mapped out by one Russian in Washington and two or three dozen in Paris, Persia, Afghanistan, and Turkey have made peace treaties with Russia; and Germany, watching this movement from afar, has herself made with Russia a commercial treaty that brings her into friendly relations.

In the four years since the Armistice, Asia, slow as she is, has become more conscious of herself. Russia, whose soul is half Asiatic, has proved that there is a limit to what the West can dictate. Germany waits and wonders.

The answer lies in Paris.

Prudery

THAT a popular magazine can print as frank an article as the one by Dr. De Kruif in this issue is in itself a mark of national progress. Even fifteen years ago, in the best days of McClure's and Collier's, such easy candor was impossible. It is often the case that we see the lacks in our civilization and overlook its gains.

France and Drink

THE campaign now going on in the United States has in it a good deal of the drink question. The wets, who were securely asleep while the prohibition wave was rising, are now fiercely at work trying to get their liquor back. The dry forces are in their turn alarmed. Facts are the best food for both sides. To both sides we recommend Mr. Hunt's article on what actually is going on in the most famous wine-drinking country in the world.

Will Lilla Be Happy?

SOME of the talk showered on the over-criticized flapper might profitably be turned on her parents. Lilla, in Robert Herrick's serial now running, loses her best friend, as our readers already know, when her father dies. Her mother views with alarm and never understands. It was her mother's failure to understand that caused Lilla's first slip and it was the same maternal lack of insight that drove the girl to a remedy worse than the original fault.

Serene will be our days and bright
And happy will our nature be
When love is our unerring light,
And joy its own security.

Hard indeed is life for a girl whose parents are not her friends. If Lilla finds her way to happiness it will be not with her mother's rigid maxims but with the inheritance of her father's healthy instincts.

Jews in Colleges

THOSE who read this month's article on Henry Ford's Jew-Mania will see that the present series ends. It is not, however, the end of our attempt to stop the growth of anti-Semitism. Far from it. Much first-class material is coming on that subject. Before long we will print something about the Jew in our colleges. The Harvard case brought the matter to a head, and fortunately our foremost university is now compelled to answer a number of questions, among others this: would prejudice be reduced or increased, if an historic home of freedom should yield to mob antipathy?

Bridge

THE most famous of experts at auction whist was a gambler on a large scale, and he also combined his card-playing with vices other than gambling. Such is often the case. Those for whom bridge becomes the center of life are likely to acquire the gambler mind, the gambler heart and soul. But that is not the entire story. Bridge requires thought. It puts the brain to an exercise similar to those given by algebra and logic. It trains the memory and requires concentration. Thousands of men and women, especially in smaller cities, are thus obtaining an activity of mind they would never otherwise know. Good does not cease to be good because exaggeration can turn it into evil. There is scarcely a virtue that cannot by excess become a vice.

Men Like GODS

By H. G. Wells

Illustrated by George W. Bellows

MR. BARNSTAPLE found himself in urgent need of a holiday and he had no one to go with and nowhere to go. He was overworked. And he was tired of home.

He was a man of strong natural affections; he loved his family extremely so that he knew it by heart, and when he was in these jaded moods it bored him acutely.

His three sons who were all growing up seemed to get leggier and larger every day; they sat down in the chairs he was just going to sit down in; they played him off his own pianola; they filled the house with hoarse vast laughter at jokes that one couldn't demand to be told; they cut in on the elderly harmless flirtations that had hitherto been one of his chief consolations in this vale; they beat him at tennis; they fought playfully on the landings and fell downstairs with an enormous racket.

Their hats were everywhere. They were late for breakfast. They went to bed every night in a storm of uproar: "haw, haw, haw,—bump!" And their mother seemed to like it.

They all cost money with a cheerful disregard of the fact that everything had gone up except Mr. Barnstaple's earning power. And when he said a few plain truths about Mr. Lloyd George at meal times or made the slightest attempt to raise the tone of the table-talk above the level of the silliest persiflage their attention wandered ostentatiously. . . . At any rate it seemed ostentatiously.

He wanted badly to get away from his family to some place where he could think of its various members with quiet pride and affection, and otherwise not be disturbed by them.

And also he wanted to get away for a time from Mr. Peeve. The very streets were becoming a torment to him, he wanted never to see a newspaper or a newspaper placard again. He was obsessed by apprehensions of some sort of financial and economic smash that would make the Great War seem a mere incidental catastrophe. This was because he was sub-editor and general factotum of the Liberal, that well-known organ of the more depressing aspects of advanced thought, and the unvarying pessimism of Mr. Peeve, his chief, was, every day that passed, infecting him more and more.

Formerly it had been possible to put up a sort of resistance to Mr. Peeve by joking furtively about his gloom with the other members of the staff, but now there were no other members of the staff, they had all been retrenched by Mr. Peeve in a mood of financial despondency.

Practically now nobody wrote regularly for the Liberal except Mr. Barnstaple, Mr. Peeve, and the large and inky family that Mr. Peeve had very unkindly brought into this scene of woe. So Mr. Peeve had it all his own way with Mr. Barnstaple. He would sit hunched up in the editorial chair, with his hands deep in his trouser pockets, taking a gloomy view of everything sometimes for two hours together.

Mr. Barnstaple's natural tendency was toward a modest hopefulness and a belief in progress, but Mr. Peeve held very strongly that a belief in progress was at least six years out of date and that the brightest hope that remained to Liberalism was for a good Day of Judgment soon. And having finished the copy of what the staff, when there was a staff, used to call his weekly indigest Mr. Peeve would depart and leave Mr. Barnstaple to get the rest of the paper together for the next week.

Even in ordinary times Mr. Peeve would have been hard enough to live with, but the times were not ordinary; they were full of disagreeable occurrences that made his melancholy anticipations all too plausible. The great coal lock-out had been going on a month and seemed to foreshadow the final commercial ruin of England; every morning brought intelligence of fresh outrages from Ireland, unforgivable and unforgettable outrages; a prolonged drought threatened the harvests of the world; the League of Nations, of which Mr. Barnstaple had hoped enormous things in the great days of President Wilson, was a melancholy and self-satisfied futility; everywhere there was conflict, everywhere, unreason; seven-eighths of the world seemed to be sinking down toward chronic disorder and social dissolution. It would have been difficult enough to have made headway against the fact even without Mr. Peeve.

MR. BARNSTAPLE was in fact ceasing to secrete hope, and for such types as he, hope is the essential solvent without which there is no digesting life. His hope had always been in liberalism and generous liberal effort, but he was beginning to think that liberalism would never do anything more forever than sit hunched up with its hands in its pockets grumbling and peeving at the activities of baser but more energetic men, whose scrambling activities would inevitably wreck the world.

Night and day now Mr. Barnstaple was worrying about the world at large. By night even more than by day, for sleep was leaving him. And he was haunted by a dreadful craving to bring out a number of the Liberal of his very own—to alter it all after Mr. Peeve had gone away, to cut out all the dyspeptic stuff, the miserable empty girding at this wrong and that, the gloating on cruel and unhappy things, the exaggerations of the simple, natural human misdeeds of Mr. Lloyd George, the appeals to Lord Grey, Lord Robert Cecil, Lord Landsdowne, the Pope, Queen Anne or the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa (it varied from week to week) to arise and give voice and form to the young aspirations of a world reborn, and instead to fill the number with—Utopia; to say to the amazed readers of the Liberal: Here are things that have to be done! Here are the things we are going to do! What a blow it would be for Mr. Peeve at his Sunday breakfast! For once too astonished to secrete abnormally, he might even digest that meal!

BUT THIS was the most foolish of dreaming. There were the three young Barnstaples at home and their need for a decent start in life to consider. And beautiful as the thing was as a dream Mr. Barnstaple had a very unpleasant conviction that he was not really clever enough to pull such a thing off. He would make a mess of it somehow. . . .

One might jump from the frying pan into the fire. The Liberal was a dreary discouraging ungenerous paper, but anyhow it was not a base and wicked paper.

Still, if there was to be no such disastrous outbreak it was imperative that Mr. Barnstaple should rest from Mr. Peeve for a time. Once or twice already he had contradicted him. And Mr. Peeve soured rapidly under contradiction. A row might occur at any time. And the first step toward resting from Mr. Peeve was evidently to see a doctor. So Mr. Barnstaple went to a doctor.

"My nerves are getting out of control," said Mr. Barnstaple. "I feel horribly neurasthenic."

"You are suffering from neurasthenia," said the doctor.

"I dread my daily work."

"You want a holiday."

"You think I need a change?"

"As complete a change as you can manage."

"Can you recommend any place where I could go?"

"Where do you want to go?"

"Nowhere definite. I thought you could recommend—"

"Let some place attract you—and go there. Do nothing to force your inclinations at the present time."

Mr Barnstaple paid the doctor the sum of one guinea and armed with these instructions prepared to break the news of his illness and his necessary absence to Mr. Peeve whenever the occasion seemed ripe for doing so.

For a time this prospective holiday was merely a fresh addition to Mr. Barnstaple's already excessive burden of worries. To decide to get away was to find oneself face to face at once with three apparently insurmountable problems: How to get away? Whither? And since Mr. Barnstaple was one of those people who tire very quickly of their own company, with whom? A sharp gleam of furtive scheming crept into the candid misery that had recently become Mr. Barnstaple's habitual expression.

ONE thing was very clear in his mind. Not a word of this holiday must be breathed at home. If once Mrs. Barnstaple got wind of it he knew exactly what would happen. She would, with an air of competent devotion, take charge of the entire business. "You must have a good holiday," she would say. She would select some rather distant and expensive resort in Cornwall or Scotland or Brittany, she would buy a lot of outfit, she would have afterthoughts to swell the luggage with inconvenient parcels at the last moment, and she would bring the boys. Probably she would arrange for one or two groups of acquaintances to come to the same place to "liven things up." If they did they were certain to bring the worst sides of their natures with them and to develop into the most indefatigable of bores. There would be no conversation. There would be much unreal laughter. There would be endless games. No!

But how is a man to get away for a holiday without his wife getting wind of it? Somehow a bag must be packed and got out of the house. . . .

The most hopeful thing about Mr. Barnstaple's position from Mr. Barnstaple's point of view was that he owned a small automobile of his own. It was natural that this car should play a large part in his secret plannings. It seemed to offer the easiest means of getting away; it converted to possible the answer to whither? from a fixed and definite place into what mathematicians call, I believe, a locus; and there was something so companionable about the little beast that it did to a slight but quite perceptible extent answer the question, with whom?

It was a two-seater. It was known in the family as the Foot-bath, Coleman's Mustard, and the Yellow Peril. As these names suggest, it was a low open car of a clear yellow color.

Mr. Barnstaple used it to come up to the office from Sydenham because it did thirty-three miles to the gallon and was ever so much cheaper than a season ticket. It stood up in the court under the office window during the day. At Sydenham it lived in a shed of which Mr. Barnstaple carried the only key. So far he had managed to prevent the boys from either driving it or taking it to pieces. At times Mrs. Barnstaple made him drive her about Sydenham for her shopping, but she did not really like the little car because it exposed her to the elements too much and made her dusty and disheveled. Both by reason of all that it made possible and by reason of all that it debarred, the little car was clearly indicated as the medium for the needed holiday. And Mr. Barnstaple really liked driving it. He drove very badly but he drove very carefully, and though it sometimes stopped and refused to proceed it did not do, or at any rate it had not so far done, as most other things did in Mr. Barnstaple's life, which was to go due east when he turned the steering wheel west. So that it gave him an agreeable sense of mastery.

In the end Mr. Barnstaple made his decisions with great rapidity. Opportunity suddenly opened in front of him. Thursday was his day at the printer's, and he came home on Thursday evening feeling horribly jaded. The weather kept obstinately hot and dry. It made it none the less distressing that this drought presaged famine and misery for half the world. And London was in full season, smart and grinning; if anything it was a sillier year than 1913, the great tango year, which, in the light of subsequent events, Mr. Barnstaple had hitherto regarded as the silliest year in the world's history. The Star had the usual batch of bad news along the margin of the sporting and fashionable intelligence that got the displayed space. Fighting was going on between the Russians and Poles, and also in Ireland, Asia Minor, the India frontier and Eastern Siberia. There had been three new horrible murders. The miners were still out and a big engineering strike was threatened. There had been only standing room in the downtrain and it had started twenty minutes late.

HE FOUND a note from his wife explaining that her cousins at Wimbledon had telegraphed that there was an unexpected chance of seeing the tennis there with Mademoiselle Lenglen and all the rest of the champions, and that she had gone over with the boys and would not be back until late. It would do their game no end of good, she said, to see some really first-class tennis. Also it was the servants' social that night. Would he mind being left alone in the house for once? The servants would put him out some cold supper before they went.

Mr. Barnstaple read this note with resignation. While he ate his supper he ran his eye over a pamphlet a Chinese friend had sent him to show how the Japanese were deliberately breaking up what was left of the civilization and education of China.

It was only as he was sitting and smoking a pipe in his little back garden after supper that he realized all that being left alone in the house meant for him.

Then suddenly he became very active. He rang up Mr. Peeve, told him of the doctor's verdict, explained that the affairs of the Liberal were just then in a particularly leavable state, and got his holiday. Then he went to his bedroom and packed up a hasty selection of things to take with him in an old Gladstone bag that was not likely to be immediately missed and put this in the dickey of his car. After which he spent some time upon a letter which he addressed to his wife and put away very carefully in his breast pocket. Then he locked up the car-shed and composed himself in a desk chair in the garden with his pipe and a nice book on the Bankruptcy of Europe, so as to look and feel as innocent as possible before his family came home.

When his wife returned he told her casually that he believed he was suffering from neurasthenia, and that he had arranged to run up to London on the morrow and consult a doctor.

Mrs. Barnstaple wanted to choose him a doctor, but he got out of that by saying that he had to consider Peeve in the matter and that Peeve was very strongly set on the man he had already in fact consulted. And when Mrs. Barnstaple said that she believed they all wanted a good holiday, he just grunted in a noncommittal manner.

In this way Mr. Barnstaple was able to get right away from his house with all the necessary luggage for some weeks' holiday

C With a kind of awe Mr. Barnstaple knelt beside the dead body of the beautiful girl. Suddenly two stark Apollos stood over the ruin and were regarding our Earthlings with an astonishment as great as they created.

without arousing any insurmountable opposition. He started next morning Londonward. The traffic on the way was gay and plentiful but by no means troublesome, and the Yellow Peril was running so sweetly that she might almost have been named the Golden Hope. In Camberwell he turned into the Camberwell New Road and made his way to the post office at the top of Vauxhall Bridge Road. There he drew up. He was scared but elated by what he was doing. He went into the post office and sent his wife a telegram. "Dr. Pagen," he wrote, "says solitude and rest urgently needed so am going off Lake District recuperate letter follows."

Then he came outside and fumbled in his pocket and produced and posted the letter he had written so carefully overnight.

It was deliberately scrawled to suggest neurasthenia at an acute phase. Dr. Pagen, it explained, had ordered an immediate holiday and suggested that Mr. Barnstaple should "wander north." It would be better to cut off all letters for a few days. He would not trouble to write unless something went wrong. No news would be good news. As soon as he had a certain address for letters he would wire.

After this he resumed his seat in his car with such a sense of freedom as he had never felt since his first holidays from his first school. He made for the Great North Road, but at the traffic jam at Hyde Park Corner he allowed the policeman to turn him down toward Knightsbridge, and afterwards at the corner where the Bath Road forks away from the Oxford Road an obstructive van put him into the former. But it did not matter very much. Any way led to elsewhere and he could work northward later.

The day was one of those days of gay sunshine that were characteristic of the great drought of 1921. It was not in the least sultry. Indeed there was a freshness about it that blended with Mr. Barnstaple's mood to convince him that there were quite agreeable adventures before him. Hope had already returned to him. He knew he was on the way out of things, though as yet he had not the slightest suspicion how completely out of things the way was going to take him. It would be quite a little adventure presently to stop at an inn and get some lunch, and if he felt lonely as he went on his way he would give somebody a lift and talk. It would be quite easy to give people lifts because so long as his back was generally toward Sydenham and the Liberal office, it did not matter at all now which way he went.

A little way out of Slough he was passed by an enormous gray touring car. It made him start and swerve. It came up alongside him without a sound, and though, according to his only very slightly inaccurate speedometer, he was doing a good twenty-seven miles an hour, it had passed him in a moment. Its occupants, he noted, were three gentlemen and a lady. They were all sitting up and looking backwards as though they were interested in something that was following them. They went by too quickly for him to note more than that the lady was radiantly lovely in an immediate and indisputable way, and that the gentleman nearest to him had a peculiarly elfin yet elderly face.

BEFORE HE could recover from the éclat of this passage a car with the voice of a prehistoric saurian warned him that he was again being overtaken. This was how Mr. Barnstaple liked being passed. By negotiation. He slowed down, abandoned any claim to the crown of the road and made encouraging gestures with his hand. A large smooth swift limousine availed itself of his permission to use the thirty odd feet or so of road to the right of him. It was carrying a fair load of luggage, but except for a young gentleman with an eyeglass who was sitting beside the driver, he saw nothing of its passengers. It swept round a corner ahead in the wake of the touring car.

Now even a mechanical foot-bath does not like being passed in this lordly fashion on a bright morning on the open road. Mr. Barnstaple's accelerator went down and he came round that corner quite ten miles per hour faster than his usual cautious practice. He found the road quite clear ahead of him.

Indeed he found the road much too clear ahead of him. It stretched straight in front of him for perhaps a third of a mile. On the left were a low well trimmed hedge, scattered trees, level fields, some small cottages lying back, remote poplars and a distant view of Windsor Castle. On the right were level fields, a small inn and a background of low wooded hills. A conspicuous feature in this tranquil landscape was the board advertisement of a riverside hotel at Maidenhead. Before him was a sort of heat flicker in the air and two or three little dust whirls spinning along the road. And there was not a sign of the gray touring car and not a sign of the limousine.

It took Mr. Barnstaple the better part of two seconds to realize the full astonishment of this fact. Neither to right nor left was there any possible side road down which either car could have vanished. And if they had already got round the farther bend then they must be traveling at the rate of two or three hundred miles per hour!

It was Mr. Barnstaple's excellent custom whenever he was in doubt to slow down. He slowed down now. He went on at a pace perhaps fifteen miles an hour, staring open-mouthed about the empty landscape for some clue to this very mysterious disappearance. Curiously enough he had no feeling that he himself was in any sort of danger.

Then his car seemed to strike something and skidded. It skidded round so violently that for a moment or so Mr. Barnstaple lost his head. He could not remember what ought to be done when a car skids. He recalled something vaguely about steering in the direction in which the car is skidding but he could not make out in the excitement of the moment in what direction the car was skidding.

Afterwards he remembered that at this point he heard a sound. It was exactly the same sound, coming as the climax of an accumulating pressure, sharp like the snapping of a lute string, which one hears at the end—or beginning—of insensibility under anesthetics.

He had seemed to twist round toward the hedge on the right, but now he found the road ahead of him again. He touched his accelerator and then slowed down and stopped. He stopped in the profoundest astonishment.

This was an entirely different road from the one he had been upon half a minute before. The hedges had changed, the trees had altered. Windsor Castle had vanished, and—a small compensation—the big limousine was in sight again. It was standing by the road-side about two hundred yards away.

FOR a time Mr. Barnstaple's attention was very unequally divided between the limousine, whose passengers were now descending, and the scenery about him. This latter was indeed so strange and beautiful that it was only as people who must be sharing his admiration and amazement and who therefore might conceivably help to elucidate and relieve his growing and quite overwhelming perplexity, that the little group ahead presently arose to any importance in his consciousness.

The road itself instead of being the packed together pebbles and dirt smeared with tar with a surface of grit, dust and animal excrement, of a normal English high road, was apparently made of glass, clear in places as still water and in places milky or opalescent, shot with streaks of soft color or glittering richly with clouds of imbedded golden flakes. It was perhaps twelve or fifteen yards wide. On either side was a band of greensward, of a finer grass than Mr. Barnstaple had ever seen before—and he was an expert and observant mower of lawns—and beyond this a wide border of flowers. Where Mr. Barnstaple sat agape in his car and perhaps for thirty yards in either direction this border was a mass of some unfamiliar blossom of forget-me-not blue. Then the color was broken by an increasing number of tall pure white spikes that finally ousted the blue altogether from the bed. On the opposite side of the way these same spikes were mingled with masses of plants bearing seed pods equally strange to Mr. Barnstaple which varied through a series of blues and mauves and purples to an intense crimson. Beyond this gloriously colored foam of flowers spread flat meadows on which creamy cattle were grazing. Three close at hand, a little startled perhaps by Mr. Barnstaple's sudden apparition, chewed the cud and regarded him with benevolently speculative eyes. They had long horns and dewlaps like the cattle of South Europe and India. From these benign creatures Mr. Barnstaple's eyes went to a long line of flame shaped trees, to a colonnade of white and gold and to a background of snow-clad mountains. A few tall white clouds were sailing across a sky of dazzling blue. The air impressed Mr. Barnstaple as being astonishingly clear and sweet.

Except for the cows Mr. Barnstaple could see no other living creatures at all except the little group of people standing by the limousine. They seemed to be standing still and staring about them. A sound of querulous voices came to him.

A sharp crepitation at his back turned Mr. Barnstaple's attention round. By the side of the road in the direction from which conceivably he had come were the ruins of what appeared to be a very recently demolished stone house. Beside it were two large apple trees freshly twisted and riven, as if by some explosion, and out of the center of it came a column of smoke and the sound of things catching fire. And the contorted lines of these shattered apple trees helped Mr. Barnstaple to realize that some of the flowers by the wayside near at hand were also bent down to one side as if by the passage of a recent violent gust of wind. Yet he had heard no explosion nor felt any wind.

HE STARED for a time and then turned as if for an explanation to the limousine. Three of these people were now coming along the road toward him, led by a tall, slender, gray-headed gentleman in a felt hat and a long motoring dust-coat. He had a small upturned face with a little nose that scarce sufficed for the springs of his gilt glasses. Mr. Barnstaple restarted his engine and drove slowly to meet them.

As soon as he judged himself within hearing distance he stopped and put his head over the side of the Yellow Peril with a question. At the same moment the tall, gray-headed gentleman asked practically the same question.

"Can you tell me at all, sir, where we are?"

"Five minutes ago," said Mr. Barnstaple, "I should have said we were on the Maidenhead Road. Near Slough."

"Exactly!" said the tall gentleman, in earnest argumentative tones. "And I maintain that there is not the slightest reason for supposing that we are not still on the Maidenhead Road."

C. The Earthlings became aware of a body lying on a grassy slope behind the ruin—the body of a man in the prime of life, naked except for a couple of bracelets and a necklace and girdle.

The challenge of the dialectician rang in his voice as he spoke. "It doesn't look like the Maidenhead Road," said Mr. Barnstaple resolutely.

"Agreed! But are we to judge by appearance or are we to judge by the direct continuity of our experience? The Maidenhead Road led to this, was in continuity with this and therefore I hold that this is the Maidenhead Road."

"Those mountains?" considered Mr. Barnstaple.

"Windsor Castle ought to be there," said the tall gentleman.

"Was there five minutes ago," corrected Mr. Barnstaple.

"Then obviously those mountains are some sort of a camouflage," said the tall gentleman triumphantly, "and the whole of this business is, as they say nowadays, a put up thing."

Came a pause during which Mr. Barnstaple surveyed the tall gentleman's companions. The tall gentleman he knew perfectly well. He had seen him a score of times at public meetings and public dinners. He was Mr. Cecil Burleigh, the great conservative leader. He was not only distinguished as a politician; he was eminent as a private gentleman, a philosopher and a man of universal intelligence. Behind him stood a short thick-set, middle-aged young man, unknown to Mr. Barnstaple, the natural hostility of whose appearance was greatly enhanced by an eyeglass. The third member of the little group was also a familiar form, but for a time Mr. Barnstaple could not place him. He had a clean-shaven, round, plump face and a well-nourished person, and his costume suggested either a high church clergyman or a prosperous priest of the Roman Catholic church.

The young man with the eyeglass now spoke in a kind of impotent falsetto. "I came down to Taplow Court by road not a month ago and there was certainly nothing of this sort on the way then."

"I admit there are difficulties," said Mr. Burleigh with gusto. "I admit there are considerable difficulties. Still I venture to think my main proposition holds."

"You don't think this is the Maidenhead Road?" said the gentleman with the eyeglass flatly to Mr. Barnstaple.

"It seems too perfect for a put up thing," said Mr. Barnstaple with a mild obstinacy.

"But, my dear sir!" protested Mr. Burleigh, "this road is notorious for nursery seedsmen and sometimes they arrange the most astonishing displays. As an advertisement."

"Then why don't we go straight on to Taplow Court now?" asked the gentleman with the eyeglass.

"Because," said Mr. Burleigh, with the touch of asperity natural when one has to insist on a fact already clearly known, and obstinately overlooked, "Rupert insists that we are in some other world. And won't go on. That is why. He has always had too much imagination. He thinks that things that don't exist can exist. And now he imagines himself in some sort of scientific romance and out of our world altogether—in another dimension. I sometimes think it would have been better for all of us if Rupert had taken to writing romances—instead of living them. If you, as his secretary, think that you will be able to get him on to Taplow in time for lunch with the Windsor people—"

Mr. Burleigh indicated by a gesture ideas for which he found words inadequate.

MR. BARNSTAPLE had already noted a slow moving, intent, sandy-complexioned figure in a gray top hat with a black band that the caricaturists had made familiar, exploring the flowery tangle beside the limousine. This then must be a no less well-known person than Rupert Catskill, the Secretary of State for War. For once Mr. Barnstaple found himself in entire agreement with this all too adventurous politician. This was another world. Mr. Barnstaple got out of his car and addressed himself to Mr. Burleigh. "I think we may get a lot of light upon just where we are, sir, if we explore this building which is burning here close at hand. I thought just now that I saw a figure lying on the slope close behind it. If we could catch one of the hoaxers—"

He left his sentence unfinished because he did not believe for a moment that they were being hoaxed. Mr. Burleigh had fallen very much in his opinion in the last five minutes.

All four men turned their faces to the smoking ruin.

"It's a very extraordinary thing that there isn't a soul in sight," remarked the eyeglass gentleman searching the horizon.

"Well, I see no harm whatever in finding out what is burning," said Mr. Burleigh and led the way, upholding an intelligent anticipatory face, towards the wrecked and burning house between the broken trees.

But before he had gone a dozen paces the attention of the little group was recalled to the limousine by a loud scream of terror from the lady who had remained seated therein.

"Really this is too much!" cried Mr. Burleigh with a note of genuine exasperation. "There must surely be police regulations to prevent this kind of thing."

"It's out of some traveling menagerie," said the gentleman with the eyeglass. "What ought we to do?"

"It looks tame," said Mr. Barnstaple, but without any impulse to put his theory to the test.

"It might easily frighten people very seriously," said Mr. Burleigh. And lifting up a bland voice he shouted; "Don't be alarmed, Stella! It's probably quite tame and harmless. Don't irritate it with that sunshade. It might fly at you. Stel-la!"

"It" was a big and beautifully marked leopard which had come very softly out of the flowers and sat down like a great cat in the middle of the glass road at the side of the big car. It was blinking and moving its head from side to side rhythmically, with an expression of puzzled interest, as the lady in accordance with the best traditions of such cases, opened and shut her parasol at it as rapidly as she could. The chauffeur had taken cover behind the car. Mr. Rupert Catskill stood staring, knee deep in flowers, apparently only made aware of the creature's existence by the same scream that had attracted the attention of Mr. Burleigh and his companions.

Mr. Catskill was the first to act and his act showed his mettle. It was at once discreet and bold. "Stop flopping that sunshade, Lady Stella," he said. "Let me—I will—catch its eye."

HE MADE a detour round the car so as to come face to face with the animal. Then for a moment he stood, as it were displaying himself, a resolute little figure in a gray frock coat and a black banded top hat. He held out a cautious hand, not too suddenly for fear of startling the creature. "Poosy!" he said.

The leopard relieved by the cessation of Lady Stella's sunshade regarded him with interest and curiosity. He drew closer. The leopard extended its muzzle and sniffed.

"If it will only let me stroke it," said Mr. Catskill, and came within arm's length.

The beast sniffed the extended hand with an expression of incredulity. Then with a suddenness that sent Mr. Catskill back several paces, it sneezed. It sneezed again much more violently, regarded Mr. Catskill reproachfully for a moment and then leapt lightly over the flower-bed and made off in the direction of the white and golden colonnade. The grazing cattle in the field, Mr. Barnstaple noted, watched its passage without the slightest sign of dismay.

Mr. Catskill remained in a slightly expanded state in the middle of the road. "No animal," he remarked, "can stand up to the steadfast gaze of the human eye. Not one. It is a riddle for your materialist. . . . Shall we join Mr. Cecil, Lady Stella? He seems to have found something to look at down there. The man in the little yellow car may know where he is. Hm?"

He assisted the lady to get out of the car and the two came on after Mr. Barnstaple's party, which was now again approaching the burning house. The chauffeur, evidently not wishing to be left alone with the limousine in this world of incredible possibilities, followed as closely as respect permitted.

The fire in the little house did not seem to be making headway. The smoke that came from it was much less now than when Mr. Barnstaple had first observed it. As they came close they found a quantity of twisted bits of bright metal and fragments of broken glass among the shattered masonry. The suggestion of exploded scientific apparatus was very strong. Then almost simultaneously the entire party became aware of a body lying on the grassy slope behind the ruin. It was the body of a man in the prime of life, naked except for a couple of bracelets and a necklace and girdle, and blood was oozing from his mouth and nostrils. With a kind of awe Mr. Barnstaple knelt down beside this prostrate figure and felt its still heart. He had never seen so beautiful a face and body.

"Dead," he whispered.

"Look!" cried the shrill voice of the man with the eyeglass. "Another!"

HE WAS pointing to something that was hidden from Mr. Barnstaple by a piece of wall. Mr. Barnstaple had to get up and climb over a heap of rubble before he could see this second find. It was a slender girl, clothed as little as the man. She had evidently been flung with enormous violence against the wall and killed instantaneously. Her face was quite undistorted although her skull had been crushed in from behind; her perfect mouth and her green-gray eyes were a little open and her expression was that of one who is still thinking out some difficult but interesting problem. She did not seem in the least dead but merely disregarded. One hand still grasped a copper implement with a handle of glass. The other lay limp.

For some seconds nobody spoke. It was as if they all feared to interrupt the current of her thoughts.

Then Mr. Barnstaple heard the voice of the priestly gentleman speaking behind him. "What a perfect form!" he said.

"I admit I was wrong," said Mr. Burleigh with deliberation. "Yes, I have been wrong. . . . These are no earthly people. Manifestly. And ergo, we are not on earth. I cannot imagine what has happened nor where we are. In the face of sufficient evidence I have never hesitated to retract an opinion. This world we are in, is not our world. It is something—" He paused, "—it is something very wonderful indeed."

¶ Mr. Cecil Burleigh cleared his throat and assumed the duties as spokesman. "We are quite unable to account for our presence here," he said. "We are as puzzled as you are. We have discovered ourselves suddenly in your world instead of our own."

"And the Windsor party," said Mr. Catskill, without any apparent regret, "must have its lunch without us."

"But then," said the clerical gentleman, "what world are we in, and how did we get here?"

"Ah! there," said Mr. Burleigh blandly, "you go altogether beyond my poor powers of guessing. We are here in some world that is singularly like our world and singularly unlike it. It must be in some way related to our world or, maybe we are in some other dimension of space than those we wot of. But my poor head whirls at the thought of these dimensions."

"Einstein," injected the gentleman with the eyeglass, compactly and with evident self-satisfaction.

"Exactly!" said Mr. Burleigh. "Einstein might make it clear to us. Or dear old Haldane might undertake to explain it and fog us up with all that adipose Hegelianism of his. But I am neither Haldane nor Einstein. Here we are in some world which is, for all practical purposes, including the purposes of our week-end engagements, nowhere. Or if you prefer the Greek of it, we are in Utopia. And as I do not see that there is any manifest way out of it again I suppose the thing we have to do as rational creatures is to make the best of it, and watch our opportunities. It is certainly a very lovely world. The loveliness is even greater than the wonder. And there are human beings here—with minds. I judge from all this material lying about, it is a world in which experimental chemistry is pursued—pursued indeed to the bitter end—under almost idyllic [Continued on page 136]

"I fot at the ba'le o' Water-loo-oo-oo."

Some explanation is needed. Old Wirk manifestly never fought at the battle of Waterloo. But he imagines he did. He is eighty. He is in his dotage. He has never been out of Penny Green in his life, and his father was never out of it before him. But his grandfather fought at Waterloo. His grandfather, it is clear, over and over again told his infant grandson that story, and many another story of his life, and times; and now Old Wirk, living again his childhood, reproduces stories precisely as, in that childhood, he had them from his grandfather's lips. He never, in telling things told him by his grandfather, says:

"My granfer did so and so." He always says, "I did so and so," and, when reasoned with, can by no means be made to believe that he didn't.

Thus comes "I fot at Waterloo-oo-oo"; and the reduplication of the final syllable is because Old Wirk was some years ago presented by public subscription with a set of false teeth; and they get unshipped with certain articulations, and his cheeks and his chin and his tongue churn them round and round while his hearers wait patiently for him to catch and control them and get on with it. But he is very proud of his false teeth, and never takes them out except for his meals, a singularity that gave some offence to those who had subscribed for the teeth; but as Old Wirk said, "I've ate wi' me gooms these score years or more, an' I never can ate clean an' sharp an' healthy not but only with me goo-oo-ooms."

Old Wirk owns and lives at the forge on Penny Green. He is long past work at the anvil, but he still can do a turn at the bellows; and for the rest he sits all day on his bench beside the forge, ceaselessly moving his jaws round and round and round, and in the mind behind his extraordinarily bright blue eyes (clear and shining as a child's) revolving round and round and round a hopelessly confused mixture of his own youth, of his father's youth, and of his grandfather's youth.

to the Tybar Arms, and there sits with his pot of ale and the sires of the village, contributing his part to the debates, and, when these touch the past, doing so as the contemporary of those whose tombs are already overgrown and misshapen in the churchyard up the lane.

IT WAS on one such evening that young Mark Sabre (who told me this), recently come to live at Penny Green and much appealed to by the antiquities of the village, material and corporeal, asked Old Wirk what was the story of the ghost which was supposed to haunt the Green and to walk it on summer nights, its head beneath its arm.

“Mrs. Pithycomb told me,” said Sabre, “it was some way connected with that green patch where the children never play,”—and he pointed to a vivid brightness in the Green’s burnt summer aspect about which lay the remains of wooden rails which one time had fenced it off. “Is that right, Mr. Wirk?”

Old Wirk churned his cheeks and tongue and chin, and might be imagined churning also the confused medley within his brain.

“Ou-ai,” said Old Wirk, “ou-ai. That’s right enough. Green’s harnted. Green’s harnted, as many a frightened soul a seen with his own eyes. Willie Pringle harnts un, an’ yon patch with the rails is where a’ lies an’ where a’ rises. Ou-ai, Willie Pringle was buried in churchyard, an’ stone stands there for any man to see. But Willie Pringle no lies there. Earth hadn’t laid on Willie Pringle mor’n a week when four very old and sober men, sitting on this very bench on a full-moon night, saw Willie’s awful shape up out of yonder place and seek his head and find it lying there and start toward them, head under arm, for to ask them to join it to his shoulders. Ou-ai, they run, they run like young chaps for all their rheumatics. Ou-ai, they surely did, for I met un running; an’ ever after Willie Pringle in’s chosen time has rise there an’ took his head an’ walked the Green for one to join it for un. An’ never will rest till he finds one, for that’s the curse that’s set on un.”

“A’ was dressed in a soger’s coat, and a’ was pretty to look upon; a’ whistled an’ sung an’ laughed as a’ walked and a’ carried in his hand a long sword that was like a streak of lightning.”

Sabre asked, “How came he to lose his head, Mr. Wirk?”

“Why, be sure, be sure, that’s a tale I’ve told ’ee a two-score times an’ more. ’Tis a terrible tale, to be sure, an’ a grave warning to maid an’ man alike. Willie Pringle lost his head after Corporal Harry come home from the ba’le o’ Waterloo-oo-oo.”

“Ou-ai, ou-ai, I fot at Waterloo-oo-oo. Drab take these teeth o’ mine! Corporal Harry an’ ine, we fot together at Waterloo.”

‘Here they be coming, Zack,’ shouts Corporal Harry in me ear; and surely there they were, they Frenchies, thundering on their great enormous horses of war, and waving their great enormous swords, and shouting.

“Ou-ai, ’twas where I lost my arm, at Waterloo. I mind him now, the mighty an’ ferocious Frenchie that took my arm from me. I see him now. His horse could by no means fall for the bagganets that upheld him. An’ he sat atop on his dead

“Where be my sweetheart?’ a’ says. An’ they look one upon another and say no word. An’ I says to un, ‘Harry,’ I says, ‘thy maid Prudence be dead an’ laid in churchyard.’” beast an’ slashed most terrible all about him. An’ he see me eye to eye, an’ swings back his mighty sword till his arm to the elbow was over his shoulder, an’, thinks I, ‘I’ll take thee with me, Frenchie, if so be my hour is now come.’ An’ I set my foot on the bodics before me, an’ I ups an’ gives him my bagganet straight to his throat; an’ he comes swish with his sword, an’ I goes ha’ with my bagganet, an’ a most terrible dizziness comes over me; an’ I mind I said to one, ‘Draw me from here’; an’ a’ bawls to me, ‘Thou must die first, Zack.’”

Old Wirk paused and stared before him with bemused eyes as though he saw again those sights which in actual fact he had never seen; or as if, Sabre thought, watching him, some rift of his own individuality struck into the clouds of his fancies and held him puzzled. But he shook his head as though to shake it an' mighty sergeant shouts, 'Now then, my likely lads, my likely lads! Now then, my true-born British likely lads, here's a pocket full o' shillings an' a knapsack full o' ribbons, an' who's the likely lads, the true-born British likely lads, that's going to have un'.

"That grandly man a-shakes his head an' rattles his shillings, an' smile, an' laughs, an', 'My likely lads, my likely lads,' says he, 'thy goodwife there would keep ye to tie to her skirts till ye be old women too. My likely lads, the King's a-calling for ye one an' all to catch Bonaparty, the scourage of Europe, an' who will stop to home when the king's a-calling him? Who'll wear a smock when a' can wear a fine red coat?'

"An' with that he sets off, an' they all sets off, walking in a circle here, with the drum tapping an' the colors flying, an' that grandly man giving a shilling an' pinning a favour here an' there to half a score on us. Right opposite me a' halts and cries, 'Now one for you, my likely lad. I warrant me the King's got the likeliest lad in all England here.'

"Ou-ai, so a' did say, to be sure, for I was a rare an' likely lad in those days, an' none in all the village to set beside me save only Corporal Harry, who was a lusty an' mighty one as ever woman loved well in these parts. Ou-ai, a' certainly was. But he was no corporal then, 'ee mind me, nor him nor me going for sojers then, having a most daring and terrible adventure to our hands which were to come to pass that very night; so that us stood away an' let the sojers an' the chaps go marching off while we shaped for it.

"You mind me, there was in the land in those days many a Frenchie that was gentle born in a's own country that was prisoner to us an' that lived with folks on parole, as they named it, which was his solemn word pledged on's sword that a' would not escape. One an' another I've see'd in they days, an' one there was a year an' more in the village here. A' was called Mouser, which is what they all are named in their own country, an' a' lived here with Mr. Crawshaw at the white house yonder.

"A' could speak nobbut a word an' a word of English, an' no man understand un when a' did, an' 'twas long o' that that Harry an' me come to run for sojers. Harry saw a main deal o' this Mouser, for a' was courting Prudence that was wench in Mr. Crawshaw's kitchen. An' a' tells me, Harry, that his was none the only courting at that house. Often as he be there, a' tells me, a' sees this Mouser walking the garden with Mr. Crawshaw's lass, Mistress Anne. An' there come a day when a' says to me 'Zack,' a' says, 'there's fifty guineas to be had for putting the Mouser over to Sandwich, by Dover, in Kent, to smugglers that wait to run un to France.'

"I says to un, 'Harry,' I says, 'tis a hanging job'; an' a' laughs an' says, 'Drabbit, man,' a' says, 'Tis a fifty guinea job, an' tho'llt have five-an'-twenty, Zack, an' I'll have five-an'- clear, and declared, "Ou-ai, that's how I lose my arm at the great ba'le of Waterloo-oo-oo."

One of the younger men, with a wink and a nod, called Sabre's attention to a bit of sport.

"Why, but, granfer, tha's got thy arms, both on un."

Old Wirk stared at his two hands, one on either knee before him, and raised and stared at one, and then the other. His questioner tittered, and from others there were "Haw-haws."

The old man turned on them sharply. "Tell 'ee I lost me arm at Waterloo-oo-oo. Tell 'ee I did!"

Sabre shook his head in reproof at the mockers, and pushed the ale-pot to Old Wirk's trembling hand. "Go on, Mr. Wirk; go on. You're telling us about the ghost, about how Corporal Harry came home from Waterloo."

Old Wirk brightened and wetted and gulped. "Ou-ai, ou-ai, when Corporal Harry come home from Waterloo. To be sure.

Ou-ai, those were days; they surely were days. Us run for sojers, Corporal Harry an' me. Us run for sojers, we surely did. I mind me well the day the sojers come, an' round, an' round the green they marched with drum an' colors an' a great mighty sergeant with a handful of favors that a' waves and shouts like the grandly man a' surely was.

"Ou-ai, drie times they go round the green with the drum an' colors; an' then they stand up here afore the inn an' the great twenty an' my Prudence likewise, which the lass 'll marry me when we get the Mouser safe away.'

"I tell 'ee, chaps, I tell 'ee, sir, I were a rare un in those days, an' ready to chance my neck for any bit fun, leave alone a pocket of guineas, so I gives ear to un, an' a' tells me.

"A' tells me a rare tangle o' stuff. A' tells me a' was going to do this for Prudence, an' Prudence she be doing it for Mistress Anne, an' Mistress Anne she be doing it for the Mouser, an' the Mouser he be doing it for to see his mother that were dying.

"Me an' Harry we went over along to Mr. Crawshaw's that night, an' in the garden we settled it all to rights, Harry an' me an' Mistress Anne an' Prudence an' the Mouser. The Mouser were a fine bold man, he surely were, an' a rare well-looking un. I mind me he had his arm about Mistress Anne while we talked, an' rare an' bravely he looked at her; an' rare an' sweet she looked at he with tears in her eyes.

"Mouser's trouble, ye see, chaps, was that a' could speak no English, which was why he surely could not travel the roads alone; an' Mistress Anne she made it for us that, when we meet folk on the road, Harry an' me'd be two young chaps taking to Dover a gentleman that was deaf mute from his cradle an' no could talk and no could hear; an' 'twas so arranged, an' on a fine clear evening we set out, the dree on us, a hunner an' fifty miles an' all, an' us in reckoning to meet the smugglers on the tenth day forward.

"Ou-ai, right down into Kent we come, with never a slip nor hurt by the way; an' then the luck turn against us.

"Two-score mile or more from Sandwich, by Dover, an' dree days from the night of meeting the smugglers, we come by an inn at nightfall an' made to pass the night there, an' stepped into kitchen an' found much company assembled an' mighty ungracious. Was a fine lady there an' a fine gentleman, with a wheel off their chaise, an' made to stop for the night along of it, an' mighty ill-pleased to tarry in such a place; an' two fine young officers bound for Dover making company with them, an' they four desiring all the inn to themselves.

"Ou-ai, when we made entry, all dripping, for 'twas raining amain, 'La!' cries the fine lady, 'here be three more of the wretches. Why, this inn doth collect the raff of the roads like bugs in a straw-bed.'

WITH THAT she puts a bottle to her nose an' smells at it, an' her fine lord puts glass to his eye an' stares at us, an' the fine young officers put also bottles to their noses an' stare, an' the company beside the fire that likely had been talked to thus, each in's turn, looked mighty sour upon us, which was to make favor with the fine folk, 'ee understand.

"Us made to take stools quiet by the fire, never liking, 'ee mind me, to call folks' regard to ourselves; but whiles we ate of our vittles the quality folk must chatter on idle tongues at us.

"This Mouser, 'ee mind me, was dressed like sober an' decent gentleman, an' carried short sword by's side; an' the fine lady with her eye on un, 'Him wear a laced waistcoat,' she cries. 'La, 'tis monstrous strange to wear a laced waistcoat an' carry sword an' be keeping company with such!'

"Has a hang-dog look,' says her lord, quizzing the Mouser through his glass.

"Fore George,' says one of the officers, 'has a nasty French look, or I never see a Frenchman that have run twoscore through the body,' a' says.

"Corporal Harry touches his lock in a well-behaved, sober, modest way, an' a' says, 'Thy pardon, madam,' a' says, 'thy pardon, sirs, the gentleman is no French but true-born English, an's father is man of property an' good estate beyond Dover. An' by thy kind leave, lady, an' by the most terrible affliction of God, a's born deaf-mute an' neither speaks nor yet hears, an' be come from Bath where a most notable physician has seen un,

C. "Ob, the disgusting French villain!" the fine lady spits out and the officer comes at us with a sword.

an' be travelling now to a's father's-estate—in our company.'

"Ou-ai, a' could speak properly, Corporal Harry could, remembering all that Mistress Anne had told un to say, an' saying it most bold an' convincing. But it surely was of no avail with they. 'A fine tale,' cried the lady. 'Keep it where 'tis asked of thee,' she cries. 'Speaking to thy betters! La!' cries she to the officers, 'tis a nice thing that I should be spoken up to my face by any dirt that pleases!'

"Her lord, that likely was accustomed to her such-like whimsies, laughs; but one o' the young officers takes up with her. 'Will have the room cleared for 'ee, madam' a' says to her, 'if it likes 'ee, madam,' a' says. 'But sound the precious mute if he be mute to French or to English only,' a' says. 'Try him with thy French, madam,' a' says.

"'Ee mind me, chaps, 'ee mind me, sir, the Mouser could understand no word of this that they was saying, an' for some cause I could no warn un; an' whiles I broke out a most cruel sweat all hot an' cold in all parts of my body, an' whiles I see Corporal Harry's face that a' was suffering the same, the lady in a very quick an' sharp voice cries out some jabber of most foreign an' outlandish language; 'an every man's eye was on the Mouser watching him, an' to my most terrible horror an' fear a' starts up a's head as though a' was stung, an' a' flushes in the face red as a maid that have had a rude immodest word spoken to her.

"Ou-ai, it surely was a clever cunning trap as ever I did behold an' that Mouser fair caught in un an' Corporal Harry an' me fair caught along on 'un, an all jumps to their feet an' shouts; an' I tell 'ee, chaps I see plain before my eyes the most terrible an' alarming spectacle of myself hanging from gibbet for escaping a Frenchie.

"OU-AI, they all jump to their feet, one an' all, quality an' common company alike; an' the young officer hollers out, 'Fore George,' a hollers, 'a villian Frenchman as well I knew the minute I set eyes on un,' a' hollers. An' a' tugs out a's sword; an' the fine lady spits out some more French language; an' Mouser, like as if was some most terrible insult, goes red as turkeycock an' fires back some most fierce an' hissing language, an' the lady screams out. 'Oh, the disgusting French villain!' an' the officer comes at un with a's sword; an' the Mouser pulls out sword to un; an' one ups with a stool an' cracks un on head from behind; an' down a' goes crash; an' another catches my boots from beneath me an' down I goes on top of un; an' another runs in on Corporal Harry, an' Corporal Harry ups stool an' lends un a flick that splits for un; an' a' swings stool, but they was too many for Corporal Harry, lookee, and very soon a' was down an' a dozen upon un, an' soon all dree on us trussed with stout ropes an' pitched in stable.

"Ou-ai, there we surely were, the dree on us, in most sad an' alarming situation as ever mortal man could surely be in.

"Ou-ai, I were most sore amazed an' fearful; an' presently I says, 'Harry,' I says, 'we be in most sorrowful an' mortal plight,' I says to un; 'an' we best be preparing to meet our God,' I says.

"Corporal Harry give a laugh, an' I tell 'ee, chaps, 'twas no rueful laugh as 'ee might expect that a' gave, but a bold and merry laugh, for a' was ever a bold an' merry un, come lot, come scot; an' a' says, 'Zack, I've my hands nigh free,' a' says, 'an' in nobbut a minute I'll free thine, an' us'll see if there be no way from here (Continued on page 109)

The Cold Gray Dawn in POLAND

By Anna Louise Strong

THE TROUBLE with Poland," said Diamond to me with a twinkle, "is that we have to wake up from so many dreams." Diamond is one of the leaders of the Socialist party in the Polish Diet—the first Polish parliament for a hundred years, the parliament whose job is to create a new nation. It has some little task on its hands.

For more than a hundred years Poland has been the football of the great empires in eastern and central Europe. She lies in the great plain between mountains and seas, over which Asia and Russia must cross to Europe. In the ancient days of Turk and Tartar raids, when Russia was submerged, and the Balkans were overrun as far north as Vienna, Poland held the vanguard of Christian Europe against these wild Mohammedans of the East. She developed a spirit of war and chivalry in doing this, and later she drove her armies to the east on her own account, and ruled over a fair-sized empire which reached across what is now Ukraine, clear to the shores of the Black Sea.

That was the Poland of the "glorious past." The more recent past has been less glorious. She lay at the point where three great and growing empires met: Russia to the east, Austria to the south, Germany to the west. These three fought their battles across the plains of Poland and divided her lands between them bit by bit, until, more than a hundred years ago, there was nothing left of Poland except a memory of the past and a dream of the future. For more than a hundred years she cherished dreams.

These were the dreams of which Diamond spoke with a smile. They were the dreams of many kinds. But now it is the cold gray dawn of morning and the dreaming is over and the work begins. The Treaty of Versailles gave back the freedom of Poland and made her an independent nation again. She began to organize her land. And it doesn't work out a bit as it did in the dreams.

"One section of us dreamed," said Diamond, "that as soon as

J. Joseph Piłsudski, Minister of War for the New Republic of Poland, headed the Polish Legion and became the popular hero in the eyes of his people.

J. Poland's White House—the home of the new Republic.

which were in Germanized Poland well organized and law-abiding, were in Russia Poland suppressed into revolutionary channels.

Every labor or business organization, every political party, every law-maker faces the difficulty of harmonizing groups of widely differing traditions. And as if this were not enough, Poland has vastly added to her troubles by acquiring large stretches of territory inhabited by people who are not Poles at all and who do not like Poland. She has a fringe of discontent on every border, and beyond that is a fringe of nations from whom she has taken that territory and from whom she constantly fears trouble.

The Socialists had first whack at the task of governing Poland. They had managed the fight for Polish freedom; they naturally took the first provisional government, before there were any elections or chance for elections. The Polish borders were not even settled. In one direction were the Bolshevik armies; in the others a lot of knotty problems with Germany, Czecho-Slovakia, and Lithuania.

The Socialists held the reins for about three months, with Moracewski as prime minister, from November, 1918, till early in 1919. They put through a bunch of highly progressive laws that none of the other parties have been able to get repealed since. It was quick work and rather clever of them, for it might be harder to pass those laws in Poland now.

They started off with an eight-hour day, and a forty-four hour week. They followed with compulsory insurance for sickness, imposed on all workers. They arranged a law that wages should rise in proportion to the rise in the cost of living.

"Each month," said Vice-Minister of Labor Simon to me, "our department figures out statistics of the cost of living. Wages go up month by month in accordance with what we find. We have nothing to do with the original basic wage, which is fixed in each industry by agreement between the unions and the employers' organizations. But this basic wage goes up each month in accordance with our statistics. It has been a great preventive against strikes."

"But what happens," I asked, "if the cost of living falls? Do wages go down?"

"Theoretically they should," he answered. "But so far there have been only two months when the cost of living was lower than the month before. It was only a little lower, about four percent, not worth making any changes for. If there should be a big drop in living costs, undoubtedly there would be labor troubles, for the employers would want to reduce the wage and the workers wouldn't want it."

HE TOLD me other achievements of that first Socialist government. A tenant's defense law was passed, which forbade the raising of rents; without that law the housing shortage would have thrown hundreds of poor people into the streets. Compulsory schools were decreed. A thoroughly democratic system for the Diet was established.

They did a rapid job in those first three months—that Socialist government of Moracewski. But then followed the government of Paderewski and then Skulski and then Grabski—and the cabinets grew steadily conservative. No new progressive laws were passed on behalf of the workers. The conservative even began to eat away the edges of those Socialist laws which they did not quite dare repeal.

the Tsar was gone we should march to Freedom without any more trouble. But then we had also a group of imperialist patriots who wanted to march to a new empire over the necks of the Russians. And we had a Catholic group who dreamed of making Poland the most holy Catholic kingdom since ancient Spain! While our Socialist crowd thought they would get a Polish cooperative commonwealth as soon as the shackles were broken!"

"Did your Jews expect also a new Palestine?" I asked. "Well, no," admitted Diamond, "our Jews were never any too hopeful."

"They were wiser than the rest of you, perhaps?"

"No, no, no," said Diamond, "only much more experienced!"

They have a hard job on their hands, these builders of a nation, as they start work in the dawn. They have first to put together the three pieces of Poland, which have undergone different history and acquired different laws, languages, customs in the last hundred years.

There is Germanized Poland, orderly and organized, with good schools, looking down on the rest of Poland as an uneducated, untidy land. There is Russian Poland, vast, disorganized, dirty, uneducated. Even the railway lines were a different gauge in the two countries. Everything else ran on different gauges also; the trade union and socialist movements, for instance,

C. A Russian Bolshevik policing the Polish border. The Army of Russia claims it cannot disarm while Poland cherishes her dreams of empire.

The eight-hour day has exceptions to it now—in the stores. The tenant's defense law has been modified, so that rents have been doubled, while lights, water, and cleaning are extra charges. The compulsory school law stands, but hardly any city in Poland has yet found the money to make its schools really compulsory.

The democratic voting for the Diet—that too has been modified by the creation of a Senate, for which only the men and women over thirty years old can vote—the conservative element of the population. Meantime one-third of all Poland has not yet had a chance to vote at all. These are the territories to the east which Poland took by her war with Russia; they became Polish after the first election, and the conservative Diet has managed to postpone having any more elections.

"IT IS dangerous," argued these conservatives, "to let these people vote. They are Russians and Ukrainians; they do not speak our language; they cannot appreciate our democracy!" And so reaction, as usual, brings about the thing that it fears, and the peasants to the east grow even more resentful toward the government under which they are cast.

Poland has more parties than most countries. She has the tag-ends of all the old parties in Russian Poland, Austrian Poland, and German Poland. She has three peasant parties, and two workmen's parties, and several varieties of conservative and clerical parties—about a dozen parties altogether.

After the Socialist Dream was over for the time, and the Socialists were reduced to holding the ground they had won, instead of pressing onward to new fields of power, the Imperialist Dream had its chance.

There were always plenty of imperialist dreamers in Poland. The Polish dreamers could point back to a grand empire, the Poland of 1772, reaching from the Baltic to the Black Sea, across all of southern Russia. The fact that they had no more right to oppress unwilling Russians and Ukrainians than the Russians had to oppress the Poles, didn't worry them.

If the imperialists in Poland needed any encouraging, they certainly got it. If they require at present any blame for their grabbing of lands, the blame is not only on them; but on the Allied nations, especially France. For the Allies shoved the Poles along toward empire in every direction. The Allies wanted to hurt Germany and Russia, and Poland happened to be a good tool.

She encouraged Poland to wish for Upper Silesia, which had belonged to German governments for seven hundred years. There was a large group of Poles in Upper Silesia, oppressed by German absentee capitalists; so the Poles had a good talking-point. But it wasn't only Polish population that interested them. Upper Silesia had mines and industries, developed by German capital. Poland with Upper Silesia would be, as a government pamphlet bragged, "among the richest countries in Europe."

It was a handsome gift; it is not surprising that Poland wanted and took it. The population of Upper Silesia voted, it is true, to belong to Germany instead; but Poland got it, most of it. And with Upper Silesia she got soreness and unrest on her western border.

Poland wanted a seaport, and the Allies, especially France, encouraged her to drive northward to Danzig. Now Danzig is a German city, where even today the German mark holds sway instead of the Polish mark. The corridor of land which connects Poland with Danzig is inhabited by many Poles, it is true, but it cuts right across Germany and divides West Prussia from East Prussia. It is a fine thing for Poland to have a seaport but will Germany always remain contentedly in two pieces?

THE ALLIES encouraged Poland to drive eastward toward Russia. So Poland fought back and forth for two years against Russia, making a great drive to the east and being beaten back once to the very gates of her own capital. In the end, at the treaty of Riga, she got vast lands from Russia.

Again there was a good excuse for her action. Those lands belonged to Polish nobles, and if the Bolshevik got the territory, the Polish nobles would see their land nationalized. Any nobleman will fight against that. But the people that lived on the lands, the peasants, were White Russians and Ukrainians. They did not speak the Polish language (Continued on page 132)

The Girl He Left

A story which proves that football, love and war are all the same game under different names

FOR TWENTY-FIVE years, Miss Harriet Peabody was known in Hubbardville as the woman who once had an affair with Curly Hotchkiss.

Curly entered Crocker College, in the sleepy little town of Hubbardville in the southern Middle-West, in the days when a young man with a swift horse and a shiny buggy had a long start in the current Cupid Handicap.

His career at Crocker College was brief and eventful. He was a slim dapper boy with a cameo face, brilliant dark eyes and a crown of thick, black, stubbornly curly hair that gave him his name. His home was in California and he had traveled in Europe and remembered what he had seen.

There were rumors of interesting reasons why he had been sent to Crocker College. It was said that he had been expelled elsewhere for wild escapades; that his father, reputed to be a wealthy California mining man, had exiled him to Crocker.

He was a sensation from the day of his arrival. When he stepped off the train at the depot, a brawny rustic wit called out: "Hey! Look at the dude! Where did you get that hat?"

Curly smiled, deposited his suitcase on the platform, walked gently up to the hulking rustic and gave him a boxing lesson. When the big fellow refused to rise to receive further punishment from Curly's small, but extremely hard and accurate fists, the elegantly-dressed newcomer carefully wiped his hands on a silk handkerchief and spoke for the first time in Hubbardville.

"I get my hats where I please," he said genially. "And when I get a hat I wear it where I please, until I find somebody who can make me take it off. I generally wear a hat quite a while. Do any of you other gentlemen object to my clothes? Any one of you like to teach me the right things to wear in your tight little city? No? Then I'll be moving along."

WHEREUPON he picked up his suitcase, stepped into Joe Gilbert's hack and with a distinguished air, asked to be driven to the best hotel in town.

Two days later he showed up for football practice and that night he was the subject of conversation wherever students met. Crocker College, they agreed, had a find. Even Buster Morgan, the coach, had broken his habit of critical silence and almost gushed in praise of the newcomer's ability on the gridiron.

Curly played quarter-back that year, a trim, snappy, ever smiling figure, cockily confident, airily bossing the big team to more victories than the little college had ever before known. There were only about two hundred and fifty students there then, but that year, with Curly Hotchkiss doing the stellar work, the team not only defeated its greatest rival, Fillmore College, but actually played the great State University team to a scoreless tie.

For the season, Curly was the idol of the place, but there were ugly rumors about him. It was said that he broke training; that he drank and gambled. This was in a day and place where penny-ante was a vice that damned a man and the first glass of beer was a potion about which long and solemn sermons were frequently preached.

Harriet Peabody was then a girl in her teens. She kept house for her widowed father, a professor of chemistry. Curly was seen driving with her on three successive Sundays and that settled the matter so far as Crocker College and Hubbardsville were concerned; for at that time and place, courtship was looked upon as seriously as penny-ante, and the first kiss was as solemn a matter as the young man's much discussed first glass of beer.

Late in November the expected explosion came. Curly was expelled. The accepted rumor was that he had called on Harriet Peabody with liquor on his breath. It was known that the Professor had ordered him from the house and immediately thereafter visited President Marquard. The next day, Curly Hotchkiss, still smiling, elegant, mockingly confident, drove to the station in Joe Gilbert's hack, boarded the 2:10 train and passed from the ken of Hubbardsville and Crocker College.

THE NEXT year he was heard from in the East. He was at West Point playing quarter-back for the Army team. Crocker College and Hubbardsville began to take notice. Harriet Peabody was pointed out to newcomers as the girl with whom Curly had kept company. "You know, Curly Hotchkiss, the star quarter-back at West Point."

In his fourth year at the Point, Hotchkiss was Captain of the team and the unanimous selection by experts for All American quarter. Crocker College and Hubbardsville paid more attention to news of the Army contests than to the doings of the home team. Curly Hotchkiss was beginning to be a legend in the little college where his stay had been so brief and brilliant.

Early the followi g all, Buster Morgan, the coach, was heard to say: "If I could just get Curly Hotchkiss to come back for a couple of weeks and give us a hand, we might get somewhere this year." That fall, each and every freshman who matriculated at Crocker had his attention called at some time or other to Miss Harriet Peabody and was told: "That's the girl that Curly Hotchkiss was sweet on when he was here. You know: Curly who was Captain of the West Point team last year and All American quarter-back. Yes, that's her."

SO THE LEGEND of Curly Hotchkiss and his brief stay at Crocker College grew up about his flashy work on the football field and his affair with Harriet Peabody. Each fall Buster Morgan said wistfully: "If I could only get Curly Hotchkiss to come back for a couple of weeks and give us a hand we might get somewhere this year." Each fall Miss Peabody was pointed out to the newcomers as the girl who had had the affair with the famous player. No one from Crocker College ever wrote to Curly or received any communication from him. He had come from another world, lived brilliantly in their quiet back water for a little stretch, and passed on.

Buster Morgan's annual remark about getting him back to help out was merely a habit with the old coach. He no more thought of actually writing to Curly to come back than he would have attempted to summon the spirit of one who has passed into the Great Beyond.

Harriet Peabody's father died and, having been a professor, left her in reduced circumstances. She turned the old home into a boarding-house for students and gradually developed into a sweet-faced serene old maid, yet peculiarly identified with the college and its traditions. Each succeeding crop of classmen continued to be told: "She's the one that Curly Hotchkiss was sweet on when he was here. You know: the famous Army player, and All American quarter-back."

Horses and hymns went out and automobiles and jazz came in. A concrete garage took the place of the old frame livery stable in Hubbardsville and young men found favor with the professors by telling them where good old pre-war stuff could be had at only ten dollars a quart—instead of being expelled in disgrace, as their fathers would have been, for being on terms of intimacy with low scoundrels who dealt in booze. All the while the brief record of Curly Hotchkiss remained as the high light in the history of the place and Harriet Peabody continued to be pointed out as the one with whom he had had an affair.

DURING the war, the town and the college felt proudly conspicuous in the reflection of a new light from the famous star of old football fields. Thrilling words came back from France of the deeds of Brigadier-General Hotchkiss, handling a greater team in a greater game. Miss Peabody, in consequence, had a place of honor in the local headquarters of the Red Cross with the mothers, wives and sweethearts of those who were in service.

No one ever spoke directly of the general to her, because by then it had become a tradition that the old affair had left a deep and lasting sorrow in her heart, and she was looked upon with a certain awe by her neighbors, who explained to strangers in carefully guarded asides: "She was General Hotchkiss's sweetheart when he was in college here. Her father broke up the match. She never married. Yes, too bad."

For thus is much of history made: A persistent rumor growing unchecked into a tradition and becoming ultimately an accepted fact. It was all on the strength of a half-dozen visits, a few Sunday afternoon buggy rides, and a stormy scene between a tipsy young scalawag and a shocked old Puritan.

The year after the war Crocker College turned its attention from the casualty lists to the football scores. Once upon a time the President of Crocker College and the faculty had reluctantly tolerated football, but in the early fall of that first year after the war, President Marquard sent for the coach, Buster Morgan, and inquired anxiously concerning the quality of the material available for the team.

That year Buster was pessimistic. "I'm afraid we're in for a bad season, sir," he said.

The President thoughtfully tapped the back of his hand with his nose glasses. "I hope you'll do your best, Mr. Morgan," he said anxiously. "Personally I feel that there is too much importance attached to the athletic record of our schools and colleges today. But we must be practical, Mr. Morgan. We live in a practical world and we must recognize facts. It is undoubtedly a fact—I might say regrettably a fact—that even the majority of parents today are influenced in their choice of a college for their children as much by its record on the football field as the reputation of its faculty for scholarship and the quality of its traditions. It galls me to be compelled to admit it, but this is an era of advertising and the best advertisement of a college today is a winning football team. Frankly, we must grow—or die. Fillmore has beaten us for the last five years, and in that time the student body there has doubled in size. I regret being compelled to hope seriously that you can defeat Fillmore this year."

Buster Morgan went away railing disgustedly at the lack of proper coincidence of time and conditions. "Years ago, when I had the stuff to turn out winners, they did everything they could to hurt me," he growled. "Now I've got nothing to work with, they come around and tell me to turn out a great team!"

THAT NIGHT after dinner at Harriet Peabody's boarding-house, Morgan sat on the front porch and gloomily told his story to the gentle little lady who had once had an affair with Curly.

"Fillmore will swamp us this year," he said gloomily, "and when I think of what the State team is going to do to us—!"

"Can't anything be done?" Miss Peabody asked anxiously.

Morgan stroked his chin reflectively. "If I could just get Curly Hotchkiss to come back and help out for a few weeks we might get somewhere," he said.

"Why don't you write and ask him to come?"

Morgan took his pipe from his mouth and sat up straight. He stared at Miss Peabody in amazement for a moment and then laughed heartily.

"What a chance!" he exclaimed. "Why, he's all tied up down in Washington. Even if he wasn't busy he wouldn't come. Shucks! What does Crocker College mean to a man like him? I guess after the way he was treated here he—" Morgan stopped, flushing, remembering that the subject was delicate.

For a little time, Miss Peabody calmly went on with her knitting. Then:

"You say President Marquard told you the college needed a good team this year?"

"Well, that ain't to be repeated," Morgan said, alarmed at having told so much. "He was very special about that. He wants to go on pretending that football doesn't amount to anything to the college, but all the same he let me know very clearly that if the team didn't do better Crocker College is liable to curl up and die."

Miss Peabody went on with her knitting, glancing up occasionally to nod to friends passing along the street in the growing dusk. Then she gathered up her work and went inside.

An hour later she descended from her room and spoke to a student in the hall. There was a high flush in her soft cheeks.

"Do you suppose a letter to an army officer in Washington addressed just Washington, D. C., would reach him?" she asked.

"I'd put 'War Department' on it," the student suggested. "That'd be all right, I think."

"Thank you. I'll do that. Are you going out? Would you mind waiting just a moment? I would like to have you mail a letter for me."

THERE was a thin mist of steam in the dressing-room. Football togs lay here and there on the floor and benches in disorderly piles. Mixed with the talk and laughter of healthy youngsters, pink from the showers, there was the flat staccato of old Ed Murphy's palms patting a lively tattoo as he worked over a man on the rubbing table. The air was heavy with the odor of sweat-soaked garments, wet leather and liniment. The talk and laughter died away as Buster Morgan came in.

"Boys, I've got some news for you," he announced triumphantly. The players in various degrees of undress gathered about him eagerly.

"We've got the chance of our lives this year," Morgan went on. "You fellows are going to learn more football in a week than all the teams this college ever had, all put together, ever did know. Boys, Curly Hotchkiss is coming back to Crocker to help out. What have you got to say to that?"

There was a moment of silence and then a roar. The men surged about Morgan besieging him for details.

"I don't know anything about it," Morgan declared. "I just got a telegram from him from Washington, asking if he could help out this year and telling me he could get here next Tuesday if I needed him."

A half-dressed youngster, his pink body still steaming from the shower, leaped on the bench and raised his arms and demanded the attention of his mates.

"Curly Hotchkiss!" he shouted. "Come on, fellows! All together! The Old Timer for Curly!"

Then, to swaying bodies and a rhythmic pumping of arms the name of Curly Hotchkiss was coupled with The Old Timer—the famous Crocker College yell—for the first time in twenty-five years.

NO MAN could have lived up to the expectations Crocker College had of its famous and once dishonored son. A crowd with a band met him at the station, the little wooden station at which he had first alighted twenty-five years before. Everyone there felt a little chill of disappointment as the slim, trim figure of the General appeared on the platform. They liked him immediately but he was so far short of the proportions that the legend had led them to expect! In outline he was the slender, erect boy of twenty-five years before; his face was leathery and lined and the still stubbornly curly thick hair was iron gray. The persistent smile of old was on his face but it no longer had the quality of contemptuous mockery. It was rather genial and sympathetic. Crocker College was a little disappointed. No one admitted this, but it was a fact.

They were disappointed, too, at the lack of romantic tension in the first meeting between the General and Harriet Peabody. President Marquard presented her, one of many among the crowd. "You remember Miss Peabody, General?" he said.

"I SHOULD say I do," the General said, laughing, taking her hand. "Why, Miss Peabody and I were quite spoony once. Weren't we, eh? Yes, indeed! Why if I hadn't been such a wild harum-scarum young rascal that I got run out of town before I got the chance to really get started in the race against the mob of love-sick young cubs that were all in pursuit of the charming young lady then, nobody knows what might have happened, eh, Miss Peabody?" He shook his finger at her warningly. "You want to look out, young lady!" he went on. "I'm liable to start right in where I left off." Then someone claimed the General's attention and Miss Peabody drifted away in the crowd.

There was much comment in many homes that night. Details of the affair were recalled by the old timers. It was remembered that Hotchkiss had really seen but little of Miss Peabody; called on her occasionally and taken her driving a few times. Some of the women were inclined to be bitter about it.

Professor Mehaffy's garrulous wife summed up the sentiment when she said:

"Well, of all the deceitful people! You never can tell about these quiet prim old ladies that try to seem so nice all the time. Imagine her going on all these years, pretending that she'd had a serious affair with General Hotchkiss, making us all feel sorry for her! Pretending to be a martyr all that time, and when he met her he could hardly recall her name!"

The next afternoon Hotchkiss showed up on the football field. "You go ahead," he said to Buster Morgan. "I'll just stand around and look on for a while." That was all he did for the entire afternoon.

At the end of the practice, he contented himself with perfunctory compliments.

"You certainly do know football, coach," he said as he went toward the dressing-room with his arm around Morgan's shoulder.

That was all about football that afternoon. Instead of criticizing the team, he sat in the dressing-room with them and told stories, rolling thin, crooked cigarettes as he sat on a bench, leaning forward with his elbows on his knees, telling anecdotes of the Philippines, of China, of Mexico and France.

The men were all fascinated and disappointed.

But the General spent the next afternoon in the same way and the afternoon after that. He made a few general suggestions to Morgan, advancing them in a tentative sort of way, and spent the rest of the time telling stories to the team.

On Saturday the team played Harrisburg, a school yet smaller than Crocker. Crocker won six to nothing, but the victory was disheartening, for on that same day, Fillmore beat Rushville, a team about equal to Crocker, thirty-four to nothing, and used many substitutes in the last two quarters.

After the disappointing game, General Hotchkiss was as genial and inconsequential as ever.

"You did fine today, boys," he declared. "You know a lot of football and old Buster Morgan will teach you a lot more before the season is up."

HE PAUSED for a little, devoting his entire attention to the business of drawing in and exhaling a luxurious lungful of smoke. Then, in his rambling anecdotal manner he went on:

"You know, boys, football is war. You have your lines and objectives and fight for ground, just the same as an army. War and football are funny games. There's nothing else just like them. Now you can take an army and train it just so well; you can teach your men to shoot just so straight and you can't teach them to shoot any straighter. The other fellow, he can teach his men to shoot straight, too.

"You can think up a lot of tricks—strategy they call it in the books—but the other fellow can think up a lot of tricks too, so there isn't any sure advantage there. But, boys, there's one thing about war and football which is far and away the most important thing in either one of them. I don't know what it is.

It's been called a lot of things by a lot of people. During the last war, our people got to calling it morale. Whatever the name for it is, it's the thing that wins football games and wars.

"You know, of course, that there's a limit to human endurance. Well, this morale, or spirit or whatever you want to call it, is the thing that a man gets hold of in a battle or a football game—a man fighting for a country or a college—and operates on, after he's reached the limit of human endurance.

"A football coach can teach you how to play the game just as well as it can be played, but somehow you've got to get hold of that thing that makes you go out there and play a damn sight better than that. Buster Morgan here knows football and he's teaching it to you just about as well and as fast as anybody could cram it into you, but this other thing——"

He broke off and looked slowly around at the circle of faces about him. The temporary solemnity of expression on his face dissolved into a genial grin.

"That reminds me of a story," he rumbled along, switching back into his customary inconsequential tone. "We had a sergeant with our outfit when I was in the Philippines, who——" And he was off again on one of his long interesting yarns that had nothing to do with football.

That night even Buster Morgan confessed his doubt of the General's value as a coach.

"I'm afraid the old boy's been away from the game a little too long," he admitted to the captain later.

THE following Saturday, the team and a crowd of rooters traveled the fifty miles to Unionville, where the big state university was located, to take the annual trimming. On the train General Hotchkiss was very much the life of the party.

"Wish he had to get out there and take the gaff from that steam-roller State bunch," one of the half-backs muttered resentfully.

"Oh, cut it out!" a chunky tackle rebuked him. "The old man's had his day, but he's a mighty damn fine fellow."

No such charity sweetened the whispered discussions about Miss Peabody, who sat conspicuously alone throughout the trip. On her was heaped the unadulterated scorn, inevitable in devotees who have discovered that the object of their worship is a mortal fraud.

The team's patience with the old general was finally exhausted when he failed to show up in the dressing-room, before they went on the field.

About five minutes of the first quarter had been played, when old Doctor Graydon sought out Morgan on the side lines.

"General Hotchkiss's been hurt," he whispered.

"Hurt!"

"Automobile smash-up," the Doctor said. "On his way here from the hotel, when it happened."

"Is he badly hurt?"

The Doctor looked away for a moment before he answered. "He's done for."

"Oh, my God!" Morgan blubbered.

HE watched the rest of the quarter through a blur of tears, only dimly aware of what was happening on the field.

In fact nothing was happening that gave occasion for comment. The game was going according to form. The Crocker College boys were fighting creditably, hopelessly. The quarter ended with a score 7 to 0 against Crocker.

At the end of the second quarter the score was 14 to 0 and it was evident that the Crocker team was about done.

As his team came off the field, Buster Morgan dried his eyes and fought for composure. Whatever happened, the boys must not know about the injury to the General until after the game was over.

At the door of the dressing-room, old Doctor Graydon met them.

"Quiet, boys," he urged. "Please! There's been an accident."

Morgan fought his way toward him, motioning to him to keep silence.

"I can't help it, Buster," the Doctor said sadly. "Boys, General Hotchkiss was hurt in an automobile accident on his way to the field this afternoon and he's dying. When he found out that he couldn't live, he begged to be brought here. It was a dying man's request, boys, and it wouldn't have helped him any to refuse it. We brought him to the field in the ambulance and carried him to the dressing-room. He's in there now, waiting for you. Quiet now, boys—and cheerful! [Continued on page 123]

THE JAZZADANCERIE was pervaded by melody, mirth and misery. The melody was supplied by Mr. Webster Dill, a Gargantuan individual whose tremendous hands wrenched toe-tickling harmony from the rented piano. The mirth was the property of the crowd that thronged the cabaret and fervidly applauded the esthetic dancing efforts of the delectable Mrs. Sapho Dill, wife of the pianist.

Misery cowered in a far corner of the room where, at a bare table, sat Permanent Williams, proprietor of the Jazzadancerie, and his melancholy wife, Jonquil. Mrs. Williams was at the moment expressing a very definite thought: "Ev'y time I looks at that fool woman dancin', Permanent, I thinks how good she would look with a lily in her han'."

He remonstrated. "Honey! You ain't got no right thinkin' them kind of thoughts."

"Mml Mebbe not"—sadly—"but as I has warned you—does you not fire her out of her job they's gwine be a quick call fo' the undertaker."

"You ain't meanin'—"

"I means I has stood all what I prospec's to stan', an' you or her, one, is pretty close to a heap of ginuwine trouble."

The music which flowed from the tips of Webster Dill's muscular fingers crescendoed. His huge, ungainly body swayed passionately and finally he clutched a crashing chord. The music ceased. So did Sapho. Poised on one toe she stood momentarily motionless, awaiting the inevitable applause.

There was a brief hush. Birmingham's colored society held its collective breath. Then, headed by Lawyer Evans Chew, it flamed into wild acclaim. Sapho crumpled to the floor, where she crouched demurely, dimpling her thanks from the midst of a chiffon pool. Her husband, all awkwardness now where he had been the quintessence of grace while wreaking music from the instrument before which he sat, towered to his feet. But the crowd was insistent.

"NOTHER dance!" came the unanimous demand. "Give us another!" And from the big center table where Florian Slappey was entertaining a party of friends: "Dance one with Permanent Williams, Sapho!"

The cry was echoed. Eyes focused upon the unhappy family group in the corner. Permanent fidgeted uneasily, his heart responsive but himself fearful of his forbidding spouse.

"You ain't sore, is you, Jonquil?"

"I's so sore that was I all over ointment I'd still ache."

Permanent hesitated, but only for a moment. There was no denying the spectators. Permanent rose to his feet, wavering between lure of the spotlight and fear of his lean and lachrymose mate. Then, uncertainly, he made his way toward the polished dance floor.

As he approached the dance space, the look of haunting fear disappeared gradually from his eyes and his lithe and slender body lost much of the rigidity which had been inspired by the recent domestic squall. Clad in a loose-fitting white silk shirt, a tiny red necktie, white flannel trousers and white shoes and socks, he presented a truly professional appearance. The girl, Sapho, viewing his approach, rose to await him. Webster Dill stared at them, then turned back to his piano, a peculiarly inquiring light in his eyes. His monster hands opened, fingers felt for the keys—and with the first crashing chord, all awkwardness departed the man. Jazz—supreme and irresistible—spurred through the room.

Permanent stood transfixed, his expression softening imperceptibly until finally there had departed from his mind all troubling memory of his glowering wife. His body swayed easily from the hips. Sapho fairly rippled. Easily, gently, almost without motion, she slid into his arms and they were off in the intricacies of a dance that was strictly their own.

It was an extremely intimate dance and one to inspire enthusiastic introspection. They danced as one person—swaying, dipping, squirming, spinning. Webster Dill's fingers flew over the keyboard, now playing loudly, now softly, always sensuously. The spectators were silent. Here was the dance superb—Terpsichore hog-tied and helpless. It ended amidst thunderous approval. Permanent and Sapho seated themselves at a table on the edge of the dancing space, which became crowded with dancers the instant Webster turned once more to his duties.

BUT now that the intoxication of the dance had passed away Trouble introduced himself once again to Permanent and that chocolate-cream gentleman turned pleading eyes to Sapho.

"The day you come to Bummin'ham, Sapho, was the most unlucky day of my life."

"Huh! You says words, but they ain't got no sense to 'em, Permanent. When me an' Webster come heah you wasn't no farther than one inch away fum bankrup'cy. An' now where is you at?"

Permanent allowed his eyes to dwell affectionately upon the happy, carefree, money-spending multitude which crowded the Jazzdancerie. "I's admittin' that you an' Webster boosted business an' all that"—he glimpsed the menacing figure of his wife—"but, Sapho, you has done taken away all the happiness of bein' a ma'ied man."

She followed the direction of his gaze. "Jonquil?"

"Uh-huh."

"She's jealous of I an' you?"

"All two bofe of us."

"Why'n't you tell her she ain't got no cause to be jealous?"

"Huh! Lot of good that'd do."

"Sho'ly it would. If she was to know that I an' you useter be ma'ied an' that we got a divo'ce fum each other—"

"Was she to know that, Sapho, I an' you would atten' a concert which we woul'n't hear none of, an' all the music would be sof' an' low."

"Even if she understood that we gotten our divo'ce on account you useter raise so much hell 'roun' the house?"

"Jonquil never would un'erstan' that."

"How come not?"

"On account all the hell which is raised 'roun' our house—she raises. An' was I to tell her I useter to be boss she'd know it was a lie an' a frame-up."

SAPHO stared curiously across the room at the sad figure of her ex-husband's present wife. Through her brain flashed memory of her domestic existence as Mrs. Permanent Williams; an endless succession of squabbles—more or less severe—in which Permanent was invariably the victor. Sapho, as Mrs. Williams, had been most decidedly on the receiving end of the sketch. It was difficult to imagine Permanent as henpecked by the innocuous-looking woman in the corner.

"You is bigger'n her, Permanent."

"Tain't her size," he retorted wanly. "It's the length of her tongue. My Gawd, Sapho, Jonquil is the talkin'est woman you ever did see."

"Talk never hurt nobody."

"Mebbe not. But it's made 'em mighty sick."

Sapho studied him speculatively. The old arrogance had departed. He was thoroughly and completely cowed. And this was the man who for two years had been her husband and her vaudeville partner. They had danced together on stages from New York to New Orleans, and in all of their mutual career he had reigned supreme—dominant, aggressive, stonily obdurate. Sapho's palm smacked on the table top.

"If she on'y knowed it, Permanent, they is jes' one pusson in the whole world she ain't got no cause to git jealous of, an' her is me."

"Tha's what you know an' I know, Sapho. But if she don't know it, we is in a fix."

"You is," she answered firmly. "I ain't."

He leaned forward earnestly. "C'mon now. Be a good spoht an' leave Bummin'ham."

"You is mos' as foolish as you looks."

"You got to," he explained desperately.

"Well"—her tone was deadly level—"I tells you heah an' now I ain't got no idee of same. What is you gwine do 'bout it?"

"But Sapho—"

"Don't you go buttin' me. Webster an' I come heah when you was jes' 'bout to lose ev'y las' nickel which you owned an' we siggested you should make a cabaret outen yo' rest'rant. An' what happened? Right away you sta'ted makin' money—heaps of money. You is mos' gittin' to be a rich man. All the money you is got—"

"Money ain't no good after you is daid."

"You gittin' daid don't intrust me none. I an' Webster made this heah business what it is, an' we ain't gwine lef' it now."

HIS jaw hardened. "S'posin' I fires you bofe?"

She laughed; a hard, threatening little laugh. "You won't."

"How come not?"

"You ain't got the nerve. You ain't even most got the nerve."

"On account—"

She nodded toward her mammoth husband. "On account Webster hates you."

"He ain't never acted like it."

"Tha's 'cause he don't know you is the man he hates."

He stared at her curiously. "Meanin' which?"

"Meanin' this: Befo' I ma'ied Webster he ast all about the feller I had be'n ma'ied to an' got divo'ced away fum. I ain't never tol' him yo' name, but I has tol' him a heap else. An' I ain't tol' him the troof, neither. I wasn't gwine tell him you useter bully me, on account I made my min' up that was I ma'ied to him I was gwine do all the bullyin'. So I tol' him that my fust husban' useter beat me up all the time. I tol' him he was the croolest man which ever was ma'ied to a woman. If you had of ever done half the things to me which he thinks my fust husban' done, they woul'n't be enough lef' of me to stick a postage stamp on. The p'int bein' that Webster is plumb crazy 'bout me an' he has always said that does he ever meet up with my fust husban', he's gwine beat him up so bad the insurance company ain't gwine 'low his fambly's claim on account the body cain't be identified."

Permanent went cold all over. He stole an apprehensive glance at Webster Dill. It was barbarous. The man was six and a half feet in height, 250 pounds avoirdupois and a mass of solid, crawling muscle. She rightly interpreted his look: "Yep! Jes' squash you!"

"Y-y-y-you ain't se'ious?"

"Ain't I, though. Does you think I ain't, you fire me away fum this job an' lemme tell him you was my fust husban'—jes' do that, Permanent, an' right away you is gwine be ain't."

The prospect was not wholly alluring. It was, in fact, downright impossible. And he knew that Sapho was telling no less than the truth, unless—"You mean, Sapho, that you is the boss in yo' fambly?"

"I is," she returned proudly. "It's all how ma'ied folks sta'ts off. When I an' you was ma'ied you sta'ied off the boss. But when I made ma'iage with Webster I di'n't lose no time lettin' him know I was gwine have my own way."

Florian Slappey sauntered up and coolly demanded a dance. Sapho glided off in his arms. Permanent shouldered his way through the crowd and speculated morosely upon the antics of a capricious fate. Six months before he would have maintained stoutly that nothing mattered save material achievement. Now he would barter most cheerfully a success surpassing his fondest dream in exchange for the domestic placidity which apparently had departed forevermore.

MOST unkindest of all, there was the omnipresent thought that the situation was of his own making. His ex-wife and her new husband had ended twenty weeks of vaudeville in Birmingham and he had met her at a dance given under the auspices of The Sons & Daughters of I Will Arise. Discretion had prompted him to keep secret from his wife the fact that this delicious creature was his former mate. Jonquil, while not particularly long on pulchritude, was there nine ways from the ace in temperament. Jealousy was her middle name. She knew, of course, that he had been unfortunate in a previous matrimonial venture. At any rate, he neglected to inform her that Sapho was the former party of the second part.

And, as Sapho had most glibly explained on the occasion of their first meeting after several years, there was no use manufacturing dynamite by informing her massive husband that this debonair young colored gentleman had once halved her joys and doubled her sorrows. So that when she made plain to him the ways and means for rescuing his decrepit restaurant venture from disaster, he leaped blindly into a contract which was now strangling him.

From the day his restaurant was converted into a cabaret with Webster at the piano and Sapho doing duty as hostess, entertainer, and vaudeville star, the Jazzadancerie had become a gold mine. The idea of a cabaret for colored folks was new in Birmingham, and dusky society responded fervently to the uniqueness of the enjoyment it afforded. Too, the Jazzadancerie was no more glorious than Sapho.

Sapho was really a first-class esthetic dancer, and when Society ceased to gasp in horror it began to love her. Her soft and gentle exterior masked the vitriol which only Permanent and Webster knew lay beneath. And besides, Permanent had been briefly happy.

Time had been when Permanent and Sapho had been vaudeville partners, as smooth a pair of dancers as ever graced the Ebony Circuit, Big Time Acts Only. And since the severance of their domestic and professional relationship Permanent had been danceless. That had been a lack which he experienced difficulty in controlling and he even yet looked back in delicious retrospect upon that most glorious of all nights—the first night at the Jazzadancerie when he and Sapho had slipped out onto the floor in the whirling intricacies of one of their most popular stage-dances.

The crowd had watched them spellbound, and at the conclusion of the number the applause had been spontaneous and tumultuous. Since then they had danced together frequently, finding in each other's society a certain basis of friendship which had entirely escaped their marital venture.

Permanent was deeply enamored of his present wife. Jonquil more than atoned in sterling qualities for what she may have lacked in vivacity. And from the zero hour of their matrimonial venture, Jonquil had been the boss.

Jonquil had seen more in the relationship of Permanent and Sapho than mere casual friendship. There was something deeper than a dancing affinity—and Jonquil's sixth sense informed her of it. Wherefore Jonquil's eyes became shot with emerald and her soul boiled over with outrage.

Of late Jonquil had become uncomfortably insistent that her husband discharge the fair coryphée and the pianist. His reluctance intensified her jealousy. She insisted. He refused. Then doubt crystallized into certainty. And Permanent knew full well that should she learn at this eleventh hour of the fact that Sapho had once been his wife, the glorious Fourth would be barren of pyrotechnics compared with the events of the then immediate future.

“Permanent, I gives you one last chance: Does you fire Sapho? I tells you right beah an’ now that does you not get rid of that woman, I gets rid of her my own se’f.”

His recently acquired information regarding the repugnance with which Webster Dill regarded his wife's first husband was not particularly heartening. It merely made misery more miserable. "Jes' like that gal Sapho—go lyin' 'bout me thata-way an' git me all kilt up."

SIX DAYS later, in the sanctuary of their new cottage on Avenue F, Jonquil caused matters to climax.

"Permanent?"

"Yeh, honey?"

"Is you gwine discharge Sapho fum wukkin' fo' us?"

He attempted evasion. "I ain't said I ain't."

"You ain't said you is."

"I ain't said nothin'."

"I asts you then fo' the las' an' finalst time: Is you is or is you ain't?"

He scratched his head. "I—I ain't!" Then his voice mounted to a moan of protest. "Honeybunch, I cain't!"

"Tha's what you says."

"It's the hones'-t'-Gawd troof."

"A'right. Also it's the hones'-t'-Gawd troof that I an' you is finished, done an' completed with one another."

"Honey——"

"You go find another hive."

"Sapho done made the Jazzadancerie siccussful."

"She made a heap mo'n that. She made me mad."

"You ain't gwine b'lieve——"

"I b'lieves what I b'lieves. An' I tells you right heah an' now that does you not git rid of that woman, I gits rid of her my own se'f."

Consternation! Jonquil intended taking a hand. Permanent knew that she was no bluffer. He also knew that she was a person of action. With Jonquil righteously angry, Sapho merciless, and Webster thirsting for his gore—"I got about as much chance as a one-eyed pig at a barbecue."

Permanent had no idea what Jonquil would do, but he was certain that she would do it. Jonquil, passive, was the passivest person in the known world; active, she was the activist. And he realized that she was about to swing into action.

The tempest was forecast one morning after a breakfast eaten in stony silence. "Permanent, I gives you one last chance: Does you fire Sapho?"

He raised haggard eyes, seeking mercy in Jonquil's face—seeking unsuccessfully. "I cain't."

"A' right." She resumed her attacks upon the bacon.

"Is you prospectin' to do somethin'?"

"Yeh."

"But, sweetness——"

"Thanks fo' them cornbreads, Mistuh Williams. I has got to eat with you, but I ain't cravin' to make no talk."

HE FLUSHED. "Anyway, you ain't gwine to make sech a hell of a good-lookin' widdler!"

From her house, Jonquil proceeded downtown on Eighteenth Street toward the Jazzadancerie. There was decision in every move of her body; the light of battle flamed in her eye. Permanent, staring moodily after her, got ready for the immediate hereafter.

Arriving at the deserted cabaret, Jonquil painstakingly indited a letter:

Mrs. Dill dear madam—

Yore presents is requested imediate at the restrant on a matter of utmost importanse and you better come if you no what is good for yours truly.

JONQUIL WILLIAMS

Sapho came, and she came red-hot. In a secluded corner the women faced one another.

"What you mean, 'sultin' me like you done, Mis' Williams?"

"I meant a heap." Jonquil's tone was uncompromising.

"Splain yo'se'f then—an' splain tho'ough."

"Tha's what I intends doin'." She leaned forward, her long fingers drumming a light tattoo on the table-top. "Mis' Dill, I has come to info'm you that you an' yo' long, tall husban' is hereby entirely fired!"

"Says which?"

"Says you is bofe fired—discha'ged—kicked out."

Sapho laughed grimly. "Never knowed so much words could make sech a lil bit of sense."

"Git out."

"Who says so?"

"I does."

"Who you is?"

"I runs this place——"

"You does—not. Yo' husban' owns it."

"He says you should git out."

Sapho's eyes narrowed. "He never said no sech of a thing."

"He's gwine to."

"He ain't."

"Reckon I know my own husban'."

"Reckon you don't know him no bettr'n I. N'r neither even half as good."

"What you mean, cullud woman?"

"I mean this!" Sapho was merciless now. "I mean, did Permanent ever tell you he'd done be'n ma'ied once befo' he met up with you?"

"Yeh."

"Well"—trimuphantly—"I reckon he never tol' you that I was the woman he was ma'ied to, did he?"

Jonquil gasped. "You?"

"Uh-huh. Me! An' so——" Sapho's tone grew a thought more soft—"you see they ain't no cause of you bein' jealous of me on account I has had all of Permanent I wants. I has finished an' done with him an' you is welcome to what is lef'. Yo' jealousy is all wrong. Me being his former wife—they ain't nothin' you c'n tell me 'bout our husban' which I don't know a'ready." She rose and bowed. "I bids you good mawnin', Mis' Williams."

Sapho made her exit in regal triumph, leaving Jonquil, crushed and doubt-obsessed, staring after her. So Sapho was Permanent's first wife, was she? So that explained his reluctance to discharge her? She wondered whether Webster Dill knew that Permanent was his wife's first husband. She had small use for the giant Webster. Hadn't he allowed this flirtation to flourish under his very nose? Didn't he sit passively by and permit a dangerous acquaintanceship to ripen?

SAPHO believed the explanation would rid her of jealousy! Jonquil's jealousy was intensified. She understood now the allure which Sapho must hold for Permanent. Permanent always had been a contrary sort. Too, Jonquil was acutely conscious of her own lack of pulchritude and aware that Sapho was present on nine different counts along those lines.

Jonquil was afraid of widows and ex-wives, particularly the latter. She was amazed at Sapho's disclosures, and indicted them both without further ado. Also she swung into action.

Permanent meanwhile gloomed about the house, seeking futilely for diversion. The trees were in full leaf, flowers bloomed in tiny front yards, spring beckoned, the birdies twittered in the trees. But Permanent knew none of this. The flowers in the front yard were cemetary decorations for him and the chirping of the little birds was not at all in tune with his fit of depression.

But Jonquil was placidly at work in the restaurant when Permanent reached the Jazzadancerie. She was dividing her time between the kitchen and the two helpers who were making ready for the business of afternoon and night. Her face wore an expression of contentment which foretold no good for Permanent. That gentleman sank lugubriously into a chair and watched Fate move forward.

But he could not forever keep silent. He rose and shuffled across the room. If Jonquil saw him coming she gave no sign. Permanent stood before her, fidgeting awkwardly.

"Honey?"

She arched her brows. "It's Permanent, ain't it?"

"Uh-huh"—humbly. "I's he."

That appeared to terminate her interest in the conversation. She moved away but he blocked her path.

"You been heah long, Jonquil?"

"Kinder."

"Alone?"

"Not ontirely."

"Who you be'n talkin' to?"

Jonquil looked him straight in the eyes. "On'y yo' ex-wife!"

Permanent shied from the abyss which yawned at his feet.

"M-m-my which?"

"Yo' ex-wife."

"Meanin'——"

"How many ex-wives has you got?"

1. "I has always wanted to meet up with Sapho's fust husban'," said Webster Dill, his mammoth hands descending upon the cringing shoulders of Permanent Williams. "An' now that I has done so, I asts you a question and I wants a honest answer."

"One too much," Permanent admitted in a most doleful tone.

"Well, I has be'n talkin' to her."

"Wh-what she said?"

"Sapho di'n't say much, Permanent. Not near enough. So I went an' had a lil talk with her husban'."

He staggered. "With Webster Dill?"

"Yeh. I so't of gotten the idea he di'n't know befo' that you an' Sapho uster be ma'ied."

"What did he say?"

"Tain't what he said, Permanent—it's how he said it."

"Oh, my Gawd!"

Permanent effected a violent exit. The worst had happened. Catastrophe had come upon him. Gone now was his last chance; his salvation lay in speed.

He negotiated the distance to the corner in nine flat and clipped eleven seconds from that on the next block. Eighteenth Street knew him as a cloud of dust and a boy on a bicycle retarded his progress not a particle. The lad picked himself up from the gutter, viewed the human streak—now far distant—and made terse comment: "Mebbe that feller is in a hurry."

Once in his home Permanent exhibited genuine activity. From the basement he resurrected a battered suitcase which he opened on the bedroom floor. Working in a frenzy, he crowded it beyond capacity with clothes—some of them his. He labored to a definite end.

Permanent was leaving; leaving absolutely and completely; departing for parts unknown and to remain unknown. And he wasn't coming back.

He was sad. With a few deft twists of the tongue his beloved wife had piled an Ossa of terror upon a Pelion of apprehension. It meant that Permanent was parting from his wife—and he didn't relish that. Not even a little bit. He loved Jonquil despite her most sincere faults. He loved her even yet. He could not find censure in his heart. Nor could he arrange time for explanations. The one thing he desired between himself and Webster Dill was distance—and plenty of it.

The clicking of the front gate came to the ears of the prospective exoduster. It should have warned—but didn't. It was only when the front door opened unceremoniously and a black terror bulked in the doorway that Permanent understood.

Webster Dill stood motionless. Framed in the doorway, his tremendous size was accentuated. The great, muscular arms which hung loosely from the enormous spread of shoulder seemed ready for action.

Permanent felt that he must speak—or shriek.

"M-M-Mistuh Dill. . . ."

"Huh!" It was a deep, throaty growl; a menacing rumble. "So you was Sapho's fust husban'?"

Permanent bobbed his head in eager agreement—anything to postpone the inevitable shambles.

"I was s'prised to heah it."

"I—I kinder thought you would be, Mistuh Dill."

Again nothing but silence could be heard in the room. And after an interminable pause, Webster Dill spoke again.

"I craves to make talk with you, cullud man."

"Hot dam!" Permanent was passionately, pitifully eager. "Let's us make it a long talk."

"Huh! . . ." Webster took one step forward, two, three. His mammoth, muscular hands descended with sledgehammer force upon the cringing shoulders.

"I has always wanted to meet up with Sapho's fust husban'," said Webster in a firm, even voice. "An' now that I has done so—I asts you a question an' I wants a honest answer."

The clock on the mantel ticked ominously. Half unconscious, Permanent extended his right hand to clasp that of St. Peter.

"What I want to know is this, Mr. Williams," finished Webster Dill. "What is the best way fo' a feller to go about gittin' a divo'ce fum Sapho?"

II 2 Exploding the Myth of France as a Country of Moderate Drinking

SAY, THESE are the folks who know how to drink—these French people. If we in America had understood this nice wine game we wouldn't be drinking shellac and wood alcohol at eight dollars a quart at home now.

The young man who propounded this sat opposite me in a sidewalk café in Paris on a brilliant early afternoon this summer. We were "having one," and my American friend was unburdening himself on the eternal question of prohibition.

"Just look around," he went on. "Don't see anybody drunk here, do you? Tell me, have you seen anyone drunk in Paris this trip?"

"About a dozen this past week," I answered, and added, "But they were all foreigners."

"Sure—Americans and English and all kind of foreigners. But no native Frenchmen. You never see them drunk. They know how to drink—a glass or two of wine at their meals and maybe a little drink in the afternoon like this." He swept his arm in a semicircle and took in the hundred or more patrons seated at tables and quietly sipping their wine or beer or an aperitif, or very possibly a cup of coffee.

"These French people know how to drink," he pronounced with absolute finality.

But do they?

I didn't argue the point with my enthusiastic fellow countryman, but I did take it up as seriously and deeply as it is possible for an outsider to investigate the manners and intimate customs of another people.

Now, there are what I please to call "national myths" about every country. These are traditions, axioms, shibboleths, inaccuracies, superstitions—that are accepted by the visitor within the gates at their own face value. France is especially blessed with these national fallacies. Every Frenchman is supposed to be volatile, highly inflammable, uncalculating, entirely sentimental—and sober. This last belongs to the long list of "drinking myths."

My American companion had just quoted some of them to me. There are others quite as common:

"You can't get drunk on wine."

"French common people have been drinking wine for a thousand years and more."

"There's no harm in wine—it even aids digestion."

"The French people drink very modestly and there's no drunkenness."

IN THE five-year period of 1905-09 (due to war and post-war conditions, only pre-war statistics have any value at present) France, the Temperate, was by a 50 percent margin the biggest user of alcoholic beverages in the world. She consumed three times as much pure alcohol per capita as the British Isles, the Drunken. Even in those days her per capita consumption was three and one-half times as great as in the United States. She led the field with 20.2

litres alcohol—reducing all drinks to 100 percent alcohol—with Italy a weak runner-up with a record of 13.2 litres pure alcohol.

In that particular five-year period she consumed per man, woman and child:

155 litres of wine.

36 litres of beer.

3.46 litres 100 percent distilled spirits.

In that same period, France, the Temperate, had 479,898 retail wine, beer and liquor retail establishments—nearly a half million bars for a scant 40,000,000 people. Belgium, however, takes the honors in the number of bars per capita.

One saloon to every 82 inhabitants in France means an average of one saloon to every 20 families. That's bad enough; but in some districts in the North, there is one saloon to every 38 inhabitants—roughly one bar to every ten families. In the big industrial city of Rouen, there is a bar to every 60 people, and on one street there are 150 houses and 75 drinking places.

"TALK'S cheap, but it takes money to buy cider," is an old saying that is especially true of France. Impoverished though she is her drink bill for 1921 was in the neighborhood of one billion and a quarter dollars—not francs, but American dollars. That's almost one-half her total American war debt. It's enough to pay the interest and retiring fund on all her debts and have a tidy sum left over.

Now what does France really drink? I mean does she bother with other things besides the famous juice of her grapes?

A few paragraphs back I quoted figures for a period some ten to fifteen years past. At that time she was consuming per capita 155 litres of wine, averaging 10 percent alcohol; 36 litres of beer averaging 3.5 percent alcohol, and 3.5 litres of alcohol—this 3.5 litres pure alcohol representing some 7 litres of distilled spirits, brandy or whisky.

The whole world, and France itself, has been enamored of the pleasant wine-fables—fragrant, blossoming vineyards with happy French peasants wandering home in the twilight to drink a glass of ruddy wine with their meal.

All that is true of millions of French sturdy common folks.

Within the hour that little Jacques is born, he is given a spoonful of warm watered wine. His whole life is nourished in a sane and happy atmosphere of wine. As a schoolboy he is packed off to his lessons with a bottle of watered wine in his knapsack. From earliest recollections he is given a glass of half-watered wine at his meals. Grown up, on wedding days and special celebrations he drinks a glass or two of some old cognac brought out especially for the occasion. He is temperate and wine does add to the joy and happiness of his life.

But there are other millions of France: Children, particularly in the Normandy country of the North, and the Breton country of the West, born of drunken

Alcohol Bureau Year Book, 1914*

C This demonstration by wine-growers and peasants against prohibition at Bar-Sur-Aube, shows the hold that grape-growing and wine-making have on the very life of the French people.

fathers and mothers, living in poverty and filth—half hungry, half cold, half educated, alcoholic from childhood. This is the unknown half of France. Few tourists see it. Millions of Frenchmen know little of it.

"During the war I examined 600 boys in Normandy for the army examinations and 50% of them could not pass the tests," Dr. Legrain, a French temperance leader, and head of a great hospital for the insane, told me. "In the ten-year period just before the war, the percent of tuberculosis among the conscripts for the whole of France was 13.5 per 1,000, while in Normandy it ranged from 23.1 to 43.3 per 1,000."

These "calvados" and "marc" drinkers of Normandy and Brittany are the hardest spirit drinkers, as I have said, but they are by no means the only spirit bibblers in France. Hundreds of thousands of peasants in the wine districts distil and drink their own spirits. France in fact is the home of the home still.

There were in 1920 exactly 1,728,029 home stills in operation. That's one for every 23 people.

Until a war law, passed June 30, 1916, was consummated, home distillation of fruits was permitted without tax. After the juice had been squeezed from the grapes for wine-making there is left the stems, seeds, skin, etc., that contain a certain amount of sugar. From this residue is made a fermentation which is run through a home still. This, up to the war, was free from all government duty or supervision of any kind as long as it was only for home consumption.

This law of 1916 limited the amount of free distillation to ten litres for home consumption. That's the law, but to see that it was obeyed would take 1,728,029 revenue inspectors. As it works out there can be no doubt that millions of litres of spirits are distilled and surreptitiously sold without paying any government tax or without being figured in the statistics.

It is around this spirit-distilling and drinking that the temperance fight in France is centering. The one real great temperance organization is called the Ligue Nationale contre l'Alcoolisme, The National League against Alcoholism.

The joker in this high sounding name is that wine and beer are not considered in its temperance programs. Alcohol in France means distilled spirits, eau de vie, brandy, cognac, marc, carvados, or in American terms, bgoze. Wine according to France is not alcohol.

IT WOULD be almost impossible to overestimate the hold that grape-growing and wine-making have on the very life and imagination of the great majority of French people. Fully 4,000,000 are in one way or another connected at some season with the trade—including some 25 percent of all the peasant farmers. In the year just before the war, 1,550,952 hectares (3,830,851 acres) of the best lands of France were in vineyards.

Except within the vision of a handful of medical men, who see the rocky road of alcoholism, tuberculosis, disease, poverty, and

FRANCE'S PREMIER DECLARES FOR WINES:

"We can hope, doubtless, that in a later day—in a future more or less distant—all will recognize the truth of the delightful Anglo-Saxon poet's tribute to wine, 'I am Health, I am Heart, I am Life'..."

(From a speech delivered by M. Raymond Poincaré, Premier of France, at the SEMAINE DU VIN, Senlis, March 28, 1923)

SIDE BY SIDE

Side by side they shared the hardships—the privations—the glories of war. Theirs was a comradeship born in adversity, strengthened by trial, and ripened to the enduring friendship of man to man that is founded on mutual respect,—on common aims and ideals. This friendship was pledged and frequently renewed in the wholesome and healthful wines of France.

Today, with the same rich juice of the grape transformed by Nature's alchemy into the blood of each, may they work together to maintain that peace which they fought to secure, side by side!

Ⓐ Dramatic newspaper advertising is one of the many weapons used to combat the growing prohibition sentiment in France.

decreased population, that France is stumbling down, there are only a few thousand in the whole country who consider the temperance fight as anything but a war against distilled spirits.

It is true that there are several small societies and groups who are uncompromisingly attempting to direct the movement against all drinking but their influence is small.

However there is a strong and growing demand that distilled liquors be done away with. This movement was given concrete recognition when on March 16, 1915, the manufacture, sale and consumption of absinthe was prohibited by law.

A YEAR later, as a war-time measure, all so-called "industrial alcohol," made from sugar beets, or grains was requisitioned by the government. This measure is still in force.

The next step against spirits was made October 1, 1917, when a law was passed prohibiting the sale of spirits to children under eighteen, and regulating the employment of women as servants in saloons.

On March 14, 1918, a real test of the temperance strength came with the introduction of a bill prohibiting the sale of distilled alcohol as a drink. Despite the fact that this was put forward as a war-time measure only 47 deputies—congressmen—voted for it.

To all appearances the wine, beer and spirits interests of France are as firm as Gibraltar. They control the Deputies and the Senate; through advertising, ownership and social prestige, they have a complete strangle-hold on the press; and in the consciousness of certainly 75 percent of all the people of France the whole prohibition idea is a wild inconceivable fantasy.

Yet if America proves the success of her prohibition, and if England and northern Europe move toward at least partial temperance, as they probably will, then it takes no prophet to foretell the day when the sale of distilled spirits will be illegal throughout France.

But wine is another matter. Its economic significance is tremendous, and before the temperance forces can make any inroad into the far-reaching industry they must solve this economic side. They must discover and popularize an economic substitute for wine-making. Hundreds of thousands of these acres of France are peculiarly fitted for grape culture, and as far as France or Italy or Spain knows the grape was meant only for wine.

DESPERATE attempts are being made at present by temperance groups to work out this substitute along practical and popular lines. Italy has done most in this work, and a Dr. Monte, of Milan, has discovered a process, called the Monte Method, whereby the water can be extracted from the grape juice by a process of refrigeration, the water freezing before the heavy sugary juices, and a sweet, highly concentrated, unfermented juice left.

No friend of France or of the people of the world can possibly know of the depth of France's drinking and not feel that somewhere there must be a check placed on it. It had, up to the war, been increasing every decade for the past 100 years. Before the French Revolution, the peasants of France were little more than serfs. They were water drinkers. Wine was a luxury. With the great estates seized and divided up, the small farmer became more and more prosperous and independent and he drank more and more wines and spirits.

In 1890 France was drinking 12.47 litres pure alcohol, reducing all her drinks to a basis of alcohol. In 1900 this had increased to 16.62. In 1913, just before the war, it was 21.17 litres per man, woman and child. In 1920 this had decreased to 16.01.

By and large this decrease is the result of the general economic depression and the fact that the government tax on distilled liquor has increased 800 percent. In regard to purely distilled spirits, as against wines and beers, the consumption decreased from 4.35 litres pure alcohol in 1890 to 2.26 litres per capita in 1920.* High prices and financial depression was primarily responsible for this.

In Italy, it is significant, as it was in France, that the most ardent anti-spirits advocates are physicians, most of whom are by no means teetotalers. At the First National Congress of the Italian Hygienic Association, held May 2, 1922, the three hundred physicians attending voted in favor of a law against all liquors containing more than 15 percent alcohol; in favor of total prohibition for all hospitals, prisons, etc., and petitioned the government to send a commission to America to study prohibition.

Like France, Italy's average consumption was growing at an alarming rate up to the war. Her wine consumption alone increased from 80 litres per capita in the decade following 1870 to 127 litres in 1921. Last year, reducing all her drinking to pure alcohol, her per capita consumption reached 13.18 litres.

"ITALY's temperance movement is bound to move steadily ahead," Domenico Pastorello, head of the Nationale Italiano Contra L'alcoolismo Society, explained to me. "There is a great moral movement in Italy today and there are thousands of the best people of Italy who are willing to throw themselves into any cause that tends toward the general betterment of our country. We believe that with propaganda we can get through a law against liquor containing more than 15 percent alcohol. Our wine people will not oppose this. Then with this law passed we will go on with our education and propaganda in favor of local option. At the same time we will be solving an economic substitute for the use of grapes for wine. We will need help from America. With money for propaganda we can make great strides in Italy."

In Rome I saw a great welfare organization being born under the direction of Dr. Ettore Levi. A famous nerve specialist of Milan before the war, Dr. Levi threw himself into war work, caught the vision of social service, eventually gave up his Milan practice and came to Rome with his big idea of driving social disease and tuberculosis and alcoholism entirely out of Italy.

"These three curses work hand in hand," he told me. "They are branches of the same tree grown in the soil of ignorance and misery. To crusade against one you must crusade against all three. They are sapping the life blood of our nation. But when the people of Italy fully realize it, we shall make great changes here."

In Switzerland the temperance idea has taken deep roots and this coming spring of 1923 a vote will be taken on a law giving Local Option to the cantons and parishes. This is a result of a referendum circulated and signed by 146,000 voters, although only 50,000 are needed to force the Swiss Congress to consider any bill. This local option, even if passed, will only give the individual communities the right to vote against distilled spirits, not against wine.

In the meantime the government is putting forward for popular vote the proposal that the government take over the manufacture of all distilled liquors. In normal times most of Switzerland's fruits and berries are exported to Germany, but due to the unfavorable German exchange practically all this exportation is stopped. With no market for their fruits the good Swiss farmers went to their home stills and are now turning their produce into spirits. There are 25,000 of these home outfits working and the government, not relishing this moonshine competition, is asking the people to turn over all distillation to the government monopoly.

The next two or three decades will see great advancements made in the prohibition of distilled liquors in all southern Europe, probably their abolishment. But until the 3,830,851 acres of grapes of France can be economically used for some other product than wine-making total prohibition will be only a dream.

With this economic question solved, however, a bone-dry France will become a definite actual possibility.

LILLA VANCE, astride the ranch pony, her soiled cotton dress too small for a sturdy girl of twelve, wasn't exactly a pretty sight as she looked back sulkily at her mother standing in the door of the dingy old ranch house. She was on her way to her father's sawmill and her mother's thoughts seemed to pierce her body and lodge in her mind. "How did I ever have such a daughter—such a homely little girl—careless—a tomboy—always dirty and 'slack' like her father, and like him always laughing at 'vulgar' jokes?" Mrs. Vance was a New Englander and she was always bitterly reminding her husband that she didn't belong on a Wyoming ranch. But Lilla, with the recklessness of youth, chuckled as she urged the pony forward. Her mother was different from her father and herself—so much so that they were constantly shielding each other's shortcomings from her.

When Lilla reached the sawmill where her father was alone she found him fallen across a table, his shoulder caught under the saw. The wicked steel band was whirring but not flashing its bright teeth. With all her young strength she managed to stop the saw and drag him from beneath it. He opened his eyes and whispered, "Lilla, get somebody—get Dan!" But her pony had run away and she came back wailing. "Tell me what to do, father!"

"Try to stop the bleeding," he said faintly.

Lilla ripped off her dress and tried to stanch the flow, but she soon knew he was beyond hope. . . . They found her there in the dark shed, her two bare arms stretched protectingly about the dead man's chest. "He's dead," she said dully to her mother. "Father's dead. I couldn't stop the blood."

DURING the following days she revisited the sawmill, living over again the terror and horror of those dark hours. She wanted to stamp into her soul every impression of her father, that big, shambling, jolly man who had been the best part of her life.

Then the family moved to a suburb of Chicago, Lilla rebelling at leaving the ranch life and hating the cooped up city.

But as the years passed she became more amenable. In high school her teachers spoke well of her. She was growing into a large, sturdily-built young woman, singularly free from any sickly curiosities in regard to sex. But as she began to feel her power of attraction, especially over boys, despite the fact that she had no prettiness, she often wondered if the simple facts of life as she knew them didn't hide some savage reality.

And then she met her elegant young cousin, Lambert Wells. Lilla and her mother had a tiny cottage on the lake for the summer and the boy had come to pay them a visit. The two were together every day. She wasn't in love with him, but by way of experiment and curiosity she had let him kiss her. Neither had realized their danger until it was too late. Lilla characteristically wasted no time in useless anxiety. She had no desire to marry the boy even though he had weakly suggested it. And above all, her mother must never know—she would never understand. She admitted guiltily to herself now that her mother had always been right and good—it was she and her father who had the "bad" streak in them. But she nevertheless set about straightening out her life again. She became a school teacher and a very successful one. The young superintendent, Dr. Gordon F. James, of course noticed this at once, but he also noticed Lilla—and in a way that left no doubt of his keen personal interest. One day, after watching her work, he asked her to come to his office. Lilla expected to be discharged.

UPSTAIRS in the superintendent's office, Lilla had regained her self-assurance. It was no disgrace for a substitute teacher to be dropped from the school, she reflected, and she was no longer afraid of the precise little man. But what came from his thin lips when she stood in front of his desk, her head thrown a bit back and her lips smiling, surprised her.

"Miss Cummings is returning to the school tomorrow, as perhaps you have heard. Would you like to take charge of the assembly room, Miss Vance?"

This took her breath away. The assembly room, where a hundred and fifty restive boys and girls were herded together for the purposes of study, while often a class was in progress at one end, was the Waterloo of most high-school teachers. One after the other failed ignominiously and relapsed to the other classrooms, being unable to keep order or even quiet. Lilla's round eyes centered on the man in mystification.

"I shall be there myself more or less," he said, "but I believe you will be successful, even without my support. You have personality."

"Why—" Lilla began stammeringly.

"Think it over if you like and let me know tomorrow, Miss Vance," he said reassuringly.

"I don't have to think it over! Of course, I'll try. It will be a lark!" she said enthusiastically.

The compressed lips relaxed into the glimmer of a smile. "That is the right spirit," Dr. James said approvingly. "I am sure with that spirit you will succeed. You can count always upon my support." And he added, "Suppose you report tomorrow at my office before school."

Lilla strode home, laughing to herself on the way at the memories of her own days in the big room, the pranks that she had "put over," the perpetual buzz of conversation, the flirtations and idleness—in short, the utter anarchy of the place.

Democracy and coöperation were not the principles upon which solely to rely in the control of the big assembly room, at first, at any rate. There were some bad precedents to break up as Lilla well knew, and if the thing was to be done at all she must begin at the start and let love and comradeship and all the pretty qualities come later.

BEFORE long all Lawndale was ringing with stories of Lilla's methods in quelling the big assembly room, how she boxed this boy's ears when he was impudent; "called down" a snippy upper-class girl; organized impromptu games to relieve the monotony of sedentary hours or took "the bunch" on a long hike. They did not hear how Lilla had broken up the clandestine gatherings of boys and girls in the attic on rainy afternoons, nor how she talked to certain of the wilder ones "on the level," threatening to expose them, not to the principal nor to their parents, but to the entire assembly room. It was a triumph. Before spring she had the undisciplined mob not merely cowed, but obedient.

The slim superintendent in eye-glasses watched the process, darting in and out of the room unexpectedly, smiling approvingly at his youngest teacher, though she was breaking all the principles of psychological pedagogy. At times coming upon Lilla in a crisis, he discreetly withdrew, giving her that promised support by feigning ignorance of what she was doing. The pupils quickly knew, however, that Lilla was a magnet for the young man, and long before she was aware of his special interest in her they were gossiping about them.

C The coldness of her husband's tone stabbed Lilla to the heart. She went to him and put her arms about his knees. "Gordon," she said, tears in her eyes, "it shouldn't be so terrible, so unforgivable for a woman to have a second child!"

On a spring afternoon Lilla gathered up her books and papers, put on her hat and went flying down the long stairs, running into Mr. Gordon F. James.

"I was just looking for you, Miss Vance," he said mincingly. "Do you mind if I walk home with you? There are certain matters I should like to discuss with you, and we can talk them over in the open air of this balmy afternoon as well as in the confined office."

"Of course!" Lilla agreed.

The superintendent did not seem to have any weighty matters on which to consult Lilla. He talked as always in carefully chosen phrases about the responsibility and opportunity afforded by the Lawndale school, and complimented Lilla warmly upon her "novel" methods of sway. Lilla was conscious of the eyes of Lawndale, as she passed through the streets at the side of the correct young man. Her lips twitched mirthfully. When she reached the Porter house she kept him dangling on the sidewalk until she was sure that everybody inside could see her prize, then formally gave him her hand and squeezed his so firmly that he drew it back.

"May I—may I give myself the pleasure of calling upon you some evening?" he asked ceremoniously. "There is so much of interest to us both in our professional duties that we hardly have time for—for—other subjects."

"Come any time," Lilla said promptly. "I'm home most every evening, and the family would like to see you too."

"Thanks!" The young man bowed stiffly, raised his hat, held it elevated for at least two seconds above his smooth black hair, turned and departed. Lilla ran up the steps, grinning broadly at the strangeness of life.

IT HAD come, her first formal caller! her first beau! Lilla skipped into the house and gurgled out the news to her mother and Aunt Myra in a burst of foolish laughter. Her mother reproved her for her flippant spirit. The young man was very highly considered in Lawndale; it was feared that Lawndale could not long retain him. "He has a brilliant future in the educational world," she said gravely. Lilla laughed again at her mother's seriousness and evident flutter.

There followed in due course the courting of Lilla. Dr. James brought her candy, flowers, books, took her once to the opera in Chicago in the gallery, walked home from church with her every Sunday, and called at first once, then twice a week. Gordon James, Lilla knew, was her mother's picture of a desirable and moral young man, the kind to marry. "And you may consider yourself lucky, Lilla," Mrs. Vance admonished her daughter, with a gleam of hidden reverence.

"He hasn't asked me yet," Lilla replied. But she knew that the formal young man would ask her to marry him whenever she let him.

Lilla hardly knew what she herself felt. This must be the kind of man that nice women attracted, and the colorlessness of her feelings must be the correct index of the purity he aroused. So when the day finally came, late in May, she said, "Yes" with a disconcerting promptness. The young man looked as if he had expected more hesitation or possibly opposition.

"Of course we shall not be rich," he said, when the emotional moment had passed, signalized by a faint impress of his tight lips upon Lilla's cheek, "but we shall have common interests."

IT WAS a mild day. The whimsical climate of Chicago had suddenly turned from a sullen spring to a warm summer. The lovers were walking beside a sluggish stream that meandered through the prairie not far from Lawndale.

"So you see," he concluded, "we shall not be likely to remain in Lawndale forever!"

"I see," she assented without much animation.

"My friends in Chicago are already approaching me about the possibility of a place in one of the larger high schools—a very attractive proposition."

"Yes," she assented, far away.

Then he talked fluently about the joys and attainments of a successful marriage.

"My mother and father were very closely united," he said.

She wondered if her own father and mother had been really united, and thought not.

Before the engagement walk ended Gordon kissed her once more. There was a collision between the stiff rim of his derby and her broadbrimmed velvet hat, that made Lilla giggle. Gordon frowned as he might if she had giggled in church and drew back. Lilla lifted the derby from his head, and he tried again more successfully. She saw the smooth skin of his sound skull beneath the thin black hair and closed her eyes, to shut out something.

"Lilla! Lilla!" he murmured.

She let her head rest for a moment upon his shoulder.

"I love you, Lilla," he said in a more natural voice than she had ever heard from him before. It was the first time, she thought, those old words had been said to her. They gave no electric thrill. But this according to her mother was as it should be before marriage—and afterwards.

If Lilla had any serious doubts of the desirability of her engagement, they must have been dispelled by the tremulous joy with which her mother received the news. Mrs. Vance liked Gordon and thought him all that a man should be—correct, refined, "cultured and highminded." They talked career and politics together until Lilla observed, "One would think you were courting mother, Gordon."

"I am sure I might be, if I had not met you first," he responded gallantly. Lilla found this reply enormously diverting. "We are not a bit alike," she said warmly.

The engagement weeks sped quickly past in a flutter that prevented serious reflection. Lilla found this excitement delightful. The announcement of her engagement was a thrilling climax for her career in the high school. The assembly room relapsed somewhat into its former anarchy, and Lilla tolerantly permitted infractions of discipline. After all, teaching and learning were not the two most serious things in life. What were the most serious things in life? Lilla could not say. . . .

THEY WERE married at the end of June and all Lawndale saw the young couple off for their wedding journey with hearty approbation. At the ceremony, Lilla looked quite superb in her white gown, blotting out the slight, black figure at her side. His lips were tensely compressed through the ordeal, and he gave the responses in a thin, clear voice with that precise enunciation which to the average American seems British and affected. The only discordant note in the whole performance was Uncle George's heavy remark to his niece, "You mustn't drive him too hard, Lilla."

She laughed without exactly understanding what he meant, and often thought of his words afterwards as if they had been oracular. Now she was too busy saying good-bye and answering joke with joke. The station platform was crowded with her friends and pupils. Across their faces, she seemed to see all Lawndale, all her life back to the lonely ranch in a kind of blur, as something unreal, not herself. Was she now about to discover herself, with this companion to whom she had been legally and formally tied? . . . In her last glimpse through the car window, she saw her mother take Ed's arm with a little weary gesture of relief.

"Well," she thought, "mother at any rate is glad!"

She turned to look at her husband.

Gordon was engaged in arranging their handbags neatly in the rack above the seat, stretching himself on his toes to reach it. He had difficulty in placing her new dressing case and Lilla promptly swung it into the rack. He frowned slightly, as if her action had not wholly pleased him, and settled himself into the seat beside her pulling his cuffs down and his trouser legs up. He was very neat and careful in his dress. For a moment Lilla was subdued; then her hand stole out and she squeezed his hand to express her sense of the queerness of it all, to draw him nearer to her in some way.

Gordon gently withdrew his hand. He hated public exhibitions of feeling. They made him self-conscious. They were not dignified. To guard against a repetition, he opened his small handbag and got from its orderly depths two magazines. One he handed to Lilla, and the other he opened with his long white fingers, searching for a certain article. . . .

LILLA let the magazine lay on her lap, and looked from the landscape to her husband and back again, more queer thoughts flitting through her head. So they were married; they were going to live together, always, at least that was to be hoped. They would be together all that day and that night, and all the days and nights that were coming.

Her mind went back to their acquaintance and engagement and the weeks that had followed since. Gordon had talked to her a lot, of course—told her about his people, his life at college, his ambitions, and he had read to her a great many books, in his desire to establish intellectual bonds between them. They had discussed marriage, occasionally, though Gordon took that largely for granted.

She looked at him once more, very penetratingly out of her wide blue eyes. He was calmly turning the pages of his review, now and then stopping to make a penciled note in his small writing on the margin.

"What is it, dear?" he asked, lifting his eyes.

She wanted to seize his arm, to pinch it and see if he were real, but she knew it would annoy him, and she said instead, "When do we get there?"

"The Lakehurst? Three-thirty, I believe." He consulted the timetable,—"No, three thirty-eight, to be exact." He was always exact. And he resumed his reading.

The Porters had offered them the cottage at Pitcher's Landing for a month, and Gordon was inclined to accept it as both convenient and economical. But Lilla had peremptorily refused the offer much to every one's surprise.

"I KNOW it too well," she had said, but that was not the reason. There was something too incongruous between the life she had led at Pitcher's Landing, culminating in her affair with Lambert Wells, and the present whatever it was to be. That was the wild, fierce Lilla, whom she believed she was burying with the act of marriage.

So they were on their way to a little lake, hidden in the forests of the northern peninsula, and afterwards they were to visit Gordon's family in Wisconsin before returning to their new home in Chicago. For the second step in her husband's career had already been achieved: he had been appointed to a principalship of one of the Chicago high schools at a salary of thirty-five hundred dollars, which Lawndale thought to be a promising beginning for the young couple, very.

"What are you reading Gordon?" Lilla asked at last.

"An article on the secondary school system in New Zealand."

Lilla leaned on his shoulder and scanned the page, which was sprinkled with statistics. For a moment, she caressed her husband's neck where it disappeared into his standing collar, then recollecting herself withdrew to her side of the seat and stared out of the window at the landscape, which consisted of a succession of flourishing corn fields. Once—and only once—during their engagement she had been moved to be "demonstrative." In surprise Gordon had repulsed her.

Now she did not feel that way, not in the least. And she wondered if ever again she would be carried away in a mad, tearing impulse to "demonstrate." Probably not. That was what marriage with its responsibilities did for one.

The retreat in the northern woods which Gordon had chosen was all that the advertisement said, except that the woods had been largely devastated by lumbermen and fire, with gaunt trees here and there as melancholy memorials of an ancient glory, great piles of mouldering sawdust and wastes of decaying slashings. Here and there in this wilderness of ruin, some foreigner had cleared a few acres and was raising a crop of wheat or corn, through which stumps still clung to the soil. The roads were dusty and incredibly bad. It was hot and dull. They spent their days on the little lake aimlessly rowing about in the search of shady nooks, or reading on the veranda of the small hotel.

ONE afternoon Lilla proposed that they should take a walk. They set out on a trail that led through the slashings and past abandoned lumber camps in search of a new iron mine which some Chicago capitalists had just opened up in the cut-over land. They lost their way, floundered through the slashings and undergrowth the perspiration rolling down their bodies. At last they came out on a cup shape lake, lying in the still hot air like a bowl of blue metal. Lilla knelt down at the edge and lapped the water like a thirsty animal, then she bathed her face and arms.

"Let's have a swim!" she exclaimed, beginning to unbutton her belt and tear at the hooks of her waist.

"But we haven't our bathing suits," Gordon protested.

"What's the difference?"

"There's a camp over there." He pointed to some shacks a little way around the edge of the lake.

"It's probably empty like the others," Lilla observed.

"Lilla! I must protest! It is most unsafe. There are people all about in these woods. I see what looks like a road on the other side."

"Let 'em come!" Lilla laughed. She was looking eagerly at the steel mirror of the still water and thinking how good it would feel against her hot body. "Let 'em look if they want to!"

"Lilla!"

The horrified tone of her husband's voice arrested her.

"If you don't care for yourself, if your own modesty doesn't inhibit you, you must at least consider what it would mean if anybody saw you and reported it to the hotel. If the story should get about that my wife stripped naked and took a bath in a public place——" Gordon stopped, overcome by the enormity of his own picture.

Lilla sat down, still thinking enviously of that envelope of cool water covering her parched body.

"Oh!" she said. "I didn't think it might hurt your career."

"It would indeed," he said reprovingly,

After a time spent in meditation Lilla rose saying, "Let's hike back to the hotel and the modest bathtub." She strode fiercely into the thickets of slashings leaving her husband far behind in his effort to follow without damaging his clothing.

THAT slight experience had given Lilla a new insight into matrimony. What she did henceforth must be judged not alone on its intrinsic merits but as it might or might not affect her husband's career. By nature reckless and not introspective, Lilla had done all her life what seemed good to her, without much thought for consequences, at least without thought of what people might say or think. Now it seemed she must judge and weigh carefully the effect of her conduct not only upon herself but upon her husband and his future.

All this he explained to her at great length after supper that evening as they sat before the open window of their bedroom. As she listened patiently she saw unfolded before her ignorant and heedless mind a panorama of social relationship that she had never considered.

"One cannot be too careful," he ended his lecture. "Every little thing counts toward failure or success. And your husband, Lilla, doesn't intend to make any fool mistakes."

Lilla listened, more and more dumbly. As Gordon described this new world in which she must live and play the part of Gordon F. James's wife, she saw a vast and intricate web and across each mesh was written in red letters, "Danger! Be careful! Think before you speak; think before you act!" However could she manage not to tear the web with her clumsy, unpremeditated tongue?

Her husband was undressing for the night. He had a methodical way of doing everything, even to folding his clothes across the chairs and putting trees into his boots. He came over to her now, his preparations completed, and put his hand on her shoulder affectionately.

"Time for bed, Lilla," he said. She did not stir. He leaned down, she could feel the point of his beard touch her shoulder, and kissed her on the neck. "Come!" he said persuasively.

When he took her by the shoulders, she jumped up suddenly brushing him aside and strode heavily to the door.

"I am going out," she said, and jerked the door to behind her before he could remonstrate.

Out in the night, she took a road at random which wandered through the cut-over land, and walked on and on with the swinging stride that was natural to her. The calm, the warm dark night, pungent with odors of the wood quieted her mood. She did not think, but walked steadily following the meanderings of the road which led past little settlements and clearings and finally plunged into a piece of uncut woods to emerge once more into the open beside a little lake. The very lake where she had almost committed her first great matrimonial sin! She leisurely stripped and waded in, thinking pleasantly of Gordon's face if he could see her. He was doubtless asleep.

After she had tired herself swimming about the tiny lake, she came out and clothing herself, walked slowly back to the hotel.

THEY BEGAN their home life in an apartment in a new building far out on the North Side on one of those endless avenues common in this city of magnificent spaces. The building was so new and so cheaply built that every door was warped, and all the woodwork pulled apart under the steam heat, even the oak flooring. But it was fresh and clean and convenient.

It was also ugly, terribly ugly, like all its ten thousand neighbors. But this Lilla did not know, and if she had been told, it would have made little difference to her because her sense of beauty, so vivid in the big things of outdoors, stopped abruptly when she came under roof.

The apartment was shiny with varnished oak and cherry, and heavy with stucco decoration on wall and ceiling and immense plate glass mirrors and electric light fixtures. The furniture was all new and good of its kind. Lilla felt that their new home filled adequately all material wants. It was "comfy." She kept it clean and orderly unassisted. Uncle George, who came with the others to the first dinner the young couple gave observed, "You'll have to step carefully, Lil, in all this furniture!"

But he too admired and enjoyed the good dinner, which Lilla had prepared by herself. Gordon played the host somewhat formally, with great dignity, his mother-in-law at his right, Aunt Myrah at his left.

"Monarch of all he surveys," Lilla thought.

Very soon the routine of their marriage was established: the breakfast across the shiny oak table. Then the cool kiss on the brow, with "Good-by, my dear—will you speak to the janitor about the door-bell and ring up that tailor?" After a flurry of collecting papers, books, hat, coat, and gloves Gordon disappeared through the door. From the bay window of the front room, Lilla could see him emerge below and trot down the pavement in the direction of the car line, spruce, correct, academic, his black bag hugged under his arm.

Sometimes, if the sun shone, before getting busy with her morning duties, she threw open the big window, and resting her solid arms upon the grimy sill would look up into the clear sky and out over the vacant lot across the way to other buildings, like the one she was in, on neighboring streets. She would draw in long breaths of air, thinking, "I must hurry and get out—it's such a pleasant day."

OUTSIDE, however, there were endless blocks almost exactly like the one where she lived, miles and miles of them, and walk as far as she might, she could not reach any really open country. The city had caught her and hemmed her in, threatening to stifle her in its cell-like structure. Its ugliness did not affect her. She craved wild places almost like an animal.

After some months of living in the Wisconsin Avenue apartment she realized how her father had been driven from within to throw over all his good business prospects in Chicago to gain the freedom of the Wyoming ranch. The open country drew her in the same, instinctive, passionate manner.

Gordon's idea of outdoors was a walk through the big park a few blocks from their apartment. He extolled the liberality of the Chicago park system.

Late in the afternoon Gordon reappeared, wilted and a little

Q Once, during their engagement, Lilla had been moved to be demonstrative, but Gordon in surprise had repulsed her. Now she wondered if she ever again would be carried away in a mad tearing impulse. That was what marriage and its responsibilities did for one!

faded from his tasks, but still neat and correct. At supper he would briefly recite the day's events, his encounters with teachers and district superintendent, and expatiate on what seemed to Lilla the infinitely petty intrigue of the school system, whose drama completely absorbed him.

Lilla listened dutifully to her husband's recital, realizing that anxiety made him nervous and brought out certain little wrinkles about the eyes. Also that he found the game exciting and stimulating. The game of politics and intrigue, on a small scale—the pushing and pulling of small, unimportant personalities, each one seeking his own advancement or preservation, wholly absorbed in the personal aspect of his work.

When Gordon was tired with his own doings, he would ask Lilla what she had been doing, who had called upon her, and invariably he commented upon all the persons she had met.

After the customary kiss and good night, Lilla sometimes lay awake and wondered and thought about life, and wondered still more; finally falling asleep with her questions unanswered to be awakened by the alarm clock at six-thirty—and the morning anxiety about the cream bottle—whether it was on the staging outside the kitchen door.

Thus their married life wore on through the year, with almost no variations. Gradually under Gordon's watchful supervision, their acquaintance in the city was increasing and occasionally they gave little "informal" dinners to people who entertained them. These Lilla enjoyed because they gave her something more to do, and she liked people in general, in an indiscriminate way that irritated her husband.

In the summer Lilla made a visit to the Porters at Pitcher's Landing, while her mother was east with her brother. She had looked forward to this visit to the place where she had spent so many free, happy summers with passionate eagerness, as if she were to find something there she had lost. It was largely a disappointment. Lilla no longer felt at ease with the boys and girls on the beach—no longer one of them.

One hot afternoon, Gordon coming over from Chicago unexpectedly by the boat, found her in her bathing suit with tousled hair drowsing on the hot sand where she had been buried for hours. After much urging he was induced to don a bathing suit and venture into the water. His thin legs and pallid color gave him a ridiculous look in the baggy bathing suit that belonged to Uncle George. Lilla laughed.

"What are you giggling at?" he demanded sharply. Lilla knowing how sensitive her husband was to personal ridicule suppressed her laughter quickly. Lilla was conscious, when he emerged, of the derisive figure he made upon the bathers, and she blushed furiously.

Sunday was a long, hot, dull day. Lilla helped her aunt with the dinner in the morning while Gordon sat on the porch smoking with Uncle George, who had a tolerant contempt for "the little professor" as he always called him. Lilla came out with a spade and advised her husband to dig around in the garden.

"It needs it, and the exercise will do you good," she said.

This was her revenge for the sewing, and she took a childish delight in pointing out to her aunt the slight figure laboriously and precisely turning up the weedy surface of the soil.

It was a relief when Gordon took the Sunday night boat back to Chicago with Uncle George, and the little cottage relapsed into its somnolent, manless state of midweek. Aunt Myra had something on her mind, and found occasion the next day to say it hesitantly.

"Lilla, my girl, aren't you going to have a child?"

"I want babies," Lilla blurted out. "But Gordon says it would interfere with his career—we should have to move into a larger flat and have a servant and he doesn't feel sure enough of his position in Chicago to risk it."

Before Lilla left Pitcher's Landing, she had come to a momentous decision and knew vaguely how she should reach her end. It would have to be by ruse, as it had been ever since the days of Eve—and Delilah. Lilla had no more scruple against the use of guile than had they.

She returned unexpectedly to Chicago one sultry September afternoon, and surprised Gordon glooming in their dusty apartment. He was, for him, demonstratively delighted at her appearance.

"How awfully well you look, my dear!" he exclaimed, after the first kiss. "Beautiful! Beautiful!" he repeated. Lilla looking into his black eyes with a mocking gleam from her own wide blue eyes murmured: "Do you think so, dear?" and knew that she must triumph.

She was clever enough to keep her own counsel as long as concealment was possible, and when she read the panic in her husband's soul at her announcement of the fact she knew that she had done wisely. She had saved him many anxious weeks. It must be said that Gordon struggled bravely to meet the situation with cheerfulness. "It can't be helped now," he said. "We must make the best of it, Lilla. One child is not too much. We shan't have to move. . . . And you are so strong and well! . . . You always wanted a child, dear," he reminded her another time. "It is the natural thing for a good woman to want children."

For a time while her baby lay in her arms she felt perfectly, radiantly content. Her prison had opened out into the most harmonious freedom. She was well and strong, the little boy was all that a first child should be, and already she dared dream of another, others, in the vague, blissful dreams of her convalescence. Her mother felt this new happiness in Lilla's soul and rejoiced. Mother and daughter were closer than ever before in their lives, in the universal understanding of birth.

"He's like Dad, don't you think?" Lilla said after the thousandth minute examination of the young David.

"In his body, perhaps," Mrs. Vance admitted, "but he has the Wells head—and black hair like his father!"

Lilla laughed. "His mother doesn't care whom he looks like," she crooned. "He's his mother's own, now at any rate."

Gordon did not approve of her, he did not like her ways—he corrected and scolded her, sometimes even in public—but he could not keep away from her, let her go her own way and live her own little life as she was quite willing to let him live his, keeping house for him and bringing up their child and performing all the other little duties of the married woman.

"Take care!" her mother warned. "You don't want your marriage to be a failure do you, Lilla?"

"No!" Lilla agreed heavily.

"It is the woman's business to see that her marriage is successful."

It was the woman's business, Lilla thought, to do everything in marriage except earn the money; and as Gordon's closeness in money matters became apparent, she felt that it would be easier to try her hand at it, instead of undergoing the humiliations inherent in this method of earning her living.

When David was nine, Lilla just thirty-two, and Gordon not yet forty, there occurred in Chicago one of those periodic political storms that take up an unconscionable space in the local newspapers and furnish the necessary drama for democracy. The political situation of city, state, and county was in unstable equilibrium between the two great parties, and two wings of the democratic party in state and city.

The democrats, having seized upon the convenient weapon of "reform," it behooved the republicans to put forward fresh candidates, at least in the minor positions, for the sake of the window dressing. Thanks to this and a few other complexities of the political horizon, Gordon James was selected by the seasoned slate makers to run as the republican candidate for county superintendent of schools.

Gordon grasped at the opportunity eagerly. He had begun to weary of his duties as supervisor, and to suspect that he might be some day shelved: this was the chance he had been scheming for and he prepared to make an energetic campaign for his party ticket.

Lilla accompanied her husband to the party rooms in a big downtown hotel on election night. She was sorry that the hurried days of the campaign were ending—it had been the pleasantest episode of her marriage, and she liked the new basis of friendliness and coöperation which it had established between her and her husband.

The noisy streets, the massed crowds before the billboards, the lights, the waves of cheering as the different returns were flashed on the screen filled her with a pleasant excitement. All these drab human beings massed in the streets below the hotel were for once interested in something, alive, awake. It did not make much difference, she thought, what they were cheering for. They felt their own strength and enjoyed it. . . . Some of the men she had met the past month came up to where she was sitting and talked to her.

"The professor is running well up," they said encouragingly. She smiled happily, with the comfortable feeling that after all "the professor" was her husband. By nine o'clock, it was evident that in spite of reform the republicans were being swept into victory in the city, county, and (Continued on page 120)

"T HERE'S no use talking," said Beverly Curtis, throwing down his newspaper. "The country is going to the dogs!"

Martin Collins turned sharply from the window, where he had been standing for some time, his back to the other men.

"Why?" he demanded, his gray eyes suddenly luminous. "Why is the country going to the dogs?"

Young Mr. Curtis yawned, and consulted his wafer-thin watch.

"I'm damned if I know exactly why, Martin," he replied. "It shouldn't, if people would only be honest with each other—treat each other fairly. But they won't. Look at the facts.

Tremendous corporations controlling everything we eat, drink and wear, robbing the people right and left in order to make millions. On the other side, labor demanding impossible wages and hours, or bolshevists ready to destroy the government if they are not allowed to run it according to their crazy ideas. And the worst of it is, there's nothing we can do to remedy matters."

Martin Collins threw back his shoulders, lifted his pugnacious chin, as he had done when in khaki, about to lead his men in a dash on some hidden machine-gun nest. The deep furrow plowed in his cheek by a shell splinter glowed dull red.

"You make me tired, Beverly," he growled. "If conditions aren't right, why don't you get out and try to change them?"

Beverly Curtis regarded his friend with rather a superior smile.

"Change them?" he asked. "How?"

"Beverly," Collins asked quietly, "did you vote at the last primary election?"

"No." Curtis moved uncomfortably in his seat.

"I see. And right there is the answer to your question, if the country is going to the dogs, it's because men like you sit around and talk, instead of doing something."

Beverly did not appear to be greatly impressed.

"Sounds all right, Martin," he said, "but it doesn't work. Take our own town, for instance. Colton runs the Republican end—Farrell the Democratic. Both of them are grafters, as everybody knows. Here's an election coming on for United States Congressman. I happen to know that it's all fixed beforehand. Farrell is going to nominate Kerns, whom he knows can't be elected. Colton is going to put up Ben Tracy, son of old man Tracy, of the Westhaven Coal Company and a dozen other corporations. Tracy will be elected, of course, not only because of his money, a lot of which will go into Farrell's pocket, but because Colton let the other side win, at the last mayoralty election, and it's his turn at the pork barrel now."

"Curtis," Collins exclaimed angrily, "you're a quitter! You say the next Congressional election is fixed—that Tracy is going to Washington to take care of his father's interests. All right. He isn't the sort of man we want. Let's elect the right sort of a man!"

"Just like that!" laughed Curtis, flipping his cigarette into the fireplace. "You're dreaming, Martin. It can't be done."

"I'll tell you what I'll do, Curtis," he added presently; "I'll make you a little bet that I can not only beat both Tracy and Kerns, but I can elect"—he allowed his gaze to stray about the big room—"I believe I could elect the head waiter of this club, if I can once prove to the public that he is an honest man."

Curtis laughed, as did several other men who had come up.

"In fact," Collins went on eagerly, "I even believe, Curtis, that I could elect you!"

This time the laugh was general. Curtis rose with a yawn.

"Nothing doing," he said. "Why don't you run yourself?"

Martin Collins stood staring at the others in silence for several moments, his eyes bright with enthusiasm.

"All right," he said, thrusting out his hand. "If you and the rest of the crowd will get out and work for me I'll do it. I'll run on the Independent ticket. I'll make the issue a fight of honesty against graft, Curtis," he exclaimed, his voice vibrant with energy. "Are you with me?"

CURTIS and the others, inspired for the moment by Collins's enthusiasm, grasped his outstretched hand, pledged their support. When he had left them, they regarded each other with uneasy smiles. The influence wielded by Colton and Farrell reached into many unsuspected corners, and they knew it.

"Martin's just letting off steam," said Curtis, taking up his newspaper again. "He'll forget the whole thing by morning."

"He'd better," remarked Stinson, the hardware man, with a grin. "I wonder if he's forgotten that Betty Keating's father and Sam Colton belong to the same lodge."

"I'd forgotten that, too," Beverly Curtis answered.

Martin Collins, striding along Poplar Avenue in the direction of Judge Keating's house, was thinking exclusively of Betty, who had blossomed into sudden and glorious womanhood during his two years' absence in France. Since his return he had thought of her, at times, almost to the exclusion of Red Star ready-mixed paints, the merits of which had been made known, by his genius for advertising, for publicity, throughout the United States.

C. Martin Collins had not been with Betty half an hour when Beverly Curtis came in. With a disarming smile and his eyes on Betty he began to tell the hard things the newspapers were saying about Martin's campaign.

Betty was awaiting him in her best war paint, in the big old-fashioned parlor. Her father and mother had retired to the sitting-room upstairs. There was a certain significance in this. Both socially, and as sales manager of the big Red Star factories, Martin Collins was a very eligible young man.

Tom Farrell, when he heard that Martin Collins had been nominated for Congress on the Independent ticket, gave one of his characteristic chuckles, then strolled over to the offices of the Westhaven Coal Company in the Garvin Building. His visit was ostensibly to discuss the plans for a new trestle he was building for the concern; on his arrival he was at once ushered into the private office of Ben Tracy, the company’s treasurer. He exhibited no surprise on finding Sam Colton there, smoking his usual black cigar.

I WAS NOT HE

*I was not he—the man
Who used to pilgrim to your gate,
At whose smart step you grew elate,
And roused, as maidens can,
For a brief span.*

*It was not I who sang
Beside the keys you touched so true
With note-bent eyes, as if with you
It counted not whence sprang
The voice that rang. . .*

*Yet though my destiny
It was to miss your early sweet,
You still, when turned to you my feet,
Had sweet enough to be
A prize for me!*

LOVE MAY ONCE, as the poet phrased it, have been a woman's whole existence, but times have changed and customs with them. To Charity Coe love was a thing apart, the diversion of her lighter hours. But this was more than Price Allerton could be expected to realize, all at once. Lean and lithe and, even in February, deeply tanned from golf, tennis and polo at Aiken, he looked to be what he believed himself—thoroughly modern. Indeed, as a junior partner in one of Boston's oldest and most dignified combinations of corporation lawyers, he found himself often in New York where, being free, white and thirty-three, he mingled with the world and scraped up a bowing acquaintance with the devil.

Nevertheless the fact remains that, born on Beacon Hill in a house with little lavender window panes through which six generations of Allertons had first glimpsed the light of day, he was, and forever must be, temperamentally tied to the apron strings of his ancestors. A terrifying thought, and yet—

IN New York there are a thousand and one social circles, and this was his first experience with the one in which Sam Sargent moved. Now, as an extra man at a dinner that New York considered formal but which was anything but that from the Beacon Hill viewpoint, he sat with Charity Coe on his left and, while she devoted herself intensively and exclusively to Sam Sargent, wondered what feminine category she might be placed in.

"Now why," ran Price's thought, "should she concentrate so exclusively on Sam?"

Everything about her indicated a deliberate intent to focus the errant glance of the casual male. Yet Price, delivered into her hand as her dinner partner and prepared for that direct frontal attack which even the sweet young things on Beacon Hill are using this year, had found himself ignored.

"Perhaps," he mused, "she's working him for a tip on the market—" The thread of that was broken by Sam's voice. "If you're not going," said Sam, "I'll be damned if I will."

Now this, of course, was addressed to Charity; that it should reach Price was significant of Sam's slipping self-control.

The glance Price cast across the table, to where Mrs. Sam sat, was purely instinctive. . . . The years had treated her less kindly than they had Sam: he could hardly believe that she was the girl for whom Sam had made such preparations when she had accepted his invitation to Class Day, eleven years ago! She had been cool-eyed, slim and self-possessed then. Now, though she could not be much more than thirty she was running incredibly to fat. The shoulders he had remembered as exquisite now bulged from her gown. Her eyes, watching Sam, were anything but cool.

OF HIS wife's glance or, indeed, of anybody or anything but Charity, Sam seemed utterly unaware.

"I'll take you home instead," he was saying. "It's time we came to a showdown. I—"

Eavesdropping was furthest from Price's intentions, but short of the wax of Ulysses there seemed no escape from the rising intensity of Sam's tone. But the hostess was rising. Price instantly came to his feet, glad of the chance to escape Charity's reply. He felt as if he had unwittingly read a letter not intended for him and of a confidential nature.

"Are you going on to the opera?"

The question, put in a voice as mellow as cathedral chimes, lingered in his subconscious mind a moment, before he realized that Charity had risen and had addressed him directly.

"No," he managed to say, "I—"

"Then perhaps you won't mind dropping me at my apartment," she suggested. "That will relieve Sam of his horrible sense of responsibility."

So, presently, Price found himself in a taxi with her. She did not speak at once, the transient glow of a street lamp revealed her wholly relaxed with her eyes closed.

"I hope I'm not taking you too far out of your way," she said, "but Sam would have been too much for me tonight."

From the many things he might have answered, he chose the conventional.

"I'm glad to be of service to you."

In the murk that enveloped the taxi, he could not be sure, yet he fancied that her eyes briefly mocked him. But her next remark was casual.

"Sam said you were from Boston."

"I believe I have managed to live it down," he retorted.

This surprised him. He had yet to discover that Charity was ever successful in making a man follow.

"REALLY? I should never have guessed it!" she commented and now he knew that she mocked him. "Also Mrs. Sam told me that you are a bachelor. Mrs. Sam," she went on, as if musing aloud, "is of the old school. You may not have suspected it but you were the fatted calf, the burnt offering at the feast tonight."

"I'm afraid I don't understand—" he began.

"Of course you wouldn't! But having been furnished with a complete prospectus of all your charms and a hint of your position and probable income, I was expected to desert Sam and devote myself to you."

"And so you didn't!" he suggested, this being a game at which two could play.

"Hardly!" she replied. "Mrs. Sam belongs back in the dark ages. She can't really believe that I'm not interested in a husband—"

"It seemed to me that you were rather interested in hers!" Price could not resist the temptation.

"Oh, Sam's a peach!" she agreed. "The fifth and best husband I've had so far."

To Price that sounded like something out of Alice in Wonderland—a bit of the Mad Hatter. But Charity seemed to sense no need of explanation; she had leaned forward to signal the chauffeur. As the car stopped, she glanced at the meter, produced a dollar bill and surrendered it. Then, turning to Price:

"Thanks," she acknowledged. "The taxi's now yours."

There, by every token, the episode should have ended, and would have, had not Price had his moments of impulse.

"I'm coming in if I may," he announced.

"As you choose," she acquiesced. "But remember I'm dull company tonight."

In her apartment she seemed oblivious of him. The switch she snapped lighted three shaded lamps simultaneously, but the subdued glow of them all only partly revealed the furnishings of the living-room. A livable living-room striking a definite color note of black and gold, without accentuating it to the point of artificiality or oppressiveness. Magazines here and there, many books on shelves and, in an open grate, the cheerful blaze of cannel coal.

Over the mantel hung a gilt framed mirror, wide as the mantel itself. Charity, letting her evening wrap slip from her shoulders, turned to this.

The mirror was like one in his Aunt Elizabeth's home in Chestnut Street: if it was genuine and not a reproduction it must be worth a lot. . . . But then, everything in the room suggested command of money. He began to speculate anew.

"Well," she demanded, facing him, "have you got me all nicely indexed and card catalogued now?"

"So far," he confessed, coolly enough, "I haven't progressed beyond the obvious. May I ask a question?"

She nodded negligent assent.

"What," he demanded, deliberately, "are you trying to do to Sam?"

Her lovely, flagrantly lip-sticked mouth dimpled to a smile.

"That," she retorted, "is like a man! Still, Sam is rather obvious. I'm afraid I shall have, regretfully but firmly, to return him to his wife, before he becomes a public nuisance."

From the table she took a cigarette, lighted it and then curled up on the divan, indolent and graceful.

"And what is Mrs. Sam to say?" asked Price.

"That," Charity assured him, "is the least of my troubles."

THEN she yawned frankly, without attempt at concealment—realizing perhaps that she was none the less attractive so.

"You're funny," she remarked. "Boston background I suppose. I do believe that for two cents you'd deliver a highly moral lecture to me."

"I really haven't any such intention—"

"And you an Allerton—of Boston!" she mocked. "When has an Allerton failed to qualify as his brother's keeper. Remind me that Sam is a married man, that I ought to be ashamed of myself for what you think—"

"I have not suggested that, have I?"

"No, but you think it. To you Sam is the poor moth, I'm the wicked flame and Mrs. Sam is—what?"

"I wonder! It seems to me that she is rather to be pitied perhaps in the circumstances."

"Why? Because, having captured Sam, she promptly let herself relapse into innocuous desuetude? She is fat you know, mentally as well as bodily."

"You mean that she is not quite as young as she was—or as you are!"

Charity gave him a swift amused glance. "You don't mean to be complimentary, I'm sure, but you are! How old do you think I am?"

The light of the nearest lamp illumined the youth of her uplifted face, touched faintly the gold in her hair.

"Twenty-five?" he hazarded.

Charity laughed outright.

"If I should say that I am thirty," she retorted, "my best friend would lift her eyebrows and say, 'Oh, did she tell you that?' Actually, I'm thirty-two—which I imagine gives Mrs. Sam at least one year advantage over me. But, never having made any poor devil, temporarily bedazzled by the thing called love, promise to love and cherish me until death do us part, I simply can't afford to let myself go the way of all married feminine flesh."

"I see! Any woman who gets fat and no longer interests her husband must expect to lose him. You make out a good case and yet—"

"Oh, I know I can't convince you. That's inevitable. I don't want to anyway. You amuse me though—really! You're so absolutely mid-Victorian—"

C In her bathroom, Charity fell into a reverie. "Egypt's Queen! I'm crazy. I'd better get me another husband." Suddenly the telephone rang. "I've got a car," an imperturbable voice told her. "Be ready in about fifteen minutes."

"Than which nothing worse can be suggested!" he interrupted her with marked emphasis.

"And I'm a tired business woman," she finished. "Too tired, really, to be amusing in turn. Do you mind if I say good night?"

Price came to his feet instantly. Still he lingered.

"A tired business woman? Just what does that mean?"

"Architecture. And I'm darned good at it, if I do say so myself. I work as hard as any man could for eight hours a day and for the rest—well, what did the tired business man do?"

"Light plays, light fiction——"

"And late suppers with light players," she finished. "I'm not interested in chorus men somehow. But I do need diversion of a sort. Sam supplies it just now. That's all."

"Wouldn't a bachelor do just as well?"

"It's lucky for you," she retorted, "that I'm modern enough to realize that that is purely an academic question."

Price laughed. "Oh, I say!" he protested.

"I'd like to see an old-fashioned man like yourself try to squirm out of it if I misconstrued it!" she flashed. "But answering your question—no. A bachelor is a spoiled beast. He thinks every single woman is trying to marry him and so he's wary."

"And a married man?"

"Is almost pathetically grateful for a little attention!"

"I see. But isn't there—does this sound impossibly old-fashioned to you—an element of danger in it. Mrs. Sam looked tonight as if——"

"I saw her," commented Charity coolly. "As to the danger, run over in your mind the things that make lie worth while and see if the element of danger isn't always there, in some degree, to give the necessary zest!"

Evidently she intended this to be the last word. For, offering him her hand, she added:

"I don't usually bother to explain but—well, I appreciate your viewpoint. I was born in Boston myself, although I keep that a dark secret usually!"

From Washington Square to his hotel was a matter of forty blocks, but Price chose to walk. A tribute perhaps, to the seductiveness of the serene February night—or perhaps a subconscious tribute to Charity. Inevitably she and her arguments filled his thoughts.

"New York stuff!" he told himself definitely.

Nevertheless he pictured Sam and Mrs. Sam and they became symbolic of married couples everywhere. The Sams were kept fit and vital by the keen competition they faced in business, the Mrs. Sams did seem somehow to relax, to let the charm that had been their stock in trade diminish. Was it because, secure in the position the conventions have accorded a married woman, they lost the sense of competition that they had felt, if only subconsciously, before they had captured a man?

YET the institution of marriage has endured through the centuries. Those who attack it have ever been placed beyond the pale. Married women are the arbiters of the conventions, they have made a married man taboo for any girl or woman with regard for her reputation. Yet here was Charity, wilful and lovely, serenely disregarding the ancient code.

"It might be a good thing for marriage if women like Mrs. Sam were forced to meet competition—keep up their charm," he admitted. But as an afterthought came this, "What about thousands of women worn out by child-bearing and the ceaseless duties of motherhood. Are they to have no protection?"

It struck him that he would like to ask Charity that. But he was not in New York to solve social problems. Even the most successful legal firm attends to odd jobs not always connected with corporation law, for its clients. These, too trivial for the gray-headed gods to whose names his own were linked, fell often to Price and with them his attention was engaged through the next few days.

One such made it necessary that he consult an architect. This did not suggest Charity, but a man did suggest her.

"Try Charity Coe," he advised.

"Is she really very good?" asked Price, with interest.

"One of the best. All she needs is the reputation the years will bring her. But you sound as if you knew her?"

"I've met her—once."

Price couldn't be sure, yet it seemed to him that briefly something flickered in the older man's eyes—indefinable yet reminiscent of the intensity in Sam's tone at the dinner. But the architect merely said:

"A remarkable young woman. Shall I 'phone her for you?"

"No! Just give me her address if you will."

The other wrote it down. "Tell her I sent you," he suggested. "I feel like heaping coals of fire on that young woman's head. She worked for me once, by the way."

NOW THAT was destiny. Price himself was blameless. Charity had left her office. Her secretary added that she thought Miss Coe usually walked to her apartment, if his business was pressing he might possibly overtake her or find her at home. His business was not as pressing as that and yet—Price overtook her in sight of the Arch.

"Oh—Mr. Allerton!" she said, with her swift smile. "I thought you had returned to Boston. So I can't resist the inevitable temptation to add, 'Are you still in New York?'"

"Is anybody or anything ever still in New York?" he retorted. "I'm not only here but wondering if you'll take tea with me. Being a bachelor I'll hastily add that it's a matter of business."

"Let that be my excuse!" she acquiesced, gaily. "Actually though I'd take tea with the devil himself at this hour."

"I'm flattered! If you'll suggest some place——"

"Follow me!" she commanded.

They walked south, past the Arch. Various little signs, each striving to outdo its neighbor in pure eccentricity, signified that tea was being served about the premises, but these Charity scornfully ignored.

Presently they arrived at a corner where there stood that which, with its mullioned windows, suggested an old English Inn. Through a small pane, Price glimpsed the head and shoulders of a much painted beauty who, though taking tea solitaire, manipulated her cigarette with marvelous coquetry as one who ever practices her art.

"This is the best of the lot," announced Charity, and led the way through into an atmosphere of elusive and cathedral dimness.

Here they found a little table, set for two, about which a single candle in a chaste brass stick cast a nimbus of radiance.

"I've got to hurry," remarked Charity. "Dinner tonight—let's talk your business while we eat."

Price described the commission he was authorized to place

"One of our clients has bought the house. He's in Europe now but he wants the work started at once."

"Seventy thousand dollars!" murmured Charity, as if her thoughts had left him. "A lot could be done with it. And I do love to remodel an old place."

Price, relapsing into silence, studied her anew. A different Charity this—all business! Yet lovelier so than he had remembered her even. The semi-privacy of their table, the candle that furnished light just for them, gave an atmosphere of warmth and intimacy to which he reacted instinctively; in which indeed he seemed to expand physically.

"I like that hat!" he said suddenly—boyishly almost.

Charity's thoughts came back to him; she smiled.

"Thanks." And abruptly she added: "It was sweet of Mort to turn you over to me."

"He said something about heaping coals of fire on your head."

"He was my first husband," she explained, startling Price until second thought recalled to him what she meant. "He's really great—and so darn' attractive, too. I adored him. But he," she made a little grimace, "was taboo!"

"What do you mean by that?"

"His wife is just sweet! She stuck by him through all the lean years, raised his family for him and has reaped woman's inevitable reward—faded and worn out at forty-five! It isn't her fault and Mort has no right to philander. I told him so and left his office the same day."

PPRICE realized, suddenly, that Charity had quite unwittingly answered the very question he had asked himself.

"You sound as if there were rules to the game," he suggested.

"There are rules to every game, aren't there? Sam is fair quarry. Can you blame him for wandering? I give him sympathy and understanding."

The sentence flickered off suddenly, as she glanced at her wrist watch.

"I must run!" she exclaimed hastily. "But—can you come to my office tomorrow? At ten, say?"

So began that series of meetings which, exclusively business, eclipsed the subject of husband hunting. Even so their acquaintance progressed to that point at which Price, returning from a flying trip to Boston, felt justified in calling her up and suggesting tea again, without even offering business as his excuse. Charity accepted.

The February sky was lowering, dusk was settling as they came to the tea room that so resembled an English Inn.

The same little table, the same atmosphere of warmth and intimacy. Charity as he remembered her in the same little jersey frock—and the hat he liked.

"I really hadn't ought to do this," she remarked. "A specially important dinner tonight. Very stupid but it may mean a lot—business, you know."

A little sketch book, bound in beautifully tooled leather which she always carried, lay on the table beside the service. Tea finished, half absently he reached over and captured this.

"May I?" he asked tardily.

The clear rose-pink that flushed her surprised him; he had never before seen Charity blush. For an instant he really believed, incredible as it seemed, that she was going to snatch the book away from him. Instead:

"Let me have it a minute, please," she asked. "There's something I want to show you."

Price, puzzled, nevertheless obeyed. So, presently, he found himself studying a caricature of himself.

VERY good," he conceded. "And the tombstones in the background are, I suppose, the graves of my ancestors?"

"Do you ever get very far away from them?" she demanded.

Price, letting the book close, returned it to her.

"How well you know me!" he remarked.

"The study of womankind is man," she paraphrased flipantly. "I'm sorry to have to eat and flee but I must!"

So they emerged to find that the single snowflake they had observed before entering the Inn, had been the forerunner of a healthy young blizzard. Charity, turning north and falling into her swift free stride, drew a deep breath.

"This is glorious!" she exulted. "Do you know what I'd like to do? I'd like to duck that dinner and just ride and ride through a storm like this. In a roadster, with the snow stinging my eyes and face."

"You'd catch your death of cold probably!"

"That's the first time I've heard that phrase since I left Boston. You sound exactly like my Aunt Elizabeth."

They had reached the apartment hotel in which she lived.

"Even if you want to come up, you can't," she said. "I've got to bathe and dress and every second counts."

Nevertheless, when she reached her own rooms, she seemed to forget her need of hurry. Instead she stood, for an appreciable interval, at the window overlooking the square. Presently a tiny clock on the desk tinkled the hour.

"Egypt's Queen!" she murmured, aghast. "I'm crazy! I better get me another husband." In her bath, however, she again fell into a reverie, studying first her pink toes and then her ankles, as if in contemplation of them she might find an answer to something that perplexed her.

The telephone buzzed; startled out of her absorption she hesitated briefly. Then sprang forth snatching at her peignoir.

"I've got a car," announced an imperturbable voice over the phone. "Will you be ready in fifteen minutes?"

"You—you've got a car?" she echoed incredulously.

"A roadster," he affirmed.

"I'll be ready in exactly fifteen minutes," she told him.

This promise she kept faithfully. The roadster, parked at the

C. Charity, letting her evening wrap slip from her shoulders, turned to Price: "Well," she demanded, "have you got me all nicely indexed and card-catalogued now?"

curb as they emerged, suggested limitless power, ready for the task at hand.

The magnitude of this Charity began to appreciate before they were clear of the city. Fifth Avenue was a maze of slowly moving, slipping, skidding, struggling motors. The busses loomed up over them, titans fighting their way through the storm. Traffic policemen, looking like snowmen, blew whistles, lights flashed red and green when they were not wholly obliterated. The snow obscured headlights and flung itself against the windshield, which Price finally thrust open.

"Sorry, but it can't be helped," he murmured. "You dressed warmly, of course——"

"Got your rubbers on?" mocked Charity. Then, snuggling down into the robes he had wrapped her in she added, "I'm comfy—don't worry about me."

A white magic wove its spell over the familiar. She surrendered herself to this. The drive, Grant's Tomb—snowflakes hurling themselves at the headlights—Yonkers, lighted shop windows, seen as through a feathery curtain, pedestrians looking like ghosts—Tarrytown, with its fine estates all but obscured.

"Like it?" he asked, breaking a long silence.

"Love it!" she assured him. "Don't you?"

"MY AUNT ELIZABETH—I had one too—used to say 'you love your mother and like your food,'" he retorted, whimsically. "And yet I think I—do love it!" he confessed.

"I think," she commented with a flash of her more familiar manner, "that for a Bostonian born and bred, with Mayflower ancestors to boot, you do very well!"

The motor choked, gasped and stopped short. He looked at her—and she smiled.

"No gas, probably," she jeered. "And you a Bostonian."

He sat a moment, considering, and then slid out from behind the wheel. She remained where she was, utterly content, wholly unconcerned, as he disappeared toward the rear deck.

"A leak in the tank—empty!" he told her. "I wonder——"

"How far we are from a garage!" she interpolated. "That's what you are going to say, isn't it?"

"I can walk on a bit, but I don't like to leave you here alone——"

"In the midst of all this traffic? Don't worry——" she stopped short and glanced at him. "Did you see it, too?" she demanded incredulously, "or am I dreaming——"

"I saw it," he said.

The mirage, it seemed like one, was repeated. Through the storm they saw what appeared to be lighted windows, scarce a hundred yards ahead, and then again, utter blackness.

"Why, it's positively uncanny!" she gasped.

"I'm going to investigate nevertheless."

"So am I," she announced, and slipped out of the robes.

As she stepped forth he glimpsed, in the glow of the dashboard lamp, the sheer length of silk, terminating in an absurd satin slipper.

"You stay where you are!" he commanded, swiftly. "You can't——"

"Just watch me!" she suggested and slipped by him.

He captured her, within twenty yards.

"Are you mad?" he demanded, sharply.

"If you mean out of my head—no!" she retorted, flippantly.

"But I am damn' mad at my skirts. If it hadn't been for them you'd never caught me."

THEY stood within the subdued radiance of the searchlight, her face upturned toward him was rosy and so very lovely that—but he caught himself.

"Will you go back to the car?" he demanded.

"No!" she flashed.

"Very well!" he said grimly. The next thing she knew he was carrying her.

"Put me down, please!" she demanded with a flash of anger.

"On the front steps if they aren't a mirage, too," he promised.

They were solid enough and so was the house, with its lights now on, now off. Then suddenly forgetting her righteous wrath, Charity laughed.

"Stupid!" said she. "I ought to have realized that the storm is doing something to the wires. It's affected the lights and they won't burn steadily."

"But why doesn't somebody answer?" he asked, and rang again with an insistent pressure.

They waited, but there was no response. Price turned to her.

"You're becoming wetter every moment," he said. "I'm going to get in somehow—wait here, please."

This time she obeyed. The snow had drenched her absurd slippers: she shivered and snuggled down into the fur collar of her wrap. Then, startling her, the front door opened.

"Come in," suggested Price, "and make yourself right at home. The lights seem to have gone for good. But there must be a candle or a lamp somewhere."

THE match he struck illumined the little hall, and they both turned toward what was obviously the living-room. There, on the mantel, he discovered twin candles in brass candlesticks and these he lighted.

"The lady of the house will murder you," prophesied Charity, cheerfully. "Those candles look to me like wedding presents—all dolled up—and obviously intended to be ornamental rather than useful."

Price grinned. "Needs must when the devil drives." And then, his voice quickening. "What luck—a fire all laid in the grate!"

As he knelt to kindle this, Charity let her eyes traverse the room. To her practiced eyes it represented a definite attempt at charm, without quite achieving it. Perhaps because it was so obviously new and yet untried.

"And that's that," announced Price, rising and looking down at the slapping blaze with the conscious glow of pride that every human seems to feel at this achievement. "Won't you take off your things and stay a while?"

Charity instantly slipped out of her wrap . . .

"Great Caesar's ghost!" he exclaimed, incredulous of eye—she was in the same black décolleté that she had worn the first night—"do you call that something warm?"

"I call it a feminine retort to masculine fuddy-ism!"

Price drew a chair up to the hearth. "Sit down!" he commanded.

"My lord and master, your humble servant obeys!" mocked Charity.

"I'll see if I can find something for you to change to," Price announced, and taking one of the candles departed upstairs.

When he returned, bearing woolen stockings and brown mules, she sat with her rosy toes nonchalantly stretched out toward the fire.

As she took the things, he bent toward her. The pressure of his lips on hers took her utterly by surprise. She struggled to her feet, breathing hard, and then surrendered to an irresistible impulse. But he caught her wrist and laughed at her.

"False move!" he mocked. "You should have laughed, not struck."

This was true and she knew it. Tears, which she scorned threatened to complete her rout. She turned and snatched at her wrap.

"I shan't stay here another instant!" she flashed.

"I AM VERY much afraid that you are going to stay here all night!" he told her coolly.

"I thought," she flamed,—“that you were a gentleman."

"You belong back in the dark ages—with Mrs. Sam," he assured her. "If women choose to play the game with new rules, why shouldn't men?"

"I—I hate you!"

"That's bully good news!" he replied, with undiminished cheerfulness. "Eleven o'clock. Gosh, aren't you most famished?"

"I couldn't eat a mouthful."

"I could—several," he said and, taking one of the candles wandered off toward the kitchen.

Left alone, Charity hastily struggled into dry stockings and thrust her feet into the mules. Then she rose. She might slip out yet, while he was busy at the ice chest. But suppose she did?

A note, scrawled in pencil and pinned to the lampshade, attracted her eyes; she began to read automatically, without realizing she was doing so:

"Dear Children:

Welcome home again. I've left everything in readiness. I must run now to get father's supper. Anyway, I know that your first night in your own home——" [Continued on page 143] same; hence the number of gullible doctors will do likewise. What we will attempt to do in this series will be to place ourselves in the attitude of the intelligent doctor, who is scornful of crazes, adamant against fads, but hospitable to advances of genuine merit.

It is a curious and interesting fact that one of the most feared and loathsome of human afflictions is at the same time one of the few diseases which up to now have been definitely influenced by drugs. The disease in question is known as syphilis. It is only very recently that this word has been able to appear in print, outside of medical journals, and textbooks, so great is the loathing of mankind toward the disease and toward those who suffer from it, and so great the secrecy surrounding its discussion.

The first really authentic record of this plague among civilized people is that of 1494, when it appeared in epidemic form, first in Spain, then in Italy, next in France, and so all over Europe. It was carried from place to place, largely by invading armies. Its venereal nature was soon recognized, and opprobrium and loathing began to be associated with it at once. No nation wanted to own it. So the French spoke of it as the "Neapolitan Sickness" and the Italians referred to it as the "French Disease," and so on.

Strangely enough, a drug was found to combat it very soon after it had spread over Europe. Old records tell us of one

MANY intelligent doctors become disgusted with the confusion and lack of common sense that exist in the field of the treatment of disease. They observe their fellow physicians chasing after this fad or that, enthusiastically indorsing a new treatment one day, and dropping it the next. Such men use drugs sparingly, and in many of their cases, not at all. They pin their faith on the power of the body to overcome many of its ills, and believe that the number of really valuable and necessary drugs may be counted on the fingers of both hands.

They are from Missouri in regard to new drugs and new methods of treatment. They require to be shown. Were all doctors of this skeptical turn of mind, the drug industry would collapse, the great confusion that exists at present would be cleared away, and the chances of real progress in the fundamental knowledge of the treatment of disease would be much improved. But such a condition would be Utopian, and there is not much hope that it will ever exist.

This is true, because there is no good evidence that the human trait of gullibility is decreasing, despite the great extension of education. The number of gullible people remains about the

Jacobus Carpensis, who in 1502 first used mercury in the treatment of the Neapolitan Sickness, "whose use was so successful that he presently became rich thereby."

The effect of the drug was so distinct and unmistakable that even the shaky and unscientific methods of folklore soon placed it in the small company of really valuable drugs. Mercury, however, has some serious disadvantages. It is a poison to the body as well as to the disease. So, because there was no carefully standardized dosage, many patients were poisoned and actually killed by doctors who were too eager to cure them. This caused the popularity of mercury to wax and to wane. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries German candidates for the doctor's degree were made to take oath that they would under no conditions prescribe mercury for their patients. Doctors who did so punishment by God, visited upon lewd and immoral persons. There was only one way, in early days, to tell to what extent mercury was of benefit. This was for doctors to give a long and careful course of treatment with the drug, until outward signs of the malady disappeared, and then to watch carefully for a recurrence of the disease or what is technically known as a "relapse."

If a person so unfortunate as to contract the disease, submitted himself to careful mercurial treatment, his symptoms might disappear, they might never return, and consequently he might be said to be cured by mercury.

On the other hand, some people who were never treated with mercury, had the same experience. That is to say, they contracted the plague, and then for some unexplainable reasons got better without any treatment, and remained hale and hearty till old age.

A New and Successful Treatment of Syphilis

By Fumigation and Inhalation

Spirocide is a carefully balanced combination of mercury, copper and vegetable matter, compressed into a mass weighing approximately 10 grams. This mass when ignited, burns slowly and requires 15 to 30 minutes for complete combustion.

Spirocide is the safest and most convenient form in which mercury can be administered.

Spirocide does not cause pain, and its use is attended by the least possible discomfort to the patient.

Spirocide can be administered in the office and the home; does not interfere with the patient's work or usual activities.

Spirocide is indicated in all stages of syphilis, primary, secondary and tertiary, and in all its complications or sequelae.

Interesting case reports, together with the names of medical men who are using Spirocide, will be sent to physicians on request.

were denounced as "poison mixers and murderers."

As years passed the amount of mercury which might be safely given was more and more accurately determined, so that now no physician is in danger of being clapped in prison for using the drug. For a long time, however, it was a serious question whether its effect on this dreadful disease was to cure, or only to improve its symptoms.

Till very recently, the cause of syphilis remained a mystery. It was considered by many people to be a

It is evident from this that it would be easy for "knockers" to maintain that mercury had no real effect on the disease. Such critics might say that it would be better to go to a soothsayer or witch doctor, or indulge in prayer to God, rather than run a chance of being poisoned by a dangerous drug.

In those days of ignorance of the cause of this sinister plague, the opponents of the use of mercury might have been put to flight by a simple method. That is to say, if doctors had kept careful records of the number of people who suffered relapse after good treatment with mercury, compared to the number who relapsed after prayer or witch-doctoring with no mercury, they might have had definite evidence of the merit of mercury. They could have assured themselves by comparing the records, that many more people got better by mercury, than spontaneously or by prayer.

But doctors do not like to keep statistics. They are usually too busy. They find it necessary to rush about at the beck and call of anguished patients. Unlike the engineer, they fear mathematics and even simple arithmetic. So they are forced to rely on their impressions and beliefs. And they are, therefore, constantly involved in discussions, arguments, strife, and turmoil both among themselves and with ignorant outsiders, who seek to belittle their praiseworthy efforts.

In 1905 an event occurred which has proved of capital importance in the fight of physicians against the "Great Pox," as syphilis used to be called. The mystery surrounding the disease was shattered by a German scientist named Schaudinn. This investigator showed that the malady was caused by a minute germ, so slender and delicate that it had escaped the search of hundreds of bacteriologists. The illustration on page 59 gives you an idea of the appearance of this dangerous beast.

Schaudinn named the organism "Spirocheta Pallida." He called it a "Spirocheta" because of its spiral form; "Pallida" because it was so difficult to stain with the dyes that are used to make such minute organisms visible.

A short time afterwards two French scientists named Metschnikoff and Roux were able to transfer the disease to higher apes. It is interesting to know just how they obtained these rare and expensive animals. One of them had received a prize for distinguished work in science. Instead of spending the money for a Rolls-Royce, or a better house, this investigator devoted it to the purchase of apes, and to experimenting on these animals.

With the possibility of studying this disease in the laboratory, our knowledge of the chances of curing it began to grow rapidly. The spirochete could be demonstrated in the syphilitic sores of the apes, as well as in those of humans. It was soon found that the germ rapidly disappeared when the animals were properly dosed with mercury and that a real cure could be effected.

But a serious obstacle remained to further knowledge. The symptoms of this disease have a curious way of disappearing. The patient, and even the doctor, may believe that a cure has occurred. Then suddenly the malady may return, with ravages more severe than those that occurred in the first attack. There was no way to determine whether a patient had really been cured or whether treatment had caused the spirochetes to retreat to some remote corner of the body, to rest, and at the first opportunity to resume their attack with redoubled vigor.

This obstacle to knowledge has been at least partially conquered by another German, named Wassermann. This investigator devised a blood test which gives quite a good indication of cure. The technic of the test is too complicated to describe in this place. But when it is properly performed, much can be learned from it in regard to the real condition of a patient who is well to all outward appearances.

IF THE test is pronounced "positive" by a competent man, the physician may be sure that his patient still harbors the germ of the disease, even though his skin be as clear as that of a baby, and even though he be perfectly well and able to go about his ordinary duties.

If, on the other hand, the test shows a negative result, repeatedly, over a period of years, it is fair to presume that a genuine cure has taken place.

Great steps forward in the conquest of this dreadful disease followed the scientific studies just described. It is thanks to the fact that the malady could be transmitted to animals that such advances were made.

While it had now been proved that mercury has a definitely injurious effect on the cause of this infection, it was clear that other curative agents should be looked for. This was evident for two reasons. First, the dose of mercury needed to destroy the infection is perilously near to the dose that seriously harms human beings. Second, many cases of this plague flourish obstinately, in spite of thorough treatment with this new drug. So, the German scientist, Ehrlich, set out on an adventure as stirring as any exploration. In brief, he began looking for a chemical compound, which would have a fatal effect on the germ of the Great Pox, but which would, at the same time, leave the patient unharmed.

In a remarkably short time after the beginning of his systematic search, Ehrlich found a substance which had a striking effect upon various diseases caused by spiral-shaped microbes.

EHRlich and his assistants did not work with substances which were ready-made. On the other hand, they called upon expert chemists to fashion new and complicated compounds. The chemists modified these substances in various ways, according to the advice of the master, Ehrlich, who tested the curative action of each one on experimental animals. Finally a drug was prepared that showed great promise of curative power against various diseases caused by spiral-shaped microbes. A small dose of this drug was able to cure rats, at one fell swoop, of relapsing fever.

Following this lead, Ehrlich turned his attention at once to syphilis, which by this time could be experimentally produced in rabbits. Again he was successful. In 1909 this drug, which Ehrlich called "606," was first tested on human beings suffering from this disease. The results were really magical. A patient on one day might be covered with a severe syphilitic rash. A dose of the new drug was given him, and presto! In twenty-four hours the rash had disappeared. The severe and loathsome sores and ulcers of the later stages of the disease vanished in an almost equally prompt manner.

High hopes at once arose of the possibility of stamping out completely this scourge of mankind. Ministers of the gospel and moralists generally entered upon grave discussions of the advisability of using this new miraculous substance. For, said they, people will be freed of the penalty of their sins, if venereal disease can be stamped out so easily.

The first high hopes were soon shattered. For it was found that while the outward sign of the malady quickly vanished before a single dose of the new drug, relapses were almost sure to occur, sooner or later. What is more, numbers of fatal accidents following injections began to be reported.

Ehrlich, another German scientist, in 1909 set out on a stirring adventure. He began looking for a chemical compound which would have a fatal effect on the germ of the Great Pox but which would leave the patient unharmed, and he found it in his famous "606."

Twelve years have gone by since the brilliant discovery of Ehrlich. The fires of the first enthusiasm have died down. The cries of the knockers and critics have largely been silenced. The drug has been modified into a new compound, called "914." Millions of injections have been given.

It is now known that, if a sufficient number of doses are given, there is far greater hope of cure than in the old days when mercury was the only weapon. Careful statistics have been compiled, especially by British physicians. These show that when a patient is well treated with "606" and mercury, his outlook for a healthy and useful life is bright.

YEARS must pass before it is really known whether this disease can be cured in the majority of cases. But it is surely a great triumph of science, and wonderful enough, that it can be so well controlled. It is most important from the viewpoint of public health, that a drug exists which is able rapidly to abolish the contagious stage of the disease, so that persons carefully treated are no longer a menace to their fellows.

Readers who delight in the art of muck-raking will begin to wonder at the purpose of the foregoing story. Expecting to read of the sinister activities of drug-mongers, they have met instead great praise of solid and brilliant achievements in the treatment of a most fearsome plague. It is easy to understand how quackery and piracy might exist in the treatment of a disease like cancer, which has till now baffled the attacks of scientists. But it is difficult to imagine how such exploitation could exist in the case of a malady like syphilis, which can be most strikingly benefited by certain drugs. It is a real fact that sculduggery exists even here, where there is not the faintest excuse for it. We will try to give you an idea of the sinister nature of the activities of certain drug manufacturers in this field.

There are a number of ways of giving mercury to unfortunates who suffer from the Great Pox. Compounds of this metal may be taken by mouth, they may be rubbed into the skin, they may be injected underneath the skin, or into the muscles, or even into the veins. The best opinion seems to hold that there is little to choose between these methods. Each has certain advantages. To each there are certain objections. But none of them stands out above the others in efficiency.

But wait! These careful statements of the highest authorities are given the lie by a group of public "benefactors" who call themselves "The Spiroicide Corporation." According to their advertisements in medical gazettes, the safest and most convenient way to take mercury is to inhale it.

Their appeal, they say, is to physicians only, and their conduct in regard to advertising is "ethical." But in reality their appeal extends far beyond the ranks of doctors. The methods of Spiroicide are irresistibly attractive to the most gullible and childish elements in humanity. They go cleverly after that side of our natures that loves to parade itself in the plumed fore-and-aft hat and the tin sword of mystic orders, that wishes to take part in the childish and imbecile activities of the Ku Klux; that hesitates to sail the seas in stateroom "94," because 9 plus 4 equals 13.

The administration of "Spiroicide" is not an example of sound treatment. It is essentially a rite, or a ceremony. Here are some of the directions, taken from one of the advertising booklets, sanctimoniously labeled "For Physicians Only," which show the flimsiness of its claims.

"Spiroicide is administered by means of fumigation and inhalation. The patient is disrobed to the waist and placed in a light chair, preferably with arms. A pastil or tablet of spiroicide is placed on a small plate, or other receptacle, after being ignited by holding in a gas or alcohol flame. . . . until it begins to smoulder. The plate with the burning spiroicide is then placed on the floor beneath the patient's feet or just under the chair. A small shelf or platform between the lower rounds of the chair is an excellent location for the plate containing the burning mass. When all is in position, a sheet should be thrown over the patient and arranged to enclose the whole. The patient should breathe naturally and inhale the vapor, which will rise and fill the canopy surrounding him. . . . The patient may complain at first of a slight choking sensation, and there may be some tendency to cough. This can be removed by raising the sheet long enough to let in a little clear air. The eyes should be closed or lightly bandaged to avoid smarting."

The picture on page 60 is a facsimile of a circular showing the "practical" use of spiroicide. The directions just quoted fairly reek of the nonsense put out by ancient quacksalvers and medicine men.

The minute directions in regard to the placing of the pot of healing incense, the order that the patient be stripped to the waist, the remark about the chair "preferably with arms," are gorgeous examples of the hocus-pocus in which the medieval brothers of the Rosy Cross loved to indulge.

Six repetitions of this sacred rite are urged, but "occasionally, depending on the severity of the disease, it may be wise to give nine treatments."

It is alleged:

"At the completion of this course of treatment with spiroicide all signs or evidences of syphilis are removed, and in ten days to three months all Wassermann tests are negative. Any further treatments than the original course of fumigations are rarely needed. These results have been obtained in cases in which Salvarsan (606) and kindred preparations have been employed without even the slightest benefit."

ASTOUNDING claims these! And such as would hardly be made after years of careful and prolonged treatment by the most improved methods.

But in spite of the very evident appeal to hocus-pocus, and the evidently exaggerated claims of merit, this mysterious new method gained a considerable vogue among doctors.

To claim special virtue for this method of giving mercury is no more or less fantastic than to advocate giving castor oil by means of a spray pump. And it would be just as idiotic to assert that the best way to give Epsom salts would be to cause the patient to dive headlong into a vat of the bitter dose. Let these two latter procedures be advertised with insistence and sonority and many doctors would solemnly recommend them in a short time.

This year the whole question of the virtue of inhaling mercury in the treatment of syphilis has been impartially studied by medical experts. They have shown conclusively that:

C. Here is our old friend, Swift's Specific, which used to claim to cure syphilis, and which traded upon the fear some sufferers have of the mercury treatment.

First—Not only is mercury inhalation not “the safest method,” but there is special danger of irritation of the lungs.

Second—The dosage is bound to be indefinite, causing the doctor to steer between inefficiency and danger.

Third—An improved method of mercury inhalation was applied to a series of patients with active syphilis—without therapeutic (curative) response.

The Spiroicide Corporation claims to be in possession of records which prove the superiority of its methods. The Council on Pharmacy and Chemistry submitted these records to two of the highest authorities in the land.

These men agreed that the evidence was completely insufficient to support the exaggerated claims of spiroicide. In several of the cases it was by no means proved that the patient had syphilis.

In twenty cases, the patients had also received “606.”

The advertisements of Spiroicide were still to be seen in the New York Medical Journal for March, 1922. In the same month the writer paid a friendly call upon the Spiroicide Corporation at its offices in New York City. He asked for records which might really prove the remarkable virtues of this new treatment.

His polite inquiries were met with profound suspicion and attempts at evasion by a representative of the company. He was told that advertising of Spiroicide had been withdrawn and sale stopped, pending “important experiments,” being conducted in Brooklyn on guinea pigs! (Guinea pigs, of all laboratory animals, are the very ones least suitable for syphilis experiment.)

Either the Spiroicide Corporation is a bit frightened at the wild nature of its claims, or it is preparing to announce still more astounding triumphs.

Detailed remarks are not in order. It is enough to say that, in spite of the existence of at least four superior ways of giving mercury, in spite of the availability of “606,” this ancient, mysterious, essentially foolish, possibly dangerous method is impudently extolled to the medical profession.

It is hard to explain why it does not rise as one man to exclude such arrant nonsense and lying claims from the mails and advertising pages of its journals.

Those of you who have followed the war against “patent medicines” will probably remember the fraudulent claims of the cure of syphilis that were formerly made for a nostrum called “Swift’s Sure Specific.” This great remedy was a concoction of harmless yarbs and simples. It had little effect upon the body, or its ailments. It was elevating to the soul because of its fifteen per cent content of hooch.

It claimed, in those days, to be a vegetable cure for the Great Pox. It traded upon the great fear that many sufferers from the disease have for treatment with mercury. For it is true that many patients have suffered abominably from overdosage with this drug, which is valuable only if properly used.

OF COURSE the claim of S. S. S. to be a vegetable cure was utter poppycock. Its beneficial effect, aside from that of its alcohol on the courage of the patient, was equal to that of so much water. Finally, scenting possible prosecution from certain powerful agencies, S. S. S. withdrew its quackish claims. Now it respectably and conservatively presents itself as beneficial to other ailments, having not the remotest connection with syphilis.

The commercial use of the drugs we are about to describe had its beginning in a hurried and regrettably thoughtless publication by a surgeon of very high standing. This doctor, eager to be abreast of the times, had heard of the brilliant success of “606,” which had just then been announced in Germany.

The new miraculous drug was not yet obtainable in America. The doctor was no scientist, and knew only that “606” was an organic compound of arsenic. He reasoned that if one organic compound of arsenic was beneficial for syphilis, any other one would have the same effect. He did not stop to realize that drugs display a most remarkably specific effect upon the parasites that plague us. He failed to remember that Ehrlich had tested hundreds of compounds of arsenic, closely related to “606,” before finding one that had a curative effect.

Having blundered thus in his reasoning, he cast about for a ready-made compound of arsenic. He found it in a substance which was comparatively cheap, and rather harmless to the body. It was known as Sodium Cacodylate.

He tried this drug upon three patients with active syphilis, found them to improve, published his results in the Journal of the American Medical Association and advised that all doctors try this new remedy. Not a semblance of animal experiment, mind you!

But such tests came quickly on the heels of the great doctor’s so-called discovery. They proved that, in the syphilis of rabbits, cacodylate had absolutely no curative effect.

Then followed a careful study of the treatment of this dread disease in humans, with cacodylate. Again, the report that the drug was practically useless. What is more, large doses were found to be dangerous to the health of the patient.

In spite of these proofs of its uselessness, certain drug-mongers began at once to advertise sodium cacodylate as a new wonderful treatment for the Great Pox.

The “Intravenous Products Company” produced a form of it which they dubbed “Venarsen.” This name is a deliberate attempt at imitation of the trade name of “606,” which is “Salvarsan.” These gentlemen asserted their product was “less poisonous than other known arsenic compounds, and that it had greater effect upon the spirochete” (the germ which causes syphilis).

CALLLED upon to present real evidence of these claims, the manufacturers failed to do so. Probably such testimonials are in their possession. At any rate, the writer wishes to add one presented by an honest and reputable physician of Kansas City.

June 8, 1917.

The Intravenous Products Co.,
Denver, Colo.

Gentlemen:

In reply to your circular letter under date of June 3, may I say that after using a great quantity of Venarsen both in clinical and private cases, I can see no more effect upon these cases than if so much water had been administered.*

This is also the report of Dr. _____ pathologist of the _____ Hospital, University of _____.

In our experiments all bloods were tested before and after administration of this product.

_____, M. D.
Kansas City, Mo.

*Italics are ours.

This testimonial is added, because the Intravenous Products Company may, by accident, fail to include it in their advertising material.

This compound, now named “Solution of Arsenic and Mercury,” is offered to doctors by the New York Intravenous Laboratory. These gentlemen are seeking with more or less success, to propagate the faddish and often dangerous notion that the majority of drugs should be injected directly into the blood stream.

They announce in regard to their “Solution of Arsenic and Mercury”:

“This methyl compound of arsenic (sodium cacodylate) has come into almost universal use for syphilis. . . . It has been demonstrated beyond a doubt that cacodylate of soda proves an effective remedy for syphilis. . . .”

These statements contain at least two lies. Cacodylate has not “come into almost universal use in the treatment of syphilis” and there is not a shred of decent evidence that “its usefulness has been demonstrated beyond a doubt.”

How do these drug-mongers differ from the low peddlers of S. S. S.? Only in that they make dupes of doctors, while S. S. S. sought to dupe the public.

If there were no really effective remedy for this terrible disease, there might be some excuse for the trial of questionable drugs. But this is not the case. The medical profession has powerful weapons for the control and probable cure of syphilis. These weapons are “606,” “914,” and mercury.

It has been demonstrated that cacodylate is practically inert against this disease, yet the drug-mongers in question seek to substitute it for drugs of proved value.

“606” combined with mercury rapidly destroys the contagious stage of syphilis. This treatment consequently removes great sources of danger to the public health. For every person suffering from syphilis in an active form is a possible source of infection to his fellow men. The advertisement and sale of inert drugs like “cacodylate,” when really valuable ones are at hand, is hardly less than criminal.

The indifference of many physicians, who are constantly bombarded by these false claims, is a blot on a generally honorable profession.

LÉON RÉNAUD was bearing his vicarious honors with a Gallic sense of appropriate dramatic importance. As he entered the Café des Ruines at Ily-sur-Flère on the eve of the day set for the climax, the assembled company of café loafers dawdling over their liqueurs or their cylindrical glasses of sweet, thin beer, noted that already he was arrayed in his frock coat of ceremony. Fanlike from his buttonhole ran in brilliant little slashes the ribbons of the War Cross, the Military Medal, the Verdun Medal, the medal of the Great War.

“Ah! It is tonight your son comes, then, Rénaud?” spoke Dufresne from the monentary silence over the card game in the corner. Dufresne was of a jealous nature; it was just his way to mar triumph by a remark so subtly offensive that one could not take it up. Léon Rénaud’s manner grew if anything more stiff and formal as he answered:

“No, tomorrow as all the world knows.” Without further ado

he wheeled, military-fashion, and seated himself at the side-table with the cracked marble top across from the one-armed Eclogue. His manner suggested that the glory of his race and tribe was not going to make him forget old friends—that, quite democratically, he proposed to continue his invariable practice of playing his evening game of dominoes with Eclogue, comrade of the whole Great War and especially of the Twenty-first of February—the immortal Territorial Defense at Verdun.

That dignity of Léon, that faint suggestion of condescending eminence, had for a week been growing on him as successive arrivals of the Parisian newspapers brightened the glory. The first dim hint came in the weekly letter from Virgile himself. His regiment of the new class was at Verdun training. All Verdun, military and civilian, was tuning up for the great event which was to put the capstone on her innumerable glories—the selection from her shell-winnowed fields of that unknown soldier whose body, representing the poilus of France, should lie forever under the Arc de Triomphe. "We hear that a squad of les nouveaux is to make the selection," wrote Virgile. "Lucky monkeys! They probably will get leave afterwards." Then, one morning not a week later, Madame Gemier, town gossip, came in advance of the Parisian newspapers to bring the great tidings which she had learned at the Mairie—Virgile had been in the squad. There, when the newspapers arrived, was the name on the front page of the Matin—Virgile Rénaud,—Infantry, Ily-sur-Flère, Pas-de-Calais.

Followed a week of pleasantly exciting events, each of which increased by its quarter of an inch the chest measure of Léon Rénaud, raised by a degree his sagging shoulders toward their old military perpendicular. The squad of nouveaux who had selected the coffin of the unknown was to march in the parade when the body was interred under the Arch of Triumph. Virgile was to share honors for the day with the President of the Republic and the Great Marshal. Then the editor of the Pas-de-Calais Télégramme came all the way over from Boulogne to interview the father of this hero, bore away, after many pledges of its safety, his one photograph taken during the war—the gift of an American correspondent who had made this snapshot while Léon was in hospital back of Dugny, recovering from his Verdun wound. And Monsieur the editor brought confirmation of news already broken in a postcard from Virgile—that when all was over, he was going to have a week's leave at home.

Q. "We stand before the six coffins. They are covered with tricolor. The tricolor on the coffin to my right begins to lift. On both corners of the coffin are hammer marks like a letter T."

There was evidently some mysterious connection between the Télégramme and the Parisian press, for two days later, the snapshot was on the front page of the Paris Journal beside a photograph of young Virgile in his uniform. That, and an account of Léon's own military record—how he, a man of forty-one with three children, had gone to war with the Territorials in 1914, how the German lines had come up to the very gates of Ily-sur-Flère, driving his family as refugees to Bordeaux; how Léon's regiment of grizzled old men had formed itself in the trenches before Verdun on the day when the great German attack burst out of a clear sky; how they had held even to extinction.

FAITH, YES! It was fit, thought Léon; and his glorified imagination carried him to reflections which he confided only to Eclogue. Madame Rénaud, to whom he dutifully confided most things, and who herself now lived in a state of glorified excitement, was only a woman after all. She had not seen him through fear and triumph over fear, through misery and unnatural hysterical happiness, through starvation and freezing and vermin and unbearable pain, through all the shadows of death, as had that cynical, chary, quiet, but generous-hearted chum of his, save himself the only survivor of a squad of six Territorials that had marched in their old-fashioned red kepis and trousers from Ily a thousand soul-years ago.

"Eh, but perhaps it was one of ours that has been chosen," said Léon to Eclogue.

"And which?" he continued, letting imagination become certainty, "which would it be—Dubuque or Cordier or my lieutenant, perhaps?"

"It does one no harm to dream," said Eclogue, "except the disappointment at waking. And one will not wake from this dream. For who will know? Pick your man, and believe it!"

Léon played his double-six almost savagely. In some things, even Eclogue could not have perfect sympathy. For a minute, there was no sound between them except the click of the dominoes. But there were other sounds, all whipping up the tiny annoyance within him. From the table in the corner where Dufresne sat, came a faint snicker. Someone had passed an invidious joke. Turning his eyes he could see that the head of Madame, bowed on her hands, was shaking.

"One stifles in this atmosphere!" growled Léon to Eclogue; then he snapped a word to Madame which brought her up straight trying to hide the confusion in her face under a deferential smile.

"Is it that your back room is vacant tonight?" asked Léon.

"But yes—" began Madame.

"We go there!" said Léon decisively, sweeping the dominoes into the box. Before Madame could rise to precede them, he had pushed into the narrow back entryway, knocked together of boards from a dozen abandoned trenches, had shoved with determination through a portière-like door of gunny-sacking, had switched on the electric light, had seated himself. All these movements Eclogue followed.

"One stifles," he repeated. "One wishes to be alone. Is it that this camel of a Dufresne defended Verdun? Is it that he has a son honored by France?" His voice rose and stopped as though he were controlling much. And when Léon spoke again, his irritation was gone and only glory remained—that and old memories, regretful but how tender:

"Dubuque or Cordier or Thiollère or my lieutenant!" he said. And now, plainly, speculation had grown in his mind to a certainty.

HERE ECLOGUE flashed a quick, "But one never can know—the law of chances, my boy!" The smoldering fire of his musings went out of Léon Rénaud's eyes. He shook his head and, "But yes—one never can know," he admitted as he settled himself back to the game. When he spoke again, Virgile, it appeared, was uppermost in his mind. "A mischievous boy—a little blagueur—but always dutiful in the end."

Suddenly a clamor arose in the café without—a shuffling of feet, joyous voices. Léon stiffened up, a domino poised in air. The clamor increased, it was coming their way; it was pierced by a word which brought Léon tumbling to his feet—Virgile! The burlap door opened, was dropped; it left standing full in the electric light a lithe, straight boy all in neat, tight horizon-blue, his cap tilted rakishly over his ear. Slim and only of middle height, he was stalwart, nevertheless. His hair and complexion were of the ruddy, Frankish blond wherewith the North has touched France, but his large eyes were dark; and they twinkled and glittered now as if many electric cross-currents of emotion were meeting and shooting sparks. Some roguish impulse seemed to conquer; for before Léon Rénaud rose and gathered him in a paternal French embrace, he had drawn himself up with a salute so flourishing that it was almost mocking. And as his father released him, held him off by the shoulders at arm's length, his eyes danced. Eclogue had risen, was sliding out of the room. In an aside almost impatient, Léon called him back.

"They out there are superfluous," he said; "you—never!" Now he addressed Virgile, still holding him by the shoulders at arm's length. "And why are you here so soon? And have you seen your mother?"

C, "Armand hears her from the road at night—he is watching the house. He rushes and pounds upon the door."

1. "Rose-Émilie, he discovers, leaves her room at night to meet this young Armand Croque. Magniac shuts her up. She weeps."

"My leave was to begin tonight," replied Virgile; "but my travel orders and ticket came this morning. The system of the French army—it is astonishing, wonderful to behold!"

"Now I know he is a son to one of ours," put in Eclogue. "A true poilu. He objects. He finds fault."

"And as for my mother," interrupted Virgile. "Do I not, my captain, know my duty? Have I not reported to the sergeant? Ma foi, it rained women at once! She was for sending for you, but I dragged myself away from the tea-party to you!" Something new was in this son of his, Léon meditated through all his grateful sense of personal flattery. Six months ago, when Virgile marched away with the colors, he would have cut off his right hand rather than display his affections on the surface; now—it was as though he had suddenly grown up and, man-fashion, was willing to face everything, even his own emotions.

"We old veterans have things to talk over which the women would never understand!" he continued; and Léon felt in that assumption of equality something curiously thrilling. It seemed to put the capstone onto the structure of rapturous pride which life had been building up in him during the last fortnight. The glow lasted while he summoned Madame, ordered apéritives all around, while they lighted black cigarettes and settled back to a talk which consisted mostly in flashes from Virgile, in promptings from the others: how the Great Marshal looked—the mustache of the President of the Republic—the girls of Paris. Once, Eclogue with his own crackling directness, once Léon with his emotional rhetoric, tried to draw him to the heart of the reminiscences—the scene in the citadel of Verdun when the squad of young soldiers picked the body of the unknown. Both times, Virgile seemed to shy from this point; he shifted abruptly to sprightly accounts of Paris in the solemnity of the state funeral, in the rebound of gaiety afterwards. When Léon again drew near the subject, he half consciously noted a curious thing. He had a sense that this heart of the subject embarrassed Virgile. The nearer he approached it, the more some curtain of reserve seemed to blind the sparkle of his son's eyes. Yet this sense was not strong enough to inhibit Léon's rush of speculation.

"Ah!" he said. "Ours fought before Verdun. We left there sixty-eight unknown dead, for the boche took no prisoners from among us—not after what we had done to them! And if it were one of ours—how fitting with you in the squad! And why not?" Léon continued, his voice now a little squeezed with awe: "Why not? Do not our dead live? Did they not lead us on in the year of victory? Were they not present in glorious legions that day?" His voice stopped. "Tell me, my son," he asked almost pleadingly. "Was there any sign—any proof—of where they found him—who he was?"

THE FATHER was holding the son's eyes in the clutch of his own direct, burning gaze. And the thing which followed was tiny but momentous. Virgile's eyes grew leaden, dropped. A flush began at his throat, ran upward across his fair skin to the roots of his hair. It brought a flash of memory to Léon; and behind memory trailed certainty. Once, five years ago, home on leave with his refugee family, he had found Virgile accused of poaching—snaring pheasants from the estate of the Comte d'Alois which bordered the refugee camp. It was the gamekeeper who brought the charge—privately. He did not wish to brand the son of a poilu at the front, he said. And he presented a piece of incontrovertible evidence—Virgile's cap, the name inked on the lining. One of the poachers had lost it in running away. Virgile was only fifteen then; an age when a boy has not yet come to his honor. He denied it all. "Then what of this?" asked Léon, and showed the cap. Over the boy's eyes had fallen the same curtain, over his complexion had risen the same flush. Touched, touched—it was true, then.

And now, Virgile was a man and a soldier. He had been taught to look his superiors in the eye, to tell the truth.

"There was a sign!" said Léon hoarsely. "You know, my boy—you know!"

Now, Virgile's eyes met his father's steadily. There was assent in them, and also pleading. Then they turned uneasily upon Eclogue. The father's mind was flashing, making instantaneously mental contacts, grasping unspoken expression as French minds will. And he answered:

"There is nothing you can tell me that you cannot tell my comrade Eclogue. The honor of the French army is safe with him as with me."

Virgile dropped his eyes; his hand went into his blouse, loosed a button, fumbled in some inner recess. He drew forth an object, tossed it onto the table, where it fell with a metallic clank.

"If one could identify the owner of that!" he said with a kind of forced gaiety. Léon's hand went out. Eclogue was on his feet; before he controlled his impulse, he had almost snatched the object from Léon! Head by head they inspected it. The thing, at first glance only a rough bit of flat, corroded metal, resolved itself into a rough but amusing caricature of a dog with forward-cocked ears, a bobbed tail, long legs and an exaggerated abdomen—one of those crude bits of craftsmanship in the aluminum from exploded shells with which the French army used to relieve the boredom of long watches in the trenches. On its side, in irregular, corroded letters, was scratched the word, "Toto."

Virgile, regarding them with a look half astonishment and half apprehension in his blue eyes, saw in his father's face a change which opened his own gates of memory. Long ago, when he himself was a very little boy, his mother had fallen in a sudden faint. And over his father's face had come that same green tinge—a wave which began at his throat, lost itself in his beard, reappeared on his cheeks, seemed to lose itself again in his stubbly, black hair. Eclogue's fair complexion had gone suddenly as white as paper. And out of his throat squeezed the one word, "Croque!" And Léon repeated it: "Croque!"

"Mon Dieu!" said Virgile, in a last attempt to appear jaunty.

And then the voice of Léon Renaud rang with command. It held not only the authority of a French parent, but also the bark of a military order, so that the shoulders of Virgile stiffened, as though by habit he were about to rise and stand at salute.

"Tell me—where did you get this—on the honor of the army!"

Léon kept his seat, but his torso had risen until he seemed to tower. Eclogue remained standing, his one hand resting on the table as he leaned forward; his eye, usually so dull, had grown bright and moist. The touch of jauntiness left Virgile.

"If Georges hadn't been drunk—" he faltered.

"From the beginning—the beginning!" thundered Léon.

"Georges, then, is of the graves service," said Virgile, with his eyes on the table. "A croaking crow he is—but amusing. Very well. It is the night before the ceremony in the citadel. All the world knows that a squad of nouveaux will choose the body. No one knows who—that is the secret of the army. Verdun is excited. I have that evening town leave. I visit Marie's. It is almost deserted. But Georges sits in the corner, and I see that he is fuddled. He is cynical when he drinks, and mysterious, but all the more amusing for that.

"I sit down with him. He hints, hints that he knows something important about the ceremony. He asks who will select the coffin tomorrow in the citadel. I answer that no one knows. He is depressed. He grows more drunken. At last he lays this down—this metal thing.

"It was on one of them," he says. "I put him in the lead casket today. Orders were to select no body with any mark of identification. I pretended to search this body. Affixed was this"—Virgile paused in his narration to indicate the bit of aluminum twirling between the nervous fingers of his father—"and I palmed it. And I did more." It is long before I learn what more he did. He tells at last. He put that body in the casket. He nailed it in. And on each corner of the lead cover he made two dents of a hammer. Like this!"

VIRGILE'S voice stopped and a gasp from his hearers broke the silence as he traced in the lees of the table-top the form of a letter "T." "If that body is picked this is a souvenir, n'est-ce pas? Georges is drunk. He exaggerates its value. He thinks he can sell it for a million francs. He offers to divide if I will get that coffin picked. I laugh at him. I tell him he is more likely to get six months in the box than a million francs. I advise him to go to barracks. I get him up, help him in, make him walk straight when he passes the sentry. And I continue to frighten him. I do not believe his story is true—then. But even if it is not true, he is preparing trouble for himself.

"Next morning at assembly, I am called out of line. I report before the caserne. I find five others waiting. Then I know. I am one of the chosen. We are marched to the citadel. There are ceremonies. I do not know what happens, for I have remembered Georges, and I am apprehensive. If he knows—the blabber—that I am in the squad, he will tell of our talk and I too am in trouble. We stand before the six coffins now, for the Marshal is making his speech. They are covered with the tricolor. We are far in the interior of the citadel where there is no air. But there are ventilators, and the wind of them is blowing abominably against my legs. It blows harder. The tricolor at the coffin to my right begins to lift, lift. No one seems to observe but me. I regard the Marshal. He is still speaking. All are looking at him. I am safe to turn my eyes. I look. The tricolor has folded itself back. And on both corners of that coffin are hammer marks like a letter T.

"A big vegetable of the staff sees this now. He replaces the tricolor. And then—we are ordered to count sixes. I wait. And the captain commanding says, 'Number four, choose!' And I am number four—"

"And you choose—it?" demanded Léon huskily. Virgile nodded, slowly, solemnly. His eyes dropped in shame from his father's direct eagle-gaze. "I am human," he muttered; "it was as though my hand touched it in spite of myself—" He looked up defiantly.

But his father was not regarding him. Léon Rénaud and the one-armed Eclogue were gazing tensely into each other's eyes. Then a spurt of his native chariness seemed to pierce the bewildered mind of Eclogue. For the first time, he spoke:

"And this pig of a Georges—and the token here?" The manner of Virgile began to grow sprightly again. He even forced a laugh, as he said:

"I arranged all that. I hunted him up before we were marched out of Verdun. He is again tipsy. He knows I am of the squad. He does not know it was I who made the choice. I have a hard time making him keep quiet in public. When I have him alone—I lie for the honor of the army. I say the lead coffins were sealed in wooden boxes and covered with the tricolor. I say there were fifty coffins—I have seen them outside—from which these six were selected before we marched in. He is depressed, for he is getting very drunk. He weeps because yesterday he thought he had a million francs—and now he cannot even pay Marie. He draws out the token. He starts to throw it into the river. I catch his arm, for I see my chance. 'Here,' I say, 'give me your pretty toy. I will pay your bill at Marie's.' I give him twenty francs and when I have Toto in my pocket, I frighten him from talking any more. I tell him that one of ours has been reported for court-martial just because he guessed at whose body it might be. And I leave him at Marie's. That is all!" he concluded, and looked at his father again with the defiant gaze of a little boy waiting punishment. And then, as his eye fell on the token, he too turned pale. An idea almost too strange and bizarre to be entertained seemed to have entered his mind.

"You know—you recognize—this thing?" he gasped.

Léon rose to his feet.

"Stand!" he commanded. "You, too, Eclogue! Repeat this after me: I swear on the honor of the French army and of the Republic never to repeat this story. I swear never to mention what I know to a living man or woman. If I do—" Léon paused as though considering what curse might be strong enough—"if I do, may the boche return and blast France!" The others repeated the oath after him, phrase by phrase. And then, almost pleadingly, Virgile asked again:

"Do you know who—what?"

At this, the floodgates of reserve seemed to break in both Léon and Eclogue. Strophe and antistrophe, they poured scattered fact, imprecation, expletive.

"Croque—Armand Vignaux—"

"Apache—kit-stealer—the disgrace of ours—"

"He had his military training here—went to Paris—was brought back to serve with ours in the war—the police knew him in Paris—"

"But that—that—" faltered Virgile, pointing to the token. Eclogue, the calmer of the two elders, responded:

"He hammered it out in '15 when we were in the Arras trenches—from a boche shell-band. The thing is unmistakable. It was his mascot. He used to talk to it—he was an amusing pig, that!"

Léon turned on him and shot a glance of reproach on one who would make sport of the shame of France. And again Eclogue understood.

"And why not?" he said. "The angels in heaven are laughing at the fool France made of herself. Croque! The Legion of Honor on his coffin! The Great Marshal saluting him! Resting under the Arc de Triomphe!"

As though imitating the angels Eclogue burst into mirthless laughter. They continued to review the military and moral delinquencies of Croque the Apache—the time he tried to desert, the time he was caught robbing kits and Cordier all but killed him, his orgies at the rear. Yet finally? Eclogue seemed to recover some of his chary sense of fairness—or perhaps it was only his contrariness—and spoke the first kind word for Croque.

HE HAD his good impulses, nevertheless," said Eclogue.

"His impulses—but yes!" snorted Léon. "His impulses! We bury under the Arch a bad soldier, an Apache—with impulses!"

Yet the rage and scorn in Léon's voice died down a little as he finished the words. It was as though he were looking for some escape from the ironical trick which Fate had played on France.

"Children loved him, for example," he muttered, half to himself, "and he was always playing with them when he was en repos. That was a curious fancy of his—that. He thought the war ought to be fought by the unmarried men—we and the boche ought to agree to that."

"Some of his blague," said Eclogue, by instinct shifting to opposition.

The romantic French spirit was surging back into Léon; he, who a moment before had been bowed with the secret shame of France, found himself now defending Croque.

"But no," he said, "he was sincere, my boy—as I know. You remember those three days in the shellholes with the trenches gone? Bien! It was Croque who lay beside me. He was to my right. I heard his admirable language all night. And the boche thought they had something over to his right, and kept dropping marmites on a piece of vacant ground. We talk now and then. I speak of Virgile here and the little sister. Those marmites were near him, so they fountained above him. But me—twice fragments tore the rim of my hole. And Croque said, after the second: 'Here, go back to your brats. I am only a bachelor. Who cares?' He tried to crawl into my hole. I had to push him back."

Eclogue gave an uneasy turn in his chair. A side of his wrinkled forehead folded into a frown.

"Tell me more of Croque," he said. "I went to work on the wharf of Boulogne after I finished my service. I never saw him again until we were mobilized. What drew him to Paris?"

"Ah, didn't you know?" asked Léon and continued.

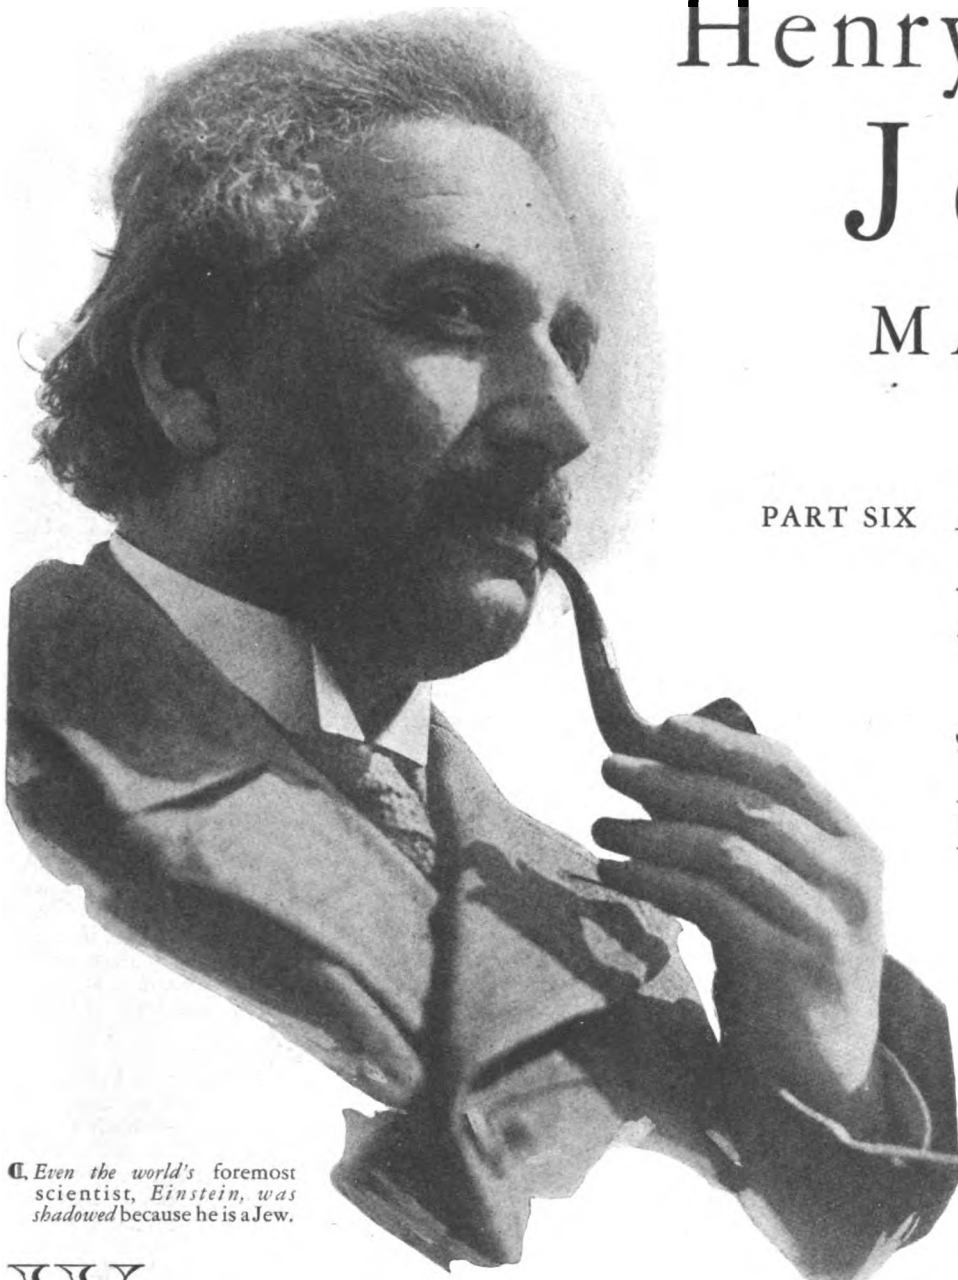

"But I forget—it was a secret. Myself, I knew only by chance. I can tell, I suppose, for they are all dead. Magniac who had the creamery at Coin-Ste-Marie—you remember Magniac. No? He came to Ily but seldom. He was (Continued on page 112)

PART SIX Forcing Dealers to Spread the Poison

Even the world's foremost scientist, Einstein, was shadowed because he is a Jew.

WE NOW REACH the conclusion of our story of Mr. Ford's strange lapse from tolerance. That we supplement this tale with one about the manufacturer's creative side is seen on page 74. That we shall continue in varied ways to fight against treating the Jewish question with ignorant mania is announced in an editorial on page 7.

As this last instalment is being written, Albert Einstein, foremost of living scientists, is put on the danger list of the German anti-Republicans and Jew-baiters. Erzberger, Rathenau, Harden could be more easily understood, because they were not only Jews but active opponents of the elements of despotism trying to regain power. Einstein, on the other hand, is not in politics. A genius in pure science, his only crime is that he is a Jew. He is put on the list intended for slaughter because when reactionaries in any country start Jew-mania the disease knows no limits.

Had Germany been on our side in the war, the group of foreign reactionaries and Jew-baiters who are connected with the anti-Semitic war in this country might conceivably have been German supporters of a restored despotism. Because of our co-operation with Russia in the war, the opportunity of Jew-baiting in this country was offered to the supporters of a restored Russian despotism.

In the present Polish troubles likewise it is the reactionaries who are anti-Semitic. It is the story all over the world.

President Lowell of Harvard has a question to face that probably Henry Ford is incapable of thinking about; Henry Ford, or E. G. Liebold, if Liebold does his Jew thinking for him. Mr. Lowell has two main questions before him:

1. Is he right in his actual statistics about the increase of Jews at Harvard?

2. Is he right in his theory that the way to check Jew-mania is to yield to it? This second question will start some thinking. Perhaps the way to increase prejudice is to yield to it.

I wish Mr. Ford, who despises history, ancient or current, would (if Mr. Liebold will permit) give a moment to these facts:

DURING the last three years at least three hundred people have been assassinated in Germany for political reasons. All have been liberals or socialists. The assassins have been all reactionaries. A large number of the victims and intended victims have been Jews, in addition to the better known cases, like Rathenau, Erzberger, Harden, Max Warburg, and Theodore Wolff.

The most notorious of the reactionary murder-societies, called "the Organization Consul," declares that its object is to "spread the national spirit and to oppose every international movement, especially Bolshevism and Judaism." Affiliated with the Consul are various patriotic clubs and newspapers, pledged to "reduce the influence of the Jews." The talk from these newspapers is heard everywhere on the street, especially among officers. All the Dearborn Independent has done is to create similar talk here. Does Mr. Ford belong in that crowd? Does Boris Brasol belong in America?

For this last instalment we have kept an entertaining little exhibit prepared by Brasol in the presence of an associate of mine. In this rough little sketch, the head of the Russian restorationists and Jew-persecutors in this country shows how far is he, like most professional Jew-baiters, from being able to learn anything that goes contrary to his prevailing mania.

Brasol sat in his office at No. 5, Columbus Circle, New York, while a friend of mine asked him the truth about the part he had played in the Kiev ritual murder trial.

In the curious illustration which accompanies this article, on this page, the reader will find Boris Brasol's own diagram, done in his hand, at that interview. This diagram was made out to prove NOT ONLY THAT BEILISS SHOULD HAVE BEEN CONVICTED OF KILLING A RUSSIAN BOY BUT THAT TWO OTHER MEN WHOSE NAMES BORIS BRASOL ACCOMMODATINGLY WROTE ON THE DIAGRAM SHOULD LIKEWISE HAVE SUFFERED FOR THE CRIME.

"I shuddered," my friend tells me, "as

C. Above is an informal sketch made for us by Boris Brasol. Brasol was explaining how Beiliss should have been convicted.

I sat face to face with this Russian Black Hundred disciple and heard him, in this twentieth century, tell coldly of the medieval cruelty of the Tsar's henchmen."

"I was the second greatest preliminary investigator in Russia," said Brasol. "I had studied detections of crime all over Europe, under orders from the government. In Switzerland, Germany, France and England I had made myself expert in criminal detection.

"The chief preliminary investigator of Russia was sent by the Tsar's government to Kiev to take the Mendell Beiliss case out of the hands of the local government. The local police authorities in Kiev were trying to prove that the murder of the boy was committed by local thieves. Moscow had a different idea. So the preliminary investigator was sent from Moscow to take over the case."

"What are the duties of a preliminary investigator under the Tsar?" asked my friend.

"About the same as the duty of your grand jury here. A preliminary investigator heard both sides of a case before it came to trial and then decided whether or not a crime had been committed and a trial ought to be held.

"Well, the Beiliss trial was held under the advice of the Moscow expert. The jury had two questions to answer as given to them by the judge. One was: Had a Jewish ritual murder been committed? The second was: Was Mendell Beiliss guilty of this murder?"

"The jury came in with the verdict that a ritual murder had taken place, but that Mendell Beiliss was not guilty.

"So many newspapers in Russia raised a clamor over the case, after the verdict was announced, that thirty-nine of them were forced to suspend publication and I was sent to Kiev to investigate the situation and report to the Russian government were any errors committed in court procedure. I found astonishing things."

At this point Brasol took a piece of paper and began to draw his diagram. "In the first place," he said, "not all the possibly guilty men were in the prisoner's dock."

My friend looked out into Columbus Circle at the statue there, with the beautiful background of Central Park, and realized that he was listening in 1922 to black medievalism.

"There should have been three men in that dock, instead of one," Brasol continued, and then he drew the prisoners' dock. The marks T T are the men whose fates should have been linked with Beiliss. The question mark means Beiliss.

"Beiliss sat alone in that box. He was tried under Section 13 of the Russian law. But this section does not provide for the trial of one man; it deals with the offenses of a group of men." The reader will note where Brasol wrote the words, "Section 13."

Brasol drew an error line down to a corner of the page and within a circle he wrote the words "Shneerson" and "Landau."

"Those two men," he declared, "were used as witnesses by the prosecution. Instead they should have been prisoners in the courtroom. They were as guilty as Beiliss. I believe the prosecution first intended to prosecute them with Beiliss, because they were acting under Section 13."

 ARE SUBJECT TO APPROVAL BY THE SIGNATURE OF A DULY AUTHORIZED EXECUTIVE OFFICER OF THIS COMPANY. (CLERICAL EMPLOYEES SUBJECT TO CONFIRMATION)

We are just in receipt of a report from our Factory relative to the activities of our dealers in securing subscriptions for the Dearborn Independent.

It is with regret that we are obliged to report that Houston occupies the eighteenth position out of thirty five Branches. Apparently some of our dealers have lost sight of the fact that we have made but one suggestion to this magazine.

We are pleased to report that every employee in the Houston Branch is a subscriber to the Dearborn Independent, and we are going to ask each one of our dealers to see to it that they become subscribers and endeavor to interest each one of their employees in taking out a subscription, at the same time not overlooking any opportunities to sell subscriptions to anyone who is a likely prospect.

Yours very truly

Your attention is invited to Mr. Abbott's general letter of April 25th with reference to a campaign for subscriptions for the Dearborn Independent.

At the time the above letter was written, we had at the Houston Branch a representative of the Publishing Company who conducted a campaign in Houston. All branch employees lined up and as a result of their efforts 214 subscriptions were secured, as against a total of 202 sent in by all dealers in our territory since the campaign began. A number of dealers have not yet returned the contract to us. Please be advised that it is necessary that we have this contract properly signed and duplicate in order that same may be forwarded to the Dearborn Publishing Company.

We know that you take pride in the success of this great organization of which you are an important part, and that you will help in promoting any project in which Mr. Ford is interested. We ask that you get behind the Dearborn Independent and take personal charge of this work.

There is one more thing we want you to do. We want you to sell cars, trucks and tractors. For the next thirty days, demonstrate to us that you can sell the Dearborn Independent.

Yours very truly

Dear Mr. Hapgood:-

Your night letter of the tenth. I wired as follows to Washington:- "Night letter tenth. Dealers continually getting circular letters urging subscriptions Dearborn Independent. Recently subscription blanks and application and bond for solicitors received with commission agreement. No letter received from Houston office. Any further information possible gladly furnished".

On the morning of the 11th, the Houston office reported Washington unable to for $100.00 for one hundred subscriptions to the Independent, to forward the used by making it $50.00, and charged it to profit and loss. Mr. Rogers, now of the Pharr, Texas, Motor Co., when engaged in the Ford business in Nebraska, as called in to to the Omaha branch, with other dealers in that territory and told to hand his check to the cashier for 40.00 for subscriptions to the Independent. We can prove these statements or we will not take them.

As a reference, beg to advise I am President of the Rotary Club of this City, and can refer you to any business man of this part of South Texas, or elsewhere. I trust I can be of service to you.

Dear Mr. Haggood:

As you know, I spent most of last winter in Detroit and Dearborn, and saw a great deal of Mr. Ford, enjoying his fullest cooperation and confidence. The result of this long continued intercourse is his biography, which undoubtedly is the first actual close and detailed account of his life that has been written.

As you have been conducting an energetic controversy with him on the subject of the Jewish question, would it not be fair to your readers to publish this picture of the man from his boyhood on, with the characteristics that led to his preeminence as a manufacturer, now while the impression of your controversy with him on one subject is fresh in the public mind?

Yours sincerely,

Green and Fresh

By Owen Johnson

Illustrated by James Montgomery Flagg

IT HAPPENED on the day before school opened; at that moment when Skippy, returning from his first sentimental summer, had no other thought than to rest up from the fatigue of the vacation and devote his activities to the serious business of life. There were the freshmen (a discouraging lot) to be properly educated, taught to punctuate their sentences with a humble "sir," "if you please," and "thank you"; there was a certain score to be settled with Al at the Jigger Shop and the basis of a new credit to be argued; there was the prize room on the third floor overlooking the campus to be redecorated with the loot of the summer, and one crucial question to be decided: "Shall we start training now or gorge ourselves for just one more day?"

"The jiggers are peach-soft and creamy," said Snorky with a pensive look. "But we should set an example, you know, old top, and all that sort of thing."

"Keerect, we must."

"I can see the crowd up at Conover's putting away the pancakes," said Snorky insidiously.

"Be firm," said Skippy, returning to his trunk.

"It isn't only the jiggers," said Snorky, who sometimes practiced virtue but without the slightest enthusiasm, "It's— it's those éclairs—never tasted anything like them—"

"Shut up!"—said Skippy indignantly. "Where's your spirit!"

"Can't a fellow be human?" said Snorky in an aggrieved tone.

"All right, all right—but put your mind on other things," said Skippy nervously.

He disengaged an armful from the bottom of his trunk and, spreading it on the window seat, contemplated the touch as of many feminine hands with an expression that was as cynically blasé as that of the traditional predatory bachelor. Whenever Skippy found a mood too elusive to be expressed in words, his lips instinctively resorted to boyhood's musical outlet. His eyes traveled appraisingly over sofa cushions, picture frames, knitted neckties, and flags that represent those select institutions where young ladies are finished off. He began to whistle:

I don't care to play in your yard
I don't love you any more. . .

"My, you're a cold-hearted brute!" said Snorky, in whom perhaps the spirit of envy was strong.

"I am," said Skippy unctuously, "and I am going to be brutier. Take a tip from yours truly, Moony."

He disposed of half a dozen cushions, draped two flags, and carefully placed three photographs on his bureau.

"Do you think that's honorable?" said Snorky resentfully.

"Scalps, that's all!" said Skippy with a grandiloquent wave of his hand.

"I get you. Heart-whole and fancy-free, etcetera, etceteray?"

"Every time."

"Since when?" said Snorky wickedly.

SKIPPY allowed this to pass, but having pensively contemplated the effect produced by the addition of Miss Dolly Travis, Miss Jenny Tupper, and Miss Vivi Balou to the adoring galaxy of the past, he swung a leg over the table and assuming that newly acquired manner of a man of the world, which was specially galling to his chum, announced:

"Snorky, old horse, you play it wrong."

"I do, eh?"

"You do. There's nothing in that fussing game. Women, my boy, are our inferiors."

"Well, it took you some time to find it out."

"Keerect, but now I'm wise. Woman is like a harp in the desert, played upon by every passing wind."

"Where'd ye read that?"

"If you're going in for that sort of thing, get promiscuous. The only cure for one woman is another."

"You ought to know."

"Are you corresponding with Margherita?" said Skippy.

"And if I am?"

Skippy shook his head sadly.

"Woman——" he began sententiously and just then fate knocked at the door.

"Come in if you're good-looking," said Snorky, glad of the interruption.

The door opened and discovered a short bulbous freshman, just a whit embarrassed as freshmen should be in the presence of royalty.

"Oh, well, come in anyway!" said Skippy. "What's your name, freshman?"

"Potterman," said the rotund youngster, squeezing in.

"Sir!"

"Sir."

"What's the rest of it—the handle, the nickname?"

"Are we telling our real names?" said the new arrival, cocking his derby.

"Green, get out the bamboo cane," said Skippy solemnly.

"Oh, well, they call me Hippo—sir," said Potterman hastily.

"Ah, yes, Hippo Potterman! Of course. That's good, but we'll do better by you. Where did they find you?"

"Philamedelphia, sir."

"What's that you've got there?" said Snorky, just about to fall upon him bodily.

PLEASE, sir, it's a letter from Mrs. Bedelle, your aunt."

"Oh, I see!" said Skippy with a feeling of disappointment.

"You know my aunt? Well, freshman, you may give it to me. I permit you. Advance. That's it. Curtsy. A little lower. Better."

Dear Jack:

My dear friend Susan Potterman is sending her son Cornelius . . .

"Is your name really Cornelius?" Skippy demanded.

Hippo Potterman flushed like the rose and said with a gulp:

"Yes, sir, it is."

"Too bad, too bad."

JAMES MONTGOMERY FLAGG

Q. "Go over to the bed and kneel down," said Skippy in a voice of great sadness.

"Now, Hippo, I want you to reflect upon what a wicked thing profanity is."

... to Lawrenceville. Please do everything you can to make him at home and see that he meets the best boys. His mother and sister will go on with him and I want you particularly to be very nice to them.

Affectionately,
Aunt Carrie.

Skippy, having read this twice, looked in the envelope to make sure that a five-dollar bill was not enclosed, as all aunts should remember to do, transferred his gaze to the fidgeting Hippo.

"H'm! First time at boarding school?"

"Yes, sir."

"Governesses before?"

HIppo, who had been recovering from his first feeling of awe, roared loudly at this.

Skippy looked indignant at this breach of etiquette and reached thoughtfully for a tennis racket.

"Please, sir," said Hippo hastily, "high school."

Skippy considered him thoughtfully and something told him that in the right-hand lower vest pocket there was undoubtedly a certain amount of round hard silver bodies and moreover that this condition was not simply episodic but chronic.

"That coot may be fresh but he is going to do a lot of heavy spending," he said to himself with conviction.

How he knew is immaterial. There is an instinct that guides—some have it, some haven't it. You can't explain it. Doc McNooder, for instance, could diagnose a pocketbook as keenly as a surgeon. It's a gift, that's all. Skippy, strangely enough possessed this gift.

"Mother just brought you in?"

Hippo acknowledged this with a look of the greatest distress.

"Sister, too?"

"Damn it, yes!"

Skippy looked at Snorky and shook his head.

"Don't you know that profanity is a wicked, wicked habit, Hippo?" he asked anxiously.

Hippo's mouth started to swallow his ears, then returned to at rest at signs of a hostile atmosphere. He swung from foot to foot, looked sheepish, looked terrified, and finally blurted out:

"I beg pardon, sir."

"It is a wicked habit, Hippo, but we are here to help you. It is very lucky for you that you have come to the right school, where you will meet boys of fine manly standards. Kneel down, Hippo."

"What, sir?"

"Go over to the bed and kneel down," said Skippy in a voice of great sadness. "Don't hesitate, Hippo. That's better. Now, Hippo, I want you to reflect upon what a wicked, wicked thing profanity is and I want you to ask God to forgive you."

Hippo who was green and fresh but not at all green and gullible, went through the prescribed program with the utmost gravity.

"Do you feel better now, Hippo?" said Snorky solemnly.

"Yes, sir, but I'd like a little more time, sir."

"Stand up!" said Snorky, frowning.

Hippo, unchastened, bounded to his feet and saluted.

"AND, Hippo, I'm afraid," said Skippy relentlessly, "that you don't appreciate what a mother's love means. Think how your mother has watched over you all these years; think how she has scrubbed behind your ears; think of the hundreds and hundreds of toothbrushes—"

But at this, as Snorky gulped and barely converted a laugh into a sneeze had hurriedly dive into the closet, Skippy abandoned his pedagogical air and said in a more natural tone:

"Well, Hippo, I shall want to talk with you very seriously on this some other time. Your manners are shocking and your morals worse, but I am here. Don't worry. Meanwhile—ahem—you can bring your family in to tea."

"Thank you, kind sir."

"Hippo, you are fresh."

"But you are kind, aren't you, sir?" said Hippo.

"Get your hat and wait downstairs," said Skippy.

"Yes, sir."

A quarter of an hour later Skippy and Snorky with Hippo in tow started across the campus to show their protégé the historic spots, beginning with Laloo's, where the merry hot dogs whistled to one another in steaming cans, by way of Bill Appleby's where ginger-pop and root-beer waited, to Al's Jigger Shop, where the jigger cooled, and Conover's, where the pancake sizzled.

Opposite the Jigger Shop the celebrated Doc McNooder, resplendent in a varsity sweater, was surveying the hungry jigger-fed crowd and debating whether to go right up and pay for his sustenance or wait a little longer and see what might turn up.

"Well, Skippy, been inventing anything new?" said McNooder pleasantly after the introductions.

"I say, Doc, I want to put it up to you," said Skippy hastily, for he feared any reference to bathtubs or mosquitoes might detract from the respect which was essential in Hippo. "I'm out for the scrub, you know, and what I wanted to ask you was, do you think training ought to start now or wait until school opens."

McNooder's mind scorned subtleties. It moved by the shortest cuts to the practical issue.

"Has he got the price?" he said, looking hungrily at Hippo.

"He has."

"Let's eat."

McNooder looked appraisingly at Hippo, whom Nature had destined to play at center rush, to be mauled and cuffed and suffocated under scores of scuffling, struggling bodies. A flicker of sympathy should have stirred, but it didn't.

"You'll need quite a lot of stuff?" he said pensively.

"NOTHING doing, Doc," said Skippy, winking hard at his protégé. "Hippo's fitted out."

"How about fountain-pens or crockery sets, or patent nail clippers?"

"I dote on fountain-pens," began Hippo.

"Hippo's under my protection," said Skippy militantly. "We're sort of related."

"Oh, well, let's eat then," said McNooder with a reluctant look.

"Don't take anything from that fellow even if he gives it to you," said Skippy in a whisper to Hippo. "Elucidations later."

Al had two attitudes of welcome, according to the record of the books, one in which the hand advanced impulsively and a smile broke from under the shaggy yellow bang and another where the hand remained in a stationary receptive cup, or sometimes caressed the limp ends of the mustache in a way most discouraging and disheartening to the delinquent debtor. When Doc McNooder arrived, however, he paid him the honor to carefully close the glass cases where éclair and fruit cake were waiting the call to service, and braced himself against the counter.

"Hello, Al!" said Skippy affably. "Here we are again. Set 'em up four times."

"I see you and I see that there Doc McNooder," said Al in an unconvinced sort of way.

"Set 'em up," said McNooder in an encouraging tone.

"Who's settin' 'em up?" said Al, resorting to his toothpick.

McNooder looked at Skippy, Skippy looked at Snorky then all three looked at Hippo.

"The pleasure is mine," said Hippo, and with a purse-proud gesture he flicked on the counter a twenty-dollar bill.

Al was not easily shocked but for once his perfect manner left him. He glanced at Hippo and then enviously at McNooder.

"I didn't know they picked them as early as that," he said enigmatically. "Doc, you'll be buying this place in a week."

"I could buy it now," said McNooder, frowning, "and, Al, step to the back and have a little business talk with me."

Al, having received payment and displayed the jiggers, left for that secluded nook in the back of the store which had heard a hundred explanations and supplications from the improvident and hungry. Skippy, who despite the new assurance of his public manner was willing to learn at the feet of a master, jigger in hand, moved into a position of eavesdropping.

"Nineteen dollars and seventy-two cents," said Al, coming to the point.

"Exactly what my little proposition comes to," said McNooder affably. "Tear it up, Al; you'll do it sooner or later, so why not now?"

"What's the flimflam?" said Al, who recognized in McNooder qualities of a superior intelligence.

"I don't like the word," said McNooder in a pained tone. "I've got an idea and you're going to buy it. Al, the jigger shop has had a cinch, a monopoly, a trust. You fixed prices and you've controlled the output. Now answer me, yes or no. Have you ever paid out one cent in commissions?"

"Get to the point."

"I will. I have an idea, I might say a brilliant idea, and when I say I like the idea better than any idea I can remember—"

A Nuisance submitted to the hazing with a cheerfulness that robbed it of its sting. He sat in wash-basins and gravely pulled imaginary miles against toothpicks furnished him as oars.

you know me—I'm modest, but Al, it's a wonder. You'll like it. No, change that line; you may not like it but you'll respect it. Al, I'm going to let you in, give you the first chance. Conover would double the commission. Appleby would go wild over it. But, Al, I'm giving you the first chance."

"Nineteen dollars and seventy-two cents," said Al, making a motion to close his ears.

"Not a cent less," said McNooder firmly who, according to his manner, having produced the proper hypnotic effect, now came to the point. "Sit down, Al; if you won't sit down—brace yourself. The idea's coming now and the idea's loaded with dynamite. Suppose it was in my power to boycott you and your jiggers?"

"God Almighty couldn't do that," said Al defiantly.

"Not as you see it—you're right there, Al, shrewd and clever! Al, there are ten freshmen in the Dickinson. Think hard now, the idea's growing. Ten freshmen. Suppose—I only say, suppose now that as a disciplinary measure we should decide that no freshman could enter the Jigger Shop say—well, let's be moderate—for the space of three months. We might let them go to Conover's or Laloo's and then again——"

"McNooder," said Al explosively, "when they lead you to the gallows I'll be sitting right up front if it costs every cent I have."

"Al, you grieve me."

"It's blackmail! It's extortion and, damn it, I believe you'd do it."

"No, Al, it's not blackmail, it's not extortion. If I came to you and said out and out, flat, tear up that account of mine or I'll boycott you—that, Al, that would be all you say."

"My Gawd! Doc, why do you waste your time in this little place, anyhow?"

"You see, Al, it's this way," said McNooder, smiling at the compliment. "I'm coming to you as McNooder your attorney—that's one person—to use his influence with McNooder the financier—that's another person. I'm a lobbyist, a paid lobbyist."

"Nineteen dollars and seventy-two cents," said Al in a fainter voice with tone of one already beaten.

"Al, I'm surprised and shocked. I thought your mind leaped at things. You don't see it yet. You're thinking in terms of ten freshmen——"

"Nineteen."

But suppose the Dickinson lays down the law; suppose the Kennedy follows suit. You saw what that fellow flashed—a twenty-dollar yellow-back; a word to Skippy and the Kennedy would follow. (Skippy, you understand, would have to be protected—you get that.) Well, what would happen? Every house in the school would follow suit. What does that mean? Figure it out. It means one hundred freshmen multiplied by ninety days, multiplied by at least two jiggers a fresh—per day—you know how freshmen eat——"

BUT HERE, Skippy, terrified, tiptoed away. McNooder aroused in him the lust for gold and he wished to retain a few simple ideals. He signaled Snorky and Hippo and escaped up the road to the home of the pancake.

"Doc McNooder is a wonder, but he's not—well he's not quite the sort of chap you want to associate with, Hippo. Understand?"

"I'm young but I'm not so green as all that," said Hippo, winking wisely and with an air of vast experience.

"In fact, Doc's a sponge and you made an awful break."

"I did—what's that, sir?"

"You shouldn't have shown him that twenty-dollar bill. He'll never let up so long as he remembers that."

"Skippy's right, Hippo," said Snorky.

"What'll I do?"

"Leave it to us. We'll think out some way of saving you."

After a good deal of thinking, they returned from a heavy performance at Conover's, laden with a large cream-cake, a half-dozen éclairs, a box of chocolates and two pounds of Turkish paste, which with the order for tinned meats, cheese, saltines and root beer effectually removed Hippo's financial superiority.

ISAY, this sort of removes the lurking danger, doesn't it?" said Hippo, searching in his pocket for the last half-dollar.

"We'll store the grub in our rooms," said Snorky solemnly, "and then there won't be any danger at all."

"Oh, thank you, kind sir!" said the irrepressible Hippo in a tone which only the soothing presence of the layer cake against his breast kept Snorky from a mood of wrath.

"If you've got to mother that little squirt," said Snorky wrathfully, once they had returned to their room, "you'll have your hands full; that's all I wish to remark. A fresher, nervier little nuisance I never——"

"Nuisance is going to get a lot of mothering," said Skippy with a far-off look in his eyes. "But remember, old dear, that's why we're here. That's why the faculty invites us to Lawrenceville."

"Well," said Snorky as he stowed away the purchases and arranged the éclairs on the tea table, "if we can keep him away from Doc McNooder, there's going to be a few compensations."

"Nuisance will neither be affectionate nor familiar by this time tomorrow," said Skippy, grinding his teeth.

"Cheese it. Hide the towels—here they come."

A knock and then the voice of Hippo in flippant familiarity:

"All right, Skippy, we're good-looking. Open up."

Skippy looked [Continued on page 126]

C, "Sic him, Skippy!" The next moment Nuisance was scuttling for his life, with Skippy roaring at his heels. And just back of the lonely stretches of the Dickinson, Skippy fell upon him.

THE DREAM OF Ireland's Lincoln

By Carl W. Ackerman

Mr. Ackerman was the only correspondent to interview Michael Collins when he was a fugitive, and one of the few Americans who shared his confidence. That's why Mr. Ackerman is so well equipped to tell how the spirit of Ireland's martyred president goes marching on

MICHAEL COLLINS is dead but his dream of Ireland's future will live as long as the Emerald Isle remains the home of the Irish race. In fact, both he and his late associate Arthur Griffith, shared the same vision of Ireland as "the Switzerland of the Seas."

It was my good fortune to have announced the discovery of Collins as one of the strong men—the iron men of Ireland. Three years ago "Mick" Collins was known only to a small circle of Sinn Fein executives. His name had never been mentioned in the press outside of Ireland and in that country it had appeared only in an announcement of his position as Minister of Finance in the Dail Eireann. At that time there was an inner circle of members of the Irish Republican Brotherhood who directed the affairs of the "Republic" and the activities of the army. The British called this little group the "murder gang."

One day, while in Scotland Yard talking with Sir Basil Thomson, the director of Intelligence, he mentioned the name of Michael Collins as the real leader of Sinn Fein, as the man who dominated the whole movement against Great Britain. I told him then that the next time I was sent to Ireland I would endeavor to interview Collins.

In Dublin I asked Desmond Fitzgerald, Minister of Propaganda of the "Republic," for an introduction to Collins. Visibly surprised that I knew such a man existed he minimized the "fictitious" accounts of Scotland Yard and replied that it was quite impossible for anyone to meet Collins. Three weeks later he called at my hotel and invited me to tea. We walked over to one of the finest old Georgian homes in Dublin, and as we sat down, in walked a young man, unarmed, unguarded, dressed in a sack suit and wearing a smile now known to all Irishmen.

"This," said Mr. Fitzgerald, "is Mr. Collins."

HE WAS at that time Chief of Staff of the Irish Republican Army and Chief of Intelligence as well as Minister of Finance. For more than two hours he talked about Ireland, smiling all the while like a happy boy thrilled by his plans for a free country. Calm and self-possessed he exhibited clippings from American newspapers of articles which I had written about him as the leader of the "murder gang" and asked me if I was afraid!

The interview which I wrote and which Collins personally corrected after this meeting was the first in which Collins' identity was revealed and the first public expression of his uncompromising challenge to Prime Minister Lloyd George.

From that day until the British Government and the leaders of Sinn Fein met to discuss a truce I had many conversations with him, and throughout the period of unofficial and confidential negotiations I acted as one of the two intermediaries between Collins and Griffith and the British cabinet, through Scotland

Mr. Michael Collins, assassinated Irish patriot, died because he would not let the impossible best stand in the way of the possible good.

Dear Mr. Ackerman,

First let me say that I am sorry ~~that~~ I have delayed you so long with this story - things are not always easily worked, and in the present circumstances delays are inevitable.

Enclosed herewith is the story as I would like it to appear. You will observe that I have made some few slight alterations in the form, and have made a few slight corrections. I would draw your attention to :

Enclosed also are my answers to the questions you submitted. I would wish to be able to give a little more time to them but that alas is not practicable.

With good wishes,

Yours sincerely,

¶ In spite of a very busy life Mr. Collins found time to read and correct the interview he gave Carl Ackerman.

Yard and Sir Hamar Greenwood, Chief Secretary for Ireland in Whitehall and Dublin Castle. The other was Archbishop Clune.

In this way I came to know and understand the dual character of Collins, the warrior and the statesman.

While Collins' personality fired the imagination of the Irish, Griffith, with his pen, crystallized the ideas and ideals of the nation. Griffith was not the type of man who inspired personal devotion. Collins was. I recall one time I told General Sir Nevil Macready, who was then Chief-Officer in Command of the British forces in Ireland, that if Collins suddenly appeared in Dublin's crowded thoroughfares and called upon all the men to follow him in an unarmed attack upon the fortified gates of Dublin Castle every man and woman would follow and die in the attempt before they would desert their dauntless Chief, whereas if Griffith should attempt a similar feat, every Dubliner would run away.

Griffith's ability as a leader was diametrically different from that of his zealous colleague. He was as powerful in prison or in his study as Collins was at the head of an army. The time the British feared Arthur Griffith the most was when he was in solitary confinement in Mount Joy prison in the heart of Dublin where, despite the censorship and watchfulness of the warden and guards, he succeeded in sending messages to the people which kept them united and belligerent supporters of their unseen, struggling, embryo "Republic."

Collins and Griffith were no less Republicans than deValera, Barton, Boland, Childers or Father Dominic. The fundamental differences between these men lay in what constituted freedom and how it could be obtained and maintained. The former were convinced in 1921 that the Republic of their dream could be fashioned through peace and economic development, while their uncompromising opponents envisioned a free Ireland purchased by the sacrifice of the last ounce of blood and treasure.

Thus the seeds of Civil War were planted in Ireland.

What did Ireland's Lincoln mean by "the Switzerland of the Seas?"

Ireland is essentially a pastoral and agricultural country. Of her twenty million acres of land less than fifteen million are devoted to agriculture and husbandry. Recognizing the importance of agriculture as the basic industry of the nation the Sinn Fein leaders did everything within their power to develop the country intensively. Sinn Fein patriotic societies set out one hundred thousand young trees during 1919 and 1920. They helped finance Irish fisheries and encouraged this industry. They cooperated with Sir Horace Plunkett and the Irish Agricultural Organization Society, Ltd., in the development of creameries. They encouraged the development of the small farm and were of service to the farmers in the production of wheat, oats, barley, rye and potatoes so that by the year 1920 there were, according to official statistics (Continued on page 142)

THOUGH he had lived most of his life in New York, Bud Highland found himself a stranger in that city. That was because New York is so big and latterly so cosmopolitan, that it can offer some sort of an exclusive asylum and way of life to the victim or hero of almost any conceivable set of circumstances. Bud had been familiar with the New York of the well-born, the well-placed and the well-to-do. Except for the Café Lafayette and one gunsmith, New York north of Wall Street and south of Fifteenth (on which street he had lived from his birth to the age of nine years) was unfamiliar to him. His late years had been lived mostly in a strip bounded by Forty-second Street at the one end, Ninety-third Street at the other, Lexington Avenue on the east, and on the west and northwest by Broadway and Central Park. His eating places had been Sherry's and Delmonico's; his clubs had not been far away. His New York had been largely inhabited by Americans.

To see his boys, which he was allowed to do daily, by the first Mrs. Highland, he had to traverse some of his old familiar stamping ground. But he made his comings and goings by way of its least patronized thoroughfares. The kind of people he had known either moved about on their own feet or in their own automobiles. By riding in the street cars, he risked few awkward meetings, and had none. Indeed, during the whole of his stay in the city he saw few people whom he had ever seen before.

His first wife, he was glad to find, had moved to a new apartment. He recognized, it is true, certain pictures and pieces of furniture, but the strangeness that surrounded them stripped them of any sentimental recollections which they might otherwise have evoked. It did not, therefore, seem especially cruel or unnatural to bid his boys good-by and go downtown to his separate lodging.

When Bud was in the apartment, his first wife usually managed to be out, but they saw each other occasionally and had a number of longish talks together, mostly about the boys.

BUD HAD supposed that he still loved her; but the moment he saw her he knew that he did not. He could not have explained why. She looked young and pretty. But somehow she had lost all the old appeal, and he who had once been murderously jealous of her could now, with no more perturbation of his equanimity than a feeling of disgust, have beheld her in the ardent embrace of another. He wondered who that other might be, if there was one; if Harry Fisher had come forward to make an honest man of himself, death-threat or no death-threat, or if he had something new in tow? Not something—someone.

Bud had for the moment forgotten that she was now in a position to be made love to by a regular man. Wonderful what the law can do! But he had no real curiosity in the matter; he was rather perfunctorily wondering how someone, whom he had once known rather well, was getting on.

The first wife, on the other hand, was dying to know all about the creature who had supplanted her in her dismissed husband's affections. No one of her acquaintances ever seemed to have set eyes on the creature. If it had been one of those chorus girls that all the men rave about, one might have understood the point of view of a piqued man marrying her in a moment of foolish exhilaration; but a dance-hall girl! No ordinary human being could understand that! It would need an alienist! It would be like him, though, to stick to his bargain. That was one of the qualities that had got so on her nerves. Anything in the nature of stubbornness or pig-headedness, she simply could not stand. Well, what did she think of him now that he had showed up again? Oh, rather nice! One would always be proud of him, and there was no doubt about his being presentable.

She had given him her hand in an impulsive, disarming way. The gesture had as much as said that she was willing to let by-gones be by-gones; that she forgave him everything.

When he had seen the boys that first time and said good night to them, she was still in the apartment. She came into the little hall, which was a dark place, and helped him to locate his hat and gloves.

"Sorry I can't have you to dinner," she said, "but Flora Jennings is coming, and you never did get on together."

Her expression took on a sudden gravity, and a still-being-on-terms-of-confidence quality.

"Everything all right, Bud?"

"Oh, yes. Quite so."

She hesitated, then plunged, and demanded:

"WHAT IS SHE like?" Bud repeated the question with some confusion, and then, very gravely and with feeling, as if to settle for all time, both for himself and others, a much mooted question, he said: "She is exquisitely pretty. She is very young and impressionable. She has a generous and beautiful nature. We are great friends."

He smiled a good night, and reached for the elevator bell.

"Oh, Bud, I can't tell you how glad I am that it has turned out so well. I've been so worried."

What? He wasn't going to seize the generous opening she had made for him and give her his full confidence! Apparently not. He was simply going to repeat that it was unusually hot for that time of year, wasn't it?

Soon after he had gone, Flora Jennings came and the first wife told her all about everything.

C. Bua junior had a miserable time of it. Mastoiditis is a thing best calculated to make a little boy feel low in his mind.

Mary was exquisitely pretty and impressionable and generous, Bud told himself. He wrote to her every day because it gave him pleasure to write.

"It wasn't so much what he said, you know, but—well, after all I do know him rather well—I was able to put this and that together, and piece and patch—taking what he actually did say, with the way he said it, and the expression of his face at the time of saying it. And well, the poor fellow is certainly up against it!"

Here the first wife proceeded to piece and patch: "She has a certain amount of looks, and she wasn't as old as most of them are. That was what he fell for. Of course he had been drinking heavily." She sighed. "He's sober enough now, poor fellow."

Mrs. Jennings frankly admitted that she could see no reason for sympathizing with a man like that. The first wife then admitted that she herself could have felt no sympathy but for the fact that "after all he is the boys' father."

Bud's marriage had, of course, played into the first wife's hands. It had been easy for her, without a single lie spoken, to make people believe almost anything to his discredit; and she had acquired for herself the reputation of having put up with more outrageousness from him than any wife should be expected to endure. No wonder she had her innocent flirtation, poor thing. . . . Never to know where her husband was ("sometimes, my dear, for days at a time!"), nor in what condition he was, nor in what company!

Bud had said of his second wife that she was very young and impressionable. By piecing and patching the first wife evolved that, "She isn't actually vicious. She has been more sinned against than sinning. You know the kind—everybody's friend—can't say 'no' to anyone, easily impressed, easily led!"

Bud had said, and he had meant it, "She had a generous and beautiful nature."

So the first wife said, "She is the kind of person you dismiss with 'easy-going, and good-natured,' when, if you weren't easy-going and good-natured yourself, you'd say, 'arrested development, mental and moral!'"

Bud had said, "We are great friends."

In so saying Bud seemed to have admitted to the first wife ("practically admitted") that the glamour had worn off.

"Honeymoons," said the first wife, "with nothing but a physical élan to recommend them, soon peter out . . . I guess that if one were sparring for the real truth, one would have to say that they are still on speaking terms, and let it go at that."

THESE confidences Mrs. Flora Jennings passed on to all whom she thought would be interested and amused to receive them. And she would add adorably: "And just between ourselves, by putting this and that together, piecing and patching (after all I do know her rather well) I am convinced that the poor darling still loves him. My dear, she adores him . . . and just think of the way he treated her . . . Harry Fisher? . . . No! You make me laugh! He was nice enough to go about with, but an awful flub really. . . . As a matter of fact she hasn't seen him, since—why, I don't believe she's seen him since she went West to get her divorce."

"Why'd she bother to go West if Bud was as rotten as everybody says he must have been? . . . Well, of course, there was only one ground in New York, and no woman wants to put such a stigma on her boys' father."

Bud had found a lodging down in that part of the city that had first been familiar to him, and since it was now dark, and there was little chance of his being seen and recognized, he elected to walk west to the Avenue and down it thereafter to the late 'teens.

All the way his mouth wore the hint of a smile. He was not conscious of this. He did not even know that he was pleased with himself. He was not even thinking of himself, but of his second wife.

Mary was exquisitely pretty, and young and impressionable, and generous. She did have a beautiful nature. They were great friends.

What did Bud mean by impressionable? Did he mean that Mary was weak and easily led? He meant simply that she had been quick to see and acquire much that was worth acquiring.

He meant that she had once been "impossible" and that now she was presentable. She dressed in good taste. She was neat as a pin; she had fought off her worst intonations. She had learned to carry herself beautifully.

Generous? Was there anything that she had that she would not give him, or give up so that he might have it? The trouble she took with his clothes and things! The sweetness with which she would yield to his wishes on any point except this one of personal service. Why, it made a man feel like a dog to see a woman putting blanco on his shoes, and smiling about it, just as if it wasn't a dreadful hardship. But what could a man do? She would do it! Always, it was "Yes, Bud," "Why of course!" "I'd love to" until he ran against that question of personal service. Then stubbornness, obstinacy, a flattening back of ears, rebellion against constituted authority! She might have let him have his way once in a while, you'd think. Not she!

"There is something wonderfully womanly about her," he thought. "It's a damn shame she never had the chance that other girls have. I never knew anyone so sweet tempered in my life!"

So contented with so little! Most women would have kept nagging him to get a job so that there would be more money to spend. He didn't believe she had a single, solitary nag in her whole body. She was the gratest person he had ever known. She didn't talk gratitude, though; she showed it. She was it.

She went with him all the way down the avenue. He had thought that it would be pleasant to get away by himself for a while. But it wasn't. Thinking about her was company for him. He had become so used to her.

Getting away like this was a good thing, though, in some ways. It would help their friendship; since, through realizing the things in her that he missed, he was learning to appreciate her.

It would be pleasant to find her waiting at the hotel for him, instead of just emptiness. She had a knack of giving a personal touch to the room. He hadn't. Once a hotel room, always a hotel room, if he happened to be living in it, all by himself.

She would have his evening clothes laid out, and his tub drawn. . . . A pretty good kid, take her for all in all.

FROM these small beginnings, the feeling grew in Bud Highland that he had not been altogether just to wife No. 2. He felt that he had been distant, almost stern, long after he had lost all reason to be fearful of some trying outbreak on her part. He had supposed, that sooner or later, the love which they are all supposed to have for the life they lead, would over-power her efforts at reform. He had not at first liked to leave her alone in their room for fear she would order up cocktails from the hotel bar. He had felt sure that sooner or later she would make a play for some strange man. He had been panicky long after there had been any legitimate excuse for panic. Paint, powder, cigarettes, drink, late hours, man-hunting—she had given these things up, not little by little, and with scandalous relapses, but all at once. She had given them up not as things she loved, but as things she hated.

She had not been a woman of pleasure, for the pleasure there was in it. That was obvious. Him she might have hunted and set her cap for if she had been that kind of a woman. She had accepted from the first the fact that no woman with a past like hers could ever be anything to a man with a past like his. If that had been a hard pill to swallow, and it couldn't very well taste sweet to any woman's self-esteem, she had swallowed it without complaint—and kept it down!

He wrote to her every day (he would have done so in any case, because he would have thought it the proper thing to do. It came under some head or other of that code of honor and honest dealing by which he tried to guide and order his actions), because he felt like doing so. It gave him pleasure.

He felt differently toward her, somehow, much more friendly and much more appreciative of her good qualities. He tried to make her feel these changes without telling her of them in so many words.

He looked forward to receiving her letters.

She also wrote every day. He had asked her to do that. He had asked her because he thought it would please her to know that he took so much interest in her.

"Don't forget," he had said, "that I shall count on getting your letters. I want to know how you are, and what you are doing, and way off and mostly alone as I will be, if you miss me at all, it wouldn't hurt me a bit to be told of it."

SHE wrote a neat, clear, undeveloped hand. . . . She said what she had to say with a brevity and directness which pleased him. She could say given things in fewer words than he could. She was afraid of big words and now and then misspelled a little one. She was not afraid to tackle a big word now and then. He had a tight memory and spelled to perfection. She knew that she couldn't spell very well; but there was no dictionary in the house and she did not like to be always asking Fred. She was afraid that her letters must mortify Bud sometimes. But they didn't. The occasional misspelled word struck him not as ignorant and uneducated but as human, and even touching.

Sometimes folded into a separate half sheet, he would find a few leaves of lemon verbena. This was his favorite fragrance. She didn't suppose there was much of it growing round the streets of New York and so she sent him some to put with his handkerchiefs or just to rub between his palms and bury his nose in, the way he was always doing in Farmer Jessup's Garden.

Yes, it would be good to get back to her. New York was a hell of a place! It might be the imperial city on the North River, and it might be Bagdad on the Subway. But to have been of it, of its best at its best, and now to be a stranger in it!—That made a weight of loneliness that was hard to stagger under. He longed so to see and touch hands and talk with the people he had been fond of, and whom he had to avoid, and dodge because he knew that no matter how polite they might be, they couldn't possibly want to see him. Some of them he knew were so fine and loyal that they would try to make him feel that nothing had happened. But something had happened.

C. Bud had supposed that he still loved his first wife; but the moment he saw her, he knew that he did not.

What he had done, on the face of it, was just about the rottenest, lowest sort of thing that a man could do! It was such an awful thing to have done to his boys! His boys' father to do a thing like that! Thank God, they weren't girls! There was no excuse possible, and no justification. He had never made, nor sought any. He had more sense. He wasn't the kind of man who goes plunging round in the woods looking for a fountain of eternal youth. When there was no excuse possible, nor any justification, he admitted it. He might be a poor simp in lots of ways, but he was man enough to admit his faults, and face the consequences.

But that morning, when shattered by drink he had come to, and found Mary in his rooms, and learned that they had been married the night before! He hadn't (Continued on page 140)

Edwin H. Armstrong, at thirty-one, ranks with the great inventors of all time. His name, declares Allan L. Benson, will soon be a synonym for the radio-phone as that of Edison suggests the electric light or Bell the telephone

Armstrong of the RADIO-PHONE

By Allan L. Benson

EDWIN H. ARMSTRONG found the radio-phone talking like a hair-lipped man and left it singing like a nightingale.

Such is the compact, unexaggerated story of one man's contribution to the youngest and most astounding of the arts. If there had been no Armstrong, there would have been no radio-broadcasting today, no radio speech that could have been understood without much guessing, no radio music to which anybody would have listened—and no radio craze.

Before Armstrong's day, speech carried over the radio was barely intelligible, what went into the transmitter as music came out of the receiver as mush, and as much power was required to send fifty miles as is now necessary to send five-hundred.

Three revolutionary inventions—all made by Armstrong—placed the radio-phone where it is. It is the third invention—the super-regenerative circuit, of which not even one radio fan in a thousand has ever heard—that makes the radio-phone sing like a nightingale. The invention is so recent that the manufacturers have not yet had time to place it on the market.

Who is Armstrong? "Who's Who" does not tell. As a celebrity, he is too recent to be in biographical dictionaries. His name may be heard almost nightly over the radio-phone; it is scattered all through radio magazines, and frequently appears in newspapers, but few of the millions who have heard or seen his name know much about him except that there is such a man who has done much for radio. The story of his life and work has never been told.

Armstrong is Major Armstrong. The title came to him during the Great War when he served in France with the American Signal Corps as an expert on radio. He is thirty-one years old. He lives in Yonkers, New York, on a high hill before which is spread out a wonderful panorama of the Palisades and forty miles of the Hudson River. He comes of a family in comfortable circumstances, took a course in electrical engineering at Columbia University, and is unmarried.

Armstrong began studying the radio when he was a boy of fifteen, brought out his first great invention when he was twenty-two years old, his second when he was twenty-seven and his third when he was thirty-one. Again we see that it is the young who do things like this. They dare to think outside the books and to try what older men might not consider worth trying. Bell was in his twenties when his genius burst forth, and Marconi was but twenty-two when he sent a wireless message for the Prince of Wales, from his yacht at sea, to Queen Victoria in her castle at Balmoral.

Armstrong was eleven years old when, in 1902, Marconi sent the letter "S" through the ether across the Atlantic, and was one of the millions of small boys who immediately became interested. By the time he was fifteen, his interest had become noticeable in the neighborhood. Mr. C. R. Underhill a friendly neighbor gave him a Fleming bulb and, a little later, he obtained a De Forest audion, which was then comparatively new. This was in 1910, and Armstrong had reached his twentieth year. He hooked up the audion and made it work, but that was not enough. He wanted to understand why it worked. He read De Forest's explanation, but could make nothing of it. De Forest himself did not seem to know and publicly declared that, in some respects, he, himself, could not explain the audion.

Armstrong, at the time, was a student at Columbia where, according to one of his professors, he "did rather poorly in many of his courses." But the mysterious audion was a challenge to him. He resolved to get to the bottom of it. His home on the Hudson became a laboratory in which he worked all of the time that he was not at the university. He worked for three years, and at the end of that time, according to his old professor, "he understood the action of the audion better than anybody else in the world."

But that was not all. He had stumbled upon phenomena with which he was destined to revolutionize the radio. He had discovered a process by means of which incoming signals might be magnified a thousand times. Until then, there had been no such thing as amplification. The human voice came in weak and thick. Armstrong's discovery made the tones roll out until, by comparison, they seemed to come from a pipe-organ, and made them round and full. It immediately became possible to transmit music. And the mechanism was as suitable for transmitting as for receiving, requiring only to be enlarged.

This was the famous regenerative circuit, upon which every transmitting device used in the big broadcasting stations today is based. It is the circuit that, to this day, is used in the best receiving sets.

"THE regenerative circuit," said Major Armstrong, "was not an invention but a discovery. While I was trying to discover the principles that underlie De Forest's audion I happened to discover in the plate-circuit high-frequency oscillations of perhaps 500,000 cycles to the second where I had expected to hear only spark tones of 1,000 cycles. I was mystified. In the light of all that was then known, those high-frequency oscillations should not have been there. I determined to tune up the rest of the circuit so that it would be resonant with these waves and see what would happen.

"I did not have to wait to see what would happen. Instantly, the signals came through, clear and strong. A moment before, the signals had come through so faintly that they could barely be heard when the phones were on my head. I could now lay the phones on the table and hear the signals all over the upper part of the house in which I was at work."

This was in 1912. During the next few months, he conducted many experiments to confirm his discovery. Years before he had strung an aerial from the top of the Palisades to a boat anchored in the Hudson, 500 feet below, in an effort to get signals from Ireland, but now with an aerial strung out of a window he could hear code-signals from San Francisco, Honolulu and Ireland. He even plainly heard San Francisco and Honolulu exchanging messages when each was frequently compelled to ask the other to repeat. Those two stations, though only about 2,100 miles apart, could not, under the old system, hear each other plainly, while Armstrong, on the banks of the Hudson, more than 5,000 miles from Honolulu, could hear both stations plainly.

Major Armstrong is not of the type that I should expect to see much elated or excited over anything. His head is firmly poised between his shoulders. But his discovery at least caused him to go to Professor Pupin, with whom he had experimented for two years at Columbia, with the tale of his triumph. Pupin could hardly believe, yet he could not doubt. It seemed impossible to hear signals from Honolulu, but he knew Armstrong. A little later, Armstrong let Pupin listen to Honolulu.

Some time afterwards, the chief engineer of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company was calling upon Pupin, and the professor told him what Armstrong had done. The telephone engineer was only mildly interested. The thing seemed incredible. It was like being told that someone had received signals from the Milky Way. The best proof that the information did not sink in is afforded by the fact that it was not until the next year that the telephone engineer became sufficiently interested to go to Columbia to hear the Armstrong regenerative circuit in operation.

Armstrong was on hand with everything nailed down. A box that could not be lifted because of screws covered the mechanism. This is the way that inventors ordinarily proceed when they are demonstrating devices not yet patented. All that the chief engineer saw was a box with some knobs on it. But he heard Honolulu. He heard San Francisco. And he heard Ireland.

This is the story of the invention of the regenerative circuit. Armstrong had done little more than to couple the plate and grid circuits of a vacuum tube—but that was enough. He had made the radio-phone. It was no longer a laboratory toy. It had a voice and it had lungs.

Armstrong next entered the second phase of an inventor's life—litigation over patent claims. He had invented and patented a revolutionary device in an important art, but immediately after his hour of victory came his hour of danger. A corporation appeared to be infringing upon his rights. At least, he thought so. It, too, had patents. It claimed to be able to do, in a different way, what Armstrong's regenerative circuit does. Armstrong took the corporation into court and a struggle began that was to last five years.

Here, perhaps, is the place to tell the story of the difficulty that Armstrong had in obtaining a patent. The difficulty was caused solely by lack of money. He showed his regenerative circuit to his father, let him hear the signals from Honolulu and other distant points, and asked for money to get a patent. The significance of the device had failed to impress its importance upon the elder Armstrong and he declined to advance the necessary funds on the ground that experimenting in radio might interfere with the young man's studies at Columbia.

Appeal was next made to an uncle. He, too, refused to advance money, but gave the young man some advice that afterwards proved useful. He told him to make a drawing of the regenerative circuit and have it witnessed and dated by a notary.

BY THE TIME the case came to trial, the notary was dead. Armstrong, in the meantime, had scraped up money with which to get a patent, but the notary's signature became of importance as bearing upon the time when the invention was made. Armstrong's drawing was perhaps the most important paper that the notary, in his whole life, had ever witnessed, but it happened that the signature was utterly unlike many other acknowledged signatures of the notary that the other side was able to bring into court. The difference was so great that the other side began to whisper about forgery.

Armstrong was in a dilemma. He knew the signature was genuine but was without present means to prove it. A furious inquiry was begun to find everybody who had ever seen the notary write. Finally, the mystery was solved. The notary had two signatures—one with many fancy flourishes that he used as a public official, and another—a plain one—that he used on ordinary occasions. Apparently, Armstrong had impressed the notary so little that in witnessing the drawing the notary had used his ordinary, business signature, shorn of flourishes.

This point was satisfactorily cleared. The question of priority was still in the balance, however, and the other side, with an impressive array of legal talent, was fighting every step of the way. Armstrong then brought into court fellow students at Columbia to whom he had told the story of his invention and exhibited his device when it was made. Armstrong's chum brought his diary into court and showed an entry in which under date of December 7, 1912, he had written: "Armstrong told me he had a connection for intensifying sound." The question of priority was eventually definitely settled in favor of Armstrong.

But the only question involved was not that of priority. Armstrong next set out to demonstrate that the other side was not, as it asserted, producing his effects in another way, but were using the exact methods that he himself employed in his regenerative circuit. To make this demonstration, it was necessary to take his paraphernalia into court and give radio exhibitions. Again and again he did this. Between exhibitions, he was toiling in his workshop, devising new methods by which he could demonstrate to the court, by actual radio operations, that the opposition device was based upon the principles that he had discovered and embodied in his own patents.

IT WAS A tremendous task for so young a man. It wore upon him physically, but weighed him down even worse financially. He had invented and patented a device so important to the wireless art that licenses to operate under it had been taken out by the Marconi Company, the Goldschmidt Company and the Atlantic Communication Company—yet he was threatened with financial disaster.

Then, in 1917, the United States went to war. Armstrong immediately saw that his duties lay overseas instead of in America. He reached what he considered was an understanding with the other litigant to let the case rest until after the war.

His duties abroad began in October, 1917. By January 1, 1918, he had recognized the nature of his problem in France and prepared to cope with it. His second great invention has its roots here, so it is well to go into the situation carefully.

What was happening was this: The Germans were sending short-wave code messages between stations a mile or two apart. These messages were of the utmost importance to us, but the waves were so weak that our stations, perhaps ten miles away, could not get all of them, and there was no known way of amplifying short waves. The Germans could hear because their stations were only a mile or two apart. Our stations missed many of the messages because the American stations were perhaps ten miles away from the sending stations.

The importance of the messages and the necessity of getting all of them is apparent when their nature is explained. When such messages as could be picked up were decoded, the character of the sending station could be determined by the nature of the message. The contents of one message might indicate that it was sent from headquarters, another from an artillery station, and so on. If the messages indicated the movement of headquarters, or the massing of any kind of equipment in a particular locality, the information was equivalent to a notification to us of what the Germans intended to do next and where they intended to do it.

Armstrong's problem was to learn how to amplify short waves. The Germans were sending on waves so short that the cycles ran up perhaps to 3,000,000 a second. There was no known method of amplifying oscillations of such high frequency. Armstrong solved the problem by what is known as the super-heterodyne process.

Ⓐ Judge Julius M. Mayer said of Armstrong: "It is necessary to recognize that he is a remarkably clear thinker. His achievement was the work of a thoughtful and imaginative mind."

What Armstrong did was this: He found the exact oscillation of the German waves. Say they were 3,000,000. Beside these, Armstrong set up oscillations of 3,050,000. When waves of different frequency are set up together, each set of waves makes an audible note, and the two sets combine to make a third. The third note represented the 50,000 difference between the German waves and those produced by Armstrong. Armstrong amplified the third note produced by the other two, and by a trick of nature that is not easily explained, this amplification produced the effect of amplifying the German 3,000,000.

"THIS is the only invention," said Armstrong, "that I ever worked out in cold blood. My other two 'inventions' were discoveries."

Armstrong's old professors, and one of the United States judges who took part in his litigation do not, however, see the matter quite in that light. Judge Julius M. Mayer of the United States District court for Southern New York said in a written opinion: "It is necessary, at this point, to recognize that Armstrong is a remarkably clear thinker. His modest demeanor belies his extraordinary ability. His achievement" (the regenerative circuit) "was not the result of an accident, but the consummation of a thoughtful and imaginative mind." The professor who said that Armstrong was not especially brilliant as a student also said that "had it not been for experimenters like Armstrong we should know but little today of the action of the three-electrode tube."

At any rate, Major Armstrong succeeded in amplifying the German short waves and turning over their secrets to the Americans. Armstrong patented his device while still in France and later told one of Marconi's engineers about it. Marconi, like everybody else, had been unable to amplify short waves. When he was in America last summer he talked about little else. He is amplifying them now by Armstrong's method.

America was far away and patent-litigation was even farther away when in February, following the armistice, both were suddenly brought to Armstrong's attention. American headquarters had been moved to Spa, Belgium, and set up in the house formerly occupied by Hindenburg. No suitable equipment was at hand with which to set up a powerful radio station, but Armstrong pieced together a number of small sets and in the cellar set up a station.

"THERE was a blinding snow storm the day I completed the operation," he said. "Nobody was feeling any too cheerful and I was no better than the others. I had just finished the installation of the station when a call came in over it from Paris. I was told by our operator in Paris that he had a cable for me and I was asked if I would accept it over our radio. I said I would and he read the cable. It conveyed to me the information that the other litigant in my patent case had expressed the determination to take steps to resume court hearings at once. I was 3,000 miles from home and knew I could not get back right away. It did not make me feel very good."

C. De Forest's audion was a challenge to the boy Armstrong, but in three years he understood it better than anybody else in the world.

IN DUE time Major Armstrong returned to America and the fight over the rights to the regenerative circuit was resumed in the courts. The litigation lasted until March, 1922, when Armstrong's rights were finally and completely vindicated. It had been judicially determined that the regenerative circuit was his and that nobody else had any rights whatsoever in connection with it.

This judicial decision was not, however, the only result of the litigation. Perhaps the most important result was Armstrong's third and greatest invention—the super-regenerative receiver. While making radio demonstrations to the court in the litigation over his first invention, Armstrong observed phenomena that led to the invention of the super-regenerative circuit.

The regenerative circuit, that Armstrong invented in 1912, magnified sounds 1,000 times. The super-regenerative circuit magnifies the regenerative circuit's product 100,000 times. In other words, these two Armstrong inventions magnify sound 100,000,000 times.

But that is only a part of what the super-regenerative circuit does. It eliminates from radio speech and music all distortion. If you have ever listened to a radio, you know what this means. The regenerative circuit, good as it is, does not do this. Music is often jammed and choked until it shrieks. Super-regenerative music is delivered as it was received by the transmitter. It is as good as the singer or the instrument provided for transmission, that is it loses none of its original quality.

The super-regenerative also gets rid of about fifty percent of the assorted noises that other types of receivers mix with the music and speech. The small boy with his spark set is no longer a terror to elderly gentlemen who wish to hear grand opera without interruption. Spark-signals are not picked up by the super-regenerative.

THE THREATENED war between the amateurs and the general public—or at least the listening public—is therefore off. So far as the owners of super-regenerative sets are concerned, amateurs may practice whenever they please, without at all interfering with the pleasure of others.

The super-regenerative needs no aerial—in fact, can endure no aerial. The set itself is so powerful an amplifier that if an aerial were attached the vacuum tubes would be instantly paralyzed by the vibration. A little inside loop, three or four feet square, is enough. This, in itself, is sufficient to work a revolution in radio. Perhaps two or three million aeriels have gone up since last March. They are likely to come down almost as rapidly as they went up now that Armstrong has perfected a device which does away with the necessity for an outside wire.

Perhaps the most important feature of the new instrument is that it makes possible the use of shorter wave-lengths. A wave-length through the air is something like a road on land. The long wave-lengths find a practical limitation in the power that is required to produce them. This limitation is not imposed upon short waves. The field of short waves is, to all intents and purposes, without limit. The difficulty, heretofore, has been to amplify the short waves. The super-regenerative circuit does it. It does more. It increases the amplification as the waves are shortened. Each time a wave-length is cut in two, the amplification is multiplied by four.

Another little fact comes in at this point to work wonders. As a wave is decreased in length, the number of oscillations is enormously increased. It is the old story of shortening a violin string by placing a finger upon it to make a higher note. Now, it is identity of oscillations that causes two sending stations to "jam." The super-regenerative set's ability to amplify short wave-lengths means that a variation of one meter, in the scale, makes a tremendous difference in the number of oscillations to the second. In a ten-meter wave, there are 30,000,000 oscillations to the second. At eleven meters, there are 27,272,270 oscillations. This difference of 2,727,720 oscillations to the second is sufficient to make it possible to tune out either station, though they were broadcasting side by side, without lessening the volume or the clearness of the music or speech from the other station.

THE super-regenerative is also likely to make it possible to reach out a little farther—to receive from a greater distance. Major Armstrong does not look for much in this direction, but some home-made super-regenerative sets are getting good results at 700 miles.

All of these additions to the art of wireless telephony have been made merely by juggling with forces and devices already known. Armstrong has taken the tools with which he and others had worked and made better use of them. His latest device is more complex than anything that preceded it.

"One has to know something about wireless," he said, "to put it together and operate it."

I had heard statements to the effect that the super-regenerative requires almost expert knowledge to tune in. I asked Major Armstrong if this was so.

"No; I wouldn't put it that way," he replied. "A set that is not properly made requires a magician and two college professors to operate, but a set that is made right can be operated by any amateur. I differentiate, in saying this, between amateurs and novices. The sets that have been reported as difficult to tune in were probably not made right. I have seen only one published 'hook-up' that was correct. The manufacturers not yet having placed the super-regenerative on the market, the only machines in existence are home-made. Oh, there are a few bootleggers who are selling what purport to be super-regenerative sets, but such sets are improperly made. The public has not, therefore, yet had an opportunity to try out the super-regenerative."

MAJOR ARMSTRONG'S personality is interesting. He is of the blue-eyed type who, throughout all of our racial history, have excelled in doing big things. His eyes do not flash. I can quite understand why one of his old professors said that he was not, as a student, "especially brilliant, and in many of his courses did rather poorly." One who has studied him can also understand how he has been able three times to revolutionize the radio. As an inventor, he has been able to get results because he is both a close observer and a hard thinker. Anyone who can both see and think—which is a much rarer combination than you may realize—can get along in this world—and improve it a little as he goes along.

Major Armstrong is a fine example of the extent to which an idea can take hold of and dominate a human being. When a problem seizes him he gives to it everything he has. He did this with the radio, again and again, sometimes working years on a single thing. Yet I suspect that his normal attitude is rather one of repose. His mind really begins to glow only when it is energized by a problem that appeals to him. Some of his university studies apparently did not present a challenge that his type of mind cared to accept. But he has the rare gift of observation and the equally rare gift of gathering energy as he goes along and staying with the problem until it is solved. A more modest man of his ability I never met. Nor is there any deception about it. I once asked him a question concerning the social significance of the radio-phone. He replied that the question was beyond him—that a man must be much more than thirty years of age to have thought so far. I asked him another question to which he gave the answer: "I know very little about what happens between the time when a radio-signal leaves the transmitter and the time when it comes into the receiver—the long gap in the air is a blank to me."

Major Armstrong's modesty—amounting almost to diffidence—is so great that he will be among the last persons in the world to realize that he has won his way into the short list of the world's great inventors. His name is already stamped so deeply into the radio that it will soon be almost a synonym for it, just as the name of Edison suggests the electric light.

AT THAT, his work has just been begun, though he gives no sign of realizing it. When I talked with him, he seemed to be chiefly interested in getting to Europe for a vacation. He wished to renew some old acquaintances that he had made in London and Paris in war-time. The fever of work was not in his blood. "I have sold to the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Company every patent I have," he said with a smile of relief, "and I'm now going to have a rest."

I tempted him with a question as to how far the radio had developed and how much time would be required to complete its development.

"Oh," he replied, "the development of the radio has just begun. It has hardly started. I believe it will be transformed within the next few years. I think its development will be much more rapid than has been the development of the automobile. I believe more brain-power has been put into the radio than was put into the automobile."

I asked him what tendency he expected radio development to take, but he replied that he did not know. "I haven't enough imagination to answer that," he said. "The biggest problem that I can see is the elimination of static. That is a terrific problem. It is the only one I ever encountered that, approached from any direction, always seems to be a stone-wall. I suppose, however, that static will be done away with, sometime."

If the radio is to be transformed, Armstrong will be one of the men who will transform it. The present generation is just beginning to hear of him, but the world will a long time ring with his name. No man can do what he has already done without taking his place among the world's notable men. Armstrong's ability to become interested will make him work, and his ability to work will spread his fame everywhere.

By

CONNIE MARTIN has never had a sweetheart, though she thinks herself richly entitled to one. She has been much too busy as the village dressmaker in a small New England port for such frivolity. She was born at sea with the captain of a freighter for a father, a circus acrobat for a mother. Of course, when her parents died she came ashore to live in her father's cottage and be watched over by her uncle, Captain Martin and his wife, Aunt Hepsy. She has been making dresses for ten years and while she has occasionally thought of a beau she has never had one, much to the chagrin of the villagers who expected the circus temperament to break out. Connie is sea-goin' and proud of it; also she is the owner of a freighter now stuck safely in the mud of the Ganges. She could be salvaged, the boat, of course, but it would cost some money, about two thousand dollars Captain Martin thinks. The boat and a diamond necklace, that's all Connie has except her own two hands. The necklace was given to her mother as a wedding present by P. T. Barnum and is valued at five thousand dollars. Mrs. Schuyler-Payne, whose yacht is in the harbor, is growing stout and she visits Connie to gain relief. It occurs to Fred Gwynne, who accompanies her, that the Barnum necklace could be made to serve as a crusher for the social up-start, Mrs. Sully. But Connie refuses to sell and hustles the visitors out because she is expecting company for dinner. The "company" is Bilge Smith, a plain gob in the United States navy, with whom Connie had picked up an acquaintance the night before. Outside there is the sound of whistling and the voices of sailors calling to each other. There is a knock at the door and Connie opening it, reveals Smith standing there.

Q. "Eleanor, Jean and Anna," by George W. Bellows, which was awarded high honors at Pittsburgh, is recognized as one of the finest achievements of American portraiture.

The Medal of the First Class

By Willard Huntington Wright

IN THESE days of violent esthetic partisanship, academic awards are not infrequently the signal for controversies and disputes. There are critics, painters and connoisseurs who are ever ready to protest a jury's decision because of its discord with their own individual judgments. But the conferring of the Medal of the First Class on Mr. George W. Bellows's "Eleanor, Jean and Anna," by the jury of the Twenty-first International Exhibition at the Carnegie Institute, can scarcely fail to meet with general approval, whatever one's personal predilections. Here is a work of portraiture which not only is its creator's finest canvas, but which, in its particular field, stands as one of the sincerest and most competent examples of contemporary American art.

Nor is this award an immediate and unconsidered adjudgment. The picture was painted over a year ago; and before its recent submission for honors, it had attracted widespread attention of a highly favorable nature. When on exhibition in the spring of 1921 it was designated by a critic in The International Studio as "the achievement of the season."

In this picture Mr. Bellows has accomplished a difficult feat. He has lifted portraiture out of the status of a mere profession, and conferred upon it a genuinely esthetic distinction. In portraits—especially single figures—the art qualities are too often deputed to the demands of documentation and personal verisimilitude. This is why portraiture—even in the hands of the most capable practitioners—seldom attains to the higher realms of creative achievement. We have but to contemplate the works of such masters as El Greco, Rembrandt and Cézanne to realize that portraiture can be made an exalted and enduring art. But it requires a particular type of genius to adhere to a definitely limited and unalterable subject, and at the same time to conceive a picture wherein the form, tones, structure and organization will possess a profound [Continued on page 143]

BOOK of the Month

The Country Beyond

By James Oliver Curwood

Plenty of our readers will be glad that this time for The Book of the Month we chose for our thirty-minute condensation a novel of the out-of-doors.

NOT FAR from the rugged and storm-whipped north shore of Lake Superior, and south of the Kaministiquia, yet not as far south as the Rainy River waterway, there lay a paradise lost in the heart of a wilderness world—and in that paradise “a little corner of hell.”

That was what the girl had called it once upon a time, when sobbing out the shame and the agony of it to herself. That was before Peter had come to leaven the drab of her life. But the hell was still there.

Just under Cragg's Ridge lay the paradise, a meadow-like sweep of plain that stretched down to the edge of Clearwater Lake, with clumps of poplars and white birch and darker tapestries of spruce and balsams dotting it like islets in a verdant green. The flowers were two weeks ahead of their time and the sweet perfumes of late June, instead of May, rose up out of the plain and already there was nesting in the velvety splashes of timber.

THUS MR. CURWOOD opens his latest story of the great Canadian outdoors. In the midst of this setting lives Nada, “seventeen, growing on eighteen,” whose beauty and charm have captivated Jolly Roger McKay, outlaw, hiding in a neighboring shack from the Mounted Police. McKay seems not a bad sort, in spite of his reputation, and he is desperately in love with Nada. The girl has rather a sorry time of it. Her god-father is a brute, unprincipled and cruel. Her only companion is a three-months old pup, and her only friend is Jolly Roger who has just recently come into her life. Her god-father, Jed Hawkins, is among other things a boot-legger. It was by accident that Nada and Peter, the pup, one afternoon stumbled upon him in one of his hiding places while he was busy filling flasks from a jug.

NADA tapped the end of her stick against the rock, and like a shot the man whirled about to face them. His face turned livid when he saw who it was, and he drew himself up until he stood on his feet, his two big fists clenched, his yellow teeth snarling at her.

“You damned—spy!” he cried chokingly. “If you was a man—I’d kill you!”

The girl did not shrink. Her face did not whiten. Two bright spots flamed in her cheeks, and Hawkins saw the triumph shining in her eyes. And there was a new thing in the odd twist of her red lips, as she said tauntingly:

“If I was a man, Jed Hawkins—you’d run!”

He took a step toward her. “You’d run,” she repeated, meeting him squarely, and taking a tighter grip of her stick. “I ain’t ever seen you hit anything but a woman, an’ a girl, or some poor animal that didn’t dare bite back. You’re a coward, Jed Hawkins, a low-down, sneakin’, whiskey-sellin’ coward—and you oughta die!”

Even Peter sensed the cataclysmic change that had come in this moment between the two big rocks. It held something in the air, like the impending crash of dynamite, or the falling down of the world.

The boot-legger, for a moment, was stunned. She was defying him, spying upon him—the brat he had fed and brought up for ten years! Her beauty, as she stood there, did not hold him back. It was punishment she needed, a beating, a hair-pulling, until there was no breath left in her impudent body. He sprang forward and Peter let out a wild yip as he saw Nada raise her stick. But she was a moment too slow. The man's hand caught it, and his right hand shot forward and buried itself in the thick, soft mass of her hair.

It was then that something broke loose in Peter. For this day, this hour, this minute the gods of destiny had given him birth. All things in the world were blotted out for him except one—the six inches of naked shank between the boot-legger's trouser-leg and his shoe. He dove in. His white teeth, sharp as stiletto-points, sank into it. A wild and terrible yell came from Jed Hawkins as he loosed the girl's hair. Peter heard the yell and his teeth sank deeper into the flesh.

It was the girl, more than Peter, who realized the horror of what followed. The man bent down and his powerful fingers closed round Peter's scrawny neck, and Peter felt his wind suddenly shut off, and his mouth opened. Then Jed Hawkins drew back the arm that held him, as he would have drawn it back to fling a stone.

With a scream the girl tore at him as his arm straightened out, and Peter went hurtling through the air. Her stick struck him fiercely across the face, and in that same moment there was a sickening, crushing thud as Peter's loosely-jointed little body struck against the face of the great rock. When Nada turned Peter was groveling in the sand, his hips and back broken down, but his bright eyes were on her, and without a whimper or a whine he was struggling to drag himself toward her. Only Jolly Roger could tell the story of how Peter's mother had died for a woman, and in this moment it must have been that her spirit entered into Peter's soul, for the pain of his terrible hurt was forgotten in his desire to drag himself back to the feet of the girl, and die facing her enemy—the man. He did not know that he was dragging his broken body only an inch at a time through the sand. But the girl saw the terrible truth, and with a cry of agony which all of Hawkins, torture could not have wrung from her, she ran to him and fell upon her knees, and gathered him tenderly into her arms. Then in a flash she was on her feet, facing Jed Hawkins like a little demon.

"For that I'll kill you!" she panted. "I will. I'll kill you!"

The blow of her stick had half blinded the boot-legger, but he was coming toward her. Swift as a bird, Nada turned and ran, holding Peter in her arms.

CROONING to the broken, whimpering Peter, the girl ran on. She lulled the pup with her words of love and all the time she was thinking that to save the dog's life she must get him into the care of Jolly Roger. Perhaps there was also a thought of the protection she, too, would find at the side of this strong man. So she came to the fording place on Sucker Creek. But the stream was swollen and running by like a millrace.

SHE PUT her lips down to Peter's fuzzy little face, and held them there for a moment.

"We'll make it, Peter," she whispered. "We ain't afraid, are we, baby? We'll make it—sure—sure—we'll make it—"

She set out bravely, and the current swished about her ankles, to her knees, to her hips. And then, suddenly, unseen hands under the water seemed to rouse themselves, and she felt them pulling and tugging at her as the water deepened to her waist. In another moment she was fighting, fighting to hold her feet, struggling to keep the forces from driving her downstream. And then came the supreme moment, close to the shore for which she was striving. She felt herself giving away, and she cried out brokenly for Peter not to be afraid. And then something drove pitilessly against her body, and she flung out one arm, holding Peter close with the other—and caught hold of a bit of stub that protruded like a handle from the black and slippery log the flood-water had brought down upon her.

"We're all right, Peter," she cried, even in that moment when she knew she had lost. "We're all right—"

And then suddenly the bright glory of her head went down, and with her went Peter, still held to her breast under the sweeping rush of the flood.

Even then it was thought of Peter that filled her brain. Somehow she was not afraid. She was not terrified, as she had often been of the flood-rush of waters that smashed down the creeks in springtime. An inundating roar was over her, under her, and all about her; it beat in a hissing thunder against the drums of her ears, yet it did not frighten her as she had sometimes been frightened. Even in that black chaos which was swiftly suffocating the life from her, unspoken words of cheer for Peter formed in her heart, and she struggled to hold him to her, while with the other hand she fought to raise herself by the stub of the log to which she clung.

Suddenly she felt a force pulling her from above. It was the big log turning again to that point of equilibrium which for a space her weight had destroyed. In the edge of a quieter pool, where the water swirled but did not rush, her brown head appeared, and then her white face. With a last mighty effort, she thrust up Peter so that his dripping body was on the log. Sobbingly she filled her lungs with air. Vainly she tried to drag herself up beside Peter, and in the struggle, she raised herself a little so that the low-hanging branch of a tree swept her from the log.

With a cry she reached out for Peter. But he was gone, the log was gone, and she felt a vicious pulling at her hair. For a few moments the current pounded against her body and the tree limb swayed back and forth as it held her there by her hair.

BUT Nada was not destined to die in the roaring water. After a time, as she saw Peter dragging himself from the water below her, she wrenched herself free, and so the two came to the shore, exhausted but safe. Then they made their way to the hiding place of Jolly Roger. He set Peter right and kept him as his own. The girl, too, would gladly have stayed, but Roger sent her back to Hawkins' home. He could not ask her to share the life of an outlaw. Peter, grown strong and intelligent, managed to warn Roger of a visitor at the cabin. Thus it was that Officer Cassidy, of the Royal Mounted Police whirled about from the window through which he was looking for Roger and found himself covered by a business-like automatic. In the midst of this, his second escape from Cassidy, Roger made a bargain that if he outwitted the officer a third time, Cassidy was to resign from the force. Roger and Peter, with two hours start, went out into the wilderness. They could not, however, desert Nada. They lingered as near as possible and the time came when Roger was willing to take Nada with him. Hawkins had arranged to sell her, for a thousand dollars, to a railroad man. The night of Nada's escape came, and Jolly Roger waited long for her. At last he and Peter set out in search of her and on the road —.

AHEAD of them, staggering toward them, sobbing as she came was Nada. Jolly Roger's blazing eyes saw everything in that vivid light of the moon. Her hair was tangled and twisted about her shoulders and over her breast. One arm was bare where the sleeve had been torn away, and her girlish breast gleamed white where her waist had been stripped half from her body. And then she saw Jolly Roger in the trail, with wide-open reaching arms, and with a cry such as Peter had never heard come from her lips before she ran into them, and held up her face to him in the yellow moonlight. In her eyes—great, tearless, burning pools—he saw the tragedy and yet it was only that, and not horror, not despair, not the other thing. His arms closed crushingly about her. Her slim body seemed to become a part of him. Her hot lips reached up and clung to his.

And then,

"Did—he get you—to—Mooney's shack——"

He felt her body stiffen against him.

"No," she panted. "I fought—every inch. He dragged me, and hit me, and tore my clothes—but I fought. And up there—in the trail—he turned his back for a moment, when he thought I was done, and I hit him with a club. And he's there, now, on his back——"

She did not finish. Jolly Roger thrust her out from him, arm's length. A cloud under the moon hid his face. But his voice was low, and terrible.

"Nada, go to the Missioner's as fast as you can," he said, fighting to speak coolly. "Take Peter—and go. You will make it before the storm breaks. I am going back to have a few words with Jed Hawkins—alone. Then I will join you and the Missioner will marry us——"

ROGER found Hawkins lying in the road where Nada had struck him down. Apparently the man was dead. To shield Nada, Roger created evidence to prove himself the murderer and returned to Nada. His plans were changed. He could not permit Nada to marry a man against whom the crime of murder could be proved. Leaving Nada and Peter with the Missioner, he set out alone into the wilderness. But Nada had no fear of the fate that awaited Roger and with Peter, she started in pursuit. Exhausted she sent Peter on as a message to Roger that she was near. The man misunderstood and went on North with Peter as companion. After long wandering he came to a settlement of Cree Indians—Indians whom he had saved from starving by robbing the post and delivering to them the stolen food. Here was Yellow Bird and her husband, Slim Buck, whom he had known for many years and for whom he had a warm affection. Here he was made welcome and after he had told his story to Yellow Bird, she communed with the spirits and foretold his fortune:

"SIT DOWN, Neekewa (Roger)," she whispered, drawing the ropes of her hair about her as if she were cold. Then she drew a slim hand over her eyes and shivered.

"It is well, Neekewa," she spoke softly. "I have gone through the clouds to where lives Oo-Mee, the Pigeon, (Nada). I found her crying on a trail. I whispered to her and happiness came, and that happiness is going to live—for Neekewa and the Pigeon. It cannot die. It cannot be killed. The Red Coated men of the Great White Father will never destroy it. You will live. She will live. You will meet again—in happiness. And happiness will follow ever after. That much I learned, Neekewa In happiness—you will meet again."

"Where? When?" whispered Jolly Roger, his heart beating with sudden swiftness.

Again Yellow Bird passed her hand over her eyes, and as she held it there for a moment she bowed her head until Jolly Roger could see only her dew-wet hair, and she said:

"In the Country Beyond, Neekewa."

Her eyes were looking at him again, big, dark and filled with mystery.

"And where is this country, Yellow Bird?" he asked, a strange chill driving the warmth out of his heart. "You mean—up there?" And he pointed to the gray sky above them.

"No, it is happiness to come in life, not in death," said Yellow Bird slowly. "It is not beyond the stars. It is——"

He waited, leaning toward her.

"In the Country Beyond," she said (Continued on page 134)

Q. How long could you expect Lapidowitz to keep his fortune of twenty-five dollars after he was tempted to guess under which shell the little pea was hidden?

Lapidowitz Meets Two Gonifs

By Bruno Lessing

Illustrated by M. Leone Bracker

IT IS CURIOUS the way things happen. The watched pot will not boil but the unwatched factory bursts into flames. The person you wait for does not appear while the one whom you do not want to see bumps right into you. There are various explanations of this phenomenon, the most satisfactory one being that, at times, a Djinn, Jinx or Universal Hoodoo controls our affairs. If this contrariness of life were due to the binomial theorem or the precession of the equinoxes it would be rather unsatisfactory to most people because most people do not understand such things. But a Hoodoo is as satisfactory as it is convincing. All this, however, is merely by the way—en passant, so to speak.

Karesh, of Karesh & Mandel (millinery trimmings), sat in his office gazing at a telegram that had just come from Chicago and murmuring, disconsolately "Oy! Oy! Oy!" over and over again. The telegram was from Rogitsky Bros., his biggest customer.

"Mr. O'Brien our new buyer," it ran, "left for New York to-day. Will stop at Ritz. Take good care of him. We expect take him into partnership. Give him good time and extend credit up to two thousand if he requires for cash purchases from other concerns to save time."

Affixed to the signature was a code word attesting to the genuineness of the message. Karesh remembered how profitable it had always been to extend courtesies to Abey Levy, the former buyer, and, in a vague way, he wondered why Rogitsky Bros. had let him go. It even occurred to him to send for Levy and, perhaps, employ him. But these were merely dim, side thoughts. The center of his mental stage was occupied, at that moment, by the one big thought: his partner was away, two of his salesmen were sick and he, himself, was on jury duty in a long-winded case that stretched from ten o'clock in the morning until five in the afternoon every day.

"Tsuros! Tsuros!" he exclaimed. "A good customer and I got nobody to look after him. Oy! Oy!"

HE US now to another scene, viz: Milken's café. Here sat Lapidowitz, the schnorrer, waiting impatiently for Mr. Smith. He had met Mr. Smith the evening before and Mr. Smith had bought him a good dinner and had promised to meet him early the next morning. It was now early the next morning and Lapidowitz was hoping that Mr. Smith would soon arrive and buy him a breakfast. Lapidowitz was hungry and Milken had refused to extend any further credit.

One of the qualities of a schnorrer—who is a sort of sublimated loafer—is that he is never surprised when anyone does anything for him. Lapidowitz had merely wondered how Mr. Smith had ever happened to drop into Milken's café.

Lapidowitz, the previous evening had asked a waiter to bring him a glass of slivovitz and the waiter had told him that Milken had given orders that no more drinks were to be served to him until his bill was paid, when he heard a gentle voice behind him.

"I'll buy you a slivovitz, if you like."

Turning swiftly, he beheld a pleasant-looking, pale-faced young man with eyes that did not appear to match, seated at a table behind him. Within two minutes Lapidowitz was drinking to the stranger's health.

"Might I ask what your name is?" he inquired.

"It's Mr. Smith," the young man replied and, observing Lapidowitz's intent gaze and astonished look, added, "I got a glass eye."

For Lapidowitz had suddenly observed that one of Mr. Smith's eyes was moving in a queer orbit by itself.

"That's too bad," murmured the schnorrer, sympathetically, to his new friend.

"It is a pretty bad one," said Mr. Smith, in a matter-of-fact tone, "but I'm getting some new ones in. I'm just down here on a business deal and I'm looking for information. By the way, if you have nothing else to do, how'd you like to take dinner with me?" asked the engaging Smith.

Lapidowitz had never in his life had anything to do that could possibly interfere with accepting an invitation to dinner. During the evening meal he found the stranger curiously eager for information concerning the financial standing of the store-keepers of the neighborhood.

"I'M A CREDIT man," Mr. Smith explained. "Our company just wants to know how much cash people have on hand."

Lapidowitz gave him a list of the well-to-do men whom he knew and added many sidelights upon their personalities which seemed to appeal to his companion.

"I guess," said Mr. Smith, "you're just the man I'm looking for. I'll meet you right here to-morrow morning."

Karesh, of Karesh & Mandel (millinery trimmings), on his way to court stopped at Milken's café for a cup of coffee.

"Why do you look so gloomish?" asked Milken.

"Nothing but tsuros," replied Karesh, with a shrug of his shoulders. As he sipped his coffee he explained his predicament to the café proprietor.

"Say," exclaimed Milken. "I know what you could do. There's that fellow Lapidowitz sitting over there. He's a regular schnorrer but he's a nice fellow when he don't owe you any money. Why you don't get him to take your customer around and give him a good time? He ain't got nothing else to do."

Karesh turned swiftly and looked at Lapidowitz.

"IT AIN'T a bad idea at all," said he. "Bring him over."

And thus it happened that Lapidowitz received a commission to call for Mr. O'Brien at the Ritz and entertain him until Karesh returned from court.

"Here is twenty-five dollars," said Karesh. "That will pay for a lunch and maybe a matinée. If he wants a ride around in a carriage telephone to the Eureka Stables on Houston Street and tell them to charge it to me. Be nice to him and do whatever he wants. Only be sure to bring him to my office at half-past five. Then I give you something for yourself."

Hardly had Karesh departed when Mr. Smith arrived. Lapidowitz greeted him with great dignity.

"Yesterday you bought me a dinner," he said. "Now, Mr. Smith, I invite you to eat breakfast with me."

The newcomer stared curiously at Lapidowitz.

"Mr. Smith? Oh, yes," said he. "I remember I told you my name. But you were broke yesterday and now you seem to be flush. What happened?"

Lapidowitz explained the situation to him and Mr. Smith was greatly interested.

"I'll tell you what I'll do," he volunteered. "I'll go along with you and help you entertain him. I know all the places in town this man would want to see."

❶ "Couldn't you make him give me back my twenty-five dollars?" Lapidowitz begged. "Why, you big bonehead," exclaimed the detective. "He ain't got it. Your friend O'Brien took every cent."

The idea appealed to Lapidowitz and so it happened that, an hour later, they both arrived at the Ritz and inquired for Mr. O'Brien.

They had hardly uttered the name to the clerk when a short, red-faced, keen-eyed man standing at the news-counter close to the desk, turned quickly toward them.

"I'm Mr. O'Brien," he said. "I heard you mention my name."

"Mr. Karesh said I should give you a good time," said Lapidowitz, extending his hand. "My name is Lapidowitz. This is my friend Mr. Smith."

O'Brien gazed from one to the other and then, ignoring the schnorrer, concentrated his gaze upon Mr. Smith.

"Are you in our line, too? Millinery trimmings and silks?"

"No," said Mr. Smith. "I'm a gentleman. I'm just killing time today and if there's anything I can show you around this little burg, I'm at your disposal."

"Did Mr. Karesh say anything about two thousand dollars?" asked O'Brien.

"Not to me," said Lapidowitz. "He is by the court on jury duty and he said I should bring you to his office after five o'clock."

O'Brien seemed disappointed at this piece of information. "That's too bad," said he. "I had some important things to get this morning and I need the cash. I told my firm to arrange it with Mr. Karesh."

"If it's just a couple of hundred dollars to help out for a little while," said Mr. Smith, amiably, "I might help you out. But a couple of thousand isn't in my line."

"Oh, don't bother about it," exclaimed O'Brien, airily. "I guess I can wait till half-past five. I've got four or five hundred with me."

"Four or five hundred dollars?" said Mr. Smith, eagerly. "I guess you won't starve. Suppose before we go anywhere we drop around to my room? I don't live far from here and we can all have a drink."

"Suits me," said O'Brien, seizing Smith's arm and leading him out of the hotel.

"Me too it suits," thought Lapidowitz, trailing behind them and mentally figuring on how much he could save out of the twenty-five dollars he was expected to spend on the buyer from Chicago. Mr. Smith led them to his present residence, a rather dilapidated hotel on Th'rd Avenue.

"I don't believe in wasting my money on hotels that have to support elevators," he explained, with a cheerful smile to his two companions.

The room into which he conducted them contained no furnishings save what the hotel had provided. A black bag on the floor and a few magazines on the table were the only signs that it had recently been occupied. From this bag Mr. Smith produced a bottle. There was only one drinking glass in the room and from this they imbibed in turn. Then Mr. Smith produced a pack of playing cards.

"Do you fellows like card tricks?" he asked. "I used to be a wizard at them but I'm a little out of practice."

"Let's see what you can do," said O'Brien, jovially. "I'm like a kid with tricks."

Mr. Smith went through several amateur sleight-of-hand performances which greatly delighted Lapidowitz and seemed to interest O'Brien immensely.

"HERE'S one now," he said, "that's a puzzler. I take three cards in my hands. See them? One's an ace and the other two are picture cards. Now I just lay them down, slow-like, on the table and I bet you can't tell which one of the three is the ace."

It was the time-worn "3-card-monte" game which Lapidowitz had never seen before.

"I bet I know where is the ace," the schnorrer cried the moment Mr. Smith had laid down the cards.

"How much will you bet?" asked Mr. Smith.

"Five dollars," cried Lapidowitz, eagerly and confident. "Put me down for five, too," said O'Brien, good-naturedly. Mr. Smith turned over the card which they both had designated and, surely enough, it was the ace. With a crestfallen air he gave them each five dollars.

"I guess I'm out of practice," he said. "I didn't do it quick enough. Let's try it again." He repeated the performance, this time, if anything, more chumsily than before. Lapidowitz fairly trembled with eagerness to select the ace.

"How much d'ye bet this time?" asked Mr. Smith. "Thirty dollars," said Lapidowitz, eagerly drawing his fortune from his pocket. He would cheerfully have staked his life.

"Wait a second," said O'Brien. "How big a bet will ye take on the card this time?"

"I'm a sport," said Mr. Smith. "Easy come, easy go, is

Q. "I bet thirty dollars I know where is the ace," Lapidowitz cried. But his heart sank the moment he turned the card. It was not the ace.

my motto. All or nothing. If I'm sucker enough to gamble I deserve to lose. You say you got five hundred dollars with you? I'll cover it—I'll put up three hundred dollars cash and a check for two hundred and I'll go to the bank with you to get it cashed."

"Four hundred and fifty's what I got in cash," said O'Brien, counting out a roll of bills. "And your check is just as good as cash with me."

"Turn the card, Lappy," said Mr. Smith, gathering up all the money on the table. This time it was a picture card.

"Not bad, eh? For an amateur?" said Mr. Smith, as he stuffed the bills into his pocket. "Well, I'll tell you, boys. I'll go out with you and I'll blow this money in to give you a good time. How's that?"

Lapidowitz's heart had sunk the moment he beheld the wrong card. The money that Karesh had given him was gone and the five dollars that he had won so easily had vanished. But O'Brien cheered cheerfully.

"Put her there!" he cried laughing and holding out his hand. "You're a guy after me own heart. Now I'll tell you what'll do. This guy here"—he pointed a contemptuous thumb in Lapidowitz's direction—"is going back to my hotel with me to get some papers. I got to send them down to Mr. Karesh. Then I'll come back and we'll go out for a good time. Mister Thingumabob here can meet us later. What d'ye say?"

"Anything goes with me," said Mr. Smith. "I'll be here when you get back."

O'Brien and Lapidowitz left the room. The latter was too heartbroken to take the slightest interest in any plans for the future. The only thought in his mind was to get in touch with Karesh and claim his compensation for having entertained O'Brien. As they reached the foot of the stairs that individual uttered an exclamation of annoyance.

"Confound it, I've left my eye-glass case upstairs. Just wait here till I run back and get it."

IT SEEMED to Lapidowitz that the buyer from Chicago was gone an unusually long time. When he returned he was red in the face as if he had been running.

"What do we do now?" asked Lapidowitz, peevishly. O'Brien's pulmonary condition did not interest him.

"Cheer up, old boy," said O'Brien, good-naturedly. "Y' ain't sore because you lost a few dollars, are ye? I got plenty left. You just stick to me and I'll see ye don't lose anything."

"Didn't he win everything you got?" asked Lapidowitz.

"That guy? D'ye think I'm a sucker? Why I got twice as much as I told him. Look here." He showed Lapidowitz a roll of bills that made the schnorrer's eyes bulge out of their sockets.

"Say, by the way," said O'Brien, "what's your name? I got a poor memory."

"Lapidowitz."

"Well, Slopowitz, we'll go downtown together and call on our friend Karesh. I've got to get two thousand dollars from him. And, after that, I'll give you the time of your life. Don't worry about that chicken-feed you lost. You stick to O'Brien."

Lapidowitz took his companion to Milken's cafe where they waited until it was time for Karesh to return to his office. And then O'Brien, with a hasty exclamation and a resounding slap on the table, looked at his watch.

C. A clerk brought Karesh a telegram. He tore it open, glanced through it and then with a wild cry, sprang to his feet. "Help!" he cried. "Gonifs! Get the police! Lock the door!"

"If I ain't a scatterbrain!" he exclaimed. "I made a date with one of the big merchants to meet him at five-thirty and I forgot all about it. Look here, Lopowitz, you run over to Mr. Karesh and tell him I've got to have two thousand dollars tonight. He'll give you the money. I'd rather have it in cash but I guess a check will do. I'll meet you—let's see—well, I'll come back here in an hour."

"Look," said Lapidowitz, "he gave me twenty-five dollars to entertain you and he was going to pay meextra, too. Soif Isay——"

A broad grin overspread O'Brien's countenance as he interrupted the schnorrer.

"You're a lad after me own heart. Just tell him you blew all the money on me. Lunch and flowers and anything else you like. Make him give you twenty-five more for your trouble."

Lapidowitz departed well pleased. O'Brien was, without exception, the most charming individual he had ever met. He hurried to Karesh's office oblivious of the fact that O'Brien, on the opposite side of the street, was following him.

"Well," said Karesh, "where's that buyer?" Lapidowitz explained that O'Brien had to keep an appointment and wanted two thousand dollars.

"Sure," said Karesh. "What's his first name so I can make out a check?"

"I don't know, replied Lapidowitz. "Anyway he said he'd rather have cash."

"CASH," exclaimed Karesh, petulantly. "Does he think I'm a bank? I'll go with you to meet him and we'll fix it up somehow. Did you give him a good time?"

"You bet I did," said Lapidowitz. "I bought him a lunch and flowers and theater tickets. I spent all the twenty-five dollars and more, too, of my own money. And if you could settle with me now it would be a great favor, Mr. Karesh."

"I wouldn't be surprised," said Karesh, drily. "But in business you got to be business-like. First I see Mr. O'Brien. Then you make out a statement. Then I see if it's correct."

A clerk brought Karesh a telegram. He tore it open, glanced through it and then with a wild cry, sprang to his feet.

"Help!" he cried. "Gonifs! Get the police! Lock the door!" He threw himself upon Lapidowitz. (Continued on page 131)

I Don't Stand Hitched

By Walt Mason

THE other evening I went to the Ku Klux hall to hear Hon. J. Pilate Abernethy discuss the living issues. Things have come to such a pass in this country that a lecture or political speech is about the only entertainment we can enjoy without buying a ticket. I'd rather see a movie representation of "The Two Orphans," with Jack Dempsey in the title rôle than hear any man lecture; but it costs twenty cents or more to see the show, and the lecture is free, and we simply must put our quarters in the Building and Loan Association if we hope to side-step the poor farm in our old age.

Mr. Abernethy beat his breast with great violence and said he cast his first vote for Abraham Lincoln, and had been a rock-ribbed Republican ever since. At the time this seemed a highly important announcement, and in my enthusiasm I climbed up on my chair and pulled down some gas fixtures, and everybody in the hall applauded with similar fervor. But after I left the hall, and walked homeward, stepping carefully so as not to wake the sleeping policeman, my enthusiasm evaporated. As one who sees through a glass darkly I realized that Mr. Abernethy's triumphant announcement really was a confession of obstinacy and nothing more. The man who sticks to one theory for a lifetime may have some reasonable explanation when cornered, but he should not boast of it.

THE place of honor in my workroom is occupied by a priceless marble bust of the Vicar of Bray, at whom most moralists and historians point the finger of scorn. In the eyes of this great and good man the most important thing was to hold his job; as a vicar he was of genuine use in the world; without his job he was of no account, so he naturally desired to go on vicking as long as he lived. He lived in parlous times, when dynasties were being overturned, and a new administration loomed up every washday. In order to hold his portfolio as vicar he had to change his convictions about three times a week, and he was equal to the occasion. Whatever party or ruler happened to be on top, the loyal support of the vicar could be counted on. As a consequence of his statesmanlike conduct he enjoys a deathless renown. People who stick to one idea all their lives refer to him as a piker; but the vicar will be remembered when his critics have joined the man who struck Billy Patterson.

In my humble way I try to follow in the footsteps of the Vicar of Bray, and all my opinions and convictions are subject to change without notice.

The more I read history, and contemplate the justly celebrated human race, the more am I convinced that progress is sadly handicapped by those men who accumulate a set of hand-made convictions and stick to them through life. In some of the benighted countries men plow the ground with crooked sticks, using their wives and aunts as horses, being convinced that it is the only way to plow.

WE ARE always being asked to admire illustrious people who risked their lives or made great sacrifices for their convictions. There was Gessler, for instance. And old Bill Tell. The legend says that Gessler was a tyrant who hung his kelly on a pole, and announced that anybody who didn't bow to it would be run out of town. When we were school children we read about this, and were trained to look upon Gessler with hatred and disdain. I used to lie awake at night thinking what I'd do to Gessler if I could get close to him with a few of last year's eggs. But now I am old all my sympathy is with Gessler. What is the use of being a tyrant if one can't take a fall out of the oppressed citizens? And it may be the tyrant's lid cost him so much he felt it was entitled to public homage. At this distance of time we can't trace his motives, but why assume that they were unworthy?

All the dead-game sports and live wires of the town bowed to the tyrant's hat and were none the worse for it. Probably they were the better for it; no doubt the tyrant kept cases on them all, and the ones who saluted the bonnet with grace would be remembered, and would be appointed to the police force, or given little grafts in the street commissioner's department. But old Bill Tell was one of your hidebound boys who took a foolish pride in standing up for his convictions.

The fact that Tell never lived has nothing to do with the case. He set a bad example, even if he wasn't on earth to do it. By standing in with the tyrant he might have been city clerk; instead of which he had to go around shooting apples off his son's head when he should have been doing something useful.

I'M ALWAYS enthusiastic over something that seems vital to me; but when experience has shown that it isn't vital, I call James and tell him to take it to the dump. For a time I was convinced that vegetarianism is the greatest thing in the world, and I used to go over to the home of Mr. Pettigrew, my nearest neighbor, and expound this great idea until he begged me to go home and leave him in peace.

"Consider the horse," I said to him one evening; "the horse is a strict vegetarian; you never see this noble animal feeding its face with Hamburger steak, and if you offered it a dish of link sausage it would resort to violence. You may go to the lunch counter a thousand times and you'll never see a horse eating fried liver. It has too much sense. It demands such wholesome feed as fragrant hay and oats freshly rolled. And now consider the strength and endurance of the horse, and reason from cause to effect, and let me have that cigar I see in your vest pocket."

It was this argument that converted Mr. Pettigrew to vege-tarianism. So he boycotted the village meat market and bought his victuals in the hay market.

Two or three weeks later I invited him to dinner. When we sat down to the table a big roast of beef was disclosed.

"What does this mean?" inquired Mr. Pettigrew, who always speaks his mind. "I came expecting a dinner of boiled herbs, and here you have a side of beef floating in its gravy. You talked my whiskers off to make me a vegetarian, and now, just when I am getting used to bran mash and alfalfa as a regular diet, you spring this on me. How about the noble horse and his refreshing diet?"

"I was thoroughly in earnest in boosting vegetarianism," I explained carefully. "But after I had lived on bluegrass for a while it occurred to me that a tiger can knock a horse silly with one blow of its paw. And does a tiger eat hay? It does not. Does a tiger fill itself with stewed onions or canned asparagus? You know better. A man must consider both sides of every question before he adopts any policy as a permanent thing."

"I see you are a man of no principles," said Mr. Pettigrew, untying the napkin from his neck, and looking around for his hat. "You are about as stable as a weathervane, and I am going home and eat the rest of that load of clover I bought yesterday. When I adopt a plan that seems right, I try to stick to it."

And that's always the way. The man who changes his mind frequently, as the result of profound thought, or enlightening experience, is denounced as unstable and lacking principles.

During the last year or two there has been a great upheaval over the propositions of Mr. Darwin. It is surprising how seriously people take this matter. Orators, professors, scribes and Pharisees are busy throwing dornicks at each other. George Bernard Shaw has written a play and many essays to demonstrate that Darwin was right or wrong, I forget which.

I SUPPOSE I should have some convictions on this subject, but I haven't. The whole fuss seems too ridiculous to mention. One learned gentleman who has an attractive line of convictions solemnly informs us that our remote ancestors were apes. I am willing to let it go at that. A respectable, law-abiding ape has his points. If an ape founded my family, it was so long ago that there's no use worrying over it, and nothing that I can do will remove the stigma. I can only try to live it down; and if a neighbor jeers at me, I have the consolation of knowing that if my forefather was an ape his was a gorilla. I refuse to be disturbed over any family matters of a few thousand or a few million years ago, even if people rebuke me for lacking convictions.

I am not sure that anything is an everlasting fact. I am easily swayed from one opinion to another. I hear the prosecuting attorney addressing the jury, and am convinced that the prisoner at the bar is a fiend in human form; then I hear the attorney for the defense, and it seems to me that the prisoner is a martyr. My convictions are adjustable, and the best talker wins, and the prisoner is hanged or acquitted, according to the elocution in the case.

I am tranquil and happy because my convictions are interchangeable, like Ford parts. For a while the allopathic doctors had me convinced that their school of medicine is the only one worth while; then the homeopaths cornered me in an alley and persuaded me that they had the real goods; and now the chiropractors have their innings, and I am assuring my friends that if a sick man wants to get well he must have his spine taken out and run through a cornsheller.

There's no sense in being sure of anything for more than a few days at a time.

From Pillar to Post

TODAY I hold the earth is round, through shoreless ether tearing; you hear my earnest voice resound, my firm belief declaring. Tomorrow I may go to bat, my old beliefs dismantling, insisting that the earth is flat, held up by chunks of scantling. One day I boost a theme or creed, the next day its in tatters; not theories large, but goodly deed is all that really matters. If while on this old earth I stay I'm square with all my neighbors, and if my bills I promptly pay, and shine in useful labors, what boots it if the earth be square or flatter than a griddle? On with the dance—I'll do my share, and pay the gents who fiddle.

Henry Ford's Jew-Mania

sumably cultivated, he has doubtless read "The Outrage," which its author, Alexander Kuprin, calls a true story. A meeting is described of "a small committee of local barristers who had undertaken the conduct of the cases of those who had suffered in the last pogrom against the Jews." The tired committee is about to adjourn when a hearing is requested by seven individuals who presented themselves as "delegates" from the United Rostov-Kharkov and Odessa-Nikolayev Association of Thieves. The delegates call attention to the fact that in the local papers "there have often been indications that among the instigators of the pogrom who were paid and instigated by the police—the dregs of society, consisting of drunkards, tramps, and hooligans from the slums, thieves were also to be found."

THE spokesman makes a distinction between the thieves of his organization, all engaged in dangerous and skilled branches, and the "pack of jackals" in the lower ranks of crime. These lower reptiles, he admits, "would gladly accept an invitation to a pogrom," but his own associates are educated. He says:

"We understand, every one of us—perhaps only a little less than you barristers, gentlemen, the real sense of the pogroms. Every time that some dastardly event or some ignominious failure has occurred, after executing a martyr in a dark corner of a fortress, or after deceiving public confidence, some one who is hidden and unapproachable becomes afraid of the people's anger and diverts its vicious elements upon the heads of innocent Jews. Whose diabolical mind invented these pogroms—these titanic blood-lettings, these cannibal amusements for dark, bestial souls? . . . We thieves by profession know better than any one else how these pogroms are organized. . . . We can swear before God and man and posterity that we have known how the police organize the massacres, without shame and almost without concealment. . . . They invited many of us to take part; but there was none so vile among us as to give even the outward consent that fear might have extorted. . . .

"None of us will forget the horror of those bloody days and bloody nights lit up by the glare of fires, those sobbing women, those little children; bodies torn to pieces and left lying in the street. But for all that, not one of us thinks that the police and the mob are the real origin of the evil. These tiny, stupid loathsome vermin are only a senseless fist that is governed by a vile, calculating mind, moved by a diabolical will."

THE PROFOUND emotion of the story is prudently hidden in broad comedy. It might be libelous for us to draw too clearly its moral, in commending the tale of Lieutenant Brasol. We will recall, however, that we have already printed a letter by that agent of the Tsar and of the Black Hundred, in which he boasts that in one year alone he had written two books that will do the Jews more injury than ten pogroms. We leave him to reflect on that boast, on his happy old days in Russia, on Erzberger and Rathenau, on Henry Ford, on how unimpeded, he, Brasol, is to carry on his work in this free country, and on how sad it was that the Jews escaped in the Beiliss case because, as Brasol reported to his government, and still contends, the lawyers for the Tsar were not as smart as Brasol shows they might have been.

Unfortunately, the American government has taken anything but a statesman-like view of the various Russian elements in the past revolution.

It kept a representative of the former Russian government here for years, while one of his principal functions was to carry on propaganda in this country against the present Russian government and to prevent the recognition of the new Baltic States.

The embassy has been constantly active to get funds for "deserving Russians."

As an example of the relation between the embassy and this group of expatriates, we offer a letter, of which part is reproduced in Russian on Page 72. It is written to General Spiridovitch, an authorized agent of Ford's newspaper, and head of a little anti-Jewish organization. It is signed by de Bach, who has been in charge of Russian embassy affairs since the departure of Bakhmetev. The principal parts of it are:

"Russian Embassy,
Washington,
January 19, 1922.

"Deeply respected and dear

Arthur Ivanovitch:

"I am able to answer your letter of January 16th because in it you do not speak with intolerable severity of V. V. Buismistrov, my old school fellow at the Lyceum, and of the other very decent people who are managing the Society for Aid to Russians, in New York. I did not answer your last letters because I felt that in view of your unfounded insults, it was impossible to keep up the correspondence.

"In substance this is what I want to say to you:—

"1. The Russian Red Cross Society does not grant any subsidies and the Central Committee of this Society has no funds of its own in America, and therefore no such accusation can be made against it.

"2. Coöperation and help to Russian refugees in America is given by the Society for Aid to Russians, on the Special Committee of which are: V. V. Buismistrov, President of the Society and Special Committee, Members C. F. Baldin, D. I. Vinogradov, V. A. Graves, G. A. Isvolski, D. P. Pertsov, P. A. Rutski. These organizations use funds allowed them by the Embassy, and they are subject to control and inspection by the Financial Department. In the activities of these organizations there is nothing arbitrary and illegal and no enormous salaries are granted. Some of the persons entrusted with the supervision of real estate, in which part of the capital of the Society is temporarily invested, for purposes of increasing its income, do not accept any remuneration for their work.

"As for your difficult situation, in spite of your letters, I have made every effort to induce the Ambassador to grant you the promised remittance of $125. B. Bakhmetiev agreed to this and I am herewith enclosing a cheque for that amount with the request that you return the carbon receipt.

"I beg you to believe in my feeling of complete respect and devotion, Bach."

NOW ONE influence of the activities thus clearly stated by Mr. de Bach is that they connect up much too closely the Russian embassy and our government with a lot of people who ought not to be carrying on their campaigns in this country. Many of them, ostensibly campaigning against radicalism, have a leading part in the anti-Jewish propaganda also.

The importance of the anti-Jew crusade, that we have now finished exposing, lies not in the weight of anything brought forward by Mr. Ford. The stuff published in the Dearborn Independent, and also the other material turned up by the Ford detectives, has been, as our readers now know, unmitigated rubbish. What gave the Ford vagary its unfortunate significance was the following set of facts:

1. That the reactionary trick of getting after the Jews, in order to stir up a dust, exists not only in Russia and Germany, but seems to be spreading to this country.

2. That the richest man in the world, an idealist, was made a victim and led into this deplorable game of the international reactionaries.

3. That his folly coincided with a Russian anti-Jew campaign in this country, with the Ku Klux outrages, and with a new outbreak of anti-Semitism in the colleges.

The actual circulation attained by the Ford weekly, even though its attempt to ride on the Anti-Semitic movement, has been slight. Of what circulation there is, a large part is forced, as shown by documents herewith reproduced. These documents illustrate the fact that Ford dealers continually receive circulars urging them to obtain subscriptions to the Dearborn Independent. The pressure is so strong that subscription blanks and applications for bonds for solicitors have been received by the dealers along with their commission agreements.

Here is one sample of the letters sent to dealers:

May 24, 1922.

"To All Ford Dealers:

From time to time we have requested the Ford dealers to get behind the sale of subscriptions for the Dearborn Independent.

and Extremes of Temperature

H EAT expands metal. Cold contracts it. This is what happens to a Waltham Automobile Clock and Speedometer in winter time.

When the car is running, the heat from the motor permeates the clock. And we've seen cars parked in zero weather taking the coldest bath of arctic air imaginable.

Do the works of that wonder-working Waltham Clock expand with the heat until the time slows down as if it had an emergency brake clamped on it?

Do the works of that little time-keeper contract with the icy cold until the hands race over the hours as if they played tag with each other?

Not a bit of it. Smoothly, unvaryingly, dependably, that Waltham Clock ticks on, smiling from its face the correct time as if there was only one temperature in all the world. Waltham has mastered what extremes of temperature do to metal.

And the Waltham Speedometer gives you the correct mileage and speed of your car over snow-rutted roads as it does upon the smoothest boulevards in summer time.

And the same mastery over extremes of temperature is built into every Waltham Watch. You may carry your Waltham from Maine to Florida, from zero to tropical weather, and it gives you that which you bought it for — the time.

The world's leading motor cars are equipped with Waltham Clocks and Speedometers. And people who invest in "all the year round" time, wear Waltham Watches.

*The Waltham Speedometer is the only air-friction Speedometer in the world.

During the month of March we obtained eleven hundred and sixty-two subscriptions which was a very good showing and we led the country that month. During the month of April we obtained five hundred and fifty-five which was less than half as many as we had in March and up until today we have only one hundred and five subscriptions for May, so you see we will make a very poor showing this month unless we get busy. The Dearborn Independent is a Ford product and is worthy of our support. We have eight days of May left, so for the balance of the month let everyone THINK, TALK AND SELL subscriptions for the Dearborn Independent.

We do not expect you to neglect your sales of cars and tractors, but there are ever so many people in your place every day that would be glad to subscribe to the Dearborn Independent if they knew the merits of our magazine. This is what we are asking you to do if any of your customers show interest in the samples which you have on display, kindly talk up and tell him how much good he can get out of the Dearborn Independent. You will be surprised to see just what good results we can have.

"Set the target at one subscription each day for the rest of May."

Yours for more subscriptions.

Circulation Department."

Just call up your own Ford dealer and ask him some innocent question about bonuses for subscriptions. We have just called up a Ford dealer, selected by chance from the telephone book. His answer was: "Mr. Handy, the chief sales agent in Washington, came around to see us the middle of last week and told us to get busy with subscriptions. He told us to pep up and it would be worth our while. We didn't even have subscription blanks but we took fifty orders between Wednesday and Saturday nights. We're in for all we're worth."

THE RESPONSES received by us, as month by month we patiently gave the facts about the Ford anti-Jew campaign have been most satisfactory. These responses leave in our mind no doubt that our purpose is being accomplished; that the silliness of the charges has been driven in.

Not that the task is ended. It is indeed true that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. Weeds will grow if the garden is not watched. Hatred, prejudice, little-nesses of many kinds, diseases of the social system, will take root unless there is a strong and alert public sentiment to stamp out the evil beginnings. This publication means to do its part. The best cure for any error is a full exposure of the facts. "Light" as Emerson says, "is the best policeman."

Coming next month: "The Intimate Life of Henry Ford," a biography of the real man by Allan L. Benson.

The Return of The Swordsman

A. S. M. Hutchinson's Story—Continued from page 22

but the door,' a' says; 'which I see a crack in roof as I lie here on my back,' a' says.

"Ay, marry, a' was a bold un, Corporal Harry. A' was presently searching round in dark on hands an' knees, an' a' found a billhook, an' in twodress minutes a' cut my bonds, an' I cut his'n; an' we cut free the Mouser that was groaning sore with crack on's head, but come to brave an' lively when we free un an' rouse un an' show un by pointing to broken rafters in roof what we would be after; an' presently soon Corporal Harry that was biggest stands straggle-leg beneath crack in roof, an' I climbs on's shoulders, an' the Mouser, that were a light an' nimble one, a' climbs on mine, an' a' takes billhook an' a' cuts away rafters that were rotten like cutting cheese, an' a' lays hold of beam, an' a' gives jump an' kick, an' a' sends Corporal Harry an' me sprawling, but a' clambers up, an' 'twas no very hard work for me off of Harry's shoulders to follow un.

"Ou-ai, there was Mouser an' me out on roof; an' we reach down my jacket an' Corporal Harry fastens on to un, an' a' kicks an' wriggles, an' we hold on amain like our arms ud come out their sockets, an' presently soon a' catches my wrists an' presently soon we pull un so a' gets a's arm through roof, an' a' swings a's self up, an' there we be, the dree on us, up on main top of roof.

"How us should ha settled un I surely do not know, but whiles we sat to think on un, that Mouser somehow slips, an' a' gives a screech an' away a' goes, an' there comes a rattle of tiles an' another screech, an' then a most mighty an' alarming thud, an' then language that was wicked oaths, sure enough, though in the French language, an' not to be understood.

"Us no could help laughing, Harry an' me; all terrible an' alarming as our situation was, an' then Harry says, 'If a' can swear a' can live,' a' says; 'an' where a Mouser can go I'm main sure I can follow,' a' says; 'so here goes, Zack,' a' says, an' a' pushes the ridge of roof with a's hands—a' was laying sprawled out on's belly, 'ee mind me—an' away a' goes, silthering; an' there comes to me presently a breaking and then a thud, an' then most sinful an' blasphemous oaths, which 'ee might fairly call the good English of the same words the Mouser had said.

"I tell 'ee, chaps, I tell 'ee, sir, I had main little stomach for the terrible danger of casting myself loose an' following un; but there surely was less stomach in me for stopping where I be'd, what with the noise they two had made by their falling and their oaths.

"Wherefore I prayed a most solemn prayer that I should not break my neck nor hang by un neither, an' I let myself go with my hands, and down I slipped, tearing my stomach most cruel and painful; and I goes quick an' quicker, and whizz! I goes over edge, an' down I comes crash an' splash into most evil an' terrible muckheap which my face buried in.

"With that comes shouts an' runnings an' bangings, an' all together such a terrible an' alarming din as ears surely never did hear before. An' Harry an' me an' that Mouser we run one way, an' men came pouring up out of the ground, as you might believe, in front of us; an' I hears Harry shouting, 'This way, Zack, this way, Zack!' and I sets for un, an' another man jumps up at me an' I goes for to flick un an' a' lets out a jabber, so I knowed un for Mouser, an' I takes his hand an' we run."

OLD WIRK had been reciting these passages relative to the escape from the inn with an animation in keeping with the scurrying hurly-burly of its action; now, as he came to the throwing of themselves down in exhaustion, so by exhaustion his narrative seemed to cease. His flow stopped; his jaws and lips and tongue churned vigorously.

Chuckles at the blank surprise in Sabre's face rose from those seated about. One man took pity. "Well, but that ain't end, granfer," he called.

"Tell 'ee," said old Wirk sharply, "tell 'ee that's how us run for sojers, Corporal Harry an' me."

"But the ghost that haunts the Green, Mr. Wirk," Sabre had said in desperation of final appeal. "That was what you were telling me. The ghost of Willie."

"Tell 'ee I fot at Waterloo-oo-oo."

"Of course you did. Of course you did. I know you did. And you were in the square, and Corporal Harry shouted, 'Here they be coming, Zack,' and down on you they thundered."

The spring was touched. "Ou-ai," said Old Wirk. "Ou-ai, they Frenchies thundering on their great enormous horses of war an' waving their great swords—"

"But if he goes over it all again," thought Sabre, "we shall just come back to the same place," and he boldly interrupted. "Yes, well then, when Corporal Harry came back after Waterloo. How did he come back, Mr. Wirk?"

"He come back blind," Wirk said.

"Blind!" cried Sabre keenly. "He was blinded in the fighting, eh? And came back with you? You brought him back?"

Old Wirk shook his head. "Nay, nay. I was nigh a twelvemonth returned afore Corporal Harry came back. Nigh a twelvemonth, an' had set my mind to it that he had bin killed, when a' suddenly comes walking up the green here as sudden as if he had sprung out of it. Ay, marry, and in nobbut two-dree hours walking off again, blind as a' was, an' none that knew un never set eye on un again."

"But that was strange, Mr. Wirk, going off so soon like that. Why? What happened? Did something happen to make him go again at once?"

"Ou-ai," said Old Wirk. "Ou-ai, sommat surely did happen, an' the most terrible thing that ever mortal eye did behold. Lookee, sir, 'twas a fair day on the Green here, the day that Coporal Harry come back. There was tents an' booths an' giddy-go-round horses an' shooting galleries, an' all sorts of most wonderful an' most merry sights for to see. And there was maypole an' lads an' lassies dancing

Listerine has been trusted for years

YOU know the comfortable feeling you have when the kindly old family physician steps into the sickroom. Listerine enjoys something of that same confidence in the home—and has for nearly half a century.

Maybe this is because your doctor believes in Listerine himself and often recommends it as a gargle, mouth-wash and general cleansing antiseptic. You've noticed he does.

Naturally, the Lambert Pharmacal Company is proud of this respect its oldest product commands. Naturally, too, the makers are going to see to it that Listerine remains worthy of this respect—always efficient, always safe.

Their name on the bottle and on the brown carton is your assurance. Be sure it's there.

Don't have sore throat again this winter

As you know, many illnesses start with sore throat. The mouth is an open door to disease germs.

Sore throat is a danger signal; heed it promptly

The use of Listerine as a mouth-wash and gargle affords a pleasant and dependable precaution against many forms of throat infection.

Use it systematically and be on the safe side. You may thus avoid many more serious ills.

round un, an' all merry an' beautiful as ever a holiday could be. An' while I stood watching the dancers, one say to me. 'Look, Zack,' a' says, 'what strange man be yon that comes this way?' An' I looks, an' one an' another looks, an' presently all be looking, an' a' comes on straight into the middle of us, the strange figure that us see. A' was dressed in a sojer's coat, an' a' was smart an' trim an' pretty to look upon; an' a' whistled an' sung an' laughed as a' walked, an' a' carried in's hand a long sword that was like streak of lightning with the sun that dazed upon un.

"AN' AS a' comes, whistling an' singing, a' sometimes stops an' throws aloft the sword high, high till it was no but a shining star in the sky; an' a' holds up a's hand as though a' called to it, an' down like a lightning-flash it comes, an' the maids scream to see it rushing upon un, an' a' catches it in a's hand safe an' sure as a bird to it's nest, an' a' twirls it round like a ring of fire, an' a' laughs an' throws an' catches an' twirls un again. An' while we stand an' stare a' calls out 'Hey, my lassies,' a' calls out. 'Hey, my lassies; hey, my lads. Doth none know me?'"

"An' I knew un then, for all a' looked so strange. An' a' calls out 'Harry!' to un, an' goes to un, an' one an' another that remembered un; for all a' had not bin to village for long years an' had growned uncommon, one an' another calls out, 'Why, 'tis Harry!' an' flocks about un; an' a' laughs an' banter, an' a' tells us a's blind, an' a' says that though he no can see his pretty bride he's come for to fetch her; an' he asks, 'Where be she, then, my jolly playmates? Where be my sweet-heart, my true love, my Prudence?'"

"Ou-ai, a' asked 'em that; an' they look one upon another an' say no word; an' they look upon me as saying 'twas me should tell un; an' they draw off an' leave us and go back to their junketings; an' I says to un, 'Harry,' I says, 'thy maid Prudence be dead an' laid in churchyard.'"

"An' a' says to me, 'Zack,' a' says, 'was she maid or mother when she died?'"

"An' I tells un, 'Mother.'"

"An' a' says to me, 'Zack,' a' says, 'was she wife or widow?'"

"An' I tells un, 'Nay, Harry, nor wife nor widow were the lass.'"

"An' a' says to me, 'Zack,' a' says, 'died she in her bed as a lass dies?'"

"An' I tells un, 'Nary bed, Zack; in the stream by Puncher's farm they found her.'"

"An' a' says to me, 'Zack,' a' says, 'tis all gospel true, then, what the lass wrote in letter to me.'"

"An' I tells un, 'Mortal true, Harry.'"

"An' a' says to me, 'Zack,' a' says, 'twas Willie Pringle wronged the lass?'"

"An' I tells un, 'Harry, 'twas.'"

"An' a' says to me, 'Zack,' a' says, 'tell me, now, be Willie Pringle here on Green while Prudence lies in churchyard?'"

"I tells un, 'Harry, ay.'"

"An' a' says to me, 'Zack,' a' says, 'be Willie Pringle sporting an' laughing with the lassies an' lads while Prudence lies very cold in churchyard?'"

"An' I tells un, 'Harry, ay.'"

"A' turns to me, sir, an' a' says, 'Lead me right down to un, Zack. Lead me right down to un. I lief would sport an' play with Willie Pringle.'"

"Now lookee, sir, an' listen, for this is how 'twas. Harry among the lads an' lassies calls to un an' says to un, 'My lads an' lassies, my fond and friendly playmates,' a' says, 'stand about me an' hark to me an' fine sport for the fair I'll give 'ee. Many fairs an' many inns I've made sport for in the Frenchies' land.'"

"All on us we ringed around un, sir, an' true it is never afore were such play seen with a sword. A' whirled his sword, an' a' twisted his sword, an' a' cut with his sword, an' thrust with his sword, till 'ee would ha' said the man stood within a maze of hoops of shining silver. Ou-ai, ou-ai, most marvelous it was to behold, to be sure. An' when a' was done with that a' called for bold uns to set apple on throat an' a' would sever un in halves, all blind as a' was, an' make never so much as a scratch on the throat that had the apple on us. We was main afeared at first for to let un try, but a' laughed so bold an' so mocking that first me an' then another an' then another come forward an' leaned us back on soles of our feet an' palms of our hands an' stretched back our necks an' had apple cut in twin on un.

"So it went on, sir. An' presently Harry says, 'Lo,' says he, 'all that I knew here an' that were playmates with me ha' come, but there be one that has not come, an' one I fain would come, for well I know un an' many's the honest fun we've had together. 'Tis Will Pringle I mean. Is he not here.'"

"An' the lads an' lassies laugh an' cry. 'He is here, Harry; he is here.'"

"AN' HE cries, 'Ha! Right glad I am he be here. Good welcome to 'ee, Willie Pringle. Come forward, come forward.'"

"Sir, they all turn to Willie Pringle for to pull un forward; an' Willie Pringle hung back an' said a' felt ill an' that the sun had bin too strong for un.

"Ou-ai, but sick an' ghastly Willie Pringle looked, an' the sweat streaming down his face, an' him so shaking that twice the apple rolled from's throat an' fell, an' us shouts to Harry 'twas fallen, an' with never a word but only a smile Harry feels for apple on the grass an' sets it back again.

"Then all be fixed at last, an' Harry puts his sword aloft, an' says he, as he had said for t'others, 'Who be this?' an' they cry to un, 'Willie Pringle.' An' a' says, 'A good stroke, then, for Willie Pringle an' a true stroke for un!'"

"An' a' takes his sword up higher yet. An' a most terrible silence an' a most terrible fear falls on all the company; an' I see man clutching man, an' maid clutching maid; an' all would cry an' run to stop un, but none could move, so terrible did he look; an' I thought to see Willie Pringle twist an' roll away, but a' was fixed there as though was bound with iron bands.

"An' Harry in a most terrible voice says, 'Untruly thou hast taken a life, Willie Pringle, but truly a life thou shalt give.'"

"An' a' cries in a very loud voice, 'Ha!' an' down his sword come like lightning from above, an' through apple an' through throat an' through neck it goes, an' the head falls an' rolls; an' in the mist before my een, an' in the horror an' the dismay an' the confusion, I see Harry wipe his blade on grass an' sheath his sword an' pass through the press an' walk away, none having wits nor courage to stop un."

Jean Longuet, French Socialist Leader—from page 5—Writes of

Poincaré and the Jingoos

which offers included a proposal for the restoration of Alsace-Lorraine to France. They were dismissed because of Italian ambitions. When all these things were done by the French Government, alone or in complicity with Italian Imperialism, the influence of M. Poincaré was supreme.

During the negotiations of the Versailles Peace, and in the application of this most disastrous and mischievous diplomatic document, M. Poincaré also represented the spirit of French Imperialism. As well as M. Clemenceau and M. Tardieu, he had to give up, to a certain measure, his annexation plans, because of the strong opposition of England and America.

M. POINCARÉ's policy was continued by M. Millerand, and to a lesser degree by M. Briand. Briand's policy was one of compromise and of opportunism. Only because of his extraordinary cleverness could he maintain himself against the growing attacks of the Nationalists. Poincaré, instead of adopting the reserve that was traditional with our Presidents of the Republic, after their retirement from the Elysée, put himself at the head of the representatives of the "Shylock Policy," in many noisy articles in Le Matin, Le Temps and Le Review des Deux Mondes.

Briand made some very unfortunate mistakes in trying to outwit our nationalists by opposing disarmament at the Washington Conference and opposing the discussion of reparations at Genoa. Poincaré came back to power and the world knows what his policy has been since that time. The man is narrow, bitter, without heart or human feeling. In spite of his talents I must always remember the terrible judgment Emile Zola once passed on him and which Zola told me. It was at a time of the great tragedy of the Dreyfus affair.

Poincaré had told some friends that he believed Dreyfus was innocent.

Zola learned of this and called on him. He appealed to Poincaré's better feelings as a republican, and as a lawyer, and urged him to take part in the campaign for Dreyfus and for justice. It was in vain. Poincaré explained that he had to remember his political position and his position at the bar. Disgusted Zola rose and left the room, uttering as he went these words—"You are a very small man, M. Poincaré."

But we must not fall into the mistake made recently by the French Communists in the Chamber of Deputies, who by concentrating on one man all their attacks seemed to forget the fundamental responsibilities of the régime and the class to which that man belongs. Poincaré is but a typical expression of the psychology of the governing class at the present moment, and more specially of the political combination of prejudice, and narrowness of mind that is called the Bloc National.

The attitude of this bloc toward Germany finds its fullest and most cynical expression in journalists and politicians of the type of Maurice Barres and Charles Maurras. Their object is not so much to make Germany pay as to annoy, bully and destroy her. They are pursuing the old policy of Richelieu, Louis XIV and Napoleon I, to prevent the Germans from being one nation. They are not deterred by the fact that Germany achieved fifty-one years ago its unity, that this unity was the natural outcome of two hundred years and more of effort by the German people.

Although Poincaré does not adopt this attitude in its extreme form, his whole policy is in that direction. His insistence on prolonged Rhineland occupation, his measures for the Turkifying of German finance, seek the disintegration of Germany; and the only practical result is to work into the hands of the German jingoos, monarchists and reactionaries.

The bloc should clearly have had, moreover, a sufficiently convincing demonstration of the foolishness of their whole policy in what happened in Bavaria. Mr. Maurras is fond of contrasting Catholic Bavaria and Protestant Prussia. So are many of our nationalists. Those men live in the past and because three hundred years ago French kings succeeded on dividing on religious lines the various parts of Germany they believed they could succeed in the same plot.

THE AMERICAN reader must understand that all this mischievous and wicked policy of the Bloc National does not represent the real feeling of the French nation. Of course after a nation has suffered what my country has suffered, during the last eight years, and more especially from 1914 to 1918, it is always easy to arouse its fear.

The present Chamber of Deputies is the expression of the disgraceful election of the 16th of November, 1919, which, thanks to the most absurd electoral system in the world, has saddled France with an enormous majority of four hundred and twenty representatives of the Bloc National out of six hundred and twenty. This Bloc National, which was created at the call of Clemenceau in his Strasbourg speech two months before the election, and was taken up by Millerand in his speech at Ba-ta-Clan a few days before the ballot, is a strange combination of partisans of the fallen dynasties, of royalists, of Bonapartists, Clericals, Republicans of the type of the plutocratic "Democratic" Alliance and last of Radicals and renegade Socialists turned reactionaries under.

When it came into power, the Bloc National did not even represent the majority of the French electorate. Far less does it do so now.

In all bye-elections, all County Council and municipal elections the electorate has demonstrated its hate and distrust of the National Bloc, and its present man, Poincaré. To avoid receiving this bitter rebuff from the nation so constantly, this Chamber has passed a law according to which several seats must be vacant before a bye-election is held. As if that were not enough, they decided that in all departments where the number of members is reduced because of the terrible diminution of the population, caused by the war, there should be no bye-election unless the number of members in Parliament was reduced. In the County Council election of last June the National Bloc candidates were nearly everywhere badly defeated.

How YOU Can Do the Same

In four months Anderson Brothers of Joliet, Illinois, doubled their business by using a Rotospeed Stencil Duplicator.

Bierely and Sons of Frederick, Maryland, increased their sales $25,000 by its use.

HOWEVER evil the present Chamber and Government, its militarist and imperialist policy can be to a large degree checked by outside public opinion, and more especially by America, whose prestige is large with the French Nation, and whose economic power is tremendous. The financial situation of France is desperate. It is sometimes said abroad that there is not a sufficient taxation of the French people, and that new taxes of different kinds might be levied. I personally believe that under present conditions heavier rates of taxation are practically impossible, but as to collection there are certainly gross abuses under the present system.

As far as the problem of reparation is concerned there is no outlet but in the wise programme that has been suggested by the organized working classes of France, Belgium, England and Germany. Its basis is German coöperation in work and in material. There is no question of bringing over hundreds of thousands of unskilled German laborers into the devastated areas. We do not need them. We have enough French labor and also Italian, Belgian and even Moroccan and Algerian. But in skilled labor we need at least twelve to fifteen thousand, which Germany can furnish us. She has declared herself entirely willing to coöperate in the work of reconstruction with all the means and strength at her disposal.

If we want the inhabitants of the devastated departments to live a decent life, get their homes, factories, roads, railways and such things rebuilt, not in twenty years but in a very few years (two or three at the outside) there is only one practical plan to this end, which lies in the immediate and fraternal collaboration of French and German Labor.

At the same time comes in the question of the cancellation of the debts. This depends upon America, and I quite understand the strong objection of a large part of American opinion.

MR. FRANK VANDERLIP says: "If America's moral forces could be brought to bear on the situation and American financial strength be brought to contribute to a solution, America might be the salvation of Europe." This is perfectly true, but America can only play this rôle if she uses the war debts as a means of compelling British Imperialists to stop their adventurous policy in the East and French Nationalists to renounce their mad policy, their maintenance of an army of 800,000 men in times of peace—after a war that was supposed to suppress militarism.

America can help by its action on those forces of the French Democracy, her millions of peasants and workers, who have nothing to do with the present reactionary and jingo policy of government.

The Unknown

rich. Fifty hectares of land besides the business. He has but two children. His daughter will have a dowry to dream of. She shall marry well—more money, of course! He is about to make proposals to the parents of the wheat merchant at Arras. And he discovers that she leaves her room by night to meet this young Armand Vignaux—this Croque! He is just out of the army. His father has no more than a penknife and a copper pot and you may believe that Magniac thinks it is not marriage Armand wants, at that! Magniac shuts her up. She weeps. Armand—Croque—hears her from the road at night—he is watching the house. He rushes and pounds at the door. Magniac sends for the gendarmes. They put him for the day in the box. When he comes out, she is gone. Her mother has taken her to an aunt at Boulogne. Croque only knows she is gone. What can he do? The law—then—makes it impossible for him to marry her without consent of her parents. He stays in Ily for a time. Then he is gone to Paris. Perhaps he expected to make a fortune so that he might marry her—youth thinks that it is easy to make a fortune. Then in Boulogne she dies of typhoid. And I suppose he learned that—in Paris. Perhaps—” Here Léon’s mind went on another tack. “Ah! She was chic, that Rose-Émilie Magniac.”

“ROSE-ÉMILIE—Rose-Émilie!” Eclogue was repeating. His eyes stared far away. His jaw was dropped. His chary cynicism seemed to have fallen from him as a veil. He choked; and then his eyes went to Léon’s in supplication.

“Did you say her name was Rose-Émilie?” he asked.

“But, yes!” replied Léon, and waited. Suddenly Eclogue stood up and, “Comrades, I know how he died—”

He sat down again, buried his face in his hand. There was no sound except breathing in Madame’s back room for a full half-minute. Then Eclogue’s hand came away from his face to emphasize and punctuate speech with slow gestures, as he began in a tone so controlled that it seemed monotonous.

“Before Douaumont. The night we pulled out. The night of my first wound. The squads are all broken. My corporal is dead. You are wounded—” this to Léon—“and I command the squad. And Croque is in my squad.”

“And at ten we are to go. The lieutenant has his orders. He has passed them on to the chiefs of squads. I have called my poilus about me and explained. There is only one way to get out and live. It is past the face of the old cement emplacement. We are to creep, one by one, lying close in the shellholes when the flares go up. We wait. It is raining steel but we have fair cover. Our lieutenant is watching everything, everything. And in the light of a flare he sees that there is a stake against the parapet which was not there when dark came. The flare goes out. He is sure he sees a reflection beyond. He perceives what it must be. The boches guess we are going out. They do not know which way, but they suspect this is one of them. One of their creepers has set up the stake between flares. It is phosphorescent on the other side. When a body passes it, they see the bottom of the stake go dark—and pfut! the machine-guns. At intervals they are volleying at the earth about it.

“The lieutenant explains. He turns his electric torch on us and calls for volunteers. That is death. I know that, and the lieutenant looks at me as he speaks. I know what he means. I am the eel of the company. It is always I who can crawl without being seen. It is my duty. He looks at me and I understand. I salute. He salutes. It is good-by. I never saw him again. I ask for five minutes. I write to Hélène a farewell. I give the letter and the picture of the kids to Pierre. And all the time Croque—Armand Vignaux—is watching—waiting. “A flare goes up and goes out,” he continued. “I mark the position of the post. The guns are silent for the moment. I go over the parapet and begin to creep. And I hear a noise behind me. I can see a little in the darkness; and I look around. Another man has come over the parapet. He is singing to himself. And this is what he sings:

“‘Rose-Émilie, Rose-Émilie, Rose-Émilie!
Heaven or hell tonight
With Rose-Émilie—Émilie—Émilie!’”

“Then he is gone and the big guns have started again and I do not hear more.

“I pause. I think—I thought until just now—that somebody else—the other company—has seen it, too, and sent out a man. I reflect that my life is perhaps saved. He will tear down the post. He will die. Then I am a man again. I, too, raise myself and run. A flare bursts. I drop into a shellhole, and look. He has reached the post. He has it in his arms. It is planted, for he is shaking and pulling at it. And then—all the boche machine-guns begin coffee-milling together.

“ONLY six squads of ours assembled in Verdun citadel that night,” he said. “We were all that was left. And we lived because of Croque—Armand Vignaux—because he pitied my—” Here the sobs conquered. “And I said—and I thought he was not fit to lie under the Arch!” he concluded at length.

Eclogue looked at Virgile, and it seemed for an instant that his customary cynicism was coming back into his eyes. Then they softened again and he asked:

“My boy, was there not a crucifix on the bier of the Unknown—of Croque?”

“But yes!” said Virgile, and wondered.

“Eh bien! Croque, too, died for men,” said Eclogue. “Is not that enough?”

Surrender

ticket," he asked Colton and grinned. "Yes," Colton nodded. "He's out for your scalp—and mine. Going to show up the crookedness of both parties, he says. It's my opinion he better be stopped."

Colton stroked his pointed gray beard reflectively for a moment, then turned to Ben Tracy, who sat scribbling notes on a bit of paper.

"You'd better speak to the old man, Ben," he said.

Tracy nodded. Speech he regarded for the most part as a waste of energy; he preferred to let his money talk for him.

AT THE club Collins's friends maintained an outward show of enthusiasm, and were prodigal in their promises, but none of them did anything of an active nature in his support. Only Beverly Curtis exhibited his original interest, and spurred Collins on in his fight. In fact, he even went so far as to furnish the new candidate with much authentic information concerning former political deals between Colton and Farrell, and in Collins's hands they proved formidable weapons.

The first big speech that Collins made a few days after his nomination created a sensation. Briefly sketching some of the former deals between Colton and Farrell, as outlined to him by Curtis, he made savage attacks upon the control of the city government by the elder Tracy, and exposed the deal about to be put through by which the municipality stood to lose from one to two dollars a ton on all the coal used in the schoolhouses and other city buildings. His information on this point did not come from Curtis, but from a member of the city council, a Polish Jew whom Farrell had approached but had been unable to control. In his peroration Collins threatened to send some of the members of the city government to the penitentiary.

The following morning the president of the Red Star Works sent word to Collins that he would like to see him in his private office. His face was unusually grave.

"Mr. Collins," he said abruptly, "you've got to cut out your attacks on Mr. Tracy or leave our employ."

Collins recoiled as though he had been struck. The scar on his face flared a deep purple.

"Why?" he asked. "Isn't what I've said true?"

"Maybe—maybe not. I don't pretend to know. But you'll have to stop it, true or not."

"But why?" the young man insisted. "You don't stand for the sort of thing Tracy and his crowd are handing us, do you, Mr. Laird?"

The grizzled old Scotchman chewed viciously on his cigar.

"Mr. Collins," he said presently, "I'm president of this company because I happen to know the paint business. I am not the whole board of directors. Mr. Tracy is. He and his associates own a controlling interest in our stock. Do you see?"

Collins walked out of the office, a man without a job. Colton's first blow had struck him.

A second was to fall that night. Bitter over his unjust discharge, he went to call on Betty Keating, hoping to find consolation. This time the Judge and his wife were not in the upstairs sitting-room. On the contrary, they sat in the library, plainly visible through the curtains which divided it from the parlor.

He had not been with Betty half an hour when Beverly Curtis came in. He brought some interesting information.

"They say you have become an anarchist, Martin," he remarked.

"Who says so?" demanded Collins.

"Why—the Star, for one. Didn't you see it? One of their sleuths has been following you, I guess; says you've been seen on several occasions entering a café down on the South Side, where the Reds have their headquarters. They tell me you're going to make a speech down there tomorrow night, at Mendel's Hall."

Collins swallowed hard and set his teeth.

"I have been down there," he said, "to see Michael Ginsberg. He's about the only honest man in the city council. And I am going to speak at Mendel's Hall tomorrow night."

"To all those foreigners?" Betty asked.

"Certainly. And they are not foreigners, most of them, but good American citizens, even if they did happen to be born on the other side. Why"—he became suddenly enthusiastic—"a lot of those men have been in uniform, fighting for the country!"

COLLINS, with a fiery eloquence inherited from his Celtic forbears, spoke to the sweating mass of humanity which crowded Mendel's Hall, in words which they understood, and told them what Colton was doing, what Farrell was doing, what others, higher up, were doing, with their hard-paid taxes, and promised them that if he were elected he would devote his entire energies to doing what he could to give them a square deal. He told them how he had lost his position, and why, and they cheered him until the roof trembled. He spoke to them as a soldier, a man who had offered his life for the sake of his country, and pointed out that the fight for freedom must be waged as earnestly on this side of the water, as it had been in the trenches in France. Some roughs, planted in the audience by Farrell and Colton, set up cries of "revolution," waved red flags. The calls for revolution, the red flags, he promptly denounced, and finished his speech grasping the folds of Old Glory. The crowd left the hall singing the national anthem with him, to a man.

Farrell and one of his henchmen, sitting in the back room of a fruit shop across the way, listened to the uproar with cynical smiles. A man was with them, a dark, undersized, man with the low forehead of a criminal.

"You get me, do you?" Farrell was saying, at the same time handing the man a roll of bills. "Mix in the crowd as they leave the hall. Do a lot of shouting. Get your gang with you, waving the red flags. Then go to Mr. Tracy's house and throw the bomb. You're not to hurt anybody, mind. Do you get me?"

The man nodded.

That night, shortly after the meeting at Mendel's Hall, a terrific explosion roused the town to sudden wakefulness. The police patrol, the fire apparatus, went thundering through the streets in the direction of the Tracy mansion. There were a number of arrests, but the prisoners were all discharged for lack of evidence. In the morning, however, the local newspapers, as well as most of those throughout the district, came out with flaring headlines, in which the dastardly attempt to murder the Republican candidate for Congress was laid at Martin's door.

DURING the afternoon he called Betty Keating on the telephone, to ask her not to judge him until he had seen her, had a talk with her. Mrs. Keating answered him; on learning who was calling her voice became suddenly frigid.

Betty, she said, was not feeling well, and could not come to the telephone, nor could she, Mrs. Keating, deliver any message from Mr. Collins to her. Martin heard the rasping click of the receiver as it was placed abruptly on its hook. He went to the window of his little sitting-room and gazed out into the street for a long time, his face lined with care, but still defiant. The arrival of the afternoon mail aroused him. It contained a curt notice from the club, requesting his resignation. He tossed it into the waste basket. The cost of his venture began to become apparent. So far he had lost, in his attempt to serve his country, not alone his position in the business world, his social standing, but possibly even the love of the woman he had hoped to make his wife.

There was another meeting between Farrell and Colton that night, and it was a stormy one.

"We've got to get this guy," the latter announced, chewing viciously on his cigar. "He's making a big hit with the farmers, the factory hands, the bums. What's more, he's a soldier, with the mark of a German shell across his face. That's a hard combination to beat, Colton. I'm getting worried."

"Maybe he's out for the dough. He hasn't got a job, you know. Shouldn't be surprised to hear he's busted. Why don't you try to buy him off?"

"Say, Tom!" Colton replied, with a pitying smile. "Don't you know men any better than that? You can't buy Martin Collins. I know, for we've tried it. Tracy had the Red Star offer him the management of their New York office, at fifteen thousand a year."

"Well, he's got one weak point, anyway. That's his girl—Judge Keating's daughter. Curtis tells me he's nuts about her."

Martin Collins, coming down Main Street the next morning, saw a vision in brown ahead of him, which gradually resolved itself into the figure of Betty Keating. He quickened his steps.

"Betty!" he exclaimed. "I'm so glad to see you."

The girl gave him a helpless look.

"Oh, Martin!" she stammered. "I'm not supposed to talk to you."

"Why not? Am I a leper, or anything?"

"No-o. But father says—"

"See here, Betty: Be a woman, not a child. I'm trying to do the right thing and you know it. Never mind what your father says. You know I'm right. Has Curtis been lying to you about me?"

"Mr. Curtis is a friend of yours, Martin," Betty replied. "He wants to see you win."

"Mr. Curtis wants to win, himself—to win you. That's his game. All right. I've told you all I have to say. When you come to your senses, let me know."

BETTY went home, feeling desperately blue. She loved Martin Collins; even the things her father and mother had dinned into her ears for the last few weeks had not convinced her that he was in any way unworthy of her love, although they had undoubtedly produced an impression. Now she began to question, to doubt them. When, later in the afternoon Curtis dropped in for tea, she made herself unusually agreeable to him; under the influence of her smile the young man became communicative.

"Of course Collins won't be elected," he confided to her. "Colton and Farrell will get him, some way. They framed up that bomb business, but it didn't work; offered him a job in New York, too, at fifteen thousand a year, to get him out of the way, but he refused it. But they'll get him, take it from me. He hasn't a chance."

Betty, outwardly smiling, was in reality boiling with rage. So this was Curtis's pretended friendship! Her heart smote her for her coldness to Martin earlier in the day. When, after dinner, her mother and father went to the theater, she insisted on remaining at home, pretending that she had a headache. No sooner had they left the house than she dashed off a hasty note to Collins, telling him she must see him at once, offering to meet him elsewhere, if he did not care, on account of her parents' attitude, to come to the house. She sent the note off by a messenger boy and sat down to wait. She would have waited less patiently, had she seen the man who had been watching the house all day intercept the messenger at the next corner, and in exchange for a five-dollar bill obtain possession of her note.

As the hours passed she became impatient, alarmed. Had Martin refused to forgive her? She tried to telephone him, but could get no answer. Fear grew in her heart, born of what Curtis had told her of Colton and Farrell—their plans. Even now they may be weaving the sinister web in which Martin would be caught to his undoing. At ten o'clock, unable to endure the strain any longer, she dashed out, and heedless of appearances, went to Martin Collins's apartment. She could warn him at least.

He had come in a little while before, found a boy waiting with the note from Betty, saying she must see him—meet him somewhere at once. He read it eagerly, and was about to write a reply when the boy spoke.

"The lady told me, when she give me the note, that you was to meet her in Mrs. Barrett's room, at the Monongahela House."

"The note doesn't say anything about it," said Martin suspiciously. "And I don't know any Mrs. Barrett."

"That's what she said," the boy insisted, "and she told me to tell you to hurry up."

Martin called Betty up, only to learn she was out. He put on his hat and was just leaving when she appeared at the door, breathless from her climb up the stairs. He stared at her, bewildered. The boy fled.

"Betty!" Martin took her hands.

"What's wrong? Why have you come here?" He closed the door.

"I had to come—to warn you. Mr. Curtis told me this afternoon that Colton and Farrell are arranging some trick to 'get' you. Oh, Martin—please be on your guard!"

"Trick?" Collins gazed grimly at the note in his hand. "Well, they almost succeeded. The boy who brought the message said you were waiting for me in the room of a Mrs. Barrett at the Monongahela House. I was just going."

"But," Betty cried, bewildered, "I don't know any Mrs. Barrett. And I didn't give the letter to that boy—I gave it to a messenger."

EXACTLY. They bribed him—got the note, of course. I would have gone to this Barrett woman's room, expecting to find you. The lady would have received me in negligée, locked the door when I wasn't looking, and the police, fixed by Farrell, would have broken in to find me in her arms. Result, a night in jail, the police court in the morning on a nasty charge, and my political career ended. Quite a pretty little plot."

"Oh, Martin!" Betty gasped. "What a lucky thing I came." She went up to him and laid her arms about his neck. "Martin, I love you. I don't care what anybody says about you. I'll marry you, dear, whenever you say."

"Tonight?" Martin laughed, eager with joy.

"Yes."

He sprang to the telephone, spoke rapidly, happily, for a few moments, then came back to her.

"It's all right," he said, and folded her in his arms.

Standing thus oblivious, they did not hear the soft footfalls outside the door, or realize that it had been opened until they saw Tom Farrell on the threshold, with two men behind him.

"This is Captain Gallagher," he said easily, in reply to Martin's angry protest, "and detective Fallon. They have a little business with you."

"What business?" Martin glanced uneasily at Betty.

"You're under arrest," Gallagher announced.

"What for?" Martin Collins's face darkened, his fingers twitched.

"Charges of immorality," Farrell replied. "Having a young girl in your rooms—"

"We've got you!" he growled. "Nothing you can do will save you."

"You dirty scoundrel!" exclaimed Martin, springing at him. The policemen intervened, and Farrell retreated across the room.

"We've got you!" he growled again. "Nothing you can do will save you."

"Don't you know this is Judge Keating's daughter?" Martin shouted.

"I don't care whose daughter she is. You're going to the station house. Answer charges in the morning. Whether they're true or not, it'll cost you the election. You're ruined, and so is the girl. Of course," he went on, with an evil smile, "if you're willing to write a letter withdrawing from the campaign—get out—surrender—"

For a long moment Martin Collins looked at him, a queer expression in his eyes. Then he turned abruptly to his typewriter, and without glancing at Betty's horrified face, inserted some sheets.

"I'll write the letter," he said. A dull silence ensued, broken only by the clicking of the keys. The letter finished, he signed it, rose, handed Betty the pen.

"Witness this, please," he said, and when she had tremblingly done so, passed the letter over to Farrell.

The latter read it uneasily, fearing some trick, but the withdrawal was complete.

"All right," he said, and with a nod of dismissal to his men, turned to go. But Martin stopped him.

"Wait a minute," he called, his voice like silk. "Miss Keating has witnessed my signature to that withdrawal, and she will also witness the copies of it I shall send to the newspapers, with a full account of the circumstances under which it was made. It will make rather an interesting story, all told—the man who bribed the messenger boy, with her note—we'll locate him, of course, through the boy. And the other boy—the one who came here with that lie about Mrs. Barrett, at the hotel—we'll make him talk—find out who gave him his instructions." Farrell howled an order to his companions, but Martin only laughed. "Arrest us? I wish you would! I telephoned the Reverend Dr. Atkinson not ten minutes ago we'd be right over—he's waiting at the parsonage now to marry us. He'll be only too glad to serve as a witness on the side of decency, and against crime. Yes, you rotten grafter—crime!" His eyes blazed. "When my wife and I—she'll be my wife then—tell the story of how you tried to blackmail me into withdrawing from the campaign—how you accepted that letter—called your police dogs off—I guess the District Attorney will have something to say to you, even if you do claim to control him. Going to 'get' me, were you? Well, you've got me, Farrell, the way the fellow got the bull by the tail, and you can't let go! Surrender?" His face was gray with rage. "Why—you rotten crook, I've got you—in the hollow of my hand, where I can crush you—throw you on the dump-heap where you belong. If you had wanted to hand me that election on a silver plate you couldn't have gone about it better. Surrender?" He threw his arm about Betty who had ranged herself joyfully at his side—"I've only just begun to fight!"

Tom Farrell crushed the letter in his hand, allowed it to fall to the floor.

"Come on, boys," he said. "It's a fool who doesn't know when he's licked."

Owned by those it serves

Less than fifty years ago an application was made for a patent which created the possibility of speech between distant points. It was the culmination of years of study, research and experiment. It suggested a new aid in commerce and domestic life; a new tie to bind the people together. But it was only a suggestion—a dream.

To make that dream come true required the creation of an organization unlike any other. It demanded a kind of scientific knowledge that was yet to be formulated, as well as a type of equipment still to be devised. And it necessitated the financial and moral support of many communities.

Out of this situation grew the Bell System, bringing not only a new public service, but a new democracy of public service ownership—a democracy that now has more than 200,000 stockholders—a partnership of the rank and file who use telephone service and the rank and file employed in that service. The American Telephone and Telegraph Company exists to serve the people and is owned directly by the people—controlled not by one, but controlled by all.

Evolution is going on. Each year the ownership is more widespread. Each year the various processes of the service are performed more efficiently and economically. Each year new lines and extensions are constructed. The responsibility of the management is to provide the best possible telephone service at the lowest possible cost and to provide new facilities with the growth of demand. To do these things requires equipment, men and money.

The rates must furnish a net return sufficient to induce you to become a stockholder, or to retain your stock if you already are one; after paying wages sufficient to attract and retain capable men and women in the service. They must adequately support and extend the structure of communication.

These are considerations for the interest of all—public, stockholders, employees.

Her Own Life

state. Gordon was now running somewhat behind the ticket, but had a sufficient lead over his rival to insure his election.

They went down to the crowded restaurant on the ground floor and had supper at a noisy table with some party "workers," who were hilarious with victory and drink. Lilla liked the hubbub, and the excitement all about her, and the silly stories the men told. Gordon, who looked wilted, wanted to leave, but she kept him until long after midnight. Then they indulged in the unusual luxury of a taxicab to take them the seven miles to their home.

"IT WAS GREAT!" Lilla sighed. "I wish there were an election every month."

"Well, I can't say I do," Gordon protested wearily, thinking with misgivings of the money his political ambitions had cost him so far. "But we pulled it off, didn't we, Lilla?"

It was the first time Lilla had heard him use "we" in any undertaking of their marriage. Perhaps it was a sign of better times. She rested her head against his shoulder and closed her eyes, lulled by the rapid rumble of the cab. Gordon put his arms about her, and when they reached Wisconsin Avenue, Lilla was asleep, with a little smile on her lips.

The election opened a new period in their married life. For one thing, Gordon agreed to move, and at Lilla's suggestion they took a small house in one of the nearer suburbs along the lake to the north.

Gordon was very busy and developing rapidly. The new contacts, which his political position involved, were making him less and less the pedagogue. It was not long before he discovered just what his election meant in compromises with his "ideals." But having waded into the swamp, he became more assured, even truculent. He put on flesh, solidity as he called it, and smoked more openly. Sometimes he telephoned out that he could not get home for the night. Lilla shook down the furnace, locked the front door, and enjoyed the solitary evening and night, with David sleeping by her side. . . . After all, her life if uneventful and petty, was as satisfactory probably as that of her many neighbors in the rows of houses all about her, whose men took the eight-twenty or eight-thirty-five to the city and returned in time for a hot supper. It was just life, she concluded.

IN THE SPRING the James's bought a cheap automobile like so many of their neighbors. Gordon ordinarily prudent in expenditure had his heart set upon owning a car and talked motors all winter. Lee Smith, a young "fraternity brother" of Gordon's who had come to Chicago to sell text-books, instructed him in the management of the car and sometimes spent Sunday at the Wilmette house. In the afternoons, they would make expeditions in the new toy, exploring the clayey, rutty roads of the vast prairie, the two men talking motor endlessly, David and Lilla bouncing in the rear seat as the car swayed and bumped over the uneven roads under Gordon's precarious direction.

One June evening after a long expedition, Lilla fainted as she got out of the car. The two men carried her to the porch, and Lee who was a sympathetic, boyish young man proposed going at once for a doctor in the car.

"No, don't, Lee," Lilla protested opening her eyes. "I'll be all right."

"You've worked too hard in the garden this hot weather," Gordon complained. "I told you you would feel it."

"You must get a doctor," Lee urged.

"I don't believe it is necessary," Gordon said. "Just a little fatigue."

Lilla smiled. She knew quite well what it meant. She had suspected it yesterday when she was working in the garden but had not felt sure. Now of course it must be so. She would have to tell Gordon, but divining the shock it would be to him, she wished to wait until Lee had left. Rousing herself with an effort, she said with an attempt at gaiety,

"You will have to get your own supper and put David to bed. . . . I am going to take an evening off like all the hired help. . . . Now leave me and let me go to bed, please!"

SHE WONDERED what Gordon would say when he knew. Of course he would dislike it just as he was starting in his new position, with all the money he had spent, and the new house and moving and the car. But it couldn't be helped, and since their new friendliness, she was less afraid to tell him. It couldn't be helped anyway. . . .

Later Gordon came up to their room, saying that Lee had decided to return to the city instead of spending the night as he usually did.

"Are you feeling any better? I wish you wouldn't overdo things, Lilla, digging and lifting as if you were a man." He stroked her forehead clumsily.

"It isn't that, Gordon!" she said sitting up, looking white and forlorn. Then she told him.

He said nothing for several moments, drawing away as if she had dealt him a blow in the face, his lips contracted in an ugly smile. She watched him fascinated by the drama written on his face. She seemed to see all the new friendliness, the kindness and toleration that had grown between them, fade out of him, and in its place a cold disgust and cruelty fight with cowardice and self-thought.

"Gordon!" she cried in a queer, weak, pitiful voice that sounded strange to herself. "Don't be angry. I didn't know. It can't be helped."

"Can't be helped," he said bitingly, harshly. "It's easy enough to say that!"

He walked to and fro across the little room, his face working, biting his lips to restrain the rage gathering inside him. She felt it coming, overwhelming all other considerations, breaking down his usual inhibitions, about to pour out over her.

"Gordon!" she cried desperately, trying to check his anger, to save herself, to save him from the bitter flood. "It isn't a crime to have another child!"

That seemed to unleash his evil passion. He broke forth in a storm of reproach, mingled with an occasional whine.

"What's to become of us?"

"I'll go to mother's," she said.

"You will not!" he snapped. "How is a man to get ahead with this thing hitting him just as he starts?"

"David is almost ten," she protested.

"If you cared about me, about our home, about the future, you would see that this thing didn't happen."

GORDON had left the house the next morning before Lilla felt able to rise. The night before, she had dragged herself to David's room and had gone to sleep hugging him in her arms, wetting him with her useless tears.

Gordon did not return to the house for three days. It was a relief to Lilla. Yet sometimes she thought what would happen, if he never came back and she had to take David and go to her aunt's home or to her brother. The sense of helplessness of the woman in her condition, her dependence upon the man, ground in to Lilla's soul. She wanted to take David and fly somewhere with him, to escape forever the necessity of seeing Gordon again. But she felt too weak to rebel.

"If he would only think once of me, say one kind word now," she said to herself, "then he might do anything he chose ever after! I could stand it."

The hours dragged wearily by. She felt too miserable to leave the house and was too proud to telephone her mother.

"She'll say it's a woman's burden," Lilla thought, "and she'll sympathize really with Gordon. . . . I'll stick it out by myself."

GORDON returned the third evening before supper. He greeted Lilla with equable kindness, as he did when she had offended him and he had made up his mind to forgive her. Lilla divined that he had had a struggle with himself, and had decided to "go through with the situation" as part of his manful battle with fate. She roused herself to meet his new attitude and tried her best to be cheerful. Gordon did not refer to her condition, and she waited timidly for him to speak of it. Never before in her whole life, it seemed to her, had she so much craved a word of sympathy. She smiled forlornly at the thought of cherishing sympathy from Gordon. One loving word and she would have burst into grateful tears. But Gordon remained blind to her tremulous expectancy. He did not refer to what had happened. Apparently he had made up his mind to ignore the whole matter. He would endure what he must, but it was her affair, not his.

Lilla wondered as the days went by and life in the household dragged on in this dreary pretense if Gordon meant to ignore her condition to the end. At least it was more tolerable [Continued on page 122]

Face Pores Give Up Their Poisons To New Magnetic Clay!

Men and Women Amazed as New Discovery Almost Instantly Reveals a Hidden Beauty

NEVER before has the attainment of smooth, clear, beautiful complexion been as simple, as inexpensive as now. Anyone can now have a fine-textured skin, radiant with the fresh coloring of youth, smooth and firm as a child's. In only 30 minutes, mind you! In one short half-hour you can have a brand-new, beautiful complexion!

It seems almost magical. Tired lines, enlarged pores, sallowness—all vanish. Blackheads and pimpleheads are lifted right away. Hidden beauty that you never dreamed you possessed is brought to the surface.

What Is This New Kind of Magic?

It's all very simply explained. The face is covered with millions of tiny pores, through which Nature intended impurities to be expelled. But when dust, bits of dead-skin, and other harmful accumulations clog these tiny pores, the impurities cannot escape. The skin becomes dull, coarse, colorless. Soon poisons form in the stifled pores, and blackheads and pimples make their appearance.

Ordinary methods cannot relieve this condition. Water clears the surface of the skin, but cannot get at the tiny mass of impurities and accumulations beneath the surface—the bits of poison that are hidden away in the pores and that are causing all the trouble. Massage may help temporarily, but stretches the skin and eventually causes wrinkles.

Only now, after years of research and experiment, has the positive, natural way been found to relieve the condition of clogged pores at once. Certain elements when combined in just-right proportions, have been found to possess a remarkable potency which acts on the face pores as a magnet acts on a bit of steel. These elements have been blended into a fragrant, cream-like clay, which is as easy and pleasant to use as a face powder.

Each particle of this amazing new kind of clay is like a tiny, invisible magnet.

When you apply the clay to your face, it seems almost as though millions of tiny magnets were drawing the pore-poisons and accumulations to the surface, absorbing them, lifting away the blackheads and eruptions. The feeling is one of physical relief—refreshing and invigorating.

How to Use Domino Complexion Clay

That's what it is called, this remarkable discovery—Domino Complexion Clay. It is applied with the tips of the fingers, just as an ordinary cream would be applied. You may read or relax while it is doing its wonderful work. In a few moments it will dry and harden into a fragrant mask. There will be a cool, tingling feeling as the tiny pores awaken, and as the magnetic clay draws the clogged-up impurities to the surface.

In a half-hour, remove the clay. With it you will remove every blackhead and pimplehead, every pore-poison and impurity, every bit of dust, dirt and dead skin. Your complexion will be transformed!

You will declare that a fairy must have touched your face, gently removed the blemishes and impurities, and revealed a new beauty!

SEND NO MONEY

The wonderful beautifying effects of clay have long been known to beauty specialists. Indeed, many kinds of clay have been used in beauty parlors for years. But only now have the just-right elements been found which, when combined, create a magnetic clay—a clay that draws the impurities to the surface and lifts them away.

To enable everyone to try Domino Complexion Clay, we are making a very special introductory offer. If you act at once, a full-size jar of Domino Complexion Clay will be sent to you direct from the Domino Laboratories, without any money in advance. Just mail the coupon below—no money.

that way than the bitter words which had passed between them when he first learned. She made feeble efforts for a fuller reconciliation, imagining wistfully what it would mean to her if they could go through these coming months close together, as they had gone through his political campaign.

But Gordon put her off firmly, as if to indicate that his present mood of tolerant aloofness was the utmost concession that should be expected of him. . . . Late on a Saturday evening a message came from his office that the superintendent had been called to Springfield on important business and might not return before the middle of the week.

"Business in Springfield on a Sunday!" Lilla thought. "At least he might have telephoned me himself, and not let me keep supper waiting!"

THEN she recovered something of her old spirit. What, after all, had she done to merit this isolation and resentment? The house was becoming intolerable. When Lee Smith came up the walk on Sunday morning, she almost put her arms around him, she was so glad to see a friendly face.

"Gordon has gone to Springfield," she told him. "You will stay to dinner and drive us over to Lawndale in the afternoon, won't you?"

The young man not only stayed but insisted on helping get the dinner. He was a nice boy, Lilla thought, a very nice boy, and already the house was less gloomy, her destiny less tragic. Although he was hardly two years younger than Lilla, she always thought of him as immeasurably her junior and had a maternal manner with him varied by sudden outbursts of youthful joking and "rough-housing" as she might with her brother, had Ed been more congenial. Lee was a smooth-faced, cheerful young American, somewhat athletic in the college where he had studied.

He and David were great friends, with a kind of intimacy between them that David did not have with his father. Lee took the boy to baseball games, showed him the new plays in football, and occasionally spanked him when he needed it. Gordon had an indulgent older brother regard for the young book agent, mingled with slight contempt.

This Sunday, they sat down to dinner in good spirits. Lee carved clumsily.

"Guess I'm not much of a family man, Lilla," he laughed. "Never had a chance since I was David's age."

"Why doesn't Lee live here?" David asked after a period of reflection.

"Thank you, son," Lee said, bowing.

"Why don't you, Lee?" Lilla insisted impulsively.

"I'd sure like to," the young man accepted easily, "if you don't think I'd be in the way. . . . I'm not much in the city, except week-ends, you know—always on the go."

"You can have the room on the third floor," she continued rapidly. "There's just a little stove in it for heat, but you won't mind. It will be such fun, won't it, David?" and then recollection coming over her suddenly, she stopped embarrassed.

"I'll have to speak to Gordon, of course. We'll see."

"It would be pleasant for me," Lee said easily.

After dinner, he and David got out the car and tinkered with it until Lilla was ready to start. The day was soft and warm, with a steady westerly wind blowing through clear spaces of blue sky. The prairie fields were already thickly covered with the new grass. Lee drove slowly and carefully, and now and then they stopped to discuss the choice of route or to pick some flowers. In the end they missed their way and failed to reach Lawndale.

"I don't care," Lilla observed. "It's been a lovely day, and we'll have been far enough anyhow by the time we get home."

It was one of the happiest days Lilla remembered, and yet it was made up of the simple nothings of which most of her days were composed. The three of them laughed and talked, like so many thousands of others on this holiday, had made a little excursion into the country and felt the fresh impulse of the summer. What made it so different, Lilla wondered, from similar days when Gordon was at home? "I suppose that Lee, David, and I are more on a level of equality," she concluded. "We like the same simple things."

AFTER SUPPER Lilla lay on the veranda lounge while Lee played negro melodies on the piano. Once he stopped and came out on the veranda.

"Aren't you feeling well, Lilla?" he asked anxiously.

"Just tired, Lee; it rests me to hear you play; don't stop."

After a time she went to bed and lay for a long time listening to the piano whose notes floated up through the open windows. The summer night, the peaceful house, the desultory melodies soothed her distressed spirit. Life might be like that, she mused, always, instead of a jangle of cross purposes and misunderstandings. She tried to think out definitely what had been wrong in her life, in her, what had buried her as it were at the bottom of a well where she could see only glimpses of the open sky. She thought of the big spaces of the Wyoming ranch, the bold outline of the mountains etched against a purple sky, felt the sting of wind against her face, the sweep of water rushing over her body, and fell asleep.

When Gordon came home, glum and depressed, which was his habitual mood these days as if he were struggling alone under intolerable burdens, Lilla timidly made her suggestion about having Lee stay with them when he was in Chicago.

HE's such good fun," Lilla urged, "and David likes him. You don't mind, do you? It would make things more cheerful perhaps."

"You can do as you like," Gordon assented coldly. "It makes no difference to me."

"But you like him," she insisted. "Well enough. It'll make extra trouble for you."

"Oh, that's nothing," Lilla said easily. Gordon looked at her hostilely.

"I should think that just at present—under the circumstances," he stopped abruptly.

It was the first time he had made any reference to her condition since the day she had told him. Lilla colored slowly and looked at him out of pained eyes.

"I shall go to a hospital anyway," she answered calmly.

"Oh!" The coldness of the tone stabbed to the heart. She felt peculiarly tremulous and alone. Suddenly she went over to him and put her arms about his knees, looking up into his face imploringly, in an appeal that she had rarely made to him.

"Gordon," she said, the tears starting in her eyes, "can't you feel differently—about this? Can't you—forgive me?" She brought the words out with an effort. "It shouldn't be so terrible, so unforgivable for a woman to have a second child!"

"It isn't the end," he said hostilely. "There'll be another and another—"

Lilla uttered a long sigh. "There will not be another, Gordon. I promise that!"

HE SHRUGGED his shoulders, and there was an involuntary push of revulsion to the woman at his knees. Lilla stared at him, the tears drying on her cheeks. The power that she had always felt over him, the power that had brought him to her for caresses, had vanished. She rose from her knees and laughed hysterically.

"No, I promise you there will never be another baby, never!"

The sneer rested on his face.

"I'll never bring another child into the world that isn't wanted. You didn't want David. You barely notice him even now. You don't want anything that interferes with your ambition or causes you any trouble."

"You talk like a fool," the man interrupted irritably, getting up and looking for his hat. "You can't seem to understand anything."

"I understand you," she returned bitterly.

"Well, that's a good thing," he sneered. "I hope you do—at last."

With that he left the house.

Lee's presence offered some relief to the depression and gloom that had descended upon the Wilmette home. The objectivity of his whistling, naïve ignorance of what existed between husband and wife helped Lilla to forget the present as a bad dream that must have an end.

"What's the old man's grouch?" Lee asked Lilla one evening when Gordon had sat through dinner without opening his lips.

"I suppose things aren't going well in the office," she suggested evasively.

"He needn't worry yet awhile," the young man commented easily. "They can't turn him out for another year anyhow, and by that time, maybe he'll be ready to go, from what he tells me."

"Gordon takes things hard—he worries."

"A lot of good that does!"

"It's the way you are made."

Then suddenly there came a change for the worse.

One sultry July afternoon Lilla and David had gone out on the lake in Lee's motor-boat. The young man was always tinkering with some decrepit piece of machinery, trying to make it work. He had bought a boat and an old engine and after spending his holidays in fitting one to the other much to David's excitement had finally got the thing to run. On this Saturday he had come from town early in order to have a grand trial, which had been talked about for the whole week.

At first the engine had chugged merrily along, and the little boat had slowly made its way up the coast past the suburbs.

At they turned in front of the military post at Highland Park, the engine began to cough and spit and presently balked altogether. After a long wait while Lee tested and tinkered the engine started only to die out, and so it kept up in the manner of motor-boat engines until it was eight o'clock before they landed.

Lilla felt limp and weak and dizzy from the hours in the sun on the water. The three were coming slowly up the street from the lake, David's hand in Lee's, when they met Gordon. Lilla could tell from the compressed lips, the increased precision of speech when he permitted himself to speak, that he was furious.

"Do you think that this is a proper thing for you to do?" he said to Lilla.

She thought he referred to her condition and said hastily,

"I'll be all right when I lie down."

"There was a cross circuit," Lee explained. "I couldn't seem to find it—I'll have to rewire the old thing."

Gordon ignored Lee, and seizing David by the hand, hurried him towards the house, leaving Lee and Lilla behind. Lilla, whose breath was coming in short gasps, put out her hand to steady herself and the young man took her arm, putting his other arm around her, to help her.

Gordon stood on the porch of the house watching them as they came slowly up the street, stopping now and then so that Lilla might catch her breath. They passed some neighbors who spoke to them, then turned to look at the couple inquiringly.

SHE FELT her husband's raging eyes watching her. He was standing in his most school-masterly poise, with folded arms, head slightly thrown back, control written all over his white face and tight lips.

Lee Smith mumbled something about looking after the boat and disappeared, leaving husband and wife confronting each other. Lilla, her gaze fixed upon her husband, wondered what had so much upset him and climbed the flight of steps.

"What's the matter, Gordon? I am sorry supper is so late."

Without reply he held the door open for her and the explosion followed almost at once within the house.

"Is that the way you act with men?"

It was all so amazing to Lilla that for a long time she stood silently letting Gordon's flood of insinuations and invective pour over her like a battery of stabbing needles. Unconsciously she tottered over to the lounge and sank down looking up into his face with amazement.

It took a good deal of provocation to arouse Lilla's slow nature, and at first she was so overwhelmed by the unexpected and fantastic nature of the attack, so inexperienced in the burrowings of male jealousy, that she merely looked at Gordon in consternation and passively listened. At last she defended herself.

"Don't lie like that, Gordon," she said dangerously. "I might kill you. . . . You've done enough already." She felt the tears of helplessness rise and choked them down. "You know it's absurd! You are making it up just to torture me."

Haggardly she recalled to him a few circumstances that disproved his accusa-

COMMERCIAL ART

Taught By Improved Methods

Many art school advertisements tell about the great and ever increasing demand for commercial artists—big pay—equal opportunity for both men and women, etc. Very good! This is all quite true, but you must first be properly taught. Understand? Properly taught! Few top notch artists are good instructors. Very few. By searching through many studios we have found them.

A Master Course Is Offered

Endorsed as the official training school for leading Commercial Art houses, employing hundreds of artists. Correct educational methods applied. A practical educator and a corps of top notch commercial artists, offer students the benefit of 20 to 30 years of high grade experience. Only the best instruction is good enough for you. Students finishing half of this unusual course can secure and hold desirable positions. Course can be made to pay for itself many times while studying. Either class room or home study instruction. Same course. Same credits. If you like to draw, let's talk it over. Ask for our book telling all about Commercial Art and the opportunities it presents. AS WE TEACH IT. Send 6 cents in stamps for postage.

tion. Gordon, who by this time had somewhat vented his ugly temper, snarled, "Well, what do you want him around for?" "I want something happy in the house. It's been too dreadful ever since—ever since—but I'll tell him to go."

Gordon suddenly whipped around at this. "You can't do that now—what would he think and people outside!"

"I don't care what they think."

His anger was evaporating into sullenness, but Lilla's sense of outrage was growing momentarily. "When he comes in I shall tell him just what you said."

At that a new and more terrible scene began. At its climax Gordon forgot himself so far as to blurt out, "If you had any consideration for me and for our life together, you wouldn't let this happen. It's a woman's business, as I understand it, not to have children when they aren't wanted."

She was very still, and in the tense silence waiting as if her whole fate hung on the next spoken word.

"Even now," he said, meaningly, "it's not so very late."

"Oh, oh," Lilla groaned. "You—you—coward! To say such a thing to me, to suggest it—even to think it!"

She rushed up the stairs and bolted herself in her room.

Lilla is thus swung into the harrowing experience of a mismatched marriage. The real fight of her life is yet to be made and there are pitfalls and dark moments. See Hearst's International for December, ready November 20th.

The Girl He Left Behind Him

Make things as easy as you can for the old chap."

The team filed in, silent, stunned, and grouped about the stricken figure of the General lying on a stretcher placed on two benches. The injured man was covered to the chin with a heavy blanket. There was a broad bandage about his head. Only his face could be seen, leathery, intricately traced with fine whiskers. He was smiling, a faint, gently pathetic ghost of the arrogant smile for which the handsome boy of twenty-five years before had been famous. He spoke slowly, faintly and with an effort that wrung the hearts of the shocked boys watching him.

The medics tell me I've been in my last scrimmage, fellows," he said. "I can't kick. I've come through more than my share of them already. I've had the good luck to do my fighting almost always with the winning crowd, boys, and I reckon I've got the habit of being what the English call top dog. I want to be top dog just once more before they blow taps over me. I just want to hear once more the good news that my men have done again what my men always have done, all the way from Crocker College, twenty-five years ago, to the Argonne in France. I'll make a bargain with you, boys; if you'll go on out there and lick the stuffing out of these people, I'll give you my word I'll stay alive till I hear that you've won. I want one more victory before I'm through. Boys, will you give it to me?"

CARDIGAN, the captain, was the first to answer him.

"We will, General," he said huskily, tears streaming down his face. "So help me, we'll do it! Won't we, fellows?"

There was a deep murmur of assent that had the note of a sob in it.

The State players were at first amused by the insane fury of effort that animated the Crocker men, when the game began again. They had met just such desperate spurts made by small teams before, but the efforts never lasted more than a few minutes. Human endurance was not capable of sustaining speed and power of that degree for a long period.

So the players for the State team were first amused, then irritated, as the astounding effort continued undiminished; and finally dismayed when, in the middle of the period, Captain Cardigan tore loose, after a series of wild smashes and flashed across the State player's goal line for a touchdown.

For the rest of the quarter it was a battle that kept the crowd on its feet, a raving, wild-eyed mob.

"What's got into that bunch?" the coach of the State team inquired as his weary men dragged off the field for the short interval of rest. The State captain shook his head.

"You got me," he panted. "They must be shot full of hop."

"Just hold them!" the coach advised the players. "They're playing way beyond their speed! They can't keep it up!"

THEN THE Crocker Collegemen came back on the field and wrecked the State coach's reputation as a prophet.

In the first four minutes of play, Cardigan smashed through left tackle and carried the ball under the goal again, and afterwards booted it full and true over the bar and between the posts for the point that tied the score. Three minutes later Murdock, the Crocker left end, got free with a long forward pass from Cardigan and sprinted thirty yards for Crocker's third touchdown. Cardigan kicked the goal and the score stood: State 14—Crocker 21. That was still the score when the final whistle blew and the referee stepped between the lines, picked up the muddy pigskin and handed it to Cardigan, his by right of victory.

The Crocker players pressed through the crowd that poured onto the field and thronged about them, oblivious to the roars of congratulations.

They staggered through the door and into the dressing-room and stopped.

On the bench, his legs crossed, a thin crooked little cigarette between his fingers, a wise proud smile on his leathery face, sat General Hotchkiss. He was dressed as usual. As they piled into the room, the General rose on his own two legs without assistance and nimbly mounted the bench.

"Well, boys, you licked the stuffing out of them, didn't you?" he crowed, triumphantly. "I told you you could do it if you just wanted to badly enough. Don't be mad at the old man for playing a little trick on you. Doc Graydon helped me out a little. He got the loan of the ambulance from a friend of his. I had to give you some kind of a shock, fellows."

A commotion in the passageway interrupted him. A woman, her hat awry, her eyes wild in her death-white face, rushed into the room. The transformation was so great that in the first second no one recognized her as the prim, gentle old maid, Miss Harriet Peabody.

THE SMILE was gone from the General's face. He stepped down from the bench, crossed the room, took her in his arms and held her facing him.

"They—they told me you were down here, hurt," she sobbed. "They said you were dead."

"My God!" the General said reverently. "Harriet, my dear, there's never been a time in all the twenty-five years that I didn't want to come back and get you."

He bent and tenderly kissed her trembling lips, then gently pressed her tear-wet face against his shoulder and looked slowly about him. The beginning of his wonted grin twisted the corners of his lips.

"This thing the highbrows call an inferiority complex bothers a lot of people," he drawled. "I've been wishing for twenty-five years I could come back here and have just this thing happen to me, but I've been thinking all the time that a fellow who was a wild young rascal like me, and grew up to be a rough kind of a soldier man, wouldn't have any right ever to try to make it happen. I reckon I've had an inferiority complex all that time and I needed a shock, just as much as you boys did. Boys, I reckon none of this would have come right for any of us if it hadn't been for this lady here, who's going to promise to marry me as soon as I can get her away some place where I can ask her. What do you say to a good, rousing old-timer to one of the best in the world: Miss Harriet Peabody!"

There, in the crowded steamy dressing-room, heavy with the odors of sweaty garments and liniment, the men of the team that made football history at Crocker College, shook the rafters with the old, old cheer for the little gray-haired lady.

When the next year's crop of freshmen came to Crocker, the residents pointed out to them the house in which Miss Peabody had lived, and said:

"That was Harriet Peabody's home when she was here. You know, the woman who married General Hotchkiss. Yes, Curly Hotchkiss, the fellow who used to be the great quarter-back at West Point. He's military attaché in Paris now. Seems funny to think of her being over there in France and mixed up with all those diplomatic people, don't it? That's where she used to live."

To fight and be friends, even after "the" woman appears—is that possible? William Slavens McNutt man-handles this problem in "Friends—As You Might Say." See Hearst's International for December.

Owen Johnson Takes Skippy Bedelle Back to Lawrenceville—Continued from page 80

Green and Fresh

at Snorky and swallowed hard while his right arm worked convulsively.

"Come in," he said with an effort.

The door opened and Miss Potterman triumphantly entered his life. Mrs. Potterman was there and Hippo with his impertinent smirk but neither Skippy nor Snorky saw anything else but that wonderful vision. Something unbelievable had suddenly stepped out of their favorite Gibson picture and was advancing in a halo. Violets and daffodils began to sprout from the carpet and birds sang in the window frames. It was instantaneous and it was terrific.

Just as there are professional conversationalists and professional sponges, Miss Potterman was a professional beauty. There was nothing accidental or temporary about her. She was complete, perfect and she knew her loveliness. After five years' triumphant progress in society she was accustomed to the petrifying effect of her sudden presence on a beauty-worshipping sex. She did not walk as other mortals walk but floated in fragrantly, and Skippy stood staring rock-still, as though Hippo had flashed the head of Medusa. None of which, by the way, was lost on the keenly observant Hippo.

"I BEG PARDON, I'm Skippy," he said shaking himself.

"Mr. Bedelle, isn't it?" said Miss Potterman in the tone that angels are supposed to employ.

Skippy saw no one else. In another moment he was seated on the window-seat entranced, dazed and blissfully content with his fate, docile as the rabbit in the presence of the boa constrictor.

"I'm so glad Corny is in your house," said Miss Potterman with a smile in the irresistible eyes. "You will watch over him, won't you, Mr. Bedelle?"

"Will I? You bet I will!"

"You see, he's my only brother and we didn't want him to go to boarding school—not just yet. That is, mother and I. Dad insisted on it. I don't think he's always—well, quite appreciated Cornelius."

"I understand," said Skippy, averting his look. Even in the intoxication of her presence he could appreciate Dad.

"You see, Corny's different from other boys, Mr. Bedelle. He's more like a grown-up person. He has a wonderful mind and such an unusual personality. I don't want him to lose it all and be just like every other boy. And some boys, I'm afraid, won't understand him just at first. You will look after him, protect him, won't you?"

"I'd promise you anything," said Skippy recklessly, which is the privilege of sixteen in the presence of twenty-five.

Miss Potterman smiled without surprise and laid her hand gently a moment on his arm in the deadliest of feminine gestures.

"Corny's told me how kind you have been already."

Skippy looked incredulous.

"Indeed, he has! Really he's quite fond of you already."

"I say, Sis!" said Nuisance at this moment, "Hasn't Skippy got a whang dinger of a room!"

And he approached with the layer cake and the éclairs.

"What a wonderful spread!" said Miss Potterman. "But really you have been too extravagant!"

Something in Skippy's sudden look decided Hippo to keep the secret but he revenged himself on the cake in a way that made his sister exclaim:

"Corny, where are your manners?"

"S all right. I'll buy another," said Hippo, then winked brazenly at Skippy.

"I'LL MURDER him, I will," said Skippy wrathfully to himself. "I'll strip the hide off him, if it—if it weren't for—" Then he raised his eyes and beheld the reason why, smiling at him with perfect faith.

"I'm afraid we've spoiled Corny just a little," she said hesitating.

"Oh, that's all right!"

"Is—is there much of that dreadful hazing?"

"Well, sometimes," said Skippy, who always placed the proper value on his services.

"Oh, dear! I've heard such dreadful things have happened," said Miss Potterman, thoroughly alarmed.

"That's only when accidents happen."

"Accidents!"

"Don't worry, Miss Potterman," said Skippy with the manner of a grand duke. "Fellows do get rough sometimes, but I'll look after him."

Miss Potterman again laid her hand on his arm.

"Thank you."

She stayed but half an hour. The door closed. The birds fled from the windows and the daffodils retired under the carpet.

"Whew!" said Snorky explosively.

Skippy fell back on a chair and fanned himself.

"What's the use?" he said disconsolately.

"Women are our inferiors," said Snorky wickedly.

"What eyes!"

"Woman is like a harp—"

"Woman!" said Skippy, rousing himself indignantly. "You don't call that a woman! That's Maude Adams and Lorna Doone and—and the Gibson Girl rolled into one!"

"Don't blame you," said Snorky heavily. "It ain't right to let anything as wonderful as that roam around loose. Skippy, it's all wrong."

"You're right there."

"Well," said Snorky reflectively, "she turned up in time. We'd have had Nuisance ready for the undertaker by the morning."

"My hands are tied now," said Skippy glumly. "I've promised."

"Me, too, but how are we going to stick it out?"

"We'll have to treat Nuisance with moral influences," said Skippy thoughtfully.

"It will be longer, longer and harder."

They dined with Miss Potterman at the Inn and that and a walk about the campus under the stars completed the devastation. Before it was over Skippy actually heard himself called "Jack," had shaken hands on an eternal friendship, promised to write from time to time of Hippo's progress and needs, agreed to defend him from bodily injury and promised to accompany him home for the short Thanksgiving recess. The final touch came when Miss Potterman sought to press upon him a large bill in case Hippo should be perishing of thirst or hunger.

Skippy put it away. It hurt to do so; it choked him, but he did it.

"Not from you—I couldn't," he said huskily. "I—well, I just couldn't."

That night as he stood at his bureau and looked into the eyes of the past, at Mimi and Dolly and Jenny and Vivi the hunter of scalps, he spoke.

"Snorky?"

"What is it, old boy?"

"Ever go fishing?"

"You betcha."

"Do you know the feeling after you've been dabbling with six-inch and five-inch trout all day—and something about three feet long weighing ten or twelve pounds grabs your hook? Do you get me?"

"Sure, I get you," said Snorky, gazing out at the stars. "But oh, gee! Skippy, why does she have to be Nuisance's sister!"

SNORKY'S worst forebodings were realized. Nuisance earned his title a hundred-fold within the week. Dennis de Brian de Boru Finnegan had been fresh, was fresh and would freshen more, but Dennis was amusing and added to the gaiety of nations. Nuisance was what his name implied, simply intolerable. You stumbled over him and you bumped into him. When state secrets were being discussed in whispers Nuisance was always within earshot. He was the extra, the intruder, the tail to the kite. He did not actively offend against the traditions which govern freshmen in the incubator period. He was too clever for that. He had submitted to the mild hazing with a cheerfulness which robbed it of all its sting. He had climbed water towers and sung appropriate hymns. He had sat in wash basins and gravely pulled imaginary miles against the toothpicks furnished him as oars.

But if he kept skilfully within the letter of the law so far as the rest of the house was concerned he was irrepensible once in the company of Skippy. Nothing that Skippy could do could chill his affection or bring him to a proper realization of the deference which should mark the manner of a freshman toward one of the lords of the earth.

"Some day," said Skippy shaking his head, "my worse nature is going to rise up and get the better of me."

"I hope I see it!" said Snorky.

"Of course I'll have to hold in until after Thanksgiving," said Skippy disconsolately. Thanksgiving over, Snorky confidently waited the explosion.

"Skippy's going to the bad," he said to Dennis de Brian de Boru Finnegan.

"He's nervous, [Continued on page 131]"

A Little More than Dollars and Cents

HENRY T. HUSTLE had been running his A. D. S. drug store in the middle-class residential section of Duluth, Minn., for nearly twenty years. His store had grown with the population of the neighborhood. From the little shop with its single counter and cubby-hole for prescriptions, it had expanded to an establishment with shelved rows of constantly changing stock, three separate departments, and two clerks.

But in spite of its growth and modern aspect, Hustle's never lost its personal touch. Even newcomers to the neighborhood told their children to "Run around to Hustle's and get a bottle of . . ." Somehow no one ever referred to it merely as the drug store. Old residents referred to it as "Henry's" and when talking to the proprietor called him "Henry" as in the old days.

The Browns called him Henry. To each other they admitted that their courtship began at his soda fountain. They had called to show him the second Brown baby. During a lull in business, Hustle was listening sympathetically to the mother's recital of the youngster's teething troubles.

"Speaking of teeth," said Hustle, "I want to show you two something for grown-up teeth. Just cross over to this counter."

When both were seated, he took a tube of tooth paste from its carton and handed it to Mr. Brown. "Don't you remember my telling you about the A. D. S., this organization in which I'm a partner, being at work on a tooth paste of our own?"

"Yes, I remember," said Brown, "but that was over two years ago."

After those tests which some might call enough, and we consider only preliminary, we had some of the most famous screen actors and actresses give us their views on it."

"And what did they say?" asked Mrs. Brown eagerly.

"They gave us opinions which were so enthusiastic that we have used them in our advertising. Here are some of them," he said handing her a printed page.

"But," continued Hustle, "the hardest

"We worked on it longer than that," answered Hustle. Then to the lady he explained, "You see, Mrs. Brown, as I told your husband, this A. D. S. of ours is made up of 26,000 druggists all situated something like me. We make our own products and sell them direct to our own customers. Some years ago we decided to make a tooth paste of our own. One that we could recommend to our customers with a clear conscience. It took lots of study, experiments and time. But we won out. You have the results in that tube in your hand."

"How is it different from other tooth pastes, Henry," said Mrs. Brown.

"It is different in this way," answered the druggist. "It was made to reach an ideal. The chemists of the A. D. S. set out to make a tooth paste that would positively clean every available surface of a tooth. It had to help keep the gums healthy. It had to leave a pleasant taste in the mouth. It could not have grit of any kind. And it must flow freely from the tube to insure economy."

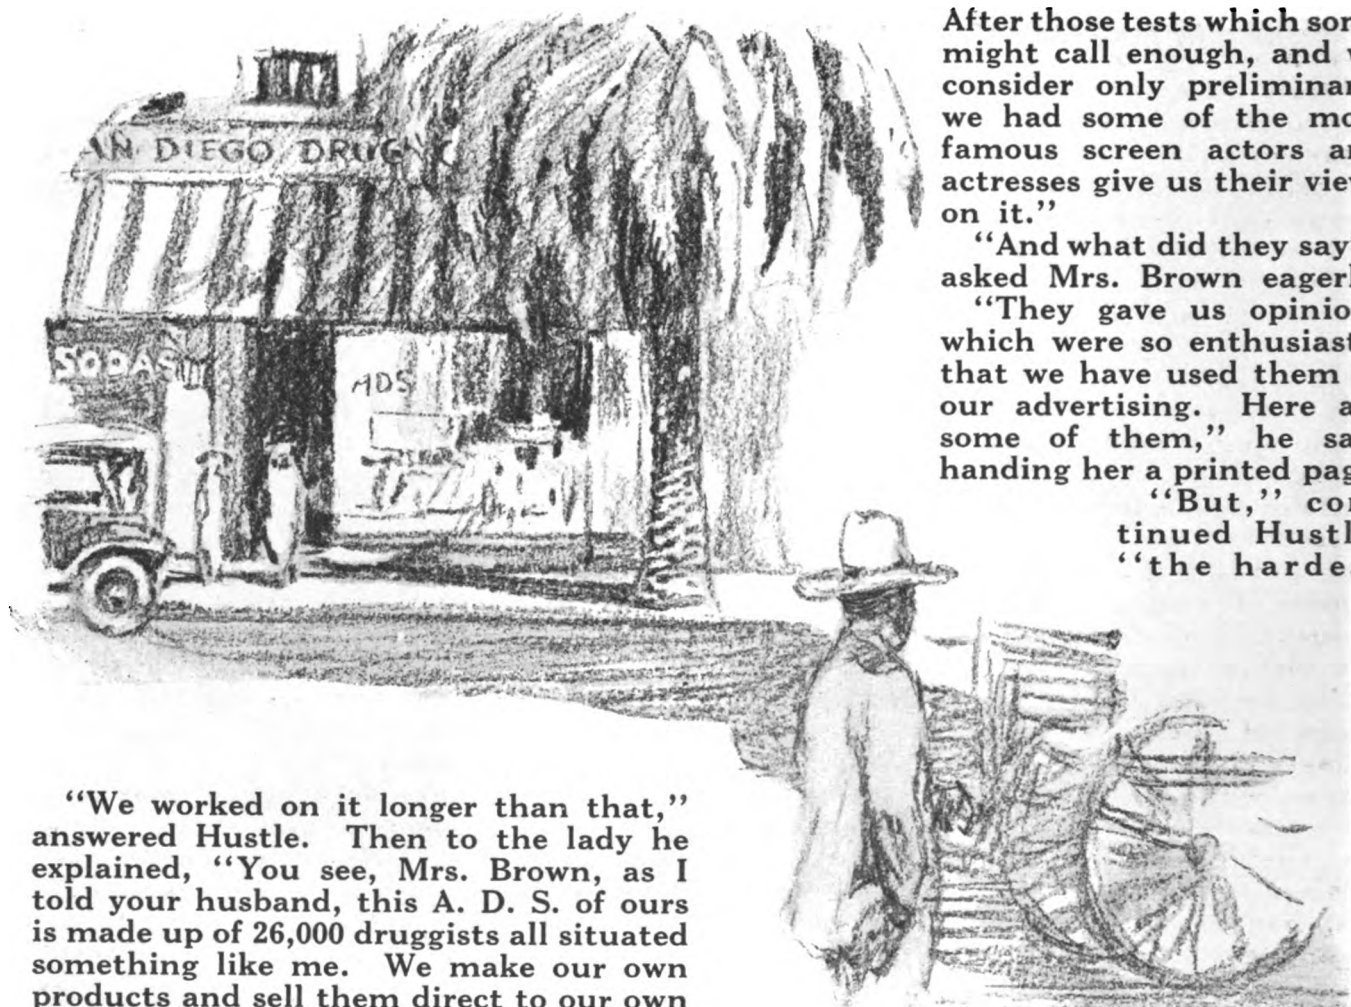

"How do you know you have reached that ideal," asked Mr. Brown, who was an engineer and demanded the practical.

"Because we proved it, both by science and practice. First of all, our own chemists had to be satisfied that the result of their many experiments had met all the requirements we demanded. Then, we tried it in the mouths of thousands of different people. Their white healthy teeth told us that Chlor-E-Dixo was right.

people to please were the A. D. S. druggists like myself. We knew what we wanted. We knew what you wanted. Before we could hand it to you across our counters it had to please us. You have been dealing with me for the greater part of your lives; chiefly because you believe that I wouldn't sell you anything I didn't believe was good. It is for that very reason that the 25,999 A. D. S. druggists and I were the hardest to please with this tooth paste. We endorse it to our customers."

Mr. Brown looked at the druggist in a new light. "That's right, Henry, your customers' faith in you means a lot. I never heard it analyzed before, but I can see now how other people in the neighborhood and ourselves have been buying here on faith all the time. Let me have a tube of that Chlor-E-Dixo. We'll give it a trial on your say-so. Mrs. Brown and I have been using different tooth pastes for years. This might give us a brand we can both use."

"All right. Take it," said Hustle, "but be sure to let me know within a few days how it suits you."

While the above may not be an accurate record of conversation by living people, it represents the relationship between A. D. S. druggists and their customers, and shows that something more than dollars and cents which these dealers put into every transaction across the counter. They have sold this tooth paste in hundreds of thousands of tubes because their word was enough guarantee for the first sale to their customers. Though they did spend years in searching for their ideal, though they took infinite pains in its production and believed they had one of the finest tooth pastes on the market, had they not had the confidence of their customers it would have cost hundreds of thousands of dollars to bring it before the public by ordinary methods.

But because this organization is composed of men like Hustle, located in villages and big cities in every state in the Union, who have been in the same stores for years dealing with the same customers, their word is believed.

When word was sent out that Chlor-E-Dixo had passed all its tests it was quietly shipped in stated quantities to A. D. S. drug stores throughout the country.

There was no big advertising campaign to announce it. It was displayed on the shelves and counters and sold with recommendation of the dealer. The dealer gave his word that it was good.

It has taken time for this unique organization to win such confidence from the public. Back in the early days of 1905 there was no American Druggists' Syndicate. The small drug store men were dominated by the jobbers. What the jobber said went both in regard to prices and quantities. And in many cases in regard to quality.

In the Spring of 1905, a small body of retail druggists banded together with little more than an idea. They believed they could serve the public and themselves better if they found a way to make their own products, to sell over their own counters. It would free them of outside domination. It would materially help their customers. Though the fight was all up hill in the early years and the opposition was tireless, they have succeeded beyond expectation.

They now have 26,000 druggist members. Each one is a partner and seller. They handle over 3,000 different products, have tangible assets of approximately seven million dollars and owe the banks not a dollar.

Their own summing up of the reason for this wonderful success is that they kept faith with the customer. The enormous sales of Chlor-E-Dixo is one of the rewards of the policy.

26,000 Druggists Say Chlor-E-Dixo will keep your teeth healthy and white

THROUGH representation all the 26,000 druggist partners in the American Druggists Syndicate had a voice in the making of Chlor-E-Dixo. They learned from actual contact with their thousands and thousands of customers what the ideal dentifrice should be.

It must thoroughly cleanse all available surfaces of every tooth. It must help keep the gums healthy. It must leave a pleasing taste in the mouth. It must have no gritty content. It must flow from the tube, economically. Because Chlor-E-Dixo has demonstrated on the teeth of thousands of people, including screen stars, that it has every one of these qualifications, it has the endorsement of these 26,000 druggists and all others who have used it.

Hope Hampton

"Night and morning when an acid mouth will do much damage to the teeth, I brush my teeth with Chlor-E-Dixo Tooth Paste. It keeps them pearly white."

Oscar Shaw

"I consider the care of my teeth of utmost importance and I give it the most careful consideration, so I use Chlor-E-Dixo Tooth Paste."

Alice Terry

"I use Chlor-E-Dixo Tooth Paste because it leaves a most refreshing taste in the mouth and always keeps my gums in perfect condition."

CHLOR-E-DIXO

is made from a combination of ingredients which is based upon the cleansing and germicidal action of oxygen, an agent that doctors have used for years as a mouth antiseptic. With these, are other special ingredients chosen for their gentle action and efficiency in removing film.

he's fidgety, he talks in his sleep. There's no living with him."

How could Snorky and Dennis, that unworldly fledgling, know what Skippy suffered? The forty-eight hours of the Thanksgiving vacation had been like a narcotic dream. He had been under the same roof with her; sat by her side in the darkened theater and thrilled at the low sobby music that sent his imagination helter-skelter into dangerous pastures. Christmas was yet to come, and for what Christmas might hold Skippy possessed his soul in patience.

Then the blow fell. A week later as Snorky Green was returning from the village he perceived Dennis de Brian de Boru in a state of surexcitation waving a newspaper at him from the porch.

Finnegan rushed forward, dived at his knees, and spilled him on the ground. "Damn you, you mad Irishman!" said Snorky, picking himself up and disentangling himself from the newspaper. "What's hit you, anyway?"

Lapidowitz Meets Two Gonifs

"Swindler! Gonif!" he cried. "He tried to get two thousand dollars. Give me back my twenty-five!" Several clerks, attracted by his cries, threw themselves between him and the frightened schnorrer. And just then two burly individuals of whose vocation there could be no doubt, entered the room.

"Police headquarters," said one of them. "Is there a chap named O'Brien here?"

Karesh, red in the face and shaking with excitement, pointed to Lapidowitz.

"The gonif tried to get two thousand dollars from me," he cried. "Already he got twenty-five and I want him locked up."

The detective calmly surveyed both Lapidowitz and Karesh.

"That guy's name ain't O'Brien," he said. "I suppose you're Karesh, ain't you? We got a wire from Chicago—"

"Me, too," cried Karesh. "From Rogitsky Bros., my best customers, what says O'Brien is a crook—"

"Oh, shut up," drawled the other detective, quietly. "We got the story and there ain't any use for hysterics. Just tell us, first, where's O'Brien and, second, did he get any money out of you?"

Karesh pointed at Lapidowitz.

"First," he said, "that gonif knows where he is. He tried to get two thousand dollars from me in cash to take to him. And second—no, God be praised! Except the twenty-five dollars what I gave this gonif to entertain him."

It took but a few moments for the detectives to get the whole story.

"The swindler! The gonif! He told me he bought him a lunch and flowers."

"I guess there ain't much chance of that guy waiting," said the detective, "but we'd better check it up."

Lapidowitz accompanied them to Mil-

"Skippy's free!" loudly shouted Dennis. Snorky, further mystified, seized Finnegan and having sufficiently shaken him demanded an explanation.

"Eighth page, first column—ouch!" said Finnegan.

Snorky opened it and read:

MISS POTTERMAN TO MARRY
HAROLD B. DRINKWATER

At this moment the door opened and Skippy came heavily out.

Dennis glanced at Snorky and solemnly handed over the fatal announcement.

At this most auspicious moment, Nuisance came around the house.

"Hi! Skippy, old sport, what ye doin'?"

Nuisance frolicked up for his victim and then stopped. He had caught Skippy's melancholy expression. He stopped and suddenly looked at the ground. He knew!

The next moment Nuisance, panic-stricken, was scuttling for his life, with Skippy roaring at his heels.

And just back of the lonely stretches of the Dickinson, Skippy fell upon him.

ken's café where, of course, there was no trace of O'Brien. Leaving a uniformed policeman stationed outside the café the detectives made Lapidowitz lead them to Mr. Smith's hotel. They rapped upon the door of the room and, receiving no answer, opened the door. Upon the bed lay Mr. Smith, a dazed expression upon his face, his arms and legs cleverly bound and tied to the bedstead and a handkerchief stuffed in his mouth.

"Gee! But that's a good job," exclaimed one of the detectives, admiringly. The other, however, was peering intently into the helpless man's face.

"Well, I declare," he ejaculated, with a chuckle. "Take a look, Bill. Ain't this our little old playmate, One-Eye Pete?"

His companion stared at the features of the prostrate man and then his own relaxed into a broad grin.

"Well, I'll be hanged," he exclaimed. "It's little Petey as sure as you live."

The moment the handkerchief was taken from his mouth he began to swear.

"He held me up with a gun, and then hit me with a blackjack."

"And then took your pile, hey?" said the detective. "Well, you needn't feel bad about it. We can't tell you the gentleman's real name just because we haven't landed him and we don't want to get him excited. But he's just as slick in his line as you are in yours."

Lapidowitz, who had watched all the proceedings in silence, leaned over the prostrate man and begged the detective:

"Couldn't you make him give me back my twenty-five dollars?"

"Why, you big bonehead," exclaimed the detective. "He ain't got it. Your friend O'Brien took every cent."

"Ts! Ts! Ts!" muttered Lapidowitz. "Ain't they the dirty gonifs!"

New Methods in Child Training

Now for the first time there is a scientific method in child training, founded on the principle that confidence is the basis of control. This new system shows you how in your own home to correct the cause of disobedience, wilfulness, untruthfulness and other dangerous habits which, if not properly remedied, lead to dire consequences. The trouble in most cases now is that children are punished or scolded for what they do. The new method removes the cause—not by punishment or scolding but by confidence and cooperation along lines which are amazingly easy for any parent to instantly apply.

Highest Endorsements This new system, which has been put prepared especially for the busy parent, is producing remarkable and immediate results for the thousands of parents in all parts of the world. It is also endorsed by leading educators. It covers all ages from cradle to eighteen years.

Free Book

"New Methods in Child Training" is the title of a startling book which describes this new system and outlines the work of the Parents Association. Send letter or postal today and the book will be sent free—but do it now as this announcement may never appear here again.

Moreover, these peasants are very, very poor. During the Great War, their homes were burned, their harvests taken by armies, and they themselves were driven before the Great Retreat of the Tsar's armies, a thousand miles away into Russia.

But when did imperialist groups ever bother about the problems of populations! The drive to the east made Poland one of the real military forces of Europe. She gained possession of the railway connections southward to Roumania, so that, together with this ally of hers, who is also under French influence, she controls the land routes clear across Europe, from the Baltic to the Black Sea, and threatens the railway communications from Moscow to salt water in both directions. That's the reason why war-clouds hover still over eastern Europe.

To the northwest Poland pushed into Vilna, and was finally allowed to keep that city. The majority of the people there voted for Poland, so she had this time a good democratic justification. But Vilna was the ancient capital of Lithuania and had been for a thousand years. So Poland gains an unfriendly nation on her north.

Against this ring of enemies, the countries from whom, in one way or another, she had taken land, Poland saw but one means of protection: a large army, maintained by alliance with France and officered by French officers; treaties with other nations, in all directions—with Roumania, with Hungary, with Czecho-Slovakia, with the Baltic States. The old, old game of treaties and counter-treaties, backed by armies and military agreements.

Poland awoke to find England looking at her askance and other nations calling her the spoiled child of Europe, and everybody betting on how long she could keep the land she had taken. Betting on the permanence of a nation's boundaries is not good for a nation's credit in the world! Poland found her "mark" sinking to utter worthlessness—7,000 of them to the dollar—and her industries slipping into the hands of foreign creditors, and her army into the hands of French officers! It was the awakening after another dream.

"THE THING which saved us, killed us," said a Polish woman to me. "The French general saved us from the Bolshevik, but since that time we have the French officers always to pay. Every young French lieutenant who comes to Poland to instruct our troops—he gets made a captain, and we have to pay his salary in French francs! One franc—how much is that already in Polish marks!"

"Do you know that France squeezes us like a dish-cloth? Every officer who comes—his diplomatic baggage is one pound of official papers, and many pounds of perfumes and French goods which he smuggles in, duty-free! He considers us a province to make money from!"

This is a new voice in Poland. Perhaps it is a trifle unfair to France; I shall not judge of the facts, for I have not examined the luggage of French officers. But it is a natural reaction; for Poland adored France unduly, and France flattered Poland with dreams of glory. And Poland is awakening from that dream of glory, and considering what the cost may be.

The first signs of the awakening came in the Finance Ministry. Michalski, the new finance minister, has done a fine big job in six month's time. When he came into office, Polish marks were 7,000 to the dollar and sinking by fits and spurts which were more discouraging to industry than even the actual lowness of value. In three months' time he doubled the value of the mark, and then, observing that the rapid rise unsettled industry, he kept the coinage as stable as possible and drove steadily toward bringing Poland to a gold basis.

His sensible plan was explained to me in detail by Dr. Wyszatycki, the president of the presidium in the finance ministry, to whom Michalski turned me over. There was to be no attempt to raise the value of the mark, except a little, and very gradually. A big rise would be undesirable, as it upsets industry as much as a big drop, and raises the amount which every debtor has to pay before he can clear himself.

NO, THE MARK was to be kept at about its same value, going up perhaps a little, while the efforts of the Finance Ministry were to go now to raising the government's income and cutting down the government's expenses. When these balance, and the government is paying its way, then it will be possible to go on a gold basis, especially as Polish exports are rapidly rising. The new coinage was to be called "zlota" and the Diet would then decree that one zlota is worth so many hundred or thousand of the paper marks, according to whatever the value of those marks may really be in gold at that time. The paper marks will thus be fixed in value, though a very low value, and will gradually be withdrawn from circulation, the zlota taking their place.

It is a definite workable scheme. Poland can achieve it if she is willing to pay the price. But the price is a heavy one!

The first thing Michalski did was to get rid of several government departments and discharge 24,000 government employees in three months' time. That meant a hundred thousand heartaches in the families of unemployed workers. One doesn't stabilize a currency for nothing!

The next thing Michalski did was to put on an enormous tax, called the "danina," to be paid only once, but thirty times the usual yearly tax, which goes on just the same. Imagine your taxes multiplied suddenly by thirty, and you'll get an idea of what hit Poland.

Of course the old count on his ruined estate cursed the government and wished back the Tsar. And his peasants—well, I talked to some of those peasants, up and down through eastern Poland.

They have come back to ruined villages, and fields made ugly by barbed wire and trenches. They are short of plows and horses and seed; they are bitterly destitute. And in the first year of their return behold, the tax-collector going up and down the land, charging each man according to the number of morgs of land which he possesses.

"We must pay taxes on barbed wire," wailed a peasant to me. "We must pay taxes on trenches."

"Our village is taxed 320,000 marks," complained another, "and all the money in the village is 61,000 marks, which has come by charity and gift from America."

ALL OVER eastern Europe there are a dozen new countries, in place of three old empires. They have to buy a dozen new armies in place of three old ones; a dozen new governments in place of three fat and smoothly running ones; and they have to pay the bills of all the old ones, too.

Worst of all, they have to pay the bill for all the suspicions, half old, half new, which are stirred up from outside. Poland cannot disarm because she fears the Red army. Russia cannot disarm, because she sees Wrangel collecting another army in Jugo-Slavia, and fears an attack through Roumania. Treaties and counter-treaties, agreements open and agreements secret—all these pile up the bill. It is the big powers of Europe that pull the strings, as they did before the war that was to end war—but the little nations pay a large part of the bill.

A great duel is going on in eastern Europe, a duel between France and Russia for the souls of the young nations. And Poland is the keystone of the arch of little nations for which they struggle.

France for a time obtained a great following. Poland and Roumania, linking together the land routes from the Baltic to the Black Sea, were her satellites. They were bound in alliance and had armies which together were about equal to the whole army of Russia. Roumania was tied up again in the little Entente, with Jugo-Slavia and Czecho-Slovakia. Poland had an agreement with Hungary. To the north of Poland were the Baltic States, Finland and Latvia and Esthonia, and France reached out for them also.

Just as she had succeeded, and the ring around Russia was complete, from the Arctic Ocean to the warm waters of the south, Poland stepped out of the ring. It was a most dramatic moment. A Baltic conference was being held in Warsaw, at which were assembled the secretaries of state and the war chiefs of all the Baltic States.

RUSSIA seemed really worried. She sent several protests, and then suddenly she struck a new note and said: "If it is true that your conference is not intended for offense against me, then let me join. I also am a Baltic State, and we have interests in common."

The wonder wasn't that Russia made the offer. The wonder was that Poland at once accepted. The small Baltic States followed. The conference was held in Riga, and agreements were reached, on trade, railway connections, and facilitation of business.

Russia had real gifts to give, gifts more substantial than the unstable "glory" which France offered. They were gifts that brought money and security instead of taking these things away. Russia said: "The coinage of all our countries is bad. But let us band together against any foreign financial consortium that will take away our sovereignty as the price of aid. Let us not become like China, but let us keep our independence and build ourselves up by mutual help toward industry and trade." And Poland was with her.

Russia said: "The boundaries of all our countries are unsettled. But yours are unsettled chiefly because you own lands taken from me. Let us work together for the recognition by all Europe of our various governments and territories. For just in so far as you get recognition for my government, you also get recognition for the treaties you have made with my government, and by which you hold your eastern borders. I want political recognition, you want border recognition; the same act gives us both." And Poland was with her!

Russia said: "We can none of us pay our bills because of our big armies. I can't disarm till you do, and you can't disarm till I do. And none of us can disarm as long as France keeps the biggest army in Europe and influences so many governments. Let us agree together to support a mutual disarmament policy wherever any nations in Europe will start it." And Poland was with her!

POLAND, YOU SEE, was waking up from her dream. She is not yet entirely awake. France and Russia still battle for the souls of the young nations, and especially for the soul of Poland, the central nation of the ring.

France offers military prestige and unstable empire, upheld by armies and alliances. It is a thing which has a great appeal to the soul of a young nation, shaking itself free from old oppressors and feeling within itself the power to give back blow for blow. Russia offers trade, the blotting out of all old scores, and peace. It is a more humdrum offering, but it is much less expensive.

If one thing is sure in eastern and central Europe, it is that Russia and Germany are going to help each other to their feet. The raw materials of untrained Russia, the trained organizing skill of Germany—it was always probable that these two would find their need of each other. The allies, in smashing Germany and taking away the materials on which her workmen lived, made the alliance inevitable.

Will Poland know it? Will she become a state of free and open transit between these two inevitable allies? Then the alliance will be peaceful, commercial, and Poland will get her share of the raw materials, the manufactured products, the commerce. She may become the great land route joining Russia and Asia with the rest of Europe. She is the great plain across which life naturally flows.

Or will she make of herself a barrier to be smashed, as all barriers are smashed which stand in the way of the inevitable movements of life? Will the East and the West meet across her in battle only, as they met in the days of the Turks and Tartars, and the later times of the three great empires which divided Poland?

That is the undecided question on which hangs more than the destiny of Poland. It is what gives to Poland her most urgent importance in the life of the world.

The Country Beyond

with a tired little droop of her head. "And where that is I do not know, Neekewa. I could not pass beyond the great white cloud that shut me out."

She stood up, and swayed in the gray light, like one worn out by hard travel. Then she passed into the tepee, and Jolly Roger heard her fall on her blanket-bed.

FOR many days Roger stayed with his Indian friends. Then one night Yellow Bird came to him with a warning: "Enemies were near. You must go at once." As they stood talking, Roger skeptical, there sounded the splash of a paddle in the lake and out of the darkness came the voice of Cassidy. Roger and Peter fled, making their escape in Cassidy's canoe. For days they paddled slowly north. One afternoon they landed on a sandy beach and as Roger stretched himself there came the sharp command: "Throw up your hands, McKay!"

TWENTY paces away stood McKay. His dunnage was on his back, his paddle in his hand. And Cassidy, smiling grimly, a dangerous humor in his eyes, was leveling an automatic at his breast. It was, in that instant, a tableau which no man could ever forget. Cassidy was bareheaded, and the sun burned hotly in his red hair. And his face was red, and in the pale blue of his Irish eyes was a fierce joy of achievement. At last, after months and years, the thrilling game of One against One was at an end. Cassidy had made the last move, and he was winner.

For half a minute after the command to throw up his hands McKay did not move. And Cassidy did not repeat the command, for he sensed the shock that had fallen upon his adversary, and was charitable enough to give him time. And then, with something like a deep sigh from between his lips, Jolly Roger's body sagged. The dunnage dropped from his shoulder to the sand. The paddle slipped from his hand. Slowly he raised his arms above his head, and Cassidy laughed softly.

A few days ago McKay would have grinned back, coolly, good humoredly, appreciative of the other's craftsmanship even in the hour of his defeat. But today there was another soul within him.

His eyes no longer saw the old Cassidy, brave and loyal to his duty, a chivalrous enemy, the man he had yearned to love as brother loves brother, even in the hours of sharpest pursuit. In Cassidy he saw now the hangman himself. The whole world had turned against him, and in this hour of his greatest despair and hopelessness a bitter fate had turned up Cassidy to deal him the finishing blow.

A swift rage burned in him, even as he raised his hands. It swept through his brain in a blind inundation. He did not think of the law, or of death, or of freedom. It was the unfairness of the thing that filled his soul with the blackness of one last terrible desire for vengeance. Cassidy's gun, leveled at his breast, meant nothing. A thousand guns leveled at his breast would have meant nothing. A choking sound came from his lips, and like a shot his right hand went to his holster.

In that last second or two Cassidy had foreseen the impending thing, and with the movement of the other's hand he cried out: "Stop! For God's sake stop—or I shall fire!"

Even into the soul of Peter there came in that moment the electrical thrill of something terrific about to happen, of impending death, of tragedy close at hand. Once, a long time ago, Peter had felt another moment such as this—when he had buried his fangs in Jed Hawkins's leg to save Nada.

In that fraction of a second which carried Peter through space, Corporal Cassidy's finger was pressing the trigger of his automatic, for McKay's gun was half out of its holster. He was aiming at the other's shoulder, somewhere not to kill.

The shock of Peter's assault came simultaneously with the explosion of Cassidy's gun. McKay heard the hissing spit of the bullet past his ear. His arm darted out. As Peter buried his teeth deeper into Cassidy's leg, he heard a second shot, and knew that it came from his master. There was no third. Cassidy drooped, and something like a laugh came from him—only it was not a laugh. His body sagged, and then crumpled down so that the weight of it fell upon Peter.

For many seconds after that Jolly Roger stood with his gun in his hand, not a muscle of his body moving, and with something like stupor in his staring eyes. Peter struggled out from under Cassidy and looked inquisitively from his master to the man who lay sprawled out like a great spider upon the sand. It was then that life seemed to come back into Jolly Roger's body. His gun fell and with a choking cry he ran to Cassidy and dropped upon his knees beside him.

"Cassidy, Cassidy," he cried. "Good God, I didn't mean to do it! Cassidy, old pal—"

With sobbing breath he cried out his grief and then looking down, he saw the miracle in Cassidy's face. The Irishman's eyes were wide open, and there was pain and also a grin, about his mouth.

"I'm glad you're sorry," he said. "I'd hate to have a bad opinion of you, McKay. But—you're a rotten shot!"

His body sagged heavily, and the grin slowly left his lips, and a moan came from between them. He struggled and spoke.

"It may be—you'll want help, McKay. If you do—there's a cabin half a mile up the creek. Saw the smoke—heard axe—I don't blame you. You're a good sport—pretty quick—but—rotten shot! Oh, Lord—such—rotten—shot—"

And he tried vainly to grin up into Jolly Roger's face as he became a lifeless weight in the other's arms.

Jolly Roger was sobbing. He was sobbing, in a strange, hard, man-fashion, as he tore open Cassidy's shirt and saw the red wound that went clean through Cassidy's right breast just under the shoulder. And Peter still heard that strange sound coming from his lips, a moaning as if for breath, as his master ran and brought up water, and worked over the fallen man. And then he got under Cassidy, and rose up with him on his shoulders, and staggered off with him toward the creek. There he found a path, a narrow foot trail, and not once did he stop with his burden until he came into a little clearing, out of which Cassidy had seen the smoke rising. In this clearing was a cabin, and from the cabin came an old man to meet him—an old man and a girl.

That night Jolly Roger made his camp close to the mouth of the Limping Moose. And for three days thereafter his trail led only between this camp and the cabin of old Robert Baron and his granddaughter, Giselle. All this time Cassidy was telling things in a fever. He talked a great deal about Jolly Roger. And the girl, nursing him night and day, with scarcely a wink of sleep between, came to believe they had been great comrades, and had been inseparable for a long time. Even then she would not let McKay take her place at Cassidy's side. The third day she started him off for a post sixty miles away to get a fresh supply of bandages and medicines.

AFTER ALL this episode had a happy ending. When Roger returned to the cabin one evening after a few days absence, he was surprised with the news that Cassidy and the girl, Giselle, were married, and that his old enemy had resigned from the Force. Once more Roger took up his far wanderings. A thousand miles north of Cragg's Ridge he spent the most of the winter, trapping and keeping out of the way of mounted police. One night of terrible storm he and Peter rescued a party of three men and a woman and the men were members of the mounted police. One of them, Breault, recognized McKay and in spite of the aid he had received, he was anxious to take the fugitive in, a prisoner. Warned by the girl, Roger and Peter escaped and then it was that the decision to return to Cragg's Ridge was reached. Back man and dog went, keeping always a sharp lookout for ferret-eyed Breault, who once on a trail would never abandon it. At Cragg's Ridge they found the desolation Yellow Bird had foretold. The whole country had been swept by fire. Inquiries won no information of Nada, but he was set on the track of the Missioner, Father John. While on this search he missed Breault by a hair, but the officer never knew of this. Then one afternoon, he came to a stream in the Burntwood country and late in the afternoon he heard the sound of an axe.

TOWARD this he and Peter made their way, until in a little clearing they saw a cabin. But the chopping was nearer them, in the heart of a thick cover of evergreen and birch. Into this Jolly Roger and Peter made their way and came within a dozen steps of the man who was wielding the axe. It was then that Jolly Roger went forward with a cry on his lips, for the man was Father John, the Missioner.

In spite of the fire-tragedy through which he had passed, the little gray man seemed younger [Continued on page 136]

Loses 74 Pounds

Feels and Looks Like a New Woman

Amazing Discovery Enables Mrs. Denneny to Lose 10 Pounds the Very First Week. She Has Lost 74 Pounds Already and Is Still Reducing. No Drugs, Starving, Exercise, Rolling, Painful Self-Denials or Discomforts.

"I WEIGHED 240 pounds. I had tried all kinds of anti-fat cures without success. Then one Sunday I saw your advertisement. It sounded so good that I sent for the books.

"The very first week I lost 10 pounds and kept reducing steadily. I lost 74 pounds and am still reducing. My friends say that I already look 10 years younger.

"Formerly I could not walk upstairs without feeling faint. But now I can RUN upstairs. Formerly I felt as if I were suffocating if I walked fast for 2 blocks. But now I can walk a mile just as fast as I can go and without the least sign of suffocation.

"I never felt better in my life. There is not a sign of my former indigestion now. I sleep like a rock. And I have a fine complexion now, whereas before, I was always bothered with pimples.

"I have reduced my bust 7½ inches, my waist 9 inches and my hips 11 inches. I even wear smaller shoes now. They were 'sixes,' now they are 'fives.'" Mrs. Mary Denneny, 82 West 9th Street, Bayonne, N. J.

Mrs. Denneny's experience is but one of many similar ones. Within the last few months over 300,000 men and women have been shown how to reduce to normal weight and secure the slender supple figures of youth by this pleasant method.

The rate at which you lose your surplus flesh is absolutely under your own control. If you do not wish to lose flesh as rapidly as a pound a day or ten pounds a week, you can regulate this natural law so that your loss of flesh will be more gradual.

Secure New Vigor Also

This natural method also builds your health and gives you renewed vitality and energy. You obtain a clearer complexion, a brighter eye and a more elastic step. Many write that they have been astounded at losing wrinkles which they had supposed could not be effaced. Your nerves are improved and your sleep is more refreshing. You regain youthful vigor and spirit as well as a youthful form.

And you obtain all this without any discomforts or self-denial. You make no change in your daily routine. You continue to do the things you like and to eat the food you enjoy. In fact, far from giving up the pleasures of the table, you may even increase them.

The Secret Explained

Scientists have always realized that there was some natural law on which the whole system of weight control was based. But to discover this vital "law of food" had always baffled them. It remained for Eugene Christian, the world-famous food specialist, to discover the one, safe, certain and easily followed method of regaining normal, healthful weight. He discovered that certain foods when eaten together take off weight instead of adding to it. Certain combinations cause fat, others consume fat. For instance, if you eat certain foods at the same meal, they are converted into excess fat. But eat these same foods at different times and they will be converted into blood and muscle. Then the excess fat you already have is used up. There is nothing complicated and nothing hard to understand. It is simply a matter of learning how to combine your food properly, and this is easily done.

This method even permits you to eat many delicious foods which you may now be denying yourself. For you can arrange your meals so that these delicacies will no longer be fattening.

10 Days' Trial—Send No Money

Eugene Christian has incorporated his remarkable secret of weight control into a course called "Weight Control—The Basis of Health." Lessons one and two show you how to reduce slowly; the others show you how to reduce more rapidly. To make it possible for every one to profit by his discovery he offers to send the complete course on 10 days' trial to any one sending in the coupon.

If you act quickly you can take advantage of a special reduced price offer that is being made for a short time only. All you need to do is to mail the coupon—or write a letter or postcard if you prefer—without sending a penny, and the course will be sent you at once, IN PLAIN WRAPPER.

When it arrives pay the postman the special price of only $1.97 (plus the few cents postage) and the course is yours. The regular price of the course is $3.50, but $1.97 is all you have to pay while this special offer is in existence. There are no further payments. But if you are not thoroughly pleased after a 10-day test of this method you may return the course and your money will be refunded instantly. (If more convenient you may remit with the coupon, but this is not necessary.)

Mrs. Mary J. Denneny, of 82 W. 9th St., Bayonne, N. J., before and after losing 74 pounds by this wonderful method. She also banished nervousness, weakness, insomnia and digestive disorders. Her complexion improved wonderfully. She is still reducing and will continue to do so until she reaches her normal, ideal weight.

Our liberal guarantee protects you. Either you experience in 10 days such a wonderful reduction in weight and gain a wonderful gain in health that you wish to continue this simple, easy, delightful method or else you return the course and your money is refunded without question.

than in that month long ago when Jolly Roger had fled to the North. He dropped his axe now and stood as if only half believing, a look of joy shining in his face. "McKay!" he cried, reaching out his hands. "McKay, my boy!"

A look of pity mellowed the gladness in his eyes as he noted the change in Jolly Roger's face, and the despair that had set its mark upon it.

They stood for a moment with clasped hands, questioning and answering with the silence of their eyes. And then the Missioner said:

"You have heard? Someone told you?"

"No," said Jolly Roger his head dropping a little. "No one has told me," and he was thinking of Nada and of her death.

Father John's fingers tightened.

"It is strange how the ways of God bring themselves about," he spoke in a low voice.

"Roger, you did not kill Jed Hawkins!"

Dumbly, his lips dried of words, Jolly Roger stared past him.

Someone was coming to them from the direction of the cabin—someone, a girl, and she was singing.

McKay's face went whiter than the gray ash of fire.

"My God," he whispered huskily. "I thought—she had died!"

In the edge of the clearing, close to the thicket of timber, Nada had stopped. For across the open space a strange looking creature had raced at the sound of her voice; a dog with bristling Airedale whiskers, and a hound's legs, and wild-wolf's body hardened and roughened by months of fighting in the wilderness.

IN THE MISSIONER'S cabin, Nada and Roger were married. But their honeymoon was rudely interrupted. Father John hurried in one evening to tell them that Breault was coming. There was no escape from the keen nose of the man-hunter. Nada refused to leave Roger; so the two, leaving Peter with Father John, went out into the night and taking a canoe, slipped down the river away from Breault, intending to make their way to the United States, as the Country Beyond. Peter escaping, pursued them and in the end it was the dog who loved them that led them into the hands of the officer. There came an afternoon when Breault, who was following the two after they had abandoned their canoe and were plodding across the country, had lost the trail. But Peter, with whom he had made friends on the long trip down the river, took up the scent and led him on. So it happened that one morning McKay awoke to find himself looking into Breault's gun. The officer grinned as he produced handcuffs and snapped one around a wrist of each of his prisoners. Then he stood back considering them a bit before he spoke:

"Now, while you're helpless, I want to tell you a few things," Breault said. "And while I'm talking I'll start the fire, so we can have breakfast. Peter and I are hungry. A good dog, McKay. He saved us up on the Barren. Have you told Mrs. Jolly Roger about that?"

He expected no answer, and whistled as he lighted a pile of birchbark which he had already placed under dry cedar wood.

"That's where my trouble began—up there on the Barren, Mrs. Jolly Roger," he continued, ignoring McKay. "You see the three of us, Superintendent Tavish, and Porter—who is now his son-in-law—and I had a splendid chance to die like martyrs, and go down forever in the history of the Service, if it hadn't been for this fool of a husband of yours, and Peter. I can't blame Peter, because he's only a dog. But McKay is responsible. He robbed us of a beautiful opportunity of dying in an unusual way by hunting us up and dragging us into his shelter. A shabby trick.

"And so—they assigned me the very unpleasant duty of running you down with a pardon, McKay—a pardon forgiving you for all of your sins, forever and ever. Amen. And here it is."

He had drawn an official-looking envelope from inside his coat and held it out now—not to McKay—but to Nada.

Just then something new happened in the weirdly adventurous life of François Breault. Without warning he was suddenly smothered in a pair of arms, his head was jerked back, and against his hard and pitiless mouth a pair of soft red lips pressed for a single thrilling instant.

"Well, I'll be damned," he gasped.

And he picked up his pack and walked off into the thick young spruce at the edge of the timber, without saying another word or once looking behind him.

So went Breault, for the first time in his life a messenger of mercy; and at the top of the silver birch the little warbler knew that something glad had happened, and offered up his gratitude in a burst of song.

Men Like Gods

conditions. Chemistry—and nakedness. I feel bound to confess that whether we are to regard these two people who have apparently just blown themselves up here, as Greek gods or as naked savages, seems to me to be altogether a question of individual taste. I admit a bias for the Greek god—and goddess."

"Except that it is a little difficult to think of two dead immortals," squeaked the gentleman of the eyeglass, in the tone of one who scores a point.

Mr. Burleigh was about to reply, and to judge from his ruffled expression his reply would have been of a disciplinary nature. But instead he exclaimed sharply and turned round to face two newcomers. The whole party had become aware of them at the same moment. Two stark Apollos stood over the ruin and were regarding our earthlings with an astonishment at least as great as that they created.

One spoke and Mr. Barnstaple was astonished beyond measure to find understandable words reverberating in his mind.

"Red Gods!" cried the Utopian. "What things are you? And how did you get into the world?"

(English! It would have been far less astounding if they had spoken Greek.)

Mr. Cecil Burleigh was the least disconcerted of the party. "Now," he said, "we may hope to learn something definite—face to face with these rational and articulate creatures."

He cleared his throat, grasped the lapels of his long dust coat with two long nervous hands and assumed the duties of spokesman. "We are quite unable, gentlemen, to account for our presence here," he said. "We are as puzzled as you are. We have discovered ourselves suddenly in your world instead of our own."

"You come from another world?"

"Exactly. A quite different world. In which we have all our natural and proper places. We were traveling in that world of ours in—Ah!—certain vehicles, when suddenly we discovered ourselves here. Intruders, I admit, but, I can assure you, innocent and unpremeditated intruders."

"You do not know how it is that Arden and Greenlake have failed in their experiment and how it is that they are dead?"

"If Arden and Greenlake are the names of these two beautiful young people here, we know nothing about them except that we found them lying as you see them when we came from the road hither to find out or, in fact, to inquire—"

The Utopian, if we may for convenience call him that, who had first spoken, looked now at his companion and seemed to question him mutely. Then he turned to the Earthlings again. He spoke and again those clear tones rang, not—so it seemed to Mr. Barnstaple—in his ears but within his head.

"It will be well if you and your friends do not trample this wreckage. It will be well if you all return to the road. Come with me. My brother here will put an end to this burning and do what needs to be done to our brother and our sister."

"We must throw ourselves entirely upon your hospitality," said Mr. Burleigh. "This encounter, let me repeat, was not of our seeking."

"Though we should certainly have sought it if we had known of its possibility," said Mr. Catskill, addressing the world at large and glancing at Mr. Barnstaple as if for confirmation. "We find this world of yours—most attractive."

AS THEY returned through the thick growing flowers to the road, in the wake of the Utopian and Mr. Burleigh, Mr. Barnstaple found Lady Stella rustling up beside him. Her words, in this setting of pure wonder, filled him with amazement at their serene and invincible ordinariness. "Haven't we met before somewhere—at lunch or something—Mr.—Mr.—?"

Was all this no more than a show? He stared at her blankly for a moment before supplying her with:

"Barnstaple."

"Mr. Barnstaple?"

His mind came into line with hers.

"I've never had that pleasure, Lady Stella. Though, of course, I know you—I know you very well from your photographs in the weekly illustrated papers."

"Did you hear what it was that Mr. Cecil was saying just now? About this being Utopia?"

"He said we might call it Utopia."

"So like Mr. Cecil. But is it Utopia—really Utopia?"

"I've always longed so to be in Utopia," the lady went on without waiting for Mr. Barnstaple's reply to her question. "What splendid young men these two Utopians appear to be! They must, I am sure, belong to its aristocracy—in spite of their informal—costume. Or because of it."

Mr. Barnstaple had a happy thought. "I have also recognized Mr. Burleigh and Mr. Rupert Catskill, Lady Stella, but I should be so glad, Lady Stella, if you would tell me who the young gentleman with the eyeglass is, and the clerical gentleman. They are close behind us."

LADY STELLA imparted her information in a charmingly confidential undertone. "The eyeglass," she said, "is—I am going to spell it—F-R-E-D-D-Y M-U-S-H. Taste, good taste. He is awfully clever at finding out young poets and all that sort of literary thing. And he's Rupert's secretary. If there is a literary academy, they say, he's certain to be in it. He's dreadfully critical and sarcastic. We were going to Taplow for a perfectly intellectual week-end, quite like the old times. So soon as the Windsor people had gone again, that is. . . . Mr. Gosse was coming and Max Beerbohm—and everyone like that. But nowadays something always happens. Always. . . . The unexpected—almost excessively. . . . The clerical collar—" she glanced back to judge whether she was within earshot of the gentleman under discussion—"is Father Amerton who is always so outspoken about the sins of society and all that sort of thing. It's odd but, out of the pulpit, he's inclined to be shy and quiet and a little awkward with the forks and spoons."

"Of course!" cried Mr. Barnstaple. "I remember him now. I knew his face but I couldn't place it."

But now more of these people were coming upon the scene. They had airplanes in this world, for two small ones, noiseless and swift in their flight as swallows, had landed in the fields near-by. A man had come up along the road on a machine like a small two-wheeled coupé with its wheels in series, bicycle fashion; lighter and neater it was than any earthly automobile and mysteriously able to stand up on its two wheels while standing still. A burst of laughter from down the road called Mr. Barnstaple's attention to a group of these Utopians who had apparently found something exquisitely ridiculous in the engine of the limousine. Most of these people were as scantily clothed and as beautifully built as the two dead experimentalists, but one or two were wearing big hats of straw and one who seemed to be an older woman of thirty or more wore a robe of white bordered by an intense red line. She was speaking now to Mr. Burleigh.

"We do not even know as yet what connection your coming into our world may have with the explosion that has just happened here or whether indeed it has any connection. We want to inquire into both these things. It will be reasonable we think to take you and all the possessions you have brought with you to a convenient place for a conference not very far from here. We are arranging for machines to take you thither. There perhaps you will eat. I do not know when you are accustomed to eat."

"Refreshment?" said Mr. Burleigh,

An Easy Way to Remove Dandruff

If you want plenty of thick, beautiful, glossy, silky hair do by all means get rid of dandruff, for it will starve your hair and ruin it if you don't.

The best way to get rid of dandruff is to dissolve it. To do this just apply a little Liquid Arvon at night before retiring; use enough to moisten the scalp, and rub it in gently with the finger tips.

By morning most, if not all, of your dandruff will be gone, and three or four more applications should completely remove every sign and trace of it.

You will find, too, that all itching of the scalp will stop, and your hair will look and feel a hundred times better. You can get Liquid Arvon at any drug store. A four-ounce bottle is usually all that is needed.

rather catching at the idea. "Some refreshment would certainly be acceptable before very long. In fact, had we not fallen so sharply out of our own world into yours, by this time we should have been lunching in the best of company."

"Wonder and lunch," thought Mr. Barnstaple. Man is a creature who must eat by necessity whether he wonder or not. Mr. Barnstaple perceived indeed that he was hungry and that the air he was breathing was decidedly a keen and appetizing air.

THE UTOPIAN seemed struck by a novel idea. "Do you eat several times a day? What sort of things do you eat?"

"Oh! Surely! They're not vegetarians!" cried Mr. Mush, sharply, in a protesting parenthesis, dropping his eyeglass from its socket.

They were all hungry. It showed upon their faces.

"We are all accustomed to eat several times a day," said Mr. Burleigh. "Perhaps it would be well if I were to give you a brief résumé of our dietary. There may be differences. We begin as a rule with a simple cup of tea and the thinnest slice of bread and butter brought to the bedside. Then comes breakfast. . . ." He proceeded to a masterly summary of his gastronomic day, giving clearly and attractively the particulars of an English breakfast, eggs to be boiled four and a half minutes, neither more nor less; lunch, with any light wine; tea, rather a social rally than a serious meal; dinner, in some detail; the occasional resort to supper. It was one of those clear statements which would have rejoiced the House of Commons, light, even gay, and yet with a trace of earnestness. The Utopian woman regarded him with deepening interest. "Do you all eat in this fashion?" she asked.

MR. BURLEIGH ran his eye over his party. "I cannot answer for Mr.—Mr.—?" "Barnstaple. . . . Yes, I eat in much the same fashion."

For some reason the Utopian woman smiled at him. She had very pretty brown eyes and though he liked her to smile he wished that she had not smiled in the way she did.

"And you sleep?" she asked.

"From six to ten hours according to circumstances," said Mr. Burleigh.

"And you make love?"

The question perplexed and to a certain extent shocked our Earthlings. What exactly did she mean? For some moments no one framed a reply. Mr. Barnstaple's mind was filled with a hurrying rush of strange possibilities.

Then Mr. Burleigh with his fine intelligence and the quick evasiveness of a modern leader of men, stepped into the breach. "Not habitually, I can assure you," he said. "Not habitually."

The woman with the red-bordered robe seemed to think this over for a swift moment. Then she smiled faintly.

"We must take you somewhere where we can talk of all these things," she said. "Manifestly you come from some strange other world. Our men of knowledge must get together with you and exchange ideas."

At half-past ten that morning Mr. Barnstaple had been motoring along the main road through Slough, and now at half-past one he was soaring through wonderland with his own world half forgotten. "Marvelous," he repeated. "Marvelous, I knew that I should have a good holiday. But this, this —!"

He was extraordinarily happy with the bright unclouded happiness of a perfect dream. Never before had he enjoyed the delights of an explorer in new lands.

The Earthling party had been distributed among four small airplanes and as Mr. Barnstaple and his companion, Father Amerton, rose in the air, he looked back to see the automobiles and luggage being lifted with astonishing ease into two lightly-built lorries.

By contemporary earthly standards of safety Mr. Barnstaple's aviator flew very low. For the earlier part of the journey it was garden pasture with grazing creamy cattle and patches of brilliantly colored vegetation.

THERE were few houses and no towns or villages at all. The houses varied very greatly in size, from little isolated buildings which Mr. Barnstaple thought might be elegant summer-houses or little temples, to clusters of roofs and turrets which reminded him of country chateaux. Here and there people were working in the fields or going to and fro on foot or on machines.

It became evident that they were going to cross the range of snowy mountains that had so suddenly blotted the distant view of Windsor Castle from the landscape.

As they approached these mountains, broad stretches of golden corn-land replaced the green of the pastures and then the cultivation became more diversified.

A graded road with bold, light and beautiful viaducts mounted toward the pass. There were more people, he thought, in the highland country than in the levels below, though still far fewer than he would have seen upon any comparable country-side on earth.

Ten minutes of snowy upland with the snow-fields of a great glacier on one side intervened before he descended into the upland valley on the Conference Place where presently he alighted. This was a sort of lap in the mountain, terraced by masonry so boldly designed that it seemed a part of the geological substance of the mountain itself. It faced toward a wide artificial lake retained by a stupendous dam from the lower reaches of the valley.

THEY made an easy landing on a turfy expanse close to a graceful chalet that ran out from the shores of the lake over the water, and afforded mooring to a flotilla of gaily-colored boats. . . .

It was Father Amerton who had drawn Mr. Barnstaple's attention to the absence of villages. He now remarked that there was no church in sight and that nowhere had they seen any spires or belfries. But Mr. Barnstaple thought that some of the smaller buildings might be temples or shrines. "Religion may take different forms here," he said.

"And how few babies or little children are visible!" Father Amerton remarked.

"On the other side of the mountains there was a place like the playing field of a big school. There were children there, and a few older people dressed in white."

"I saw that. But I was thinking of babes. Compare this with what one would see in Italy."

"The most beautiful and desirable young women," added the reverend gentleman; "most desirable—and not a sign of maternity to be seen!"

Their aviator, a sun-tanned blond with very blue eyes, helped them out of his machine and they stood watching the descent of the other members of their party. Mr. Barnstaple was astonished to note how rapidly he was becoming familiarized with the color and harmony of this new world; the strangest things in the whole spectacle now were the figures and clothing of his associates. Mr. Rupert Catskill in his celebrated gray top hat, Mr. Mush with his preposterous eyeglass, the peculiar long slenderness of Mr. Burleigh, and the square leather-clad lines of Mr. Burleigh's chauffeur, struck him as being far more incredible than the graceful Utopian forms.

The aviator's interest and amusement enhanced Mr. Barnstaple's perception of his companions' oddity.

"I suppose this is really real," he said to Father Amerton.

"Really real!—what else can it be?"

"I suppose we are not dreaming all this."

"Are your dreams and my dreams likely to coincide?"

"No, but these are quite impossible things—absolutely impossible things!"

"As for instance?"

"Well, how is it that these people are speaking to us in English?"

"I never thought of that. It is rather incredible. They don't talk in English to one another."

Mr. Barnstaple stared in round-eyed amazement at Father Amerton, struck for the first time by a still more incredible fact. "They don't talk in anything to one another," he said. "And we haven't noticed it until this moment!"

UNDER the direction of the brown-eyed woman in the scarlet-edged robe, the Earthlings were established in their quarters near the Conference Place in the most hospitable and comfortable fashion conceivable. Five or six youths and girls made it their business to initiate the strangers in the little details of Utopian domesticity. The separate buildings in which they were lodged had each an agreeable little dressing-room, and the bed, which had sheets of the finest linen and a very light puffy coverlet, stood in an open loggia—too open Lady Stella thought, but then, as she said, "One feels so safe here."

The light meal that followed was by terrestrial standards an entirely satisfactory one. The anxiety of Mr. Freddy Mush was completely allayed: there were cold chicken and ham and a very pleasant meat paté. There were also rather coarse-grained but most palatable bread, pure butter, and exquisite salad, fruit, cheese of the Gruyère type and a light white wine which won from Mr. Burleigh the tribute that "Moselle never did anything better."

No servants waited at the clothless stone table; the woman in the white and scarlet robe and the two aviators shared the same and the guests attended to each other's requirements. Other Utopians with friendly but keenly observant eyes upon the Earthlings came into the great pillared veranda in which the meal had been set and smiled and stood about or sat down. There were no introductions and few social formalities.

"All this is most reassuring," said Mr. Burleigh. "Most reassuring. I'm bound to say these beat the Chatsworth peaches. Is that cream, my dear Rupert, in the little brown jar in front of you? . . . I guessed as much. If you are sure you can spare it, Rupert. . . . Thank you."

SEVERAL of the Utopians made themselves known by name to the Earthlings. The brown-eyed woman's name was Lychnis. A man with a beard who might perhaps, Mr. Barnstaple thought, have been as old as forty, was either Urthred or Adam or Edom, the name had been very difficult to catch. He conveyed that he was an ethnologist and historian and that he desired to learn all that he possibly could about the ways of our world. He impressed Mr. Barnstaple as having the easy carriage of some earthly financier or great newspaper proprietor rather than the diffidence natural in our own everyday world to a merely learned man. Another of their hosts, Serpentine, was also, Mr. Barnstaple learnt with surprise, for his bearing too was almost masterful, a scientific man. He called himself something that Mr. Barnstaple could not catch. First it sounded like "atomic mechanic" and then oddly enough it sounded like "molecular chemist." And then Mr. Barnstaple heard Mr. Burleigh say to Mr. Mush, "Didn't he say, 'physio-chemist?'"

"I thought he just called himself a materialist," said Mr. Mush.

"Their intonation is peculiar," said Mr. Burleigh. "Sometimes they are almost too loud for comfort and then there is a kind of gap in the sounds."

When the meal was at an end the whole party removed to another little building that was evidently planned for classes and discussions. Lychnis, Urthred, Serpentine and the Earthlings seated themselves on a semi-circular bench below the lecturer's platform. There was accommodation for about eighty or a hundred people upon the seats before them. All these were occupied and beyond stood a number of graceful groups against a background of rhododendron-like bushes.

They were going to talk over this extraordinary irruption into their world. Could anything be more reasonable than to talk it over? Could anything be more fantastically impossible?

"Odd that there are no swallows," said Mr. Mush suddenly in Mr. Barnstaple's ear. "I wonder why."

Mr. Barnstaple's attention went to the empty sky. "No gnats nor flies perhaps," he suggested. It was odd that he had not missed the swallows before.

"Sssh!" said Lady Stella. "He's beginning to speak."

been quite ready to face the consequences that time, had he? He remembered that he had planned, while she was in her bath, to leave out all the money he had in his pockets for her, and a check for all he had in the bank, and to bolt. It had been in his mind, to ship before the mast, and under an assumed name, on the first ship that was sailing for anywhere that was far enough off.

It made him cold all over and ashamed to think what would have become of Mary, of his wife, if he had abandoned her.

For, like it or not, the moment you marry a girl, she is your wife. She has ceased to be whatever she was before, and she has become your wife.

It doesn't help the man to say, "I was drunk and didn't know what I was doing," any more than it helps the girl to say, "I was so young. I didn't know."

Drunk or sober, young or old, wise or foolish, you made certain promises, and while you were making them you meant to keep them, and—he was profoundly thankful that he had stood by the woman he had married and tried to give her a square deal. If it had been honest and decent to stick, then decency and honesty had been rewarded. She had turned out well. She had stuck to her promises splendidly. Each had managed to make out of the other something well worth making—a friend.

THINGS were going to be better than ever between them when he got back to her. She might not have noticed but all these months he had been sick, half comatose from the blow he had given himself. He had not been able to feel that the old ways, the old friendships, the old habits and all things dear had really gone out of his life forever. He realized it now. The break was complete. Wherefore, he would not return to his wife as one who repents, mourns and looks backward, but as one who sees definitely that there is an altogether new life to be lived, and who proposes bravely and constructively to live it.

In that life she owned a half interest. Between them they must make it an honorable and cherished asset.

His past was dead! Door nails had nothing on it!

Well, if marriage could do so much for him, how about Mary?

When that question asked itself he jumped out of the chair in which he had been dawdling and ruminating, and began to pace the room.

It would, of course, do the same for her. Her past was dead too. That was only fair.

He realized then that this was no sudden discovery but only a formulation of something that had for a long time now been an established fact in his own personal regard for her. Her past was dead.

Bud Junior had had a miserable time of it. Mastoiditis, followed by the operation that cures the condition, the drainage, the dressings, is the thing best calculated to make a little boy feel low in his mind. But the worst was all over now. The doctor felt sure of it. One side was well, and the other, though it had grumbled and threatened, was distinctly on the mend.

But he had to be kept in bed, and he had to be kept quiet. He had been so long out of school that he was afraid he would have to be dropped a class, and this worried him. He was dead sure that mother was going to be fussy about him all the rest of his life.

He saw a picture in which mufflers, galoshes and ear tabs would figure even in the mildest weather.

Bud Senior had longed for his boys, and had dreaded seeing them. Montie, the elder, being precocious, as his mother before him must have been, would be sure to have imbibed something of the scandal that concerned his father. Both the boys must, surely and with only hints to guide them, be convinced that their mother had been greatly wronged by him. He wondered if, in their childish judgment, they had wrongly sided with her. Children are sometimes violently prejudiced. Bud Junior had seemed only glad to see him, and from that moment the inflammation that threatened the boy with further torturings had begun to subside. Montie had seemed glad to see him too; but with a difference. The precocious young wool-gatherer, and accurate observer of other people's manners and customs, showed at once in his affectionate but reticent greeting that there was a new head of the family—himself.

He did the honors. He asked his father if he would have a drink. There was a hint in his manner of the tolerance which comes with much experience. All men, he seemed to say, have in them the seeds of all the temptations; but let no man judge another until he was intimately acquainted with the facts.

ON ACCOUNT of Montie, the first wife had been obliged to dismiss her maid. "Oh, nothing serious, just symptoms. He was rather grown-up for his age, and Grizelle was always flattering him, and telling him what a wonder he was going to be when he grew up, with those beautiful brown eyes of his, and his long black lashes . . . Bud Junior would have hit her if she'd said anything like that to him; but Montie liked it. . . . Oh, she was just putting silly ideas into his head, and I thought she'd better go." And she had added with a sigh, "But I'm afraid he's going to be a case. The only magazines he likes are about actors and motion picture people. He takes the most tremendous pains with his personal appearance . . . I'm sure I don't know where he got all his foolishness."

"The world," Bud Highland thought, "will say that he gets it from me . . . and, of course, he gets it from his mother . . . if she had been a boy instead of a girl, she'd have been a case!"

He had a talk with Montie and tried to win his confidence. No use. He was obviously a boy who was determined to go through life profiting by no other experience than his own. It was obvious, though this point was never actually reached, that he knew just about as much as his father might have thought best to tell him.

He was a charming boy, handsome, well made, and sure to have gone wrong even if his lot had been cast among the Spartans under Lykurgos.

Bud Junior had neither the charm nor the beauty. But he had honesty, and loyalty, and when he grew up he would look like a man. He was very like his father. He had the same short nose, the same steady, slow-moving eyes, the same cleft in his square lower jaw. His head was narrower between the ears than Montie's; it hadn't the same delicacy; it looked to be made of thicker bone. When they had been hurting him worst, his brows had a way of knitting themselves into a kind of puzzled look.

Bud spent all his afternoon with Bud Junior. Montie, full of engagements, came and went. He never missed a dancing class, and sometimes, all dolled up, went with other boys of his own age, to call upon such of their girl friends as had afternoons at home.

It made Bud feel very old and sad to see his boy going that glittering and artificial way. He preferred boys who were just boys. Montie might have been very good at games; he was already an exquisite dancer; he might have stood high in his class; he might have excelled at almost anything. What was he going to get out of life? He was going to deserve a bad reputation—and be clever enough to avoid having one. He was going to be cold-bloodedly passionate; warm-heartedly selfish; calculatantly reckless. He would make the worst husband in his set and the best marriage.

Bud Junior was the solace. Later on he would see through his mother, and make her the better son for it. He would make some woman very happy if only she had the sense and the patience to let him. He wasn't going to need his father. He would have grown clean and straight in any slum.

The past was, indeed, dead. Once Bud was on his feet again, he guessed he'd be going. It would not be easy, though. He would miss that boy so. He wished he could have him. He even made the suggestion, falteringly, to the first wife and received a withering answer—"Let my boy live in the same house with that woman! You must think I'm crazy."

She wasn't. The theory was correct. Bud would have been the first to acknowledge this. For, of course, she didn't know Mary.

"Poor little Mary," Bud thought. "She'd make the boy a good mother, and with me to look after them both, and a good, wholesome atmosphere to grow up in, why he'd be getting more of what he likes and is going to like than he'll ever get here. Of course it wouldn't do to take him away from his mother, if she really wanted him, and I was a fool to suggest it; but how about the new father he's going to have one of these days?"

He felt sure that the first wife was going to take a second husband before long; he knew the signs. Other things being equal, he hoped the second husband would be rich.

A man tells himself that he cannot do without this or that, without this thing or that person. A man tells himself that he cannot live without the woman he loves or the children who are all the rest of the world to him. Nevertheless in many cases the woman takes herself away from him, and she takes those children with her, and the man who couldn't possibly live in the face of such deprivation—doesn't die. Or if he does die, it is long afterward and of something else. In most people the will to live is stronger than any passion, it is even stronger, as a rule, than one's pet theory.

The first wife had brought about a certain situation, which her husband had been powerless to change. She had assumed certain responsibilities, which, whether she did well or ill by them, she could by no means be made to give up.

WHEN, therefore, Bud started back West he felt that he had been forcibly relieved of all present and future responsibilities toward his sons. It was as if he had ceased to be their father and had become their grandfather. Since he was to have no say in their education or the ordering of their lives, it would not be his fault if they grew up ignorant and if their lives went wrong.

He was through with New York. He doubted if he would ever see his sons again. He concluded, indeed, that it would be for the best in the long run if he deliberately kept away from them.

He spent a day in Chicago, avoiding old friends, and killing time as best he could.

Toward late afternoon the feeling of boredom and dullness passed. The thought that in less than four days he would see Mary again began to excite him.

He wasn't such an outcast after all! He wasn't headed for nowhere; but for somewhere in particular. He was no unattached soap bubble bobbing hither and yon; but a man with definite attachments and responsibilities. Curious that all of a sudden, at thought of Mary, his heart should beat more quickly. He would be more than glad to see her!

He stepped into a Western Union office and sent her a night letter. It was the most affectionate message that he had ever sent her. He wanted her to be glad to know that he was glad that they would soon be together again.

In the smoking car a Traveling-Man asked Bud for a light, and thereafter began a conversation.

"Going all the way through?"

"Yes. To Los Angeles."

"Ever been in California before?"

"Oh, yes," said Bud easily. "My wife's there, and I'm on my way home . . ."

THE END.

How to speak and write Masterly English

Thousands of people make little mistakes in their everyday English and don't know it. As a result of thousands of tests, Sherwin Cody found that the average person is only 61% efficient in the vital points of English. In a five-minute conversation, or in an average one-page letter, from five to fifty errors will appear. It is surprising how many experienced stenographers fall in spelling such common words as "business," "abbreviate," etc. It is astonishing how many business men say, "between you and I" instead of "between you and me," and use "who" for "whom," and mispronounce the simplest words. Few people know whether to use one or two "c's" or "in's" or "r's" whether to spell words with "le" or "el," and when to use commas in order to make their meaning absolutely clear.

A REMARKABLE INVENTION

Mr. Cody has specialized in English for the past twenty years. But instead of going along in the old way he has applied scientific principles to teaching the correct use of our language. He made tens of thousands of tests of his various devices before inventing his present method. In all his tests he found that the trouble with old methods is that points learned do not stick in the mind. In school you were asked to remember rules, and if you forgot the rules you never could tell what was right and what was wrong. For five years Mr. Cody worked almost day and night to find a way to replace bad habits in writing and speech, with good ones. And as a result of his experience he evolved his wonderful new

SELF-CORRECTING METHOD

Mr. Cody was granted a patent on his unique device, and now he places it at your disposal. This invention is simple, fascinating, time saving and incomparably efficient. You do the lesson given on any page, then you see exactly how Mr. Cody himself would correct it. You mark your errors and check them in the first blank column. Next week you try that page again, on the second unmarked sheet, correct your errors, and check them in the second column. You see at a glance what you have learned and what you have failed to remember, until you have reached the 100% point in spelling, punctuation, grammar and expression.

ONLY 15 MINUTES A DAY

A remarkable advantage of Mr. Cody's course is the speed with which these habit-forming practice drills can be carried out. You can write the answers to fifty questions in 15 minutes, and correct your work in five minutes more. You waste no time in going over the things you already know. Your efforts are automatically concentrated on the mistakes you are in the habit of making, and through constantly being shown the right way, you soon acquire the correct habit in place of the incorrect habit. There are no rules to remember. There is no tedious copying. There is no heart-breaking drudgery.

NEW BOOK FREE

Every time you talk, every time you write, you show what you are. Your English reveals you as nothing else can. When you use the wrong word, when you mispronounce a word, when you misspell a word, when you punctuate incorrectly, when you use flat, ordinary words, you handicap yourself. If you feel your lack of language power, if you are ever embarrassed by mistakes, if you cannot command the exact words to express your ideas, our new booklet "How to Speak and Write Masterly English" will prove a revelation to you. Merely mail the coupon, and it will be sent by return mail. Learn how Sherwin Cody's new invention makes command of language easy to gain in 15 minutes a day. Mail this coupon or a postal AT ONCE.

The Dream of Ireland's Lincoln

hitherto unpublished in the United States or Great Britain, 50,252 acres planted in wheat; 5,332,050 acres in oats; 206,888 acres in barley; 5,580 acres in rye and 584,316 acres in potatoes.

But as a result of the warfare against the British Forces in Ireland, agricultural production began to fall off to such an alarming degree that men like Collins were as much interested in Ireland's economic and financial independence as they were in her political freedom.

IN IRELAND I obtained from the official reports of the Irish Government and the British administration statistics showing the effect of the war upon agricultural production. I cite a number of examples in order to show one reason why men like Griffith and Collins accepted the status of an Irish Free State. For example, the yield of potatoes decreased from 144,231,000 bushels in 1918 and 102,539,000 bushels in 1919 to 74,140,000 bushels in 1920. The yield of oats decreased from 101,399,000 bushels in 1918 and 85,540,000 bushels in 1919 to 65,388,000 bushels in 1920.

In the production of wheat there was an even greater decline. So that it was necessary for Ireland to import from the United States in 1920, 16,078,832 bushels.

As butter and bacon are two of the most important agricultural products of Ireland it is significant to observe that there was a corresponding decrease in the butter tonnage between 1913, or the year before the war, and 1920. In 1913 Ireland produced 32,368 tons of butter and 49,760 tons of bacon. These products dropped respectively to 26,258 tons of butter and 37,209 tons of bacon seven years later.

The amount of milk produced decreased from 102,232,085 gallons in 1916 to 78,463,281 gallons in 1919.

Therefore the issue which confronted the Dail Eireann when the truce was signed and the peace negotiations started was this: If Ireland is so near to the realization of a republic shall the Dail Eireann accept the status of a Free State and through the development of self-government struggle for economic and financial independence, or should the Dail hold out for unconditional recognition and unconditional economical freedom.

Those who finally sided with Griffith and Collins and pledged Ireland to the terms of the peace treaty based their position not alone upon the ground that the Free State guaranteed Ireland a full and fair measure of self-government and freedom but upon the sound economic position that Ireland had more to gain in the future by striving through peace to prepare for the day when she could be, if any nation could be, free from England financially and economically.

In 1919 Irish imports amounted to $632,863,766. Of this sum Ireland imported from England $526,496,876, compared to only $36,959,484 from the United States. In 1920, however, these imports increased from the United States to $54,263,540.

The lesson which Collins, as Minister of Finance, learned from these figures was the same one he learned from the Irish people through his daily contact with them during their struggle against Great Britain. It was that the war with England was rapidly destroying the productive power of the country and the nerve vitality of the nation. Although from 1916 to 1921 he devoted every ounce of his energy and every quality of his character to the fight for the recognition of the de facto government he had the statesman's vision of an honorable compromise, believing that if the people of Ireland, with the sympathy of the whole world and the moral and practical cooperation of the children of Ireland in foreign lands, could unite behind the Free State Government, they would be in a position to obtain complete independence through the development of Ireland.

Another aspect of Ireland's struggle which impressed itself deeply upon his mind was the effect of the guerilla warfare upon the women. He knew from the reports which came to him from every section of the south, from Dublin to Cork and from Wexford to Limerick, that the women of Ireland could not stand the strain much longer without the Irish race suffering immeasurable harm. Was it not Collins who, after his return from the London peace conference, appealed to the women of Ireland to support the Treaty on the grounds that the Irish race could not endure another protracted period of strife, which was costing Ireland not only the lives of her best young men but the lives of the children and the sanity of the women as well? Collins showed by his reports that there had been an alarming increase in the number of children born dead and in the number of women in asylums.

JUST as Lincoln knew the United States could not exist half slave and half free so Collins and Griffith believed Ireland could not survive politically free and economically enslaved.

Their vision of Ireland as "the Switzerland of the Seas," was that of a little nation with greater assets and resources than any other of the small nations of the world. They realized that Ireland's greatest asset was not only the number but the prominence, the influence and the wealth of her sons and daughters in the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. They dreamed of the time when their government could expand industrially and develop agriculturally as Switzerland has developed.

For seven centuries Ireland struggled against crushing odds to win the status of a Free State. For more than a year now, this little nation had been tortured by civil war. Millions of dollars' worth of roads, railways, private property and government buildings have been destroyed.

Arthur Griffith and Michael Collins, more than any other two Irishmen, laid the foundation for Ireland.

Ireland tomorrow will be a united, prosperous, homogeneous country, and in her history Collins, for all time, will stand out as the Lincoln of Ireland.

☞ The Art of George W. Bellows—Continued from page 96

The Medal of the First Class

artistic value over and beyond, and irrespective of, the theme.

In "Eleanor, Jean and Anna" Mr. Bellows has not been neglectful of the deeper concerns of art. Not only does this work contain portraits of specific personalities, but the esthetic values have been consciously conceived and built up through the placing of the figures, the folds and lines in the dresses, the poses of the hands, and the arrangement of numerous accessories such as vases, books, sashes and flowers. Moreover, the canvas, as a whole, has been executed boldly and vigorously, and with a realism ardent and distinctive.

Mr. Bellows ranks high among the living artists of this country. His marked individuality precludes his enrollment in any specific school of painting, although his robust naturalism and free technique place him at once in the category of such men as Redfield, Glackens and Gardner Symons; and in spirit and attitude he has very definite affinities with Sargent, from whom he has learned many valuable lessons.

However, there is no imitation of these artists visible in his painting. Mr. Bellows is essentially an individualist, and his originality is by no means one of the minor attributes of his art. He is a revolutionary and a heretic in that he refuses to be bound by traditions and formulas.

A good example of Mr. Bellows's ability as an illustrator can be seen in the drawings he has made for "Men Like Gods," the new novel by H. G. Wells, which begins in this issue of Hearst's International.

Mr. Bellows was born in Cleveland, Ohio, just forty years ago; and the impulse of the pictorial artist manifested itself in him at the age of five. He studied principally under Robert Henri—one of the most artistic men, and unquestionably the foremost instructor of painting in America. He has exhibited in the principal cities of Europe and the United States; and his works are now hung in the chief galleries of the country. In 1908 one of his pictures received the Hallgarten Prize; and since then he has won practically every medal, award, prize and honorable mention which it is possible for a painter to acquire.

Her Sixth and Only Husband

From the threshold came Price's voice. "Steak in the ice chest and potatoes all pared!" he announced boyishly.

Charity ignored him; refusing even to look at him. He moved away again. She heard him lift the stove covers and presently there came from the kitchen the teasing odor of broiling steak.

"Dinner is served, madam," he announced, in a sepulchral tone.

"Burnt I should say, by the smell," she retorted. "Let's eat here, by the fire."

This they did, settling themselves by the hearth, he in a chair opposite her.

"How times have changed!" he commented. "Having—in the delicate mid-Victorian phrase—compromised you I am in honor bound to marry—"

"I wouldn't marry you if you were the only man in the world!" she flashed.

"Why, I thought that any girl that married any man considered him the only man in the world. I do remember, too, that Sam once thought Mrs. Sam was the only girl in the world. Now—"

"It's her own fault," blazed Charity. "I've sent Sam back to her but—oh what's the use. If I couldn't hold a man except by his marriage vows—"

"I think," said he, "that you—could!"

The glance she gave him was unpremeditated and for an instant their eyes held. Then, as if he were as unconscious of her widened gaze and parted lips as she was herself, he glanced at his wrist watch.

"Almost twelve," he announced. "The old formula for a situation like this was for the lady to sit up all night, bolt upright, in a chair. But perhaps—may I suggest that you can be more comfortable upstairs?"

"But the people who belong here," suggested Charity. "I think they have just been married and are coming home from their honeymoon—"

"They'll not come tonight, not in this storm," he assured her.

From the mantelpiece he took a candle and offered it. But when she, rising automatically rather than of conscious volition, would have taken it, he did not release it.

"Are you sure," he murmured, "that you wouldn't rather—stay?"

"No, no," she said swiftly, stepping back. "I—I mean it. I'm not the marrying kind. My career means—"

This she had said before, to other men. But never with such breathless impetuosity, such a sense of struggling desperately against the sweep of something greater than she had ever dreamed of.

"Marriage? Have I mentioned anything like that," Price asked, blithely.

The color drained from her cheeks.

"You—oh, how dare you!" she gasped.

"You sound like something from the movies!" he retorted. "I only asked if you wouldn't like to sit up."

"You're evading!" she accused passionately. "You know that it's you that's been jumping to conclusions all the evening. You have no right to think that I'm not—decent!"

"You yourself told me that Sam was your fifth and best husband so far. What was I to gather from that?"

"They wouldn't have dared—not one of them—to talk to me the way you have."

"I wonder," he remarked, "just what your philosophy of life is anyway. You express a desire, if I offer a natural objection—as I did when I said I had no car—"

For the first time in several minutes, Charity's eyes met his.

"But the gasoline. You said——"

"That was merely a device of mine to discover just how unconventional you really are," he replied. "I might have known. Hunting husbands is like shooting tame pigeons. Half famished ones at that. They run toward you, they don't try to escape—as a bachelor might. And you bag them and call it exciting! Poor sport—and inevitably a poor sportswoman!"

As he finished he picked up his coat and slipped into it. An instant later the front door closed behind him. After an appreciable instant, during which she stared with unseeing eyes at the dying fire, Charity recovered herself and changed back to her own stockings, now dry.

"Damn him!" she murmured. "Oh damn him, damn him, damn him! If I could only make him pay for that!"

Five minutes, ten minutes—fifteen slipped by. Then the whirr of an engine. She slipped hurriedly into her wrap and a minute later he reappeared.

"Engine cold—had a devil of a time starting it—and I had to shovel the snow out of the seat," he explained. "Ready? Then let's go."

Snow still fell steadily, but seemingly with less intensity. Charity could not be sure, she was too sleepy. Silence encompassed them, save for the whirr of the motor. Price had not spoken since they left the house. Drugged by her drowsiness, she let her head go back. She had no intention of sleeping.

"Oh!" she exclaimed suddenly, wide awake now. "I—did I fall asleep?"

Price smiled. "I should say you did. We've just passed Grant's tomb——"

He was driving with one hand. Suddenly she realized that.

"Why move?" he suggested. "Aren't you more comfortable so?"

In his eyes there was that which belied the whimsicality of his tone, as abruptly, he brought the car to a standstill.

"Charity!" said he, huskily, "do you really hate me?"

The man had delivered himself into her hands! She had wanted to make him pay and here was the way. Now she could answer him, answer him in a way that would hurt him horribly. The very words, the very tone came to her, in a flicker of an eyelash:

"Oh, nothing so serious as that! Indeed, you rather amuse me," she could say. Only—she couldn't! Instead she said: "No—no more than you do me."

She felt his arm tighten about her but she did not draw away. She felt paralyzed, curiously unable to speak, to move, to think, to do anything save just wait breathlessly.

"I hate you so much," he said, his voice vibrating, "that I bought this car just for the sake of this ride. That and a crazy idea——"

"That you could make me realize just what you thought of me," suggested

Charity, her voice so low that she herself wasn't sure she had spoken aloud.

"Exactly!" he flashed. "Anything to get under your skin. I'd rather have you hate me than laugh at me. I am conventional and—well, so are you. I proved that anyway. I knew all the time, I just wanted to make you admit it. And I was crazy enough to think——"

He stopped short and, after a second during which her eyes evaded his, impetuously pushed the starting button.

"Think what?" asked Charity, quickly—the engine had begun to throb.

"That a husband of your own might be more desirable than somebody else's," he said, as if it were forced from him, against his will. "Laugh—go ahead——"

Charity didn't. "You—you didn't say that!" she murmured.

THE engine stalled as he turned back. "You said," she added hurriedly, "that you wouldn't marry me——"

"I didn't. You said that your career, Charity, you——"

Ever so briefly her eyes met his. Then, some time later, the wind that precedes the dawn came up chill and searching. But they did not feel it.

"You realize, Charity, what—what this means. You meant it?" Price was saying.

The tense expectancy in his eyes, the wistful intensity of his voice stirred her to swift and sweet reassurance.

Then with an upward glance and with a flash of her old manner she added, "You're to be my—my sixth and only husband, aren't you? And if any lady tries to steal you——"

"You darling!" he murmured. "They won't have a chance."

"You," said Charity, emphatically, "can just bet they won't!"

CONNIE (putting her hand to her throat)—Oh, this—is a necklace.

SMITH—Hell! You don't wear it, do you? It looks like some ten cent store junk!

CONNIE (deeply hurt by his lack of appreciation)—No—I never wear it. I only put it on because—but if you don't—(takes the necklace off) draw up your chair—and pitch right in. I hope you'll like my biscuit. Have some jelly. I put it up myself. One nice thing about my jelly—it always jells. Yes, I do dress-making—but sometimes I like cooking better—it all depends on who you're doing it for, doesn't it? Have another biscuit—help yourself to the butter—take plenty of butter. And here—I rolled out a pie for you—sorry I couldn't have two kinds—then you'd have a choice.

SMITH—This sure is some chow.

CONNIE—I hope you'll like my cooking. If I'd had more time, I——

SMITH—You're all right, sister

CONNIE—Milk and sugar?

SMITH—Sure, all the trimmings. Live here all alone?

CONNIE—Yes, since father died—it's most ten years.

SMITH—Ain't you got any folks or nothing?

CONNIE—No—my mother's dead.

SMITH—My mother's dead, too.

CONNIE—Oh, I'm sorry. You must miss her.

SMITH—I do. It don't make so much difference to a guy like me—but it sure must be hell for a lady like you.

CONNIE—Oh, I manage to get on all right—though, I'd like to do something more important than sewing. My mother was awful ambitious for me—she wanted me to be an opera singer—or own a milliner shop in a big town or something like that.

SMITH—My mother wanted me to be a priest and started me off on that tack. But I wanted to see the world! One day I beats it and jumps a freight—and heads west—I gets as far as New Mexico—worked on a ranch there and saved some money—but soon I gets restless—so I takes my roll and starts back east—no brake beams for me this time—Pullman and all—I was sure traveling heavy. Once again on the Java.

CONNIE—The what?

SMITH—The Java—I thought you was sea-goin'. The coffee.

CONNIE—Oh, yes. Of course—the Java. I didn't hear you.

SMITH—When I gets to Philadelphia—that's where my mother lived—the old lady was sure glad to see me. I'd never wrote her except a post card the year before—she knew I was coming home though. . . .

CONNIE—I know—she felt it inside—all kind of trembly in the stomach. That's how I felt today—what with trying to get this dress done—and getting supper and watching the clock—and kind of wondering if you would come. . . .

SMITH—Her lamp chimbley broke three nights running and she said it was a sign—you see, she comes from Ireland and believes in signs and things. . . . but then, she wasn't educated like me.

CONNIE—No, I suppose not. I kind o' believe in signs myself. Your mother must've worried a lot about you when you didn't write.

SMITH—Sure—I guess she did. Women's like that—they're always wanting you to write to them. After my mother died, I started in drinking to forget. When I come to, I was looking at one of those ads of a gob all rigged out in one of those white suits. Well, I'd always wanted

VISION

BY RICHARD H. WALDO,
Publisher of Hearst's International Magazine

THE 3% Immigration Law seems destined to have an effect on advertising that was not generally foreseen.

BECAUSE of that law, labor is in many lines more scanty than it has been since the boom days of the war and post-war period. Help Wanted advertisements in the principal cities once again outmeasure the Situations Wanted columns. Each month a greater number of manufacturers associate this condition with the fact that only 87,000 more people came into this country during the past year than went out of it in the same twelve months.

WHAT is of still greater importance is that those who went out were largely skilled and semi-skilled men and women. Those who came in were mainly green hands. We have throttled our intake, but we do nothing to check the flood that is draining our skilled labor market.

PERHAPS the situation is a good one. Perhaps the inevitable bidding up of labor prices by one concern against another is helpful. Perhaps the resulting increased cost of all products into which labor enters is what this nation needs.

ON the other hand, it may be that we should have a healthier situation were it not again necessary to use the incompetent and the lazy at prices which only competence and industry can justify. Perhaps we should have a better condition if men and women knew that only by putting their backs into their work could their jobs be held and progress made. There is much evidence to the effect that the by-product of working under reasonably competitive conditions is a soundness of morale and a steadiness of citizenship that is not obtained otherwise.

WITH rising labor costs eating up margins of profit, sales plans must always be hampered. Without powerful sales work, education of the millions in the purchase of better goods and in the development of better standards of living cannot proceed. Without such procedure markets do not develop and employment cannot increase. The war period proved that it is not enough to give a man $10.00 a day. He must also have wants developed that will call for the use of that money, or he will simply quit his productive efforts at the point where his present wants are satisfied.

THOSE of us who have to do with advertising and who understand its effect on standards of living, have food for thought in this situation. Our efforts to cut the cost of distribution can come to little when the conditions touched on above are in force.

HAVE we a sufficient vision to do anything about it?

to see the world—and the Barbary Coast out in 'Frisco.

CONNIE—The Barbary Coast—Oh, that's such a pretty name. I think I'd like to live there. I can see it—a long silvery shore with white breakers rolling in—beautiful flowers growing along it—and palm trees—with birds singing in them. Is the Barbary Coast like that?

SMITH—Hell, no—

CONNIE—Oh, you mustn't swear! Of course, you can if it makes you feel more at home, but, somehow, coming from you, it don't sound natural. Go on—tell me about the Barbary Coast.

SMITH—Well, it's—Oh—it's the place they've lost the lid to. You won't understand—you ain't the sort that would. Well, I think this is my chance to get to 'Frisco, and having nothing better to do, I goes in. They ask me a lot of fool questions, then I signs some papers, and then they sends me out to see the world. The world—he—all I've seen of the world is the lights of Coney Island one night through the starboard port, as I was looking over the top of my hammick, while we was beating it down the coast at a fourteen knot clip. Have you ever slept in a hammick?

CONNIE—No. I bought a second-handed one once for the back yard—but I never slept in it.

SMITH—Hammicks make you feel like the makings of a cigarette before you lick the paper. Oh, well,—I won't be sleeping in a hammick all my life. I'm working hard and studying and soon I'll be a Chief Petty Officer and have a bunk to sleep in. When my time's up, I'm going to write for my master's papers, then I'll try to get a job as Captain of a freighter.

CONNIE—Captain of a—a freighter! You?

SMITH—Sure. And I could hold the job too—if I ever get a crack at it.

CONNIE—Are they hard to get?

SMITH—I'll say they are—unless you stand in with some owner. But, you watch me—I'm going to be Captain of a freighter—in spite of he'—Excuse me—I nearly said it.

CONNIE—My father used to be a Captain, and I remember him standing up on the bridge in his so'wester—

SMITH—That's it, sister! You ought to be aboard a ship sailing all over the world—down to the Tropics and out to China and India, and all those spiggety places.

CONNIE—Spiggety places! Oh, those are the dream places I want to see. You've said it—spiggety places.

SMITH—That's why I'd like a ship—to take a wife along with me—setting across from her when she eats—and watching the sea with her at night. How does it listen, sister?

CONNIE—How does it listen? Oh, you'd take your wife along with you? Then—you're—you're—not—married?

SMITH—No. But I could be married. Lots o' girls have said they'd marry me, but I didn't want them. (Rises.) It's time I was pulling out.

CONNIE—So soon? Why, you only just come. I hope you'll come back real soon.

SMITH—No chance. We shove off to-morrow.

CONNIE—But you'll be sailing up here again next summer with the fleet, likely?

SMITH—Can't tell—I may get transferred to the Pacific Fleet.

CONNIE—Would that keep you away for long?

SMITH—Can't tell—a couple of years perhaps. There's them gobs coming back for me! Where's my cap?

CONNIE—I'm sorry I—I couldn't entertain you longer—so we could've got better acquainted—and sort o' got to know each other a little.

SMITH—Sure—setting here all snug-like—with a girl alongside—well, it ain't so bad.

CONNIE—I'll always remember about—about tonight—and last night—and Java—the chow—and hammicks—and every-thing.

SMITH—Good luck, sister—so long—

CONNIE—Must you be going so soon—must you?

SMITH—Do you want me to stay—You do? Really? All right, sister. (He turns back, takes her in his arms and kisses her.) Never had a fellow before?

CONNIE—No.

SMITH—Gwan . . . that's what they all say.

CONNIE—I've never said it before.

SMITH—Why'd you let me kiss you?

CONNIE—I don't know—perhaps it's because you—you—you smell of the sea—Oh, I like the smell of the sea. I love the smell of the sea.

SMITH—Well, let it go at that.

CONNIE—Will you come back?

SMITH—Sure—I like to have a place in every port where I can drop in.

CONNIE—Then—good by, Mr. Smith.

SMITH—Good-by, sister.

CONNIE—You're sure you'll come back?

SMITH—Sure—some day. (He goes out, whistling "Hello, 'Frisco.")

CONNIE (looking after him)—Good luck, Mr. Smith.

SO MR. SMITH came and went lightly, but Connie's head was full of schemes. Suddenly the freighter, stuck in the Ganges mud, loomed large in her eyes. It was the work of only a few minutes to sell the necklace, despised of Sailor Smith, to Mrs. Payne for five thousand dollars, and later to start Captain Martin off to salvage the ship, the Zonoma. The saving of the freighter brought Connie money, the cargo alone netted a neat little fortune and the village dressmaker became a woman of fortune. But wealth did not bring happiness, for her heart still turned to the sailor who had come from the sea for a day's dalliance and had then vanished, little more than a ghost of a man to all but Connie. Efforts at discovering the strange Smith had all failed. So when, two years later, the Atlantic fleet came into the harbor, Connie, in a last desperate effort, gave a party aboard her freighter for all the Smiths in the fleet. This brought many Smiths, including the Admiral, but not the right one. At last, from the petty officer in charge of the "gobs" she hears of her man. He was last seen in Paris, drunk and hunting for a dressmaker. Inspired with the belief that she is soon to find her Smith, Connie hurries away to get advice from the Admiral. When she returns to the deck, a new-comer has just crawled over the rail and is standing with his back to her, watching the dancers.

Connie—Oh—I beg pardon. Have you just come? Ever been in this port before?

SMITH (after a pause)—Hello, girlie. Say, give me a dance, will you. Come on what do you say? (Connie stares at him.) What's the matter? What's eating you?

CONNIE—Don't you—know me?

SMITH—Naw. . . . Your face is familiar, sister—but . . . Well—do you dance—

CONNIE—Have you been drinkin'? Say you've been drinkin'!

SMITH—Booze? No such luck! I ain't even had a decent cup of Java for two years.

CONNIE—Java. . . . And you don't know a girl in this port that would give you a cup of Java—Java and . . . jelly and . . . homemade biscuits . . .

SMITH—Java and biscuits . . . in this port? Nop! Hold on there—sure I do! I was making a lot of ports then and—say—Why—er—ain't you—why of course—You're the little sea-goin' dress-maker or milliner—or something—the girl that set and talked to me on a bench and then asked me up for chow . . . Let's jump this dance and you can take me to your house again—what do you say?

CONNIE—You never . . . thought o' going there . . . to find out if I was living or dead . . . You just forgot—

SMITH—Say, I risked the brig for you tonight—and if I get court-martialed for it, it's worth it, little lady! It's worth it! (he opens his arms) Come in. . . .

CONNIE—Just a minute . . . jest a minute. . . . Oh, I will—I will—but—I got to get sort o' used to you again.

SMITH—All right. I won't rush you. Notice anything? (He points to the rating on his sleeve) See this here? Three stripes and a wheel.

CONNIE—Quartermaster—first class!

SMITH—You're wise. I'm coming on.

CONNIE—Remember that night when you told me you'd always wanted a freighter and—

SMITH—I do—and a feller'd need a lot o' pull to get a Captain's berth these days—

CONNIE—That's just it—you need a pull—and you got it. How'd you like to sail a freighter that I could get for you?

SMITH—You! What ship would that be?

CONNIE—Look about you, sailor, look about you. You're settin' on her. How do you like her?

SMITH—Say, cherie, don't talk about no ship now. Let's just talk about ourselves. . . . Like me?

CONNIE—Oh, Bilge—yes! But let me tell you about the freighter first—

SMITH—Say, cherie—couldn't we get a license and pull it off tonight? Are you game to try? We shove off tomorrow.

CONNIE—Tomorrow! Oh, no! Oh, I can't lose you again so soon!

SMITH—It's the way of the sea.

CONNIE—Then—then we'll get spliced tonight—right off. Come along, come on.

SMITH—Say, cherie, what's yer name?

CONNIE—Connie Martin.

SMITH—Oh—ho! . . . So you're the girl that's rotten with money! Hell!

CONNIE—What's the matter?

SMITH—Say—I ain't the sort of guy that'd live off'n no woman.

CONNIE—But after we're married, you won't have to live off me.

SMITH—Take it easy, sister. When I sail a ship I'm going to be the boss—and what I say goes. That's me.

In a great huff, Bilge goes out to dance. "Bat" Smith, one of Connie's guests, is busy comforting his hostess when Bilge returns to the deck. The sight is too much for him and a knock-out fight is staged between the two men. Bilge gets the short end of it and Connie berates "Bat" for his cruelty. The entrance of the Admiral stops the scene and Bilge is ordered away with the other Smiths. Once again Bilge Smith goes out of Connie's life—but not out of her heart and her mind. The money was in the way—so she got rid of it and the boat—put them in trust for someone so she could never touch them—and went back to dress-making. So two more years pass and then one evening the door opens and Smith comes in. He is no longer in uniform; his clothes are old and greasy, his face is blackened with the dirt of the stoke-hole. He has worked his way from South America, coming to Connie as soon as he heard she had lost her money. The girl receives him with an air of indifference, but she gives him a chance to wash and sets out food for him. As he wipes his face on the fancy towel she gave him he asks:

BILGE—How did you lose your money?

CONNIE—Oh—well, my money's gone.

BILGE—Well, then so far as I can see now, they's nothing that would stand between you and a poor gob, is there?

CONNIE—Not a thing that I know of.

SMITH—That Java smells good to me. . . . Say, you kind-a need a feller to look after you now, don't you?

CONNIE—Oh, I don't know. . . . I'd want to be pretty sure a feller liked me.

SMITH—Well, you ain't got nothing, so you could be sure of it now.

CONNIE—How long you going to be in port this time?

SMITH—What's that got to do with it? Cherie, give us a kiss.

CONNIE—No siree! Mr. Smith, and that goes! I—I'd most forgotten you.

SMITH—All right, sister. . . . Well, I've got the promise of a ship.

CONNIE—You have? Got your Captain's papers?

SMITH—No, I ain't—not yet.

THEIR talk is interrupted by Captain Martin who comes in to get more definite information about the disposal of the freighter. Of course his talk starts Bilge to wondering if the story about the loss of money and boat is not a "frame-up." The captain leaves and Bilge bursts out:

BILGE—All this sewin' here's a fake.

CONNIE—It ain't. I'm workin' just as hard as ever I did. I must.

SMITH—The hell you must!

CONNIE—Oh, Bilge, I ain't a got a cent now—I gave it all away—I'm as poor as poor can be and I can prove it. You said my money stood between us. So I had to get rid of the money. It's held in trust.

SMITH—Who's it in trust for?

CONNIE—I—er—I—well—it's—it's held in trust for—in trust for—Oh, dear me. For me—my first baby—if his—or—her—or it's—father's name is—is Smith!

SMITH—(He throws off his cap, grabs her in his arms and kisses her)—Hell!

How Much Would You Guess These Thirty Books Are Worth?

884 booklovers were asked to estimate the value of this de luxe edition of the Little Leather Library. The guesses ranged from $5 to $100; the average was $18. Not a single person estimated correctly. What would be your guess?

IF YOU are a booklover—if you like to have good books around you, you unquestionably know what good books should sell for. Here, then, is the new de luxe edition of the Little Leather Library—the value of which we ask you to estimate. You will find in this set the finest works of such immortal authors as Shakespeare, Kipling, Stevenson, Emerson, Coleridge, Poe, Burns, Omar Khayyam, Macaulay, Lincoln, Washington, Oscar Wilde, Gilbert, Longfellow, Drummond, Conan Doyle, Edward Everett Hale, Thoreau, Tennyson, Browning—and others. These are books which no one cares to confess he has not read and re-read; books which bear reading a score of times.

Each of these volumes is complete—this is not that abomination, a collection of extracts; the 30 volumes, pocket size, contain over 3,000 pages; the paper is a high-grade white wove antique, equal to that used in books selling at $1.50 to $2.00; the type is clear and easy to read; the binding, while NOT leather, is a beautiful limp material, tinted in antique copper and green, and so handsomely embossed as to give it the appearance of hand tooled leather; it is five times more durable than leather!

Please make your guess now—write it, if you will, on the margin of this page. Then compare your estimate with our price, which is quoted in the coupon.

How can it be done?

Please note carefully that the price shown in the coupon is ALL YOU PAY FOR THE ENTIRE THIRTY VOLUMES. There is no "extra" of any kind. And, though we are frequently asked how we can offer thirty such books at so amazingly low a price, there is no secret as to how it can be done.

These books are printed in editions of a

We asked 884 booklovers to guess what this set of 30 books was worth. Here are their estimates. AFTER EXAMINING A SAMPLE. The signed estimates are on file in our office.

million at a time. That is the whole story—"quantity production."

Testing human nature

Naturally, these books must be made by a body of specially trained workmen. We cannot make a million volumes, discharge these workmen until the edition is sold, and then expect to get the same men again. This body of men must be kept together. The manufacture must be continuous—one edition following the other immediately. That is the only way we can continue this interesting enterprise.

It is worth our while, therefore, to give our customers something valuable if they will cooperate with us by sending in their orders at once. It is worth our while to make an attempt to overcome the bugaboo of procrastination, which haunts so many publishers.

That is the reason, the only reason, we offer you, in addition to the regular set of 30 volumes, a $2 pair of Hand-Hammered Copper Book Ends, made by Elbert Hubbard's famous craftsmen at the home of Roycroft wares, East Aurora, New York—if you will send in your order at once, instead of waiting.

An experiment—not a precedent

One word more. This offer, as you can gather, is simply an experiment. It must not be taken as a precedent. We do not know whether it will work. We do not know whether ANYTHING can keep people from procrastinating, for it is certainly a deep-seated human trait.

In any case, we hope it will keep YOU from procrastinating. If you want this set of books—if you feel that eventually you will buy them—we urge you to do it NOW, instead of LATER, so that you can obtain not only the 30 volumes, but the beautiful pair of Roycroft book ends. Do not send money. Simply mail the coupon or a letter.

Coming NEXT Month:

*S*omerset Maugham put the South Sea Isles into fiction with The Moon and Sixpence. His novel Of Human Bondage is an outstanding achievement in realism. Playgoers are familiar with his brilliant comedy of manners, The Circle. Somerset Maugham is not only one of the most versatile writing men of today; he is one of the best of our modern story tellers. Before the Party, which will appear in Hearst's International for January, is the first of several short stories which Mr. Maugham is writing for this magazine. Watch for them.

"I am simply delighted with my set"

HUNDREDS of pages of Hearst's International could be filled with expressions even more enthusiastic than the above, from purchasers of this beautiful set of the Little Leather Library volumes. But there is a great "silent vote" even more impressive, more convincing.

Close to twenty million of the great masterpieces in this edition have already been purchased, by tens of thousands of bankers, teachers, lawyers, children, mothers, students, physicians and others, in every walk of life, for booklovers belong to no class. Every volume was sold subject to 30 days' approval, under a straightforward, money-back guarantee. On this plan it is obvious that this enterprise never could have survived unless practically EVERY purchaser was delighted with this bargain. Twenty million books that could have been returned for refund, but were not: no more convincing evidence could be presented as to the extraordinary value given here!

Is this offer too good to be true?

Think of purchasing 30 volumes, including the greatest masterpieces of literature, all for only $2.98. Consider the fact that each volume is complete, that each volume is beautifully bound, not in paper or cardboard, but in a rich, embossed Croft which looks so much like leather that even experts are often confused. Consider that the entire set contains over 3000 pages, that the paper is equal to that used in books selling at $1.50 apiece, that the pocket size of each volume makes spare time reading a pleasure. Is it surprising that even our friends among publishers wonder how it can be done? Is it surprising that the greatest obstacle to be overcome is the feeling that this offer is too good to be true!

If you are the least bit doubtful, all we can do is send this set of 30 volumes to YOU on approval. Send no money now—just the coupon or a letter. Pay only $2.98 plus postage when the set arrives—then send it back if you are even slightly disappointed and we will not only refund your money, but postage both ways. Please glance over the titles of these books on the illustration to the right; can you afford not to own them?

INTOLERANCE

A "Independence of thought was formerly threatened by monarchists who feared the disaffection of their subjects. May it not again be threatened by other forms of intolerance, possibly even in a popular government?"

BRYCE, IN "MODERN DEMOCRACIES"

A INTOLERANCE is a vice which seems to summon to its support almost every other vice of heart or mind. There is scarcely a low practice or mean-spirited passion known to the head or heart which intolerance does not in some way enlist and enslave to its purposes. But, after all, and in the last analysis, the fundamental, underlying basis of intolerance is intellectual cowardice. Unwilling to meet the antagonists in the open arena where truth and right contend with error and injustice for supremacy, intolerance would, through foul and brutal methods, destroy the antagonists before the arena is reached. If I deny my opponent the privilege of expressing his views or of advancing his arguments, it is because I have in fact no faith in my own contention or distrust the strength of my own arguments.

A If I would close the press or the mails to other men's views or opinions or beliefs, it is because I fear they may win support and approval from others where my opinions or beliefs would fail. But if I am strong in my own faith, convinced of the justice of my position, I fear no man and rather covet the opportunity to meet in the open all who contend otherwise, never doubting that in the end my antagonist, though free to use all the powers of the intellect at his command, must fail.

A It must be admitted, I presume, by all who have observed the trend of things in this country, that the spirit of intolerance is obtaining a strong hold among our people. Doubtless much of this is due to the war—for war breeds intolerance as the stagnant waters of the swamps breed disease. But the great problem is: can we rid ourselves as a people of this demoralizing and destructive, this wicked and consuming curse now that the war is over? In this respect we move with alarming tardiness. All other nations engaged in the Great War have outdistanced us in forgiving those who expressed their opinions and views in derogation of the war. Their political prisoners were released long ago. We still hold in prison those who are guilty of no crime save that which the exigencies of the war seemed to justify as crime, to wit, the expression of opinion, the criticism of government. We saw fit to pass a drastic and, in my opinion, an unjustly drastic law practically forbidding the discussion of any matters relative to the prosecution of the war. Although it was a war measure and could only have been passed as a war measure, yet long after the war is over, we deprive many of their liberty for that which in peace times would pass utterly disregarded. All this illustrates, not only our indifference to the great guarantees and privileges of the people under our Constitution, but it discloses a spirit of intolerance such as we have never before exhibited.

A Frederick the Great once saw a crowd staring at something on the wall. He made inquiry and found it was a scurrilous placard against him. He directed that the placard might be placed more conveniently that all might read. But under our form of government, dedicated to the principles of free speech and of a free press, men rust and rot in prison because of criticisms or adverse views touching the vices or policies of the highly wrought and sensitive souls who, perchance, were custodians of people's liberty for a brief season. It has been said, and well and truly said, that you may chain down every other human right, but if you leave the right of speech free, it will unchain all the rest. While all lips were silenced during the war and all minds subdued or terrorized, such a riot of extravagance, of shameless waste, of graft, took place as no country has ever before witnessed. If anything demonstrates the imperishable worth of complete tolerance in speech and of political opinions, it is the story of this War.

A The people are loaded with not only millions but, in my judgment, billions of dollars, because no one dared to denounce those who cloaked themselves as patriots and filled their pockets while the country was in peril. Let us, therefore, in this country demand that intolerance of political views shall never obtain and that the precedents of the war shall be pushed into oblivion and disregarded at once and remorselessly. Nothing is ever gained by denying the utmost freedom of discussion upon all political questions. After its submission and before its adoption a copy of the Constitution of the United States was burned publicly at Albany and in Rhode Island. A thousand armed men, headed by the Judge of the State Supreme Court, denied the public the right to discuss the Constitution favorably to its adoption. We find in almost every great crisis of world history those pathetic figures who would stay the trend of human thought by silencing human lips. [Continued on page 112]

HAPGOOD on Ford's Life,

First of All SENATOR BORAH speaks with gravity in the opening article of this issue, but he does not exaggerate. The world's psychology justifies his utterance. His are the bold and lucid principles that proclaim the statesman. As far as we are concerned, no article could be published by us that would better express the faith in which we intend to march.

Senator Borah mentions no country abroad, but he proclaims that intolerance, which caused the war, is also the malign force that impedes recovery from the war. In our own country he sees the same shadow growing larger. He confines himself to the truth expressed in high and noble general principles: the truth and the principles that have been the soil in which freedom has grown, and must continue to grow if the mighty virtues of liberty and truth are to guide our steps.

Toleration MANY nations, and still more the ruling classes in many nations, are now defining justice as vengeance, and safety as intolerance. The world needs nothing as much as it needs tolerance. Senator Borah has recently taken first place in Washington, for moral and intellectual prestige, because in addition to his other gifts he has refused to hunt with any pack barking along one or another warped and narrow creed.

Intolerance of other nations, other races, other religions, other conceptions of business, economics, and government—that is a blindness that the war, instead of lightening, as we hoped, has brought down on us more darkly. The general public can be appealed to either through its ideals or through its fear and prejudice. Of Senator Borah the highest praise is that his appeals are ever to the best in men.

A Month from Now A LITTLE more than a month after this magazine appears again, another Christmas will have come and gone, a new set of resolutions will have welcomed another year.

Festivals serve to remind us of the flight of time, of the importance of life; but in truth new beginnings are made on the quietest day; every hour is the anniversary of signal deeds.

As we in this office try to put into our magazine selected records that beckon forward, the number just ahead always has for us the freshness and importance of the human dream.

Perhaps of all our own dreams purer liberty and better understanding have the brightest tints. A few illustrations, a month from now, illuminate that continuing purpose. In our January number we print an article of a good deal of boldness on the political departure of the Ku Klux Klan. We think we are, in that series, deep in the realities of freedom. As usual, we shall not argue much, but let documents carry the lesson.

In the same issue there will be a piece called "Hebrews," by James Oppenheim, that gives the powers and the errors of his race as only a Jew can state them.

When Dr. De Kruif calls his article on the gland furor of the moment by the title "Ponce de Leon and the Ring-Tailed Monkey," he mixes lightness with the solid history of science in the way we like.

Again, an article by Luther Burbank, full of vision and young enthusiasm, strikes the note characteristic of what today is best: for if the world is growing better it must be largely through the triumphs and the teachings of science, that creative study through which man is conquering the world.

Biography BIOGRAPHY, according to Carlyle, is "the most universally pleasant, the most universally profitable, of all reading."

Much as has been written about the world's foremost business man, there has been nothing approaching the detailed, personal, and adequate story of his life that characterizes the one, written after months of talk with him by Mr. Benson, which we now begin.

Plutarch's Lives have been for eighteen centuries the food of great minds. It was the same Carlyle who said, "Biography is the only true history."

If it is a pleasure to publish a first-rate life of a giant in business, the pleasure is increased by the fact that we have just had to undo Ford's dangerous error in lending himself and his money to the Jew-baiters. Any man, however great, or any organization that agitates against minorities in this country, will arouse our opposition. But we wish to be just, and Ford's genius in production is a mighty asset to the race.

Farmers WHENEVER two great classes in our democracy begin to coöperate, a step ahead is taken. Big money, as represented by the head of the War Finance Board, and the Farmers, as represented by the Bloc, beginning with a good deal of friction, ended by taking together measures leading to a new psychology. William Hard tells the story justly and well. The business mind of Mr. Meyer was right in fighting against the Government's actual buying and selling. The Bloc was right in its belief that the great agricultural interests were not considered enough in our credit system. Each side won where the facts were in its favor. As the farmer in the end is the most important citizen in the land, and as he has not yet had full aid and justice, the facts will still be launching their high explosives in his behalf. "What is genius," asks Emerson, "against facts, which are the genius of God?"

Look abroad. A peasant is premier of Bulgaria. Roumania, Jugo-Slavia, Latvia, and Esthonia have cut up the great estates at the demand of the peasants. Peasants are now clearly seen as the real rulers of Russia. Just to the north of us, a farmer has been made premier of Manitoba, following similar results in Ontario, Alberta, and British Columbia. In the Federal House of Commons of Canada the farmers have 66 members to 169 of all other parties.

Naturally this mighty change will not be all progress.

Ku Klux Klan and Drink

Much of it may be retrogression. Assuredly it will be a mixture of loss and gain. Good or bad, it is inevitable. The city cannot continue to rule the country unless it begins to make itself the country's friend.

Both Sides

ABROAD, the agrarian movement, sweeping like a prairie fire across Central and Eastern Europe, may well be the foundation of a better future—simpler, juster, and less complicated. On the other hand, however, the untrained peasants have taken immediate steps that have undoubtedly dislocated business and diminished production. On this continent we are more fortunate. The farmer here is not a peasant. He is educated. He has never been a slave. When he rebels it is not in the extreme ways we have seen where the peasant has been ground in the dust for centuries. The farmer whose sons and daughters go to college; who reads his newspaper and periodical; who telephones, rides in his car, and uses modern machinery—that farmer is not of a lower order rising to the top. His demand is not revolutionary. It is as balanced and rational at least as the measures demanded by manufacturers, distributors, or labor. The farmer's new power in Europe is progress, at a cost. Here it is progress, without the cost.

Degrees in Drink

FRAZIER HUNT'S article on the drink question in Northern and Central Europe comes at the right time. Probably the majority of readers in this country think Sweden took the lid off. In fact all she did was to vote not to nail it down tighter, and that she voted only at a ratio of 92 to 88. A slight influence may have been exercised by those who have noticed how Spain and France have been bullying Norway and Iceland because their liquor control interfered with the business of the larger countries—a sweet idea of freedom. Sweden rations liquor, somewhat as in war-time various countries rationed sugar and bread. In 1919 these restrictions were strengthened. Any party that should propose to take off the restrictions, and behave like the United States in the saloon days, would be snowed under so deep the election would resemble a census.

Even with her moderate system the country districts of Sweden went for complete prohibition. Next month Mr. Hunt paints the situation in Great Britain. The answer to our own liquor system is not in passion, nor in impatience with the great experiment, but in honest experience and in a genuine welcoming spirit toward the light.

Sense in Norway

IN NORWAY, the last we heard, there were in the penitentiary, in the entire country, seventy men over twenty-five years of age. Under twenty-five there were none, Norway not caring to send men of that age to that institution. In the woman's penitentiary there were, again for the whole country, forty-five, and this included all under detention for sex irregularities.

Norway treats legitimate and illegitimate children alike. She makes any father, or potential father, responsible for his children of either sort, or for those who might be his. Comparing the number of criminals in jail with the mildness of the laws, it does not look as if Norway were wrong in deciding that Moses, however great in his day, is out of date.

In social penalties it is as in legal: the Scandinavian countries disapprove of social irregularity but they do not find the cure in punishment and brutal ostracism. In making the continuance of a marriage optional, they go much further than the Rev. Percy Stickney Grant goes in his contest to liberalize his Church. They do not ask two people to commit a crime to free themselves from forced intimacy.

Several Norwegian cities have solved their motion picture problems by owning their own film theaters and using the profits for the general welfare.

How startling is common sense in action!

China's Clock

WESTERNERS seldom get Chinese news in its right perspective. Things happen as reported, but their meaning is not what it would be in Europe or the United States. For thousands of years the Chinese have been doing things in the same way. Ninety percent, more likely ninety-nine percent, of the affairs of life are unaffected by governments or armies. The reality is custom.

Whatever happens in politics or war the change in custom will be slow. "It will not be long," you may hear a man say in China. "Perhaps three hundred years."

If a foreigner discusses the new political and social changes that are going on at present he is always given this ample perspective. He is told that things are moving but that they will move slowly. And so no doubt they will, although modern transit and communication will speed up even China.

Li Hung Chang was talking to a friend of ours. "Time," he said, "is a circle. A nation at one period will be going down one side of the circle, and again it will be rising on the other side. Today China is near the bottom of the curve. But she is beginning to rise, and she will be great again."

And then Li repeated that statement about time, which they all make. We think of 1776 as a long time ago. To the Chinaman it was but yesterday. And two centuries ahead is but tomorrow.

Time and the Soul

PERSEVERANCE, audacity, the courage of the soul—such are the virtues that make life a progress even to its end. Experience kills some natures, renews and increases others. To some the past is a fetter, to others a spring-board.

Since what we choose is what we are,
And what we love we yet shall be.

Of all kinds of courage the sort that does us most good is this same courage of the soul—courage in the face of life's universal happenings. If we have this kind of courage, age (as Goethe said) does not make us childish, but keeps us still true children.

CORDELIA, The

CORDELIA MARLOWE was tempted to destroy all of the letters unread. But the fascination of her horror drew her on, and one after another of them she read some two dozen. They varied in expression as much as the men might have differed in their physical appearances; some were delicate, some direct, some leering. But every writer had read his own interpretation into the advertisement she had run in the Times. At length she came upon the following, typed upon heavy expensive paper, the firm's name embossed at the top of the page:

My dear Miss R 113:

If you will reply in person, show this letter, and ask to see Mr.

Franklin, it is possible that some work may be arranged for you with our firm.

Very truly,
Kedmore and Franklin
per M. G.

This letter brought her up with a start. Its impersonal formality, its brevity, its typewritten signature, were coldly refreshing after the odious familiarity of the letters that had preceded it. "Kedmore and Franklin"—the name sounded familiar. Who were they? The austere letterhead conveyed no hint of their business. Oh, yes; she remembered now. They were a firm of lawyers. Big lawyers, too, for dimly remembered newspaper accounts connected the firm with many important

C. Mitchell, the butler, puzzled Cordelia, but Gladys veered from the subject, thus convincing Cordelia that the butler was more than just a butler.

MAGNIFICENT

cases. And, oh, yes—they were the chief counsel in helping Mrs. Henry Arnold win her sensational counter-suit for divorce.

She hesitated. What help could she possibly be to such a firm? Then suddenly she made her decision: They had asked her to come, and there would be nothing lost in seeing them. So she locked in her desk the torn heap of repulsive letters, to be more fully destroyed later, and started for the firm's address on lower Broadway.

Just a week before, had you been at the Grantham, you would have seen Cordelia Marlowe, the most discussed and the most beautiful leader of the younger set, having luncheon with three of her college chums. She knew them as Jackie, Ailine and Gladys. You would have recognized them as Mrs. Jacqueline Thorndike, Mrs. Ailine Harkness and Miss Gladys Norworth. Altogether, they were the four most talked of young women in New York society.

As you observed the calm self-possessed smile on Cordelia's handsome face, you would never have guessed that only a few hours before she had been made aware of the great calamity that had occurred. Because of this tragic event, Cordelia had wanted to avoid the girls, but the need to see Jackie, her roommate at school and closest friend during the years since then, and tell her the unbelievable thing that had befallen her, had driven her to the meeting.

All through the luncheon the four girls had chattered about this and that, interrupting each other with the license of old friends. But after the fingerbowls were placed before them, they had really settled to the business that had brought them to the reunion luncheon.

"Of course the biggest thing we've got to do is to pick the Chairman for the reunion," said Jackie Thorndike. "We know the person we want, and the person the whole class will want—Cordie Marlowe. And she's practically promised. We're all agreed on that, yes?"

"Cordie, of course," agreed Gladys Norworth.

"Then that's all settled," declared the brisk Jackie.

"I'm afraid it's not settled," said Cordelia. "I suppose I should have told you before, but I didn't know the thing myself much before this. The fact is, I'm not going to be there."

"Not be there!" the three chorused in dismay. Then Jackie demanded: "What's the matter, Cordie? Why not?"

CORDELIA'S good-humored, easy smile did not change—except that there was now a provoking hint of mystery in it.

"I've suddenly changed all my plans," she answered.

"But I say, Cordie," Gladys Norworth had burst out in sudden concern, "you promised to come out to my place right after the class reunion and stay for the summer! Your new plan isn't going to interfere with that?"

"I'm sorry, Gladys. But I'll have to call that visit off."

"But, Cordie, when I'd planned—What is it, anyhow that you're up to?"

Cordelia was still smiling. "It's just as I said, Gladys. I can't say any more just now—and you'll know in a few days."

There was a moment of surprised silence on the part of Jackie and Ailine. Gladys having asked Cordelia out to Rolling Meadows, and Cordelia having accepted! Here was something else to wonder about!

There had been no further questioning of the smiling enigmatical Cordelia about her altered plans. Gladys and Ailine had soon departed on a shopping expedition, and at last Cordelia and Jackie had been left alone.

"You've certainly sprung a lot of surprises on us, Cordie, old dear," began Jackie. "You needn't tell me a thing you don't want to—particularly about your changed plans. But Gladys asking you to come out to that big place of hers—that was certainly a jolt! Why, since she came back from France two years ago with that queer step-sister of hers and that French war orphan the two of them adopted, Gladys hasn't had a soul out to see her!"

"That's exactly why she asked me," returned Cordelia. "I don't know all Gladys's reasons, of course. She said her keeping to herself so much since she came back from France was because of the effect the three years of war work in the hospital of that Countess de Crecy had on her."

"So that's it! The way she's herded to herself and behaved generally has had me guessing—had all of us guessing."

"Gladys said she now believed her keeping out of things had been bad for her, and from now on she is going to entertain a lot. She put it up to me as a favor, and said she wanted me out at Rolling Meadows to help put life into things."

"SHE CERTAINLY could not have asked anyone who could do the thing better!" declared Jackie. "But her picking you, Cordie! She's always been jealous of you, and especially just now with the two of you—I guess I don't have to say that."

"I suppose you're referring to Jerry Plimpton?"

"Jerry Plimpton, yes."

"I spoke straight out to Gladys about that when we were all out at your place last week. We'd had a bit of a row, and she'd flared up about Jerry. Just as nice as I could I told her that if Jerry liked either of us, that was pretty much his own affair and I guessed he'd make up his mind to suit himself."

"How did Gladys take it?"

"You know how Gladys is. When she has a good impulse, it's as swift as her temper. She broke down. Said she'd always resented me, because people liked me; that's why she's been so nasty. Said she had lots of acquaintances—but no girl friends—not a real girl friend—and how she did need a girl friend she could depend on! It all sounded mighty sincere. That was when she asked me to come and stay with her."

"Perhaps Gladys was sincere—for that moment!" said Jackie skeptically. "But even so, she was unconsciously thinking of little Gladys. And if she wants a real girl friend, one that she can depend on, how about that step-sister of hers? The little I've seen of Esther Stevens, she's always seemed to me a mighty decent sort and I'm sure she's all Gladys needs to depend on."

"I said much the same to Gladys. She said that there was too much difference in their ages for them to be real friends."

"I don't believe her! There's some other reason and I'll bet it all has something to do with Jerry Plimpton!"

Cordelia still wore her smile: "Whatever Gladys's real reasons may have been for asking me, I guess they don't make much difference at present since I'm not going out to visit her."

SUDDENLY Jackie's hand had slipped across the table-cloth and gripped Cordelia's wrist. "Speaking of Jerry Plimpton!" she had breathed. "There—coming out of the grill-room!"

Cordelia slightly turned her head. Jerry Plimpton's course lay by their table, but as yet he had not seen them. He was twenty-nine or thirty, tall, well-built, with high-bred, handsome features, an easy confidence in his every movement; altogether an outstanding figure in any company.

Jerry had sighted them, and bore down upon their table with an eager smile. The greeting was that of old friends.

"If I didn't have an engagement with my lawyer," he grumbled, "I'd invite myself to sit with you for a while."

"If you did, I'd have to tell you you couldn't stay," returned Cordelia, "for I'm having, right now, a business engagement with Jackie."

His gaze fixed on Cordelia. "That sounds to me like an order to hurry along. All right, Cordelia. But I'll be seeing you tonight out at the Grastons?"

"I'm sorry, Jerry, but I won't be able to make it. I've just changed all my plans."

"Changed your plans!" he exclaimed. "In what way?"

She regarded him with her same, easy, unperturbed smile. "I can't tell you just yet, Jerry. But you'll know all in a few days."

Puzzled, Jerry went on his way.

Jackie had said, "I wish those few days you mentioned were over, so I could know what all this business is about!"

"You won't have to wait, Jackie. That was my chief reason for coming here today: to get the chance to tell you at once what it's all about. We're wiped out, Jackie—utterly finished!"

"Finished?" echoed Jackie. "In what way?"

"In every way."

"You mean especially—especially money?"

"If we haven't any money at all—well, I guess money includes everything, doesn't it?"

"Cordie. . . . How did it happen?"

"No use bothering you with many details. It's a common story, anyhow. I'll bet that never before did so many families go on the rocks as in this awful year of Our Lord, 1921. I didn't know anything about our mess till last night; then mother and I had a long session, and she told me some things she'd been keeping from me. With the high prices since the war she found it harder and harder to live on our income. Result, she kept drawing on her capital by selling off bonds. Result of this was that the income from her remaining bonds was so inadequate as to make her feel they were hardly worth keeping. She saw only one chance. Desperate, she decided to sell the bonds and speculate. Mother picked out oil, and—everything's gone."

"Cordie—Cordie—what will it mean?" Jackie had cried.

"Isn't that pretty plain? As my mother put it last night, it means that the Marlowes, one of the best families for generations, must necessarily sink out of their world into poverty and dingy obscurity."

"Cordie!" breathed the dazed Jackie. "Cordie! . . ."

CORDELIA had still tried to smile into Jackie's staring face. But nonetheless she was feeling something of the poignant dismay that had pierced her and dazed her when her mother had broken the news of the family disaster. She knew no other world except this into which she had been born; she loved it; and now she had lost it!

"I guess you realize now what it means, Jackie," Cordelia said mechanically. Then she added: "The only reason for keeping the thing secret is my mother's wish. She feels the disgrace, and wants to avoid it. Mother said that since the rent for our apartment is paid in advance until the first of July, it will be cheaper for us to live on there than any place else. She hopes there may be some kind of a chance that something may still turn up, and if something does then the world needn't ever know what's happened. She wants to keep the thing quiet, on that chance."

Jackie nodded. "But you—what are you going to do?"

C. "What I said about Jerry still goes," Cordelia told Gladys. "You and I are not going to have any difficulty about a man."

CHARLES D. TATUM CO.

"I've thought it all out, and the only thing is to go to work."
 "WORK!" Jackie was scarcely less horrified and sympathetic than at Cordelia's original announcement. "Cordelia Marlowe—go to work!"

In the end Cordelia had convinced Jackie that she was in earnest and that had led to a discussion of ways and means. At last came the suggestion that Cordelia "advertise" and this had borne fruit in an "ad" in the Times which read:

AMERICAN GIRL, 22, strong, good-looking. Best social standing. Expert at swimming, riding, tennis, dancing, and can drive a racing car. Has other accomplishments, but no useful training. Desires position with adequate remuneration. What have you to offer her?

When Cordelia had gone to the advertising office of the Times three days later, and presented her receipt, the clerk had handed her a packet of what seemed a hundred letters or more.

Her fascinated horror had come when, locked in her room at home, she had torn open the top letter of the parcel, and read:

Dear Little R 113:

Your advertisement listens mighty good to me. Let's get acquainted. You sound like just the girl I've been looking for. Call up the telephone number below, ask for me, and we'll arrange to have a nice little dinner together and size each other up.

Well, if we make a hit with each other I think you'll be satisfied on the point you made about adequate remuneration. I have enough money and you'll find me no tightwad.

Eagerly awaiting your ring.

After that, her breast heaving, she had regarded the pile with horror. Then she had forced herself to read many another letter before she came to one written on embossed stationery, and in answer to which she was at this moment entering a tall office building on lower Broadway.

AN EXPRESS elevator shot her up to the thirtieth floor. Here was an impressive line of doors labeled "Kedmore and Franklin," one of which was marked "Entrance." As she stepped through this door into an outer office of quiet but rich appointments, a young woman of her own age arose from a typewriter and courteously asked how she could serve her.

"I wish to see Mr. Franklin. Please give him this letter."

The young woman passed through a side door, and almost at once returned. "You are to come right in, please."

With her heart in almost painful wonderment as to what she was about to experience, Cordelia followed her guide through another office, which instantly gave an impression of quiet distinction, to a third door which the young woman opened. "You'll find Mr. Franklin waiting," she said.

Cordelia stepped through, and the door closed quietly behind her. Her quick eyes took in a large room of yet more simple distinction than the others, with windows that looked downward upon the whole northern and eastern stretch of the city. A man at the flit-top desk in the center of the room stood up; she saw he held the letter she had sent in to him.

"Will you please have a chair," he invited in a low courteous voice, motioning to a chair beside his desk.

She obeyed, giving him a swift glance. Mr. Franklin was perhaps thirty-five, clean-shaven, quietly but smartly dressed, of athletic build, of easy bearing; he gave her an instant sense that here was a man of power, a man who would achieve great things if he had not already achieved them.

He resumed his chair after she was seated. "And now Miss—Miss—" He gave a start as he now saw her features more clearly. "Pardon me, but I believe I already know you."

"I do not recall ever having seen you before," Cordelia said with some stiffness and in surprise.

"You are correct; we have never met. But I occasionally glance at the photogravure sections of the Sunday papers, and no one more frequently appears there. You are Miss Cordelia Marlowe."

"Yes," Cordelia had to admit.

"You wrote the advertisement to which this letter refers?"

"Yes."

"Indeed!" He regarded her thoughtfully for a moment. "Excuse me just one second, please," he said. "A little item I had overlooked."

He pressed a button beneath his desk, though there was a double row of pearl-topped buttons in view beside his telephone, and scribbled upon a pad. He folded this, and apparently waited for someone to appear, meditatively tapping his pencil upon the rich mahogany. But no one entered.

"I guess this matter will have to wait after all," he remarked, turning his keen, steady, gray eyes again to Cordelia. "Would you mind telling me, Miss Marlowe, just why you wrote that advertisement?"

"The advertisement answers that question. I want work."

"But why should Miss Cordelia Marlowe want work?"

"Is my reason important to you? It seems to me that the important consideration is whether I am suitable for any work you may have in mind."

"That is partly correct, Miss Marlowe. But I think you will admit that it is somewhat unusual to have one of the best known young women of New York's smartest set advertising for work—and any sort of work at that. We are a responsible firm, Miss Marlowe, and therefore must necessarily exercise care regarding our personnel. I think you will agree that we are not exceeding our legitimate requirements in wanting to know what prompted so unusual a procedure on your part."

CORDELIA had to admit to herself that he was right, and she gave a brief account of the family reverses.

"Strange that I hadn't heard of this," mused Mr. Franklin.

"No one has heard as yet."

"No one?"

"No one except my mother, myself, and my best friend, Mrs. Murray Thorndike."

"Do you object to telling me why this misfortune has been kept a secret?"

"It was my mother's idea. It occurred to her that there was a desperate last chance of something turning up."

"Thank you for your information," he said quietly. And then added, "Just what did you think you might do for us?"

"I had not thought. My advertisement was plain enough in stating that I could do nothing useful. If you have work for me, it will be for you to decide what I can best do."

"What sum had you in mind when you mentioned 'adequate remuneration'?"

"I was hoping you would pay me thirty dollars a week."

Mr. Franklin slowly shook his head. "At thirty dollars a week I fear we could not use you."

Cordelia stood up dully. "Then I might as well be going. I suppose I should thank you for your kindness in seeing me."

"One moment, please. I am not quite through. Won't you be seated again?"

That even voice had a compelling quality. Cordelia sank back into her chair.

"Since you have already permitted me to be inquisitive relative to your personal affairs, I hope you will answer just one more question. How much a year has it cost you to live? I mean for the family, in the manner in which you have been living."

"I don't know exactly, but around thirty thousand."

"I should say at least thirty thousand, to live the way you were living. And at that you must have found it hard. I have listened to your proposition, Miss Marlowe, and I now ask you to listen to me. My offer to you is thirty thousand a year."

"Thirty thousand!" gasped Cordelia.

"It being expressly understood as part of the agreement, if we do agree," the quiet voice went on, "that you and your family are to continue to live in the exact manner in which you have been living. There will of course be other conditions."

"Thirty thousand!" repeated the dazed Cordelia. "Thirty thousand—when you wouldn't pay me thirty a week! I don't understand."

IT IS VERY simple. Thirty dollars a week presupposes that you have dropped from your present position, and are just Miss Smith. As Miss Smith you are not worth thirty dollars a week; and besides, you would not particularly interest me for I can get ten thousand Miss Smiths to do the Miss Smith kind of work. But as Miss Cordelia Marlowe, holding your present position, you are not one of ten thousand, you are one of a very small number, and as such you are easily worth thirty thousand a year to my firm."

"Doing what?" she inquired.

He shifted slightly, and seemed to be keenly watching the effect of his carefully chosen words upon her. "You must understand that much of our work is of a highly confidential character and is performed for wealthy clients. Many of our clients belong to your own set, or come in contact with it. Frequently a delicate situation arises, and we must protect our client's property and honor. We can best do this if we are in a position to secure information other than through our regular channels concerning the conditions which threaten them. A person belonging to your set, and moving on terms of intimacy in it, can easily secure bits of information which, added to what we already know, would prove of great value to us."

"Am I to understand that you are proposing that I am to act as a spy upon my friends, and that I then pass on this key-hole information to you?"

"That is what I was intimating—yes."

"Then you may get someone else." She started to rise.

"PLEASE KEEP your chair, Miss Marlowe. I made that intimation solely for the purpose of testing you. Had you said 'yes,' we could not have used you. We require a person of utmost honor—and if you were a person to sell out your friends, you might also sell out us."

"Well?" she demanded.

"The general nature of the work is much as I have outlined it, but you would not be requested to do anything that would be displeasing to your honor and good taste. Further you will have the privilege of refusing to participate in any case that does not appeal to you. I believe that most affairs would so engage your sympathy that you will be happy to be of service."

"I don't know," Cordelia said doubtfully.

"The arrangement will obviate all the unpleasant features that would attend your sinking to the level of Miss Smith," he suggested. "I judge that you are not exactly eager to give up your present position and your present friends?"

"No."

He pressed this point gently but firmly: "Also it would obviate the fate your mother dreads for herself and would solve the problem of your sister."

"Those are good arguments," she said. "But before I can answer I'd like to know what are the other considerations of which you spoke?"

"Certainly. We must require that you never let a single soul know the true character of your relations with our firm. Your explanation for seeing us, if ever an explanation is necessary, is that we are your personal attorneys."

"I understand. What else?"

"This includes of course that you shall not let anyone know the real source of your income. For the public to learn this would mean that the public had also learned of your family reverses, and that might in some way impair your position."

"I see. What are the other conditions?"

"We have covered them all. I am now waiting for your 'yes' or 'no'."

"I can only say yes to such an offer, especially when it leaves me free to decline any work you may propose."

"I am glad you are to be with us," he said. Even now his voice did not alter in its courteous, business-like quality. "And you will soon find that the proposition is real enough."

"When do you want me to begin? And on what?"

"I wish you to begin at once, if possible. I have one case in hand in which I am certain you can render the greatest service, but the circumstances are not yet quite ripe for you. May I ask what were your own plans prior to the time your mother gave you her bad news?"

"I had accepted an invitation to visit a school friend, Miss Gladys Norworth. Of course I have canceled it."

"GLADYS NORWORTH!" exclaimed Mr. Franklin. "The great heiress—the Miss Norworth?"

"Yes."

Mr. Franklin's gray eyes held a surprised brightness for a moment, then were as calm as before. "Since I am not quite ready with the case I referred to, I suggest that in the meantime you make your visit with Miss Norworth as originally arranged."

Mr. Franklin hesitated an instant, then continued: "I think it might be well for me to say a little more. Very shortly I would have asked you to go to Miss Norworth anyhow."

"Gladys Norworth one of your cases!" exclaimed Cordelia.

"I said her affairs," corrected Mr. Franklin. "Miss Norworth knows nothing of our firm being interested in her, and I wish you to take care not to let her suspect it. If she did, our efforts might be useless. We are confidential counsel to the trustees of her estate. Her trustees believe something is seriously wrong with her affairs, but they themselves have been baffled as to what it is. That is why they have secretly entrusted us with the matter. We have gained some facts, and some suspicions, but we have not yet penetrated the mystery. That is what I wish you to do. Help us get to the heart of this baffling matter. You will please notice everything, and report every detail to me no matter how unimportant it may seem to you."

"That is what I said I could not do—spy upon my friends."

"I thought we had covered that," Mr. Franklin said patiently.

"You are not acting as a spy—at least not in the repugnant sense of the word. You are in reality her protector, though she does not know it, and must not know it. You are really trying to help save your friend. That is something very different, is it not, from being a spy?"

"Yes," Cordelia admitted.

"Then you will go, as soon as arrangements are made?"

"Yes. But would you mind telling me something about the situation?"

"I cannot without a breach of good faith toward the trustees. Besides, there is no need for you to know much; what you need you will learn for yourself. Further, I will very frankly admit that I do not understand the thing myself, except that something strange is going on behind the surface. And now, Miss Marlowe, I believe that is everything, except the discussion of financial plans involving your getting into my hands your mother's oil stock as soon as possible."

THIRTY minutes later that discussion was over and Mr. Franklin opened the door for her with a courteous bow. As she shot down the elevator, and walked as in a dream up Broadway, within her was a chaos of wonderment and thrilling exultation: a whirling chaos that had three chief elements.

What was the strange thing that was going on in Gladys Norworth's affairs? Now that a point had been made of it, it did seem that Gladys for a long time had been behaving oddly. What was she, Cordelia, going to find out? What was going to happen to her?

But more thrilling than these thoughts was the change that had come in her fortunes. An hour before she had been a pauper seeking work at a miserable wage. Now she was her old self again. Her mother was saved—Lily was saved—she was saved! The family position was unchanged; she was to remain up in her own world—the world that loved her, the world she loved! The world where she and Jerry Plimpton would be meeting as before and where anything might happen.

CORDELIA would have wondered even more had it been possible for her to have remained invisible in Mr. Franklin's office, and thus been able to see and overhear. The moment Mr. Franklin was back in his chair, after seeing Cordelia out, he remarked in a slightly raised voice:

"Come in, Kedmore."

A door at the side of the office opened, and from a little private corridor that led to the adjoining office there stepped forth a stockily built man of perhaps fifty-five with a pinkishly bald head. His clothes had doubtless cost as much as Mr. Franklin's, but their wrinkled and baggy appearance suggested that they also served him as pajamas.

"You got my signal?" Mr. Franklin queried when his partner was in the chair which had so recently held Cordelia.

"Sure." It was a relaxation to Mr. Kedmore to be inelegant.

"Then you saw her and heard her. What do you think?"

"That she's a peach! Lord, man, I almost passed out when I learned who she was."

"Then you think she'll do?"

"She'll be a wonder—if you can manage her."

"You saw this afternoon's performance."

"Yes, that was clever work, Franklin. Damned clever. But where did you get that idea, of sending her out to—what's her name—Gladys Norworth?"

"If you listened carefully, you will recall that Miss Marlowe was the first to mention Gladys Norworth. I'd not even thought of Miss Norworth until Miss Marlowe spoke of her invitation to visit Miss Norworth. So I decided to send Miss Marlowe where she already had an invitation. Almost every rich family has a closet with a skeleton or two in it, and I thought Miss Marlowe might as well start on these Norworth people, where she has an opening, as with anybody else. It's all the same to us. You understand I don't care a damn about this Norworth outfit: that is, not unless something big is turned up there. What I care about is landing a young woman like [Continued on page 140]

A Story of San Francisco's Chinatown

Eleven Forty-Five

PAUL ENRIGHT had last been seen in a street called Jodyn that curves out of the Mexican district into Chinatown. The Oriental quarter had gobbled him up—the son of one of the wealthiest families in Southern California, but not yet in control of his fortune. I was one of the younger members of the firm of Brill, Brock and Co., attorneys, closing up affairs connected with the Enright estate for Paul and his sister, Louise, the only heirs. Ten days after Paul Enright vanished we received a tip from Clinton Dean, night editor of the Chronicle, saying that it might be well for one of us to see Clabby of the Chronicle staff, the man who “covered” Chinatown. I was sent and saw Clinton Dean first.

“If Enright is held in the quarter, Jimmy Clabby is the only white man who can get a line on him,” he said. “On the outside Clabby is an American, but under the skin, he’s a Chinaman himself. Get it—a hard-headed, clever and sophisticated criminal reporter on the outside, but underneath a dreaming Oriental. See Clabby.”

It was two in the afternoon. Dean said I would likely find Clabby at the present moment in the reporters’ room at police headquarters, which I did. A little chap with blunt, brown-stained fingers pattering upon a rickety old type mill, a municipal property.

Two-thirds of a sheet of copy-paper was filled before he looked up and I met two brown eyes neither Celt, nor Latin, nor Anglo-Saxon. The smoky face was broader than one would have taken it to be from the profile. I can’t tell if I should have seen the “dreaming Oriental” under the drab, tired features, if it hadn’t been for what Clinton Dean said, but certainly I saw it now. I told him why I had come to him, but he chatted on discursively for at least ten minutes. Then the real subject was opened from a queer angle.

“I was up to see young Enright’s sister this morning,” Clabby said, plucking a cigarette paper out of his shirt pocket. The tobacco was loose in the side-pocket of his coat. The rolling was done as quickly as you seal a letter, the match waiting between his teeth meanwhile. “But I’m not printing the interview,” he added. “That young woman is so straight that she gets past your guard.”

“Did you know Paul Enright?” I asked.

“No.”

“I understand you’ve specialized among the Asiatics,” I said.

CLABBY’S eye was cool as it held my face. “Asiatics,” he repeated carefully, “are worth giving a forenoon to occasionally. I’m not speaking of those who run to religion and give talks to women in working hours—but regular Asiatics. I came here three years ago and my first assignment was in Chinatown. I never got out of it. I can never get out now.”

His eyes looked dead, a gray hopeless craving in them; then a sudden gleam of hope, as if he saw the way to life.

“Why, an American cat that drifts into Chinatown is different in two or three months,” he said. “Everything that touches them changes, but Chinos don’t change. Mrs. Emmet, the woman I lodge with—room and board, now and then—got a Chino washee-washee nineteen years ago, to do her laundry for two dollars a week. He’s doing it yet—same man—for two-fifty. She’s had six children, meantime, and there’s been a world war. Old Hop Lai—queer old pelican.”

“You meet Hop Lai in Chinatown, then?” I asked.

“Yes. He’s one of the big men there. I don’t know how big. He’s part of a Chino bank, yet he still collects his own laundry.”

"Why aren't you using the interview with Miss Enright?" I asked curiously. "General interest dying down?"

"Oh, no, they'd eat it alive," Clabby said, meaning the public. "But I won't play her end, unless it's necessary——"

"But why?"

"She's too blamed decent," he muttered. "Some people like publicity at any price, but she isn't that kind. By the way, she is ready to pay a hundred thousand to get her brother back, but I don't suppose you attorneys would let her. You fellows have to be conservative."

"I think Miss Enright is in a position to pay what she pleases if conditions are right," I said. "But I hadn't heard that there was an actual offer from the parties holding her brother."

"There hasn't been, but big money would set him free."

"Did she suggest that she would pay this amount?"

"No. Miss Enright doesn't know any more about a hundred thousand than she does about the police blotter out yonder at the desk. It was I who told her that I thought it would cost that to get her brother free."

"What basis have you?"

Clabby smiled. "I'm over in the quarter a good deal. Perhaps I heard it from old Hop Lai. It's a ticklish thing to mention, but I think I could take a hundred thousand over into Chinatown and come back before dark with Paul Enright."

COULD THIS be an overture? My suspicion accumulated that the Chinese were using Clabby as their agent and that Clinton Dean was in for a piece of change, because he steered us to Clabby. My glance hadn't been turned from the reporter for three seconds, but his eyes were waiting for mine.

"I say, it's ticklish to mention the matter," he chuckled. "But Chinatown knows that I am to be trusted. So does the Chronicle. So do the police. I'm curious to know if your firm want Paul Enright back a hundred thousand dollars' worth——"

He cleared his throat.

"No, I'm not curious," he added. "I know you fellows won't do it. You're all caked up on what money is—psychologized is the word. You can't hand over even other's people money. You'll trust the police. Meanwhile Paul Enright, with more thousands than I have dimes, will wait until somebody puts an explosive under your firm or Chinatown gets impatient."

Clabby was called away.

I am not going to put down my personal reaction to this talk. I went back to the firm with it. Brill, Brock and Co. was seventy years old—grimly established. When you thought of the word Repute, you thought of Brill, Brock and Co. When you entered the silent suite which the firm had occupied for twenty-seven years in the Granite Block, you were clutched in an iron awe. I am forty-five years of age, the youngest member of the firm, and still regarded as an office boy by the venerable Brock, the present head, son of one of the founders. There were four of us present when I turned in a statement of my talk with Clabby. It was Fontaine who spoke after an hour's conference. What he said was almost exactly what two others, at least, in the room would have said:

"This Clabby is a dangerous party. He has entrenched himself, as he thinks, and dares to act as agent for the Chinese. We cannot prove that he is an agent—at least, not now; neither can we put one hundred thousand dollars entrusted to us in the hands of a whimsical and uncertain young person—with an acknowledged penchant for Asiatics. When we turn over ransom money it must be in such a manner that the law can take a hand."

I WAS STRUCK first with the fact that Clabby had sized up the Brill-Brock attitude rather neatly. I might have told my confrères that Paul Enright might be suffering from his incarceration, and that it was his money, but Fontaine would have answered, for three at least, that Enright was not in control of his estate just yet.

That evening I called upon Miss Louise Enright in the cool, dim mansion, for fifty years the home of the Enrights. I had met her several times in late years, but there seemed something more to her tonight, as she came toward me from the shadows of the great room—a pale-browed sort of a girl of twenty-five, with her hair done in a way suggesting past school-rooms. Most men wouldn't look at her twice, except for her familiar wealth and position. She didn't wear spectacles, but they went with her kind of face. A pair of spectacles can hide a face like hers from the world very effectively.

And now I began to see a wonderful thing, and disastrous. It stole out from her in a kind of heart's warmth that grew and grew—that she was mysteriously enthralled in the personality of the little Chinatown reporter on the Chronicle. We talked of brother Paul. She was tremendously indebted to Mr. Clabby, she said, for bringing the word that money could free him at once. She would be glad to have her own part of the fortune used. Paul would fix all that later.

"But don't you see?" I began. "If we should turn over one hundred thousand dollars for Mr. Paul's release, without apprehending his abductors——"

She laughed at me gently: "Mr. Clabby said you would say that, and that you would say, no one would be safe if you did, and that you would have no guarantee that Paul might not be abducted again, or even me."

C. Louise Enright, the heiress, was not an impressionable girl, but Clabby had touched her in a deep and lasting way. She was eager to find her brother but she was enthralled by the Chinatown reporter.

"Did Mr. Clabby advise you to offer the money?" I asked. "Oh; no. He merely said that he thought he could get Paul free, if he let it be known in Chinatown that we had that amount to pay to the right parties."

Throughout the next half hour, I realized that Clabby had struck it rich even if he did not negotiate the ransom. The Enright girl was not impressionable, but he had touched her in a deep and lasting way. And strangely enough now, Louise Enright's quality was growing upon me—something established about her, that could never slip and throw a man; something that belonged always, if it belonged at all. I wondered if the Enright wealth had anything to do with the way I was getting this. There is a bit of a flunkey in most of us. A great house, a very rich girl.

"He seemed so tired," she said, speaking of Clabby.

ON THE TENTH day after our first interview, I learned that Clabby had disappeared. At the Chronicle office they said he had not reported for two days. He occasionally missed

¶ Hop Lai's beady eyes told as much as a rock-bound coast. "Mis' Hemmet's Clabby boy?" he repeated. "No home? No work? Where is now—no can tell."

one day, the desk man observed, but usually brought in a story as a result of the slip. At three o'clock and at five that afternoon, I telephoned the Chronicle. He had not turned up and had sent in no message. The third time I called was after dark in the evening, from my apartment uptown, and the same negative answer was returned from the editorial rooms. A few minutes later my 'phone rang. The call was from Miss Enright, who said she was driving near, and that her car would be at my door in ten minutes.

"Can it be—you haven't seen him either?" she said, before I had spoken.

I shook my head.

"He has been trying to find my brother. He was to come to me yesterday, but did not—nor send any word. He has not been at his work."

I heard her words, of course, but another part of me was stilled in contemplation of the miracle that had come upon her. Even her hands seemed different, and the light and largeness of her eyes. When a miracle came to a girl like this, it came to stay.

"We are his friends," she repeated. "He may be in desperate trouble. We must stay together until we find him!"

An initiative was aroused in her that her brother's disappearance had not quickened.

"I was thinking I might go down into the fringe of the quarter tonight," I said.

"May I not go with you? My car is here—everything."

WE FOLLOWED an impulse to drive first of all to Hop Lai's laundry. The old man was not there, but nearby, at On Loy's pharmacy, in the side-room playing checkers. He greeted us like friends from China, but thought at first, past doubt, that he was to be arrested for crimes which only his own fears could hint. Hop Lai was elderly and fat. His beady eyes told as much as a rock-bound coast.

"Mis' Hemmet's Clabby boy," he repeated. "Yes, do wash——"

"Where is he now?" I asked.

Miss Enright explained that he had not been at home for two days, nor at work.

"No home? No work?" Hop repeated darkly. "Where is now—no can tell."

"But you know he comes to Chinatown," she said.

"Long 'go Clabby boy come here, long 'go. No come since—" his voice trailed off.

"Oh, yes, he comes almost every day—" the girl explained. I had been watching. The old man darted a look into my face as the girl spoke. What he saw I don't know, but he said quickly:

"Look-see! Hop Lai look-see—"

"We go with you," I said.

"Al-li."

Now we went to weavers and carvers and potters and hair-dressers and smoke shops and drug shops and chow shops—old Hop Lai sitting in front with the chauffeur and telling about his own automobile and how he learned to drive; the difference between it and his first laundry wagon; how all he knew about the city was to go around and collect laundry; how the city had changed in thirty years and how he didn't care to go back to China. Very wise and beady-eyed, he was, and always when we stopped at a place, he explained to the proprietor that he was looking for "Mis' Hemmet's boy—lil' Clabby—gone two day," and always at the places where we called, the proprietors seemed to know Clabby—"Clabby of the Colonial—four-day see—three-day see—no see today—" as Yat Quong Low of the Up-River Restaurant said. Upon the shoulders of Hop Lai a grave responsibility appeared to rest, as upon a member of Mrs. Emmet's household. This milling around had long been wearing upon me. An Oriental, I have observed, can carry out an aimless undertaking with a whole lot better grace than a white man. Though it is difficult to get the feel of a Chinaman, I would have sworn that Hop Lai had no real idea of helping us, even if he knew where Clabby was.

"No more look-see tonight," he said, with seeming regret, as he plumped out of the car on the deserted walk and rocked back and forth in his felt slippers. It had struck eleven, and we let him go.

"Tomorrow night—more look-see," he called.

WE HALTED to talk a moment, then the car moved slowly on. We were in the neck of the outlet now—the Narrows, the street was designated at police headquarters. Old frame and brick stores leaned forward toward each other, holding out decayed wooden balconies over the rutty, cobble-paved road. It was the one street in town that somehow stayed wet through the dry months. The big car heaved and settled bashfully. We had left Hop Lai little more than a minute when we heard running feet. The car was stopped. We both knew, before the figure came up to our eyes out of the dark.

"It's old Hop again," I said, but did not rise to his excitement.

"You come," he said to me, pawing at my hands. "Big car no can turn—make stay here. You come. We find Clabby boy—veree quiet lady wait in car!"

The girl's hands urged me to follow; yet I resented the Chinaman's haste—something obscene about it to me. For several minutes I followed; then we entered a passage. I remember many corridors, many odors, vaguely numbered doors, dim iron lanterns far apart, a blind beggar singing in a low whine—all this under one roof, farther and farther indoors. The passage seemed to stretch back fully a block, when Hop Lai halted and knocked rapidly with the tips of his fingers low on the door. A Chinese in pajamas very wide and wrinkled and flappy at the ankles, came to the door holding high a thin glass lamp. Hop Lai craved pardon for knocking. The other railed at him in Chinese, many words like the stamp of angry feet, after which the door was shut in our faces, and the old laundryman wailed:

"No tonight—no can find Clabby boy tonight!"

"Where did you see him first?" I asked.

"He stand by blind man in passage. I run. I call 'Clabby boy.' He turn and run away. I go back to bring you. We knock Leung Nam's door, but no can find. Leung Nam great man. Own all little house in one great house. Leung Nam say Clabby no come in. Hop Lai go to bed now!"

It didn't sound straight. I located the door of Leung Nam in my mind—turning twice, as we went out. I placed in mind, as I could, the other doors. It was evidently a public passage to many houses—enough traffic of feet to support a beggar there. Hop Lai left me and I hurried back to the Narrows. Its heaviness was in my nostrils, but before I dipped down into the actual muck of it, I saw a black cavity in the road where Miss Enright's limousine had been. It was half a minute before I fully realized the possibility that she had been taken over by the Chinese.

Affairs like this were far removed from my accustomed sphere. Little doubt that I was slow and ungraceful in the midst of them. But this I knew: that the young woman would not have left the Narrows of her own accord. I found a cab and drove to the Enright house. At the door a servant informed me that Miss Enright had not come in. I had to think it out, and directed the driver to my apartment. My feverish idea was to find a quiet place to think. In my letter box was a message from the one man I wanted to see most. The note was written in pencil on newspaper copy-paper:

My last night in town. If you get this before two in the morning, come to Leung Nam's Passage—the passage of the Blind Man, they sometimes call it—number 25, and bring this paper. Cl—

It was now midnight. In the cab again, I reflected coldly that I might be falling into a trap. Had I not better stop and telephone Fontaine of the firm? Was it the Chinese that had taken Miss Enright because we had delayed the ransom for the brother, or was it Clabby, for personal reasons? What had become of Miss Enright's chauffeur and the car itself? In spite of this rush of questions, I did not halt the progress of the car.

In the Narrows again, I alighted from a cab and asked the driver to wait in the exact spot where the limousine had stood. I remember that little stretch of walk to Leung Nam's passage—a black walk—the shops mostly shut. It might have been a bit of a London human drain, save for an occasional narrow-ankled and skull-capped figure in the doorway. The world seemed very old and numb—my steps reverberating on the dried skin of it.

IN THE LEUNG Nam Passage which I found readily because of the earlier episode with Hop Lai, the blind beggar still whined his song. His intonation changed abruptly as I dropped a coin in his gourd. I wondered if it were a signal. Number 25 was not the door upon which Hop Lai had knocked, but on the opposite side and not so far in.

"Mr. Clabby," I said to the bent, attenuated one in a bath-robe who opened for me.

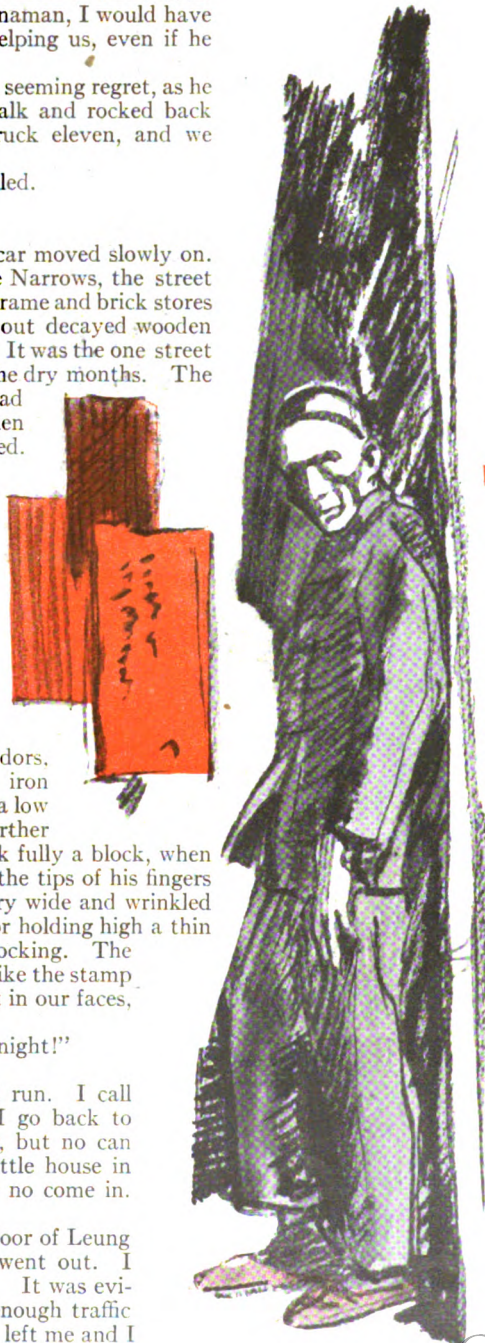

"No come here," he answered.

His head was bowed and in shadow, but the hiss of intaken breath could have come from nowhere else than his lips. I gave him the message Clabby had sent. The door swung a trifle wider for me to brush through. I reached to get the paper back, but the hand had drawn away.

"Wait-see Clabby—one moment," he answered, and turned from me.

I smelled the fumes of the long pipe, and recalled the expression I had seen in Clabby's face the first day in police headquarters, when he had spoken of never being able to come up out of Chinatown.

The old man reappeared in the dimness ahead and raised his palm toward me, shutting his fingers upon it—the Asiatic way of beckoning. He led me into a small bunk-room where one pale China boy with a loose queue and an unshaven brow, was in attendance—the sickest human plant I had ever seen.

There were no smokers in the nearer bunks. The place was cold gray like wintry dawn. Now from the shadows at the end of the room I heard a chuckle and saw a human figure—arms outstretched, one held higher than the other. The jolt in the center of my body was indescribable that instant—a surge of ancient horror that most of us feel about crucifixion. It was Clabby, not hung on a cross at all, but just out of his bunk and apparently stretching after long stupor. His naked wrists and ankles looked pathetically small and whitish in that chaotic light. It seemed I had not seen his brow before, as if he had never taken off that brown cap in my presence. I meant to study him for a minute.

"Hello," he said. "Sit down."

"How long have you been here?" I asked, hopeless of learning any truth from him.

"I don't know. I thought I'd make it a real one this time. Had to see you before I went away."

"Thought you'd make it a real one?" I repeated.

"... Night and day it nags me," he explained about the opium. "It wears and wears you down. You can keep it off for a while, but it is patient. It presses in, no hurry, but it always presses. It's like China."

"Why are you going away?"

"It is getting too easy here. It is easier to sleep here than at home."

Of course, I didn't accept this without reserve. Yet at that moment I saw the pale brow of him again, and the hard-headed criminal reporter whom Clinton Dean had talked about seemed a myth. I had never been so utterly incapable of decision.

"Gawd, the gardens I have been in," he muttered abruptly. "I don't say it's worth dying for, but it has its side."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean there is a heaven inside of a man, and we're all half mad to get at it. We try tobacco and wine, but they only rattle the doors. This dream stuff lets you—"

"Not me," I said.

"It doesn't work with everybody, but Gawd, it lets me in, that's all I mean."

I reached forward and touched his bare knee.

"Clabby," I said with swiftiness, but very softly, "is it safe to talk here?"

"Not business."

"Get your clothes on and come out with me."

"No, I'll be going in another direction," he said queerly.

"Then I'll have to tell you here: The sister has vanished, too."

A low groan came from him. It was like the hideous pain of being brought back to life when one is on the border or partly over. He did not ask me to say it again. There was a half-minute of silence. Then he rose and began feeling about on the bunk above his head for his clothes. I waited and watched. Clabby spoke to the boy on the way out, not in Chinese, but it was no English that I could follow. Also he spoke to the bent one in the bath robe in the outer hall.

"This man has the note that you sent me," I told him at the door.

"It doesn't matter," Clabby answered.

In the hall he shoved his arm through mine. "A bit rickety yet," he said.

We passed the blind man and were in the street before he whispered:

"Did they go to her house to get her and carry her off?"

"No, it was here in Chinatown. We had come to look for you,"

C. "You come," Hop Lai said. "You come. We find Clabby boy—veree quiet lady wait in car."

I answered, and told him the story of the girl's abduction. Often he brushed his hand over his head. We had halted now out of range of the taxi-driver's ears.

"You know, I didn't count on using my head again right off," he said with apology. "What are you going to do now?"

"It's your Chinatown," I said.

"It's my Chronicle, too," he replied with a touch of bitterness. "I don't get it."

"I've got friends in Chinatown. It's only three years—but they're beginning to believe in me. I guess they've pulled off the only thing that would make Clabby hurt Chinatown——"

That instant his eyes came up to find mine, and I saw living death in them. I was unlucky enough to be present once when a judge was pronouncing sentence on a prisoner—"to hang by the neck until you are dead, dead, dead." The look I saw in the prisoner's face was like Clabby's now. There wasn't fear in either face; only a cornered and done-for look and a smile to steady it.

"Clabby, why did you call me to you tonight?"

"I WAS about to vamoose," he said. "I wanted to get her brother for her, but you fellows won't come across within a month of parley. I'm sick of that. You won't get Paul Enright without the money and you won't get the Chinese who've got him—no more than you could catch a ghost. You're all right yourself, but even you belong to Brill, Brock and Co. As I say, I couldn't get Paul Enright for her, and I couldn't let her——"

"Go on," I said.

"I called you here because you knew her and you knew me. I'm leaving town. I wanted you to talk to her, to make it easier for her, somehow, because I'm not the sort to make her happy. Why, I'm digging my grave every night."

"Now, that she is gone—what are you going to do?" I demanded.

"I'll have to stay by and get her out," he muttered, as though driven against his will.

"What can you do?"

He laughed mockingly. "The first article in the code is to be square to one's friends. I suppose the first thing I must do is to break that. I've got the stuff to overthrow Chinatown with a few Chronicle columns, but it would be any man's last assignment in this funny old world."

"You think the same party that's got Paul has taken the sister tonight?"

"Yes——"

"For ransom?"

"Yes. But it will cost you three times what it would for the brother alone. It may pay Brill, Brock and Co. to wait a few years and let the world forget, while you are holding the fortune for heirs as good as dead—heirs who leave no heirs."

I shook his arm. "Clabby," I said, "Brill, Brock and Co. may be slow and conservative and reverence money and property, but they're honest!"

"I'll let that pass," he said softly. "But I'm not forgetting that it is Paul Enright's money they're holding and it is Paul Enright who is being imprisoned——"

"They want to do it right——"

"There's no use talking."

Now I was on queer ground for me. "Clabby," I said, "why couldn't you make Louise Enright happy and yourself too?"

"Because I'm a drifter, a dope-fiend——"

"But couldn't you forget that for her?" I questioned.

"Not now. I'm afraid I'm just Clabby. Oh, you Brill, Brock people would never understand! You'd have to get loose once to understand—loose from the body. But I'll meet her later on. I mean there's more to a love story than living together in a house—even in the Enright house——"

"You mean after death?"

"You'd have to hit the pipe to understand——"

"But she——"

"Gawd," he said, "she knows—without the dream smoke."

I put this down for what it is worth, but do not understand.

I saw him several times the next day. We managed to keep from the press that day the sensational fact that Miss Enright had been taken over, like her brother. I began adequately to realize that day that Clabby's three years in the quarter had won for him certain knowledge that was power; exact knowledge, apparently, that Chinatown feared more than all the indefinite ignorance of the police. I kept forgetting that Clabby was under suspicion himself, at least, when I was with him. There was a strange power about the little man.

"I'M PUTTING it up to them tonight," he said. "The worst of it is, one never knows who's on top. I'm dealing with Leung Nam, Hop Lai and two or three others, but they may be only agents. The leaders go up and up in Chinatown—till they're never seen—spoken of with reverence, as if they were disembodied. I've written the story that will do the damage. They can see it in copy. They can stop it by giving up Miss Enright safe and sound. You fellows will have to free her brother."

"Are you sure she will be safe and sound?" I asked.

"Oh, she's held gently enough. It's a big deal in finance—not a white slave case. Only the taking over of Miss Enright could make me use pressure. It's like betraying one's home——"

But there he interrupted himself.

"Are you telling the Chinese what Miss Enright means to you—what you mean to her?" I said with more feeling than sense.

His eye came up to me like blue ice. "I'm not making much of that," he said quietly.

Then a moment later I saw the tired, tortured boy in his eyes, the loneliness of a winter desert, and the steady smile again.

"Excuse me for not being sociable," he said.

"I can't seem to work it. . . . Of course, you understand I'm not planning to saddle my sort of a grave-digger onto a girl like her. Why, I can't even keep a landlady happy. . . . So-long, I'll be at the Chronicle later."

IT WAS NOT until eleven that night that I saw him again. I had been waiting for hours in and out of the Chronicle building. I searched his face as he crossed the editorial rooms. It told me nothing. I bent over him, as he rolled a cigarette before his typewriter.

"I have to report that so far I have failed," he said quietly. "Without qualification—failed! My copy goes into the desk at eleven forty-five, if they don't send someone to head it off," he added. "One of them must come to this desk, before eleven forty-five."

"But if you run the story, what will that get you—or her?"

Clabby laughed. "That's what my friends the Chinese said. Why, I'm only telling an instalment in tomorrow's paper. This——" he took out a bundle of copy done on the municipal machine at headquarters, "is only the lead of the story. They'll give her up tomorrow to forestall the second chapter——"

"But why haven't they come across already?"

"They don't think I'll do it. They don't think I dare. They trusted me and know I know what it means for Chinese to give their trust. You'll never understand that without going in for them. No one else could understand it."

He stopped short and the steady smile looked up at me. I felt a deep cold within.

"I told them I'd get off the Paul Enright case. I even told them that I would use my influence with his sister to make you attorneys pay for her brother's freedom in full. But their price has gone up now that the two Enright heirs are held."

"It's all up to you, then," I said.

"To this, and the rest of the story," he answered, tapping the copy against his desk and glancing around toward the face of Clinton Dean, the night editor, masked in an amber eyeshade. "Unless you make Brill, Brock and Co. pay."

The little man under the brown cap before me, was handling himself in bigger issues than I was familiar with. He was handling himself—which is a man's whole job. He was handling himself against his ambition, which was to get deep and high in Chinatown and be the one white newspaperman to hold face and faith, man to man, with the big yellow men there. That meant supremacy in his line as a newspaperman, but I think Clabby wanted the Chinese faith more than a reporter's reputation. In any case, he was throwing it all away—that genius-work of three years. He was handling himself in the woman-thing and a fortune with it. I shall never forget his sentence on that: "Of course, you understand, I'm not planning to saddle my sort of a grave-digger onto a girl like her." And then he was handling himself against his heaven, because in raising his hand against the Chinese, he was cutting himself off from every sanctuary of the long pipe.

There are moments when I don't like life—not anything about it. A few of such moments were right there in the Chronicle editorial rooms, before eleven forty-five. It was dramatic as the rise and fall of empire to me. The front page of the morning paper was held open to the last minute. About five minutes before it was due to be closed, I heard Clinton Dean, the night editor, call for copy. The whine of the elevator doors seemed to groove along the quick of my spine.

"Clabby—'phone," called the assistant night editor.

The little man arose and went to an empty desk nearby, picking up a receiver there. And this I heard in his quiet voice: "Yes. . . . No, not yet—three minutes more. . . . Positively. . . . You should have come before. . . . Unless you give me your personal word that what I ask shall be granted. . . . But I cannot wait, unless your word is given. . . . Of course, I know the consequences. . . . All right, good night. I'm sorry—sorry."

WE STOOD together the last minute or two. I took out a cigarette-case and put it back, though the case wasn't empty. Instead, I drew a paper that was sticking out from Clabby's shirt pocket and a pinch of loose tobacco from his coat and rolled one of his kind. Then he left me, opening his copy in his hand as he crossed the big room. Then he placed it in the light under the face of Clinton Dean, masked in the amber eyeshade. Two minutes later I heard again from the assistant:

"Clabby—'phone. . . ." And Clabby's quiet voice, after he had listened: "No, I turned it in. Sorry."

Now Clinton Dean spoke to the assistant and calmly:

"Tell 'em down-stairs to get ready for a three-column head. Clabby's got the white whale himself."

A three-column head for the Chronicle—that was war stuff. A little later still, Dean finished reading, wrote a head for the story, crossed to the desk where Clabby sat and said in a low, exultant way:

"So you got 'way into them, you runt—'way in past the telephones. I looked for something like this, when I didn't hear from you for two days. Yes, something like this, but there's more of it—"

"I'll know tomorrow if there's more," Clabby said.

"I'll know why not—if there isn't more. Hear me?" the chief demanded.

For a second I thought they might be acting, but I couldn't hold it.

Clabby smiled. Clinton Dean was called to his telephone.

"It's a little world out here," Clabby said strangely.

"Out here," I repeated. "You mean after your heaven—"

"How'd you guess?" he said softly.

Now we heard the night editor's voice. Dean's hand was over the mouthpiece of the telephone and he was turned to his assistant:

"Hold up Clabby's stuff for the present. There's a man here who says he gave Clabby the story and now he denies it. He talks like a white man. . . . Hey, Clabby, what do you know about this?"

"Let me talk to him," Clabby said.

"He says for you to call a 'certain number' and you'll find the facts are different," Dean added sharply.

Then Clabby talked for a [Continued on page 122]

THE INTIMATE LIFE OF HENRY FORD

Ⓒ. 1 Henry Ford's By Allan L. Benson

M BOYHOOD

Illustrated by Walter J. Enright

MARY LITOGOT, of Dutch descent, was the daughter of a prosperous farmer and his wife who lived near Dearborn, Michigan, nine miles west of Detroit. She was born in 1841. When she was six years old, she first saw William Ford, an English boy, born near Bandon, Ireland. William Ford had come to America with his father, mother, brothers and sisters and settled near Dearborn. The Fords had been farmers in Ireland and resumed farming in America. At times, William Ford worked for the father of Mary Litogot. He was both industrious and frugal. In a few years, he bought forty of Mr. Litogot's two hundred and forty acres. Fifteen years after William Ford's arrival in America, he and Mary Litogot were married. The next year, on July 30, 1863, their first child was born and named Henry, after an uncle. The mother was then twenty-two years old and the father thirty-six.

The mother died at the age of thirty-five. Henry was thirteen years old. Five other children had been born—two sons and three daughters.

Mary Ford died when she was so young that Henry Ford is the only one of her children who remembers much about her. Even Mr. Ford is of the opinion that his recollections of his mother are incomplete. They are incomplete. But they are incomplete only because his memory has let go of recollections that signified nothing. The important characteristics of his mother—the characteristics that explain her and explain him—are crystal-clear in his mind.

Henry Ford's mother was great in the things that the world calls little, which are, nevertheless, the only things in the world that are great.

She had great love, first for her husband and, later, for their children.

Henry Ford, in speaking to me of his mother, said:

"She was of that rarest type of mothers—one who so loved her children that she did not care whether they loved her. What I mean by this is that she would do whatever she considered necessary for our welfare even if she thereby temporarily lost our good will."

Mrs. Ford once temporarily lost Henry's affection by interfering with the gratification of his appetite for cake. It was the only time in his life that he was ever ill. His mother discovered what had upset him. Inquiry developed the fact that he had been trading the good bread and butter with which his mother filled his dinner pail for another boy's cake. The mother told him to keep his bread and butter and let the other boy's cake alone. Henry wanted to keep on trading.

"But I had to mind," said Mr. Ford. "When mother made up her mind to anything, she never stopped until she had accomplished her purpose. It is a good thing she did make me mind, too. That other boy and his whole family have been dead for years." Whether due to the cake, he didn't say.

HENRY FORD's mother had a great sense of order. Order, to a housewife, means, among other things, cleanliness. Her house was clean and the things in it were in place. Henry Ford's factories are clean and the things in them are in place. He says that a dirty factory attracts poor workmen, tends to demoralize those who would otherwise be good, and invites bankruptcy.

Mr. Ford says that his wife and his son's wife are the same type of women as his mother.

"My mother had a mind of her own," he said, "but she would have had no respect for a man who permitted his wife to rule him. I often consult with my wife with regard to business affairs because I know her judgment is good, and many times take her advice. But I am always the one to decide what I shall do."

William Ford, father of Henry, lived to be seventy-nine years old. He had inherited the remaining two hundred acres of his father-in-law's farm and was, therefore, throughout life, in comfortable circumstances. He was a good, honest, up-standing farmer, with all the virtues of good citizenship, but with none of the daring that has led his eldest son so far. William Ford was content to be a warden in the village church, to till his farm and to live in peace. To him, a bird in hand always seemed to be worth a good many in the bush.

"Father thought I was an awful fool," said Henry Ford, "to quit a job at which I was getting $135 a month to build automobiles. And after I quit the job, he used to tell me that I should hurry and build my automobiles or everyone who wanted one would be supplied before I got started. We were building one hundred cars a day in 1907 when father died."

C. Ford as a boy loved to take watches apart. His genius appeared in the fact that he could put them together again.

The old Ford home stands today just as it did when Henry Ford's little Dutch mother lived in it with her children. In out of the way places, here and there, Mr. Ford has picked up duplicates of the various articles that were in the house in the long ago. Furniture, carpets, dishes, lamps and pictures have been restored. And in the carpenter shop, down by the barn, is an old two-cranks boring machine and other carpenter's tools like the ones that Henry Ford's father used. If Mr. Ford's parents could come back, they might not be able to realize at first that they had been away from the old place.

HENRY FORD, at the age of five and one-half years, began school on January 11, 1871. On that day he put the date in his childish memory, where it remains after a lapse of more than fifty years:

No other fact need be told to enable one to realize that Henry Ford was an unusual boy. One might travel around the world without finding half a dozen persons more than fifty years of age who could tell the exact date upon which they began school.

The name of his first teacher was John Brainard Chapman. Mr. Chapman is dead, but his picture is in Mr. Ford's office.

The school, which is near Dearborn, was known as the Dutch Settlement School. The building, a little old-fashioned, one-story affair, is still standing.

Henry Ford went to the Dutch Settlement School three years, walking two and one-half miles each morning and night, carrying his dinner in a pail. After that, he walked about the same distance to another school which he attended until he was sixteen.

DURING this period, the lad discovered what was then his favorite book. It was Herbert Mattison, A Bound Boy. The hero had been "bound out" by his father to work for a neighbor until he was twenty-one years of age. This was a common thing in America fifty years ago, the boy who was "bound out" usually receiving for his labor only his board and clothing and a small amount of money.

Henry Ford had been going to the little country school but a few years when began in his mind the rumble of mechanics that has never ceased. At the age of thirteen, he caught his first vision of the automobile. It was but a fleeting vision, yet it was clear.

C. The workbench was from the first a center of interest to young Ford. Anything with wheels in it captivated him.

C. At night, the boy Henry Ford would steal forth to ride to a neighbor's home and repair a dilapidated timepiece.

"I remember well," said Mr. Ford, "saying to John Flower, a little boy who owned a tricycle upon which he used to let me ride, that if we could only attach an engine to the tricycle it could drive itself. I was then thirteen years old." Obviously he started young.

ABOUT the same time, the lad for the first time saw and read a scientific journal. It was called The World of Science, and was published in London.

Mr. Ford's interest in the improvement of water-power began when he was thirteen. The same interest that flamed out almost half a century later at Muscle Shoals.

"I built a dam across a little stream near our house," he said, "and backed the creek up until there was enough fall to run a water wheel. I attached a rake handle to the wheel as a shaft, and at the other end of the shaft had a coffee grinder in which I ground dirt."

Mr. Ford stopped to laugh.

"John Miller, a neighbor, came over to our house pretty soon," he continued, "to complain that my dam had flooded his cellar which was full of potatoes."

From water-power, the boy's mind turned to clocks and watches. He was seized with a fierce desire to know everything about timepieces.

"Only a little while ago," said Mr. Ford, "I was in the old barn in which I first took a watch apart."

Asked if he had any difficulty in putting the watch together, he replied:

"No, I knew what each wheel was for as soon as I saw it. It was as easy to put the watch together as it was to take it apart."

THE NEXT thing that William Ford knew, his son Henry was repairing watches and clocks for a few near-by neighbors, charging nothing for his work. That was all right. A watch-maker, of course, had to have tools, but one of his mother's knitting needles was made into a screwdriver, while a piece of an old watch-spring served admirably as tweezers. Mr. Ford, by the way, still has the screwdriver that he made from his mother's knitting needle.

But there came a time when William Ford was not so well pleased that his eldest son had become clock and watch repairer for the whole neighborhood. The elder Ford's dissatisfaction arose from the fact that the boy still continued to charge nothing for his work, though the excellence of his craftsmanship had caused his business to extend for many miles around. People said that when Henry Ford fixed a watch or a clock the job was done right, and William Ford thought that if the boy was so good a mechanic, he was good enough to be paid for his work. William Ford was the kind of a man who always gave and demanded exact justice, hence his insistence that the laborer, in this case, was worthy of his hire.

Of course the neighbors were willing to let the matter run along as it was going, and as it happened, Henry also was willing. What he most wanted was not money but the fun of repairing clocks and watches—the work was fun to him. Many a time, after walking two and one-half miles to and from school, he would walk nine miles to and from Detroit to buy springs and other little things with which to give some dependability to his neighbors' timepieces.

FINALLY, Henry Ford's father could stand it no longer and forbade the boy to go out nights to do free work. Henry was working hard all day on the farm in summer, and the father felt that he needed his rest.

"I couldn't quit," said Mr. Ford, "so I used to go to my room at nine o'clock at night and wait until I thought my father had gone to sleep. Then I used to creep out of the house, go to the barn, saddle a horse and ride away—sometimes many miles—to a place where I knew there was a watch or a clock to repair. Many a time I did not get home until three o'clock in the morning. Yes, I always worked on the farm the next day, just the same. The loss of sleep did not seem to hurt me any."

Mr. Ford did not tell me the incident that follows, but it was told to me in Dearborn.

The story is that Henry went out one night on his father's best horse to repair a clock several miles away, the father, as usual, being unaware of his absence. The job lasted until long after midnight. It was in the spring of the year and all the streams were running high. To make matters worse, it rained during the night while the lad was at work. The result was that a small bridge, over which boy and horse, outward bound, had passed in safety, was washed away during the evening. When the return journey was made, the bridge being gone, the boy and horse tumbled into the stream. William Ford's best horse and his eldest son were in imminent danger of broken legs, if not death by drowning; but Fate brought them through, wet but unhurt.

WATCHES have always possessed a strong fascination for Mr. Ford. One day while he was giving me material for this book the twelve o'clock whistle blew. Mr. Ford looked at his watch. "It is just right," he said. I mentioned that my watch had just been cleaned but gained seven minutes a day, notwithstanding the fact that the regulator was at the extreme "slow" side. "Let me see it," he said. He took the watch, opened it quickly, peered into the works with a magnifying glass and told me what was the matter with it. "I have always been interested in watches," said Mr. Ford. "I have half a bushel of watches that I have bought from time to time, just to go through them, see how they are made and observe how the workmanship differs. When I was a young man, working in a machine shop, I once had an idea of making a standardized watch on a big scale. I figured that by making two thousand watches a day I could make them for thirty-seven cents each and sell them at fifty cents each. That was before the day of cheap watches."

Henry Ford's boyhood on his father's farm passed like the shadow of a flying cloud over a field. It was a busy boyhood—a period in which he was a student in school, a farm-worker and a dreaming mechanic who worked to make his dreams come true. William Ford wished his son to be a farmer, and though Henry did not like farm-work, he worked hard at it. But his heart was always in his mechanical pursuits, which his father detested, because he realized that they were leading the lad away from the country.

The boy, while going to school winters and working on the farm summers, contrived to make himself a little workshop in which he toiled nights. He had a forge, a bowstring-driven lathe, a vise and enough small tools to enable him to do almost any kind of repairing that came to hand. But he worked with his tools always against the wishes of his father.

Thus for a time the struggle went on between the father's will and the son's determination. One day, when the boy was sixteen, the struggle ended. The mother had died three years before, the old home did not seem the same, and the call of the city silenced everything else in the boy's heart. Without saying a word to anyone, he walked nine miles to Detroit, rented a room in which to sleep, and sought employment in a machine shop.

HENRY FORD's first feat in financiering was performed the day after he walked to Detroit from his father's farm. He quickly found employment as an apprentice in Flower Brothers' Machine Shop at a weekly wage of two dollars and a half, but his board and room were to cost him three dollars and a half a week. The lad solved the problem by finding an opportunity to work four hours each evening for a jeweler named McGill, who had a little place at Baker and Twentieth Streets. After working ten hours a day in a machine shop, the boy worked from seven to eleven each evening repairing clocks and watches, for which he received two dollars a week.

“Stick your toes in,” was the advice given Ford as he toiled with a heavy load. This advice stuck with him as he worked at his first automobile.

The average boy would consider this a dog's life. To Henry Ford it was the realization of his fondest dreams. At last he was in machinery, up to his ears, night and day. The rumble that was to dominate his life was becoming real—the rumble that he had first heard in little more than fancy on his father's farm; the rumble that in 1922 has grown to a great clashing of metals moved by sixty thousand horse-power engines at Highland Park, with a sound like distant thunder that forecasts a million horse-power at Muscle Shoals, or on the Mississippi!

THE BOY literally reveled in his opportunities to learn about machinery. In both shops he received wages for his work, but in neither shop did he work for wages. If he could have lived for nothing, he would have been glad to work for nothing. What he wanted was information and experience. The machine shop and the watch shop gave him both. They gave him also an opportunity to talk with men from whom he could learn. The boy was always eager to talk with any machinist whose joy in his work revealed him to the lad as one from whom he might learn something. The days passed like minutes and the evenings flew like seconds. The lad was never tired and the time to go to work never came too early in the morning.

Henry Ford, as a boy, was always playing because his work to him was play. In whatever he did he was really playing the game of acquiring knowledge with regard to machinery and mechanical principles. We see this in a move that he made after he had worked nine months in Flower Brothers' Machine Shop. Although his wages had been increased to three dollars a week, he quit the job and went to work for the Dry Dock Engine Company at fifty cents less a week because he felt that he had learned all he could where he was and [Continued on page 143]

As You Might Say

By William Slavens McNutt

THEY MET FIRST in a little southeastern Alaska boom town; a village of board streets and sidewalks raised on stilts over the muck of the slope just above tidewater, that came into being within a month after news of high-grade quartz came out of the high hills near-by. For a brief season, that little camp on the steep cedar-grown shore of Kanak canal was a place where a man with the price could get anything he wanted.

Jeff Ashley was short, stocky, dark, with a broad definitely featured face that would have been the countenance of an orator and a statesman, if it had not been half that of a thug; and would have been altogether that of a thug if it had not been half that of a great orator and statesman. He had a deep-barreled, iron-hard body, built to stand hard usage and to react to mental command rapidly enough for purposes of self-preservation in places where self-preservation was not only the first law of nature but the routine part of daily work.

He was just ashore from a halibut schooner, having left suddenly over the side after decorating the captain with twin black eyes and a splintered nose.

Bob Corrigan was in from a construction job at the Hoonya mines on the coast to the westward. Bob was long and lanky and fair. His nose was large, bony, and slightly Roman; his eyes were small and light, the color of a worn dime and half its size. His chin was one of his most negligible features. Occasionally some amateur character reader based his treatment of Bob on the theory that a man with a receding chin was sure to be easy meat in a ruction. The amateurs who made this mistake might have been consoled—after becoming healed up—by being told that Corrigan was not the only exception to the rule, his chin being practically a twin of that worn successfully through so many fistic engagements by the late Mr. Robert Fitzsimmons.

They met in the rear of Peg Bender's cigar store. Peg Bender's cigar store was mostly rear. The laws in Alaska today are strict and a man who wants to sell booze and carry on a little unlimited gambling of sorts, even in a remote boom town, must pay some attention to them. Not much to be sure, but some Peg Bender paid attention to them by labeling his place a cigar store, wasting at least six square feet and a perfectly good unpainted counter to bolster up the pretense.

Bob Corrigan had money and Ashley had none. But that was not the reason Jeff felt an electric thrill of anger along his spine at sight of him. Other men in Peg Bender's place had money, and Jeff felt no urge to pick a quarrel with them. He noticed Corrigan at first, because Corrigan was of his own quality of character. He was big and dominant. The others in the room formed a background for him, against which he loomed, arresting, prominent.

He was playing poker at a round table with six other men and the dealer. Ashley seated himself in a chair across from Corrigan, somewhat removed from the table, and scowled at the long, lanky, blond man who had attracted his attention and compelled his dislike. Shortly Corrigan looked up and met Ashley's gaze. For a full half-minute he stared into Jeff's dark eyes without blinking, without effort or show of emotion. Several men in the room noted the duel of eyes. A number of them rose and, with a markedly casual manner, strolled out of the place. All those who did so were old-timers, men of long experience in incidents common to the back room of Peg Bender's joint.

Peg himself meandered across the room, the wooden stump that did duty for the lower half of his left leg banging loudly on the bare floor. He stopped near the table at which Corrigan sat. To the unpracticed eye he appeared to be idly watching the play; but one old-timer in the room, a whiskered old chap, playing solitaire at the small table in the corner, who had not been witness to that first significant clash of glances between Corrigan and Ashley, noticed Bender standing there, studied him for a few seconds, rose, yawned, nodded good night to an acquaintance and left the place at a gait noticeably a trifle swifter than his habitual pace. He knew his little book, the old-timer did! After a little Ashley rose, walked around behind Corrigan and stood for several minutes, silently watching his play. As Corrigan raked in a sizable pot Ashley spoke.

"IF A MAN with brains just had a fool's luck to go along with the sense in his head, what a poker player he'd be!" he said.

Few in the room understood the significance of his words, but the vicious quality of the tone was unmistakable. The buzz of conversation died out.

Ashley went on, his words clearly heard in the silence. "I reckon every man has some'n to help him get by. Some has sense enough to play poker like poker ought to be played, an' others has the luck to draw two cards to a monkey flush and fill. Yes, sir, I reckon the first feller that said, 'A fool for luck,' he must 'a' been watchin' one of 'em play poker."

Peg Bender shifted his position slightly and dropped his right hand into the pocket of his coat.

Corrigan looked at the dealer and the corners of his lips twisted upward in a slight quizzical smile. His small pale eyes were narrowed and shot full of brilliant shifting points of light, but of course Ashley couldn't see this.

"I'M OUT," he said softly, counting his chips and shoving them across the table. "Three hundred and eighty-five is my count."

"Right," said the dealer, counting the money out of the check drawer and passing it across to him. "There's more where this came from. Don't forget us when you're feelin' playful again sometime. We aim to please."

"That's what I like to hear a man say," Corrigan said genially, as he pushed back his chair and rose, half turning to face Ashley. "I sure do like to see a man that enjoys helpin' folks out. I'm that way a lot, even if I do say it myself. Whenever a man comes to me and wants somethin' an' I got it, you'd be surprised how much fun I get out o' givin' it to him. Now this gentleman here"—he indicated Ashley with a nod—"this gentleman here, he's lookin' for trouble. He don't just exactly ask for it, not in so many words, but I ain't one to wait to be asked right out plain when I know a man's got an appetite for somethin' I can easy spare. So I'm just goin' to—"

"Just a minute there, boys," Peg Bender interrupted, half stepping between them. "You gentlemen take notice I got my hand in my pocket; an' I ain't got it there to keep it warm, neither. You can go right on outside an' use the street for a shootin' gallery, an' I won't even pester you so much as to come out to the front door an' see which one o' you needs buryin'; but this is my place, an' if there's any killin' done here, I'm goin' to do it."

"Speakin' for myself, I wasn't figurin' on doin' any shootin'," Corrigan replied politely. "I never went in for gun totin', an' I haven't got one on me now. Unless I've made a mistake, this gentleman here"—indicating Ashley with a bow—"wasn't lookin' for a gun fight. My idea was that his knuckles was itchin', an' I was just figurin' on givin' him-somethin' to scratch 'em on."

"I ain't got any gun," Ashley said shortly. "I've been 'round some an' I ain't met anybody yet that made me start thinkin' about savin' up to buy one, neither."

Corrigan smiled. "You see, Mr. Bender, you went an' mistook our ideas," he said, with a hint of reproach in his tone. "I kind o' felt it in my bones that this gentleman didn't have any shootin' ideas in his mind. O' course, he's a young man yet, an' he ain't met everybody. That's why I'm goin' to interduce myself to him. He says himself he's been around a lot, an' he must be tired seein' so much o' the same scenery all the time. I got an idea I can show him somethin' new."

"NOT IN HERE, yuh can't!" Peg declared. "Don't make no diff'rence whether it's a shootin' battle or a hittin' battle; it ain't goin' to be here!"

Little Hank Withers pushed forward and planted himself by Bender's side. Hank was less than five feet tall and weighed in the neighborhood of ninety-five pounds with his clothes on. He was ninety-two years old and he had been in every gold rush from the Mexican border to Nome, since the days of '49. His size made it possible for him to skate into dangers enthusiastically on the thinnest of thin ice and never break through.

"You boys want to do some fightin'—why'n't ye go down to the dock an' do it there?" he piped up in his shrill falsetto. "Best place in town to do any fightin'. It's level an' good footin' an' plenty big enough to wrastle 'round on—an' besides there's lots o' good places to watch it from down there. If you boys'll just go on down to the dock an' do your fightin' down there, I'll go see the marshal an' tell him what you're at an' what you're doin', so's he won't bump into you accidental while he's nosin' 'round an' have to run you in before you get satisfied."

Corrigan smiled and raised his eyebrows in an expression of interrogation. "Suits me," he said. "Is this gentleman satisfied?"

Ashley nodded. "Let's go!" he said shortly. "I want to get my dinner pretty soon, an' I'm figurin' on you to wrastle me 'round long enough to give me an appetite, anyhow."

"Don't walk too fast on the way down there," little Hank Withers piped up as he scuttled out in front. "I got to look up the marshal an' tell him what's goin' on, so's he won't butt in: an' I don't want to miss none of it."

"I won't knock him out from underneath himself till you get there!" Corrigan called after the little man.

Ashley looked at Corrigan and laughed.

"You talk like a reg'lar guy," he said approvingly. "I hope you don't fizzle out on me 'fore I get well warmed up."

"I'll do my best to stay right side up till you bust out into a sweat," Corrigan promised affably. "I've always had mighty good luck at keepin' myself movin' round an' doin' this an' that whenever me an' somebody else was seein' which was which."

Slowly, side by side, they strolled down the steep wooden street to the wharf, chatting of casual matters, the climate, chances for work in the neighborhood and the wages offered, while the crowd from Peg's place steadily grew and those who had been in at the beginning explained the matter of the coming entertainment to the newcomers joining in.

Arrived on the dock, the two men shucked their coats and shirts, squared off, and began to fight. They fought for three bloody hours; fought on into the late Northern twilight; fought while a thin fog rolled up the inlet and enveloped them; fought sometimes furiously, at others scarcely able to do more than hang to each other and gasp for breath, and then being temporarily recuperated, they fought with all the ferocity will and muscle could express. They fought while little Hank Withers hopped about in a semicircle of onlookers, excitedly declaring he hadn't seen anything like it for years, and bewailing the fact that he must absent himself for a minute or two at ten-minute intervals to carry the news of the fight to the marshal, who was hiding behind a shack a couple of hundred yards up the hill. The marshal had-bound Hank to do him this favor on the threat of stopping the fray.

They fought on while the marshal's desire to be an eyewitness of the struggle grew big and overcame his fear of breaking the conventions; fought after the marshal himself had joined the delighted audience and become so engrossed in betting his money on Corrigan to win that he forgot to be worried because he was not doing his duty. They fought until Ashley went down from a right to the jaw and spent the last ounce of his strength in regaining his feet. As he struggled, gasping, to an upright position, Corrigan spent the last flicker of effort that was in him aiming another right at his opponent's jaw. The blow missed by two feet and the force of it swung Corrigan off his balance. He crashed to the board flooring of the dock and lay there, only dimly conscious, fighting for breath, unable to rise. Ashley stumbled over the recumbent form of his foe, fell and lay beside him, equally spent and helpless.

THE MARSHAL, seeing they were unable to rise, assumed the position of referee. He counted ten over the two prone bodies, announced in loud tones that the battle was a draw and that all bets were off.

Thereupon he brushed his star with his sleeve, translated himself back into his official position by assuming a stern scowl, and ordered the crowd to disperse.

"What's been goin' on here?" he demanded sternly. "You boys been fightin'?"

"No!" Corrigan gasped. "We were just teachin' each other to read an' write!"

"I'm glad to hear it," the marshal said, in a relieved tone. "Education ain't a bad thing. Far as I know, there's no law against it. For a while I was afraid the way you two was actin' that you might be breakin' the peace."

"Nothin' like that," Ashley panted, managing to raise himself on one elbow. "It's just as my pardner there says. We was teachin' each other a few things."

"Oh!" said the marshal. "You boys pardners, huh?"

"Sure," said Corrigan.

"Why, certainly!" said Ashley.

The marshal leaned over and helped up first Corrigan and then Ashley.

"There's a doctor up the street, just this side of the Lyric Theater," he said. "You two boys bring what's left of yourselves along up there with me and let him see what he can do with the pieces. I'll pay the bill. Oh, yes, I will!" he went on decisively as Corrigan started to protest. "I got more fun out o' watchin' you two boys teach school than I could buy anywheres else for what the doc will charge to patch you up. I'm goin' to pay for the repairs, or pinch you both—one o' the two."

An hour later, Corrigan and Ashley issued from the doctor's office, liberally sewed, plastered and bandaged, and limped side by side down the street.

"Let's eat!" said Corrigan, stopping in front of a restaurant.

"No!" said Ashley.

Corrigan eyed him.

"Busted?" he queried.

"Clean as a sea-gull," Ashley confessed.

"I got near five hundred dollars," said Corrigan. "Come on in an' eat."

"I didn't ask to borrow none of it off you, did I?" Ashley retorted.

"Borrow!" Corrigan exclaimed hotly. "Borrow it! It was you first said we was pardners, not me. What about it? Are we pardners, or ain't we?"

"All right," said Ashley. "If you feel that way, let's eat!"

IN THE next three years they did not eat a dozen meals apart. Together they roamed the continent, across and up and down, from Nome to Key West, and from San Francisco to Newfoundland. Wherever hard jobs offered a thrill and a wage, they went and worked; and when the thrill was gone, they traveled on.

They did a little fishing on their own hook in Alaskan waters and once signed on for a trip out of Gloucester on the Grand Banks. They worked in the mines of southeastern Alaska, and in lumber camps in Washington and Canada; on the tall skeletons of skyscrapers, high above the roar and rush of New York and Chicago; in the stoke-holes of ships on the Atlantic and Pacific.

Tiring of a job in New York, they would draw their pay and spend it, whereupon one would suggest: "Let's go out to San Francisco and see what's doing."

A walk through the city; a time of waiting in the dark of the railroad yards; a run and a spring as an out-bound train, gathering speed, came abreast; and then from two to three hungry weeks of sport that would shame a big-game hunter, weeks of dodging detectives and trainmen; weeks of clinging precariously in night and storm to the outside of trains; weeks of dodging in and out of the big cities on their westward way; of sticking to the train on desert or mountain with all the crew on the hunt for them. Then they would breeze into San Francisco, lean, hard, and happy, their appetite for movement, danger, and hardship satisfied, ready for the comparative tedium of a dangerous job high on the slim girders of a steel building or in the roar and rush of some huge construction project.

The day after war was declared, they enlisted together in the same outfit. Together they went overseas and together they went into battle. Ashley was hit in the course of a disastrous trench raid and Corrigan was wounded while trying to get his partner back. Together they were carried to the first-aid station and together they rode back to the same hospital; together they convalesced, rejoined their outfit, fought through to the Armistice, and then, still together, the fighting being over, they went joyously A. W. O. L. to Paris.

THEY HAD three wonderful days and nights there. Then an M. P. accosted them on the Boulevard near the Café de la Paix and demanded their passes. Corrigan disposed of him with one punch, but M. P.'s on the Boulevard in the neighborhood of the Café de la Paix immediately after the Armistice were plentiful and pestiferous. Be it said to the fighting credit of Corrigan and Ashley that they stayed on their feet for at least fifteen minutes, making a running battle of it as far as the Rue Royal in front of the Madeleine. There they were overpowered and lugged away to jail.

They were sentenced to six months each in labor battalions and then the split came. Ashley was shipped off to a battalion in Brest, while Corrigan was sent down into the Argonne country to aid in cleaning up the mess left by the recent victoriously militant A. E. F. during its final slap at the retreating German army.

For two years after they got out of the army they hunted each other industriously all over the United States; then they met purely by chance on a street in El Paso, Texas. Ashley was just up over the border after a monotonous and unprofitable experience as a machine-gunner with a small revolutionary faction that did not have a machine-gun and never got nearer active revolutionary service than sneaking along dark alleys and talking in whispers. Corrigan was passing through town on his way east from the coast to a big construction job on the Mississippi River in Louisiana.

The two men alternately hugged and beat each other violently. They stood apart and fervently called each other names, for the utterance of which men are often shot dead.

For this was their only way of expressing the deep affection that they felt.

When the first fury of their greeting had somewhat abated, Corrigan clapped Ashley on the shoulder and said:

"Why damn your old hog-hide, you blinkety-blink, you! I'm so blinkety-blink glad to see you again that I most wish you was a woman. I do for a fact! Damn me, if I wouldn't like to kiss you!"

"Well, you wall-eyed, lop-eared, flea-ridden, mangy old hound, you," Ashley retorted. "If I was a woman, I'd leave you kiss me 'thout yellin' for help. What do you know about that? I reckon you've seen yourself in the glass often enough to know that that would be goin' a long, long way for a friend."

They walked to the little park in the center of town and sat on a bench there.

"I'm thirty-three years old," Corrigan said suddenly. "How old are you, Ash?"

"Thirty-four next month."

"Ain't that hell!" Corrigan exclaimed. "First thing we know, we're goin' to be plumb grown up! You know, Ash, it's time we done somethin' for ourselves 'sides just keepin' the bottoms of our feet scratched. Why, first thing you know, we're goin' to be gettin' old!"

"That's right," Ashley agreed.

"S'pose we go on up to southeastern Alaska an' rustle 'round up there 'till we get ourselves a stake together an' buy a good big roomy gas boat," Corrigan suggested.

"Suits me!" said Ashley.

"Beats a farm for men like you, an' me," Corrigan went on enthusiastically. "Just as much of a home an' more so. An' besides that, we could move 'round in it enough maybe not to get wishful to bust loose an' go traveling."

"Now you're talkin' sense," Ashley said. "Couple o' guys like you an' me with a gas boat up there—a good big one—they got a good home an' a livin' for life. There's a lot better than a thousand miles to ramble in here an' there up an' down the passage an' out to the westward. A man'll be able to shoot his meat up there for years, more'n either one of us'll ever live. We could pick up a nice piece o' money fishin' an' packin' cargo for the canneries an' some o' the small camps. We could slide south in the winter time—down 'round Vancouver awhile—an' then go north in the summer an' 'way out to the westward. Even up into the Bering if we felt like it. Boy! I guess that wouldn't be soft!"

"Just you an' me," said Corrigan gently.

"Sure!" said Ashley. "No more hittin' the grit. No more dicks or shacks to dodge."

"No more workin' for somebody else," Corrigan chimed in.

"You said it!" said Ashley. "A home of our own for the rest of our lives and a damn' good one! One we can take with us when we want to move an' make a good livin' doin' it! You're on, old kid!"

Q. Eva gave her friends a good imitation of the rejected Jeff's proposal to her: "Oh, it was too funny, he had his hands together like a preacher, and he said, 'I know I'm not fit to breathe the same air with a girl like you, but the way I feel for you now—'"

They shook hands solemnly.

"Let's eat," said Ashley.

"Attaboy," said Corrigan.

So they went to the nearest restaurant and there met Eva Haskell.

Eva was a small, blonde, persistently kittenish person with a cunning cultivated baby stare and the manner of an eager child who finds everything and everybody perfectly wonderful and adorable. She was a waitress in the White Front lunch room.

"Ain't it a shame to see a girl like that working in this kind of a place?" Corrigan exclaimed, when she had taken their orders, after a merry interchange of comment on the weather and the way times were now. From his tone it was apparent that Corrigan was sincerely indignant about the matter.

"Sure is!" Ashley agreed emphatically. "A girl like that! It's a shame!" Ashley's tone was just as indignant as Corrigan's had been.

Corrigan's eyes narrowed. He looked at his friend intently for a moment.

"Pretty kid, ain't she?" he tentatively asked his pardner.

"A beaut!" Ashley agreed enthusiastically. "A pippin! I'll say she's pretty! Boy!"

"H'm!" said Corrigan enigmatically, and fell to making marks on the tablecloth with the tines of his fork.

They were the only two in the restaurant at the time. When Eva returned with their orders, they talked with her. She was timid, but friendly. She flushed, begged their pardon for any lack of proper attention of which she might be guilty, explaining that the duties of the job were new to her. She went on to say that she thought a girl ought not to be ashamed of doing anything to make an honest living. A film of moisture clouded her blue eyes as she spoke briefly, haltingly of her father's death the year before. It seemed that her poor father had been a lovely man, but he left his finances in somewhat of a hash; and when the lawyers got through there was nothing left for little Eva.

"Of course, I wasn't brought up to do any kind of work," she explained. "Father would never let me lay my hand to a thing. We always had plenty of servants. I think now that every girl ought to be taught to earn her living, no matter how well off her parents may be. Of course I was well educated, but I never learned anything by which I could make money; so you see you mustn't be hard on me if I don't get things just right. It's all very new to me yet."

Ashley and Corrigan both assured her that she'd done fine. Also they heartily applauded her courage. She explained then in a lower voice and with wary glances about that the work itself wasn't so hard and the customers were all just lovely to her, but the man who owned the place, the proprietor—Well, she didn't want to say anything against him, but as a matter of fact, he was a man that her father wouldn't have permitted her to know; and in spite of the fact that she was now forced to work for a living—well, of course he hadn't actually done or said anything yet she could really object to, but there was something about him. If he thought for a minute he could take advantage of her position—Well, she guessed that some of the men who came into the place would tend to his case if it ever became necessary for her to ask assistance.

"If it ever comes down to that," said Corrigan, "just you let me know you're in need."

"Yes," said Ashley, "and if he don't happen to be here, you let me know!"

"I'll fix him," said Corrigan vindictively.

"I'll take care of him!" said Ashley, scowling.

"Oh, I'm sure you'd both help me if it was necessary!" Eva said, blushing and dimpling. "I hope it won't be. A girl like me that's had proper bringing up has ways of making a man keep his place. Come in again, you boys, won't you?"

"Sure!" said Corrigan.

"You said it!" said Ashley.

They went to the little park again and sat on a bench. The suggestion of the gas boat and Alaska was not brought up. Instead, after a silence, Corrigan said: "Shall we muss around town and see if we can pick up a job?"

"Suits me," Ashley said.

That night before they went to bed Corrigan spoke his mind.

"You got any ideas in your head about that Miss Haskell we was talkin' to down to the restaurant?" he asked.

Jeff blushed and squirmed.

"Why, yes, in a way," he confessed. "I don't s'pose she'd look at me twice. But women's funny. You can't tell about 'em. She sure hit me right square between the eyes."

"THAT'S JUST the way I feel about it for myself," Corrigan said bluntly.

"Well," said Ashley after a little, "that makes it tough."

"Sure does," Corrigan agreed with a deep sigh.

"I tell you," said Ashley; "we'll roll the bones. High man gets first chance to talk to her about—about these ideas we both got in our heads."

"Shoot!" said Corrigan.

Ashley fished a pair of worn dice from his pocket, knelt on the floor, and rolled out two sad but ambitious treys.

Corrigan picked up the dice, shook in his palm, and rolled them out on the carpet. They read ace, trey.

"Right, Jeff!" he said, rising, "you get first chance."

"I ain't sorry, Bob," Ashley said regretfully. "And ain't a guy to say I am, when I ain't. But I will say this: I'm sorry I'm in a spot where I can't be sorry when you lose."

The loss was temporary. In a month Ashley proposed to Eva Haskell and was refused. The next day Corrigan proposed and was enthusiastically accepted.

"I guess I'll be movin' along," Ashley said when Corrigan told him of his success. "I was just hangin' round in case you didn't have any better luck than I did."

"Eva was fixin' fer a party at a road-house down the valley tomorrow night," Corrigan said awkwardly. "I kind o' wish you'd stay over for that, Jeff."

"All right," Jeff said without enthusiasm. "Sure! I'll stay for that."

THE party at the road-house down the valley was a large one. With the exception of Jeff Ashley the guests were all Eva's friends. Corrigan met most of them for the first time that night. They made him feel uncomfortable. He sat opposite Ashley, saying nothing, rolling and smoking innumerable cigarettes, and slowly absorbing ginger ale highballs. It was late in the evening

The World War on BOOZE DRINKING in SCANDINAVIA

Part      By Frazier Hunt

3      Illustrated by Harry Townsend

THREE of us sat in the coffee room of a hotel in Copenhagen an afternoon in early fall and talked over the Danish temperance movement—a Danish prohibition leader, an interpreter and myself.

"How about this Tax Free beer that I hear you talking so much about?" I finally asked my prohibition guest. "Is this two and one-fourth percent beer an accepted temperance drink?"

"Yes, of course," he answered.

"No, I mean do temperance people here drink it? For instance, would you drink it?"

"Certainly," he answered very honestly.

But still I hesitated. This seemed to be too good to be true—a two and one-fourth percent tax free near-beer considered non-alcoholic, non-intoxicating, non-immoral. I feared that my interpreter was not making my question clear.

"What I mean is this," I slowly began, "would you care to have a glass of this near-beer with me now?"

"Why I don't mind—thank you," he answered.

More than a little thrilled I called a waiter and ordered three bottles of "Skattefri"—tax free beer. When it came we each poured out a glass and with a slight toasting gesture proceeded with the business of drinking it.

Now, I have no standing as a beer connoisseur, but this certainly looked like old-fashioned beer and it certainly tasted like beer, and if it was only near-beer, it was mighty, mighty near beer. My temperance friend flicked the mellow froth from his mustachios and smiled over at me.

"Goot, ugh?" he asked.

"Excellent," I answered. "Our light-wine-and-near-beer people in America would shed tears as big as Indian clubs over that beer. . . . If this is only two and one-fourth percent tax free beer I want to try some of your really taxed genuine beer."

The interpreter called the waiter this time and ordered him to bring a bottle of the real beer. When it came along I asked him to fill up two glasses, one with the high percent beer and the other with this tax free light beer. I turned my head while he did this and then with my eyes shut I tasted from each glass.

By no amount of lip smacking or head cocking or wise cracking could I tell the slightest difference between them.

Now I have detailed this slight adventure in beer because the drinking problems in these Scandinavian countries and in all Northern Europe are infinitely more similar to those in America than are the problems and conditions in the warm wine countries of Southern Europe. Here in the North there is near-beer, smuggling, bootlegging, Puritanism and "moral issues." In the South, the temperance movement has as yet hardly been lifted from its cradle.

In the southern wine belt, as I pointed out in last month's Hearst's International, the grape and its fermented juice is indigenous: it is a part of the very life of the great majority of the common fold. The millions of peasants scattered throughout France, Spain, Portugal and Italy, drink the wine and cider and spirits that they themselves ferment and distil from the grapes and fruits that are grown in their own vineyards and orchards.

Besides the tremendous sentimental significance attached to wine-drinking in the South, it has as well a great economic side.

It is estimated that fully ten percent of all the people of France are connected with the wine industry: four percent of the finest tillable land is in vineyards, producing a finished product valued in 1921 at 8,601,594,800 francs—some three-quarters of a billion dollars.

But here in the northern countries of Europe it is entirely different. There is nothing really indigenous about the beer and booze business. It is usually a "capitalistic" enterprise—how all Europe loves that word—that the small farmer or city workman has no financial interest in. This means that he has little or no economic interest in the carrying on of the wet business.

This, coupled with a decidedly keener and more awakened moral sense and social welfare concern in the North, has resulted in a considerably more advanced temperance consciousness in the countries lying above the "wine belt" of Europe. Speaking generally, North Europe has for the past quarter century been gradually decreasing its liquor consumption while South Europe has steadily increased her drinking—the war period, excepted.

Of all the countries of Europe, the Scandinavian states with Finland and Iceland, have certainly shown the really spectacular advances in prohibition growth. Working, for the past half century, more or less under the temperance inspiration from America, these sturdy little states of Northern Europe have been moving steadily and surely forward toward prohibition.

Long before the opening gun of the Great War broke the peace and happiness of Europe, these Scandinavian countries had projected temperance education and enacted laws that were changing these districts from some of the hardest drinking parts of Europe to the most temperate.

The war brought stringent rationing of foodstuffs for these neutrals, with the result that the manufacture of spirits and high percent beer was temporarily prohibited by law. Taking full advantage of this actual and psychological situation the dry leaders—just as was done in America—pushed through as much permanent prohibition legislation as they could, with the general result that by the middle of 1921 the whole of Northern Europe was well on the way toward at least partial temperance. Roughly, the liquor conditions in these small northern states in early 1921 were as follows:

Finland was bone dry except, of course, for the busy and universal bootlegger, and a light beer.

Tiny Iceland was bone dry—except for two and one-half percent beer.

Norway prohibited the manufacture and sale of all distilled spirits and of wines and beer of over twelve percent alcohol and permitted communities to vote themselves bone dry—except for beer of two and one-half percent alcohol by volume.

Sweden, since 1914, had been selling spirits only under the Blatt System, which gave sober adults the right to purchase up to four litres of spirits each month through their individual motbok—coupon book. All liquor was sold under an earlier devised "Gottenborg System" that took the excess profits out of the liquor selling business and permitted stores to make only an annual net profit of five percent.

Denmark was operating a near Local Option whereby local communes, to all intent and purpose, could refuse the granting of new licenses or the renewal of old ones when they expired. Some 175 of the 1,200 communes of Denmark had taken advantage of this law and voted themselves dry—except for beer of two and one-fourth percent alcohol. She was drinking but twenty-five percent of what she was a quarter of a century ago and but one-third of what she was before the war.

¶ "Stop this temperance foolishness!" the wine countries told Iceland. "You can't shut out our French liquors and Spanish wines! Kindly change those silly prohibition laws of yours or you can eat your own fish and starve."

On the surface the temperance movement was booming. Enthusiasts were prophesying that in ten or twenty years the Scandinavian countries would be bone dry. And then a fly dropped in the temperance ointment—a rift sprang in the prohibition lute.

Rather, to be more exact, two flies dropped in the ointment and a double rift sprang in the lute.

First of all came a sudden awakening among the wet interests of all Europe that their booze business was in actual danger of a dry invasion. From America an Idea was being broadcasted—as mysteriously and yet as effectively as the broadcasting of a radio message. The greatest nation in the world had gone bone dry and, more than that, had made up its mind that the whole world was to go dry.

It was a declaration of war on the wet world—and wet Europe mobilized its money munitions and its press artillery and its political machinery and its army of drinkers and the fight was on. In September, 1921, the first wet Congress of the world was held at Lausanne, Switzerland, and a wet General Staff was organized with headquarters in Paris, and a general plan of campaign laid out.

Wet propaganda bureaus were formed in practically all the capitals of Europe and every interest allied with the wine, beer and booze business aroused and drafted. Through control of most of the press, the legislative bodies, certain church organizations and traditional public opinion, the wet interests throughout most of Europe had every advantage of entrenched positions.

All these weapons, however, were far less powerful in the Scandinavian countries than in the rest of Europe. But here in the North, the wet interests of Europe found another weapon of offense against the dry Idea—the seventy-five-mile gun of Trade pressure. This is the second fly and the No. 2 rift.

From the clear blue sky that hung over the wine belt of the South shot a bolt of liquid lightning. Putting it very crudely these wine countries plainly and forcibly said: "Here, you tiny Iceland, how dare you go dry and exclude our Spanish wines. And that goes for you, Norway! Stop this temperance foolishness! You can't shut out our French liquors and Spanish and Portuguese wines! Kindly change those silly prohibition laws of yours—or you can eat your own fish and starve."

Tiny Iceland spluttered and gasped and cried to the heavens for help. But the heavens were busy with post-war problems pretty generally and had no time to listen. Temperance round-robins were broadcasted and signed by big names and little names and forwarded to the King of Spain. But the King of Spain was out playing polo. And Iceland simply had to sell her fish—or eat it and starve.

Briefly, the story is that every year Iceland exports to Spain between 18,000 and 20,000 tons of her split cod. Shortly after her prohibition law went into effect the trade agreement between Spain and Iceland expired and the Spanish Government very firmly refused to renew it unless Iceland permitted the importation of Spanish wines up to twenty-one percent alcohol. The 1921 catch was in the warehouses and unless something was done there would be a dead loss of from five to eight million dollars—meaning the complete ruin of the fisherman.

While negotiations were pending Spain extended the old arrangement from month to month, but finally she put on the screws and on April 25, 1922, the Iceland Government voted to suspend the law as to Spanish wines for one year. In the same breath she voted 20,000 crowns to be spent in procuring a new market for her fish.

That was lesson A in this game of teaching small nations not to lose their foolish heads over the thrill of American prohibition. Lesson B is Norway. As it is many times larger than Iceland it is, of course, many times more important.

For almost a century Norway has slowly but surely been educating herself toward temperance. In the twenty-year period before 1845 her per capita consumption of one hundred percent pure alcohol was eight litres—sixteen litres of ordinary "full proof" spirits per man, woman and child.

In 1845 the number of retail saloons were reduced by law and in 1871 the Gothenburg system, which limited the profits of the retail spirits business to five percent annually, was introduced. By 1882 the per capita consumption had been reduced to two and eight-tenths litres. Semi-local option laws gave communities the privilege of doing away with their public bars—except that two and one-half percent beer by volume was always permitted to be sold in restaurants and hotels with food. By 1920 over ninety percent of the country districts of Norway were dry. Of 637 country districts 595 were dry and but forty-two wet. Of sixty-four towns thirty were dry and thirty-four wet.

With the coming of the war, the quantity of spirits and beer made was greatly reduced on account of the shortage of grain. Finally on May 25, 1917, a law was passed giving the King power to decree against spirits and strong wines, and in October, 1919, a national referendum to prohibit all distilled spirits and wines of more than twelve percent alcohol was voted upon. On this referendum 489,017 voted in favor of prohibition and 304,673 against it. This was made a law in 1921.

AND NOW there enters into the picture, the wine countries and the wet interests of Southern Europe. France steps in first.

As far back as 1909, as the result of Norway's early prohibition gestures, France had quietly announced that unless French wine and spirits exports were left alone Norwegian bonds would be excluded from the French Bourse. This, for the moment, checked Norway's dry ambition and caused her to make a new trade agreement with France, fixing set import duties on wines and spirits. Then twelve years later came her temperance law prohibiting the importation or sale of all spirits and wines of over twelve percent alcohol. France immediately put the economic screws on little Norway.

As a result of this pressure Norway finally arranged definitely to import annually 400,000 litres of French spirits and brandies for scientific and medicinal use, and at the same time changed the twelve percent wine limit to wines of fourteen percent alcohol. The temperance advocates of Norway shook their heads but reasoned that it was necessary [Continued on page 126]

THE DAMYANKEE—proper noun, third person, sometimes feminine: term of designation, not of insult—comes to scoff, but remains to don heavier underwear. Forty above in the Delta feels like forty below anywhere else. Perhaps it is due to the dampness from the Father of Waters, backbone of the whole Delta country. Perhaps the lay of the land steers down the cold waves from Memphis, Tennessee; or steers up the Gulf storms from the region of New Awleens. Whatever be the explanation, however, fact it is that in winter the thermometer in the Delta says one thing, while one's epidermis is emphatically contradicting.

Then is the season that "sunny South" becomes as much of a misnomer as the erstwhile "sunny France." The bare trees hoist starkly up toward the shivery gray sky. The cotton fields, lately hidden under rotund bushes with their many puffy white bolls, look like stripped Christmas trees. Occasional stalks wave desolately here and there in the scalloped brown fields; and the telephone wires beside the paved "good road" keep up a very lonely "hum-m-m-m!"

Ann Brooke Caldwell yanked the long black touring car to a halt upon the graveled driveway before the old-fashioned white pillars, and thrust an impatient gauntleted hand down upon the horn button. Instantly all of the brown, flop-eared hounds in creation charged yelping around the corner of the spreading old house, and skidded to sudden halts at sight of the car. Nothing else rewarded her, however, unless one could count the smell of frying bacon from some one of the row of negro cabins, respectfully aligned behind the "big house."

Ann Brooke's mop of brown hair swung around impatiently. Ann Brooke's snapping brown eyes searched the pillared veranda, the worn pathways, the fenced enclosure. Then Ann Brooke's restive hand clamped down again upon the summoning button. Dutifully her attendants elevated their noses and their voices.

There came a rattle at one of the double white swinging doors. With exasperating slowness it began to edge open, and a round, kinky, bullet-head, with the white of one eye showing from a rich chocolate background, stuck out, turtle-fashion.

"Jupe!" snapped Ann Brooke.

"Yas'm!" Milk and honey were in the dulcet tones. They signified, without further utterance, that Jupe had been hastening, as fast as his paining feet would permit, since first her summons penetrated to him.

"Where's Mr. Noel?" shortly, impatiently.

"Mist' Noel?" Jupiter was pained that his memory contained no such name. Then, at a restless movement by Ann Brooke, "Oh! You means Mist' Falkner Noel. Does you mean, Miss Ann Brooke, you wants to see Mist' Falkner?" Genuine surprise showed in Jupe's tone.

"Jupe!"

"Yas'm, Miss Ann Brooke."

"Where—is—Mr.—Falkner—Noel? I mean the Mr. Falkner Noel that owns this plantation: the Mr. Falkner Noel that hires you: the only Mr. Falkner Noel that you know. Now—where is he?"

Subterfuge abandoned Jupe. "He—he huntin'."

"Hunting? Where?"

"Part'ige huntin'. Him 'n' de dawg lef' early dis mawnin'. Dey out in de sage patches. Sho' do seem funny, Miss Ann Brooke, to see you comin' out here to see Mist' Falkner ag'in."

"Never mind all that, Jupe. Any way of getting there in this car?" Ann Brooke Caldwell wanted what she wanted when she wanted it.

"Yas'm, 'spec' so. 'Spec' yo kin——"

"How do I get there?" treading down impatiently upon the starter. "Up that roadway?"

"Yas'm. He up in dere, 'longside de creek. He been shootin' la'k dey done foun' all de coveys o' birds in de whole Delta. But Lawd, hit's too col'——"

The philosophizings of Jupiter were wasting their sweetness upon the Delta air. A cloud of bluish-white smoke floated where the touring car had stood.

BUT JUPITER, averse as he was to aught that pertained of chill, remained to shake a commiserating woolly head.

"Lawd!" he speculated, eye upon the departing car. "Dis love bus'ness is sho' hell! Five years—an' den she comes back. Sweet Jordan!"

Jupe's promise was fulfilled. Ann Brooke skirted the cotton-fields, left the car, crossed a precarious bridge of laid saplings, to the sage patches on the creek bank. She was in luck. Ahead appeared a lean, khaki-clad figure. She called and the figure turned, stared, then whistled to an unseen dog.

Delta Country

There was something almost uncanny in the way that Falkner Noel covered the rough ground. One moment he was over there: the next, by her side. Tall, lean, tanned, his features might have been slashed out ruggedly by the broad strokes of a skilled artist. As he removed his battered, oddly becoming slouch hat, his dark eyes were curious.

"I want to talk to you, Falkner," Ann Brooke began without semblance of preface.

"That trail's pretty bad on tires, Ann Brooke," he observed with apparent irrelevance, breaking his shotgun and removing the shells.

"Darn tires! I didn't come 'way out here to talk about tires to you, Falkner," the girl cried in a tone of great decision.

"No-o-o. I suppose you wouldn't—any more—now—Ann Brooke." His voice was low.

"I've come from talking to Chancellor McCarden. He won't give me a divorce from you."

Falkner lifted startled eyes. His voice, however, was well under control. "A divorce? You haven't—haven't said anything about that to me, Ann Brooke."

"I know. I know I haven't. He says I'm not married to you."

"Not married . . . ? I—see. McCarden knows all about—?"

"Of course he does. He was Chancellor, then. Come on: get in the car. We can ride as we talk," she exclaimed.

"What can I do with Seth?"

"Put him up front with us, of course. I still like dogs."

"But he's plumb muddy—and pretty full of cockle-burrs."

"That's all right. Put him in. There—that's better."

There was a momentary backing and shifting of gears. Then the car began leaving a companion set of flat parallel lines in the rich black soil of the overgrown plantation trail: retracing the tortuous way to the white-pillared "big house;" on to the graveled driveway; roaring out upon the paved "good road."

"Falkner," she began abruptly, half turning toward him. "I'm tired of all this, just dead tired."

"Yes? Are you—Ann Brooke?"

"Yes, I am! I'm getting old, Falkner. You are, too. Why, you're nearly thirty!"

"I'm getting old, all right, Ann Brooke. But no one could accuse you of getting ancient. Why, your little face looks just like a child's."

"I'm the oldest girl in the younger set. And I'm tired, Falkner, of being treated like an engaged girl. I'm tired of having all the fellows rush me to tell me that life is blighted for them. I'm tired of seeing the old hens smile knowingly at one another if chance throws you and me together at a dance. And—and I'm tired, Falkner, of seeing the flappers look at me sort of—sort of—defiant-like if you happen to take one of them off to sit out an intermission at a dance. I—I'm sick of it—all—Falkner." There was no mistaking the misery in the fresh young voice.

FALKNER'S arm started to answer. Then it remembered. "I'm sorry—little Ann Brooke. I'd give anything if things hadn't—if things weren't as they are. But let's not go over it all again. I'm sick of it. I know you are, too. You can't change. I can't. You had your say, 'way back yonder, that morning when my leg was broken. There's nothing I can do, now, to help matters any."

"There is, Falkner. That's why I came this morning. You ought to know I didn't come just—just calling," bitterly.

"You did—once—Ann Brooke," very quietly. Unobservedly he leaned back in the cushioned seat to watch her. Again swept over him the invariable rush of conflicting emotions.

Why was it, he questioned soberly, that in a land where beautiful women are proverbial, none of the others could make him feel this way? Why couldn't he have gone on ahead and have married some little pink-and-white thing, to settle down to domestic complacency, being adored, the rest of his days? This girl, this high-willed girl, could make him miserable just by the sheer fittingness of her: by the clear-cut, delicate way her profile stood out from a velvet background; by the little curves about her lips; by the whimsical flash of understanding in her wide, brown eyes. If he had never seen Ann Brooke Caldwell, he might have been satisfied with someone else. Now, he knew he never could be. Nor could he remember a time when he had not felt this way about her.

"No," he roused himself to reply. "I don't suppose you did come, just calling. Not . . . any more . . . now . . ."

Ann Brooke changed tactics. "Recognize this road, Falkner?"

"Certainly. It's the river road from town. Why?"

"Nothing. Noth-ing. It has changed a lot in the last ten years or so, hasn't it, Falkner?" Ann Brooke bent toward him. A soft note was in her voice: the music of springtime; of honeysuckle, and of birds. Falkner braced himself.

"Yes, I recognize it," he answered shortly; then, deliberately misunderstanding: "That bridge over there—the concrete one—used to be wooden. I got stuck one day, hunting rabbits, about half a mile down the creek. Going around a brier patch, and got into a quicksand."

ANN BROOKE'S white teeth closed upon a red lip. "That—that wasn't what I meant, Falkner," she said softly. "I was remembering further back than—that."

Falkner held to a safe silence.

"What's the matter with you, Falkner?" she queried, bending upon him the full power of one soft, brown eye. "Don't you remember, too?"

"Yes, I remember." His tone was harsh and out of sympathy.

"I mean—this river road—long ago."

"Of course. It isn't the sort of thing a fellow can forget."

His thoughts echoed his words. Yes, he remembered—all of it. That was the trouble. He remembered too well. A decade or so could make little difference.

Then—a dozen years ago—those same "old hens" that today smiled knowingly when chance threw the two together at a dance, had smiled tolerantly upon young Ann Brooke Caldwell and Falkner Noel. It had been youth, they had agreed: sheer youth in its pre-springtime. But the two, Delta boy and Delta girl, knew: as only youth can know in the Delta—where the mating is done early.

Yet—even for the Delta—they had been ridiculously young when they had eloped: really eloped, in all seriousness. Major Caldwell and Falkner's widowed mother had discovered and had raced behind them to catch them before they could cross the river and the state line. Somehow the youngsters had kept ahead long enough to secure, with much perjury and argument, a long paper with "Marriage License" in large letters at the top, and an official looking seal at the bottom. The waggly beard of the Justice of the Peace was pronouncing them man and wife as Major Caldwell finished his first sprint since the panic of '93 and landed in their midst.

From his remarks that ensued one could infer that he did not entirely approve. Among other of the unpleasanties was that he—both sets of parents, sir!—were going straight into court and have that—that damfoolery annulled because they were both minors.

Whereupon, harkening, Ann Brooke and Falkner swore eternal constancy. No matter what their parents and all the rest of the world might do, they were going to remain steadfast. Their own act had married them. No one else—nothing else—could make any difference. They would hold to that.

The Major tired before they did. He had never played the stern parent; and it was too late for him to begin. Ann Brooke had had her own way since babyhood, and she could be very obdurate when she wanted. Major Caldwell tried storming; tried ignoring her; tried reasoning; tried bribes—tried everything that his fertile old brain could devise. Then he capitulated, and brought them together for a solemn conference.

C Ann Brooke crossed a precarious bridge of saplings, and called to a khaki-clad figure. There was something uncanny in the way Falkner Noel covered the ground.

If they would wait till they were grown, he proposed, he would agree not to raise any objection then if they still wanted to marry. His protest—his only one, he wished to assure them—was because of their extreme youth.

"But, Daddy!" protested earnestly Ann Brooke-the-stubborn. "You talk like we aren't married already. We are. What you all did doesn't change anything. It would take something we did to wipe it out! No one else could do that."

All right, then, hastily interposed the war-wearied pacifist, they could consider it that way if it suited them better. Only, let them give him their word to wait till Ann Brooke was eighteen, anyhow; then, if they were still as sure, go through with another ceremony. Oh, of course—hastily—of course it was useless; but just to humor an old man's whim. Would they?

"We know—that we care," gravely considered Ann Brooke, her eyes round and serious. "And we know—that we aren't going to change. It's a long time—but we're sure. How about it, Falkner? Shall we promise?"

The lad, clear-eyed, nodded. "We promise, sir."

Two years later, Falkner's mother died. His world began to turn topsy-turvy. He had thought their finances plentifully taken care of. Rudely awakened, when the estate was settled he found himself with only a thousand or so in cash and one old plantation that had not been cultivated in years.

Hobson's choice was forced upon him to recoup his fortunes: to revive the days of the overseer: to hire as many families of "hands" as he could afford: plant his own crop: harvest it, and win or lose. Action followed resolution.

His days were soon filled to the brim. The contract of employment of the "hands" called for "kin to kaint"; and from the time that they could be induced to admit they "kin see" till they contended earnestly, "Lawd, Mist' Falkner, hit's dusk dark ri't now," he kept them at it.

His first crop was full, in spite of his inexperience, at a time of top-notch prices. His second did nearly as well. The third was promising to ring wedding bells for them soon when his horse slipped and Falkner acquired an entirely unwelcome broken leg.

Ann Brooke was entertaining at a club luncheon when she heard. Without comment she set down a dish of macaroons and began packing a suitcase.

"SEND MY trunk," she announced to the protesting Major Caldwell, and to the assemblage at large, "out to me at my husband's. Don't look so scandalized, Daddy: we'll have performed that fool ceremony you insisted on. And we'll receive you all as soon as Falkner's well enough."

The individual referred to, when she arrived, was giving Jupe the fidgets. Jupe was accustomed to the luxurious policy of let-well-enough-alone—and the sudden change was hard.

Ann Brooke cast a quick look around as she entered. The room was not badly furnished. But it showed—things, to her woman's eye. The sight gave her a little tug at the heart.

"Hello, bridegroom!" she greeted with a gaiety she was far from feeling. "Did you know you are about to be married some more?"

"Can't let you do anything of the sort!" Falkner and the broken leg retorted.

"Of course not," Ann Brooke palliated. "You're right. What I meant was go through with that other ceremony. We're already married."

"No place down here for a woman to be. Specially, not for you. No, can't let you do it." Falkner's voice came through set teeth. A compound fracture is not conducive to easier speech.

"But you need me now, honey—you need me now. I want to help with the struggle, Falkner; not when you've done it all alone."

Ann Brooke's earnest little face bent close, pleading. Falkner shut tight his eyes upon the tempting vision.

"I—can't—honey," he groaned. "I want you: you know how I want you. But I mustn't let myself let you. No!"

Ann Brooke—the self-willed came to the surface in one hot flash. "I never had to force my attentions," she blazed. "Is that your last word?"

There was nothing of pretense in Falkner's groan of dismay. "Honey! Oh, hon-ey: don't use that tone to me. I—you know I—"

"Wait—Falkner. I want you to realize that what you say is going to be final. Now: go on and say it!"

He paused. Then, "I—I can't let you do it. I—just—can't!"

She turned and left abruptly. It was six months before he saw her again.

So had it begun. Each had thought it only a sudden flurry of love: soon to blow over again. High will met high will squarely—and neither yielded. They met coolly. Days edged into weeks—into months—insensibly into years. They spoke casually, of everything but what they were thinking about when they met.

FALKNER returned with a start to the present, and to the car in the chill of the river road. No, he had not forgotten. Nor was he likely to.

"Of course I remember," he repeated. "It isn't the sort of thing that one can forget."

"I'm tired of this—Falkner. I want to put an end to it—to be free again. I want to feel loose from it all again: not to have a guilty twinge of conscience if I receive attentions. I want to feel free to encourage the man, if he chances along."

Determinedly Falkner's face held its unemotional mask. "Why consult me?" he demanded shortly: tone striving to hide the sting beneath.

"I made myself believe—I told you—I convinced even Daddy, that we were really still married. I've made myself believe it for ten years. And now that I want to quit, I can't."

I know I sound foolish. But what's the use of trying to be logical when you feel it's all wrong?"

"I think, Ann Brooke, I can understand," the man said slowly.

"I tried to explain all that to Chancellor McCarden. He could grant me a divorce so I'd feel all right about it. But he wouldn't see—just wouldn't! Even tried what he called 'reasoning' with me."

"He did?"

"Insisted on quoting foolish Latin phrases that he said meant that an existing marriage would be the first thing I'd have to prove to get a divorce. He couldn't seem to understand, Falkner, that to me, we've always seemed really married since that day, across the river. I never could feel free until I got a divorce, myself. And I can't get one, he says, until I am legally as married as I feel. Do you see?"

"I understand what you are saying. But what have I to do with that?"

"That's what I want with you," eagerly. "I want you to marry me—"

"Marry you?" His tone was wooden but his heart leaped.

"So I can get a divorce."

"I don't get the idea, Ann Brooke." High on each cheekbone came a flush, with a queer dangerous narrowing of Falkner Noel's eyes.

C "But, Falkner! There'll be papers to sign! Where'll you be?" Ann Brooke cried to her very new husband. "You said you were tired of it all," he said savagely. "I am too—God knows I am."

"Chancellor McCarden says I can't have a divorce if you aren't legally married to me. It doesn't matter. Just stand up and have someone mumble a few words. Then you can go your way and I'll go mine. And I can get freed from you."

The flush mounted higher into Falkner's cheeks. His eyes gleamed through narrow slits. "Freed—from—me?" he half-questioned. "You—want—to get rid of me! I—so you feel that way about it, do you, Ann Brooke?"

The girl nodded. "I'm tired of this way of living, Falkner," she said simply. "I want to end it. It—it's—hell." She leaned across for his answer.

It came softly; too quietly: "All right, I agree. May I make one stipulation, though?" Something in his voice warned.

"Surely. What is it?"

"Let me name the time of day. It occurs to me that I should like to be married at four in the afternoon."

"At four in the afternoon?" Ann Brooke was frankly puzzled. "We can, of course. But why?"

Abruptly came his reply. "The day for Memphis, Tennessee, leaves at four-thirty. The ceremony should be over within fifteen minutes. The bride won't be troubled long after the ceremony, with her bridegroom. Now drive me home!"

AND THEY went through with it. Ann Brooke Caldwell and Falkner Noel walked into the minister's study. The minister's wife and an errant visitor were impressed as witnesses. Once more the two stood, very straight and very pale, while the familiar words were being said over them.

Falkner's thoughts were far from the mumbled formula, busy with bitter might-have-beens. It was—all—so different from what it should and might have been. [Continued on page 107]

C. This prophet in Utopia had died very painfully, but not upon the cross. He had been tortured in some way and then been fastened upon a slowly turning wheel until he died. There flashed upon Mr. Barnstaple a picture of a solitary looking, pale-faced figure, beaten and bleeding in the midst of a jostling sun-bit crowd which filled a narrow high-walled street.

the Opening
Chapters*

Illustrated by George W. Bellows

MR. BARNSTAPLE needed a vacation. He wanted badly to get away from his family to some place where he could think of its various members with pride and affection, and otherwise not be disturbed by them. And he needed to get away for a time from Mr. Peeve, his chief, the gloomy editor of the Liberal, that organ of the most depressing aspects of advanced thought. Mr. Barnstaple's tendency was toward a modest hopefulness and a belief in progress. But he had got to the point where he was ceasing to secrete hope and for such types as he, hope is the essential solvent without which there is no digesting life.

With great adroitness he managed his affairs so that he could slip away from home in his little yellow car—his family called it the Yellow Peril—and started Londonward. He was scared but elated by what he was doing. He sent his wife a letter explaining that his physician had ordered an immediate holiday; that he would wander "northwards," and would not bother to write—no news would be good news.

Hope had already returned. He was on the way out of things. Driving along happily he was a little way out of Slough when he was passed by two enormous touring cars not far apart. They swept around a curve and when Mr. Barnstaple took the turn a few seconds later the long stretch of road showed no sign of them—they had mysteriously disappeared. Then suddenly his car struck something and skidded so violently that he seemed to twist around toward the right, and when he finally stopped the car in profound astonishment he was on an entirely different road in strange surroundings. But one of the big touring cars that had passed him was standing in the roadway. One of the men in the big car addressed Mr. Barnstaple: "Can you tell me at all, sir, where we are?"

"Five minutes ago," said Mr. Barnstaple, "I should have said we were on Maidenhead Road."

Mr. Barnstaple had recognized the speaker as Mr. Cecil Burleigh, the great Conservative leader. Then he met the other members of the party. Lady Stella, a beautiful society girl, who was thrilled with the whole adventure; Mr. Rupert Catskill, Secretary of State for War; Father Amerton, who was well known in the pulpit for his tirades against society, and Freddy Mush, Mr. Catskill's secretary.

Suddenly Mr. Barnstaple discovered a burning house and as the party moved toward it they came on two dead bodies—a man and a woman, surrounded by the wreckage of some sort of scientific apparatus. Both were naked and of extraordinary beauty of face and form.

"These are no earthly people," said Mr. Burleigh. "Manifestly we are not on earth. This is not our world. It is something very wonderful indeed. It is Utopia! But it must be related to our world or maybe we are in some other dimension of space from those we wot of. And as I do not see any immediate way out I suppose the thing to do is to make the best of it."

In the midst of their excitement the whole party suddenly became aware of two stark Apollos standing nearby.

"Red Gods!" exclaimed one of the Utopians. "What things are you? And how did you get into the world? And what do you know of the death of Arden and Greenlake?" (English! They spoke modern English!)

Mr. Burleigh told them in Parliamentary English all he knew of how they had come to be there, and of how they had just found the bodies. The two Utopians then made preparations to conduct the Earthlings in airplanes to a place where they were taken care of with refreshment and lodging by young men and women as scantily clad and as beautifully formed as the two dead experimentalists.

Then they all repaired to the Conference Hall where the fate of the Earthlings was to be decided.

CL The Story Continues:

THE INCREDIBLE conference between our Earthlings and the Utopians began. It was opened by the man named Serpentine, and he stood before his audience and seemed to make a speech. His lips moved, his hands assisted his statements; his expression followed his utterance. And yet Mr. Barnstaple had the most subtle and indefensible doubt whether indeed Serpentine was speaking. There was something odd about the whole thing. Sometimes the thing said sounded with a peculiar resonance in his head; sometimes it was indistinct and elusive like an object seen through troubled waters; sometimes, though Serpentine still moved his fine hands and looked toward his hearers, there were gaps of absolute silence—as if for brief intervals Mr. Barnstaple had gone deaf. . . . Yet it was a discourse; it held together and it held Mr. Barnstaple's complete attention.

"It had long been known," Serpentine began, "that the possible number of dimensions, like the possible number of anything else that could be enumerated, was unlimited!"

Yes, Mr. Barnstaple had got that, but it proved too much for Mr. Freddy Mush.

"Oh, Lord!" he said, "Dimensions!" and dropped his eye-glass and became despondently inattentive.

"For the most practical purposes," Serpentine continued, "the particular universe, the particular system of events, in which we found ourselves and of which we formed part, could be regarded as occurring in a space of three rectilinear dimensions, and as undergoing translation, which translation was in fact duration, through a fourth dimension, time. Such a system of events was necessarily a gravitational system."

"Er!" said Mr. Burleigh sharply. "Excuse me! I don't quite see that."

So he, at any rate, was following it too.

"Any universe that endures must necessarily gravitate," Serpentine repeated, as if he were asserting some self-evident fact.

"For the life of me I can't see that," said Mr. Burleigh, after a moment's reflection.

Serpentine considered him for a moment. "It is so," he said, and went on with his discourse. "Our minds," he continued, "had been evolved in the form of this practical conception of things, they accepted it as true and it was only by great efforts of sustained analysis that we were able to realize that this universe in which we lived not only extended but was, as it were, slightly bent and contorted into a number of other long unsuspected spatial dimensions. It extended beyond its three chief spatial dimensions into these others just as a thin sheet of paper, which is practically two dimensional, extended not only by virtue of its thickness but also of its crinkles and curvatures into another—a third dimension."

"Am I going deaf?" asked Lady Stella in a stage whisper. "I can't catch a word of all this."

"Nor I," said Father Amerton.

Mr. Burleigh made a pacifying gesture toward these unfortunates without taking his eyes off Serpentine's face. Mr. Barnstaple knitted his brows, clasped his knees, knotted his fingers, held on desperately.

He must be hearing—of course he was hearing!

Serpentine proceeded to explain that just as it would be possible for any number of practically two dimensional universes to lie side by side, like sheets of paper, in a three-dimensional space, so in the many dimensional spaces about which the ill-equipped human mind is still slowly and painfully acquiring knowledge, it is possible for an innumerable quantity of practically three-dimensional universes to lie, as it were, side by side and to undergo a roughly parallel movement through time. The speculative work of Lonestone and Cephalus had long since given the soundest basis for the belief that there actually were a very great number of such space-and-time universes parallel to one another and resembling each other, nearly but not exactly, much as the leaves of paper might resemble one another. All of them would have duration, all of them would be gravitating systems—(Mr. Burleigh shook his head to show that still he didn't see it.)—and those lying closest together would most nearly resemble each other. How closely they now had an opportunity of learning. For the daring attempts of those two great geniuses, Arden and Greenlake, to use the—(inaudible)—thrust of the atom to rotate a portion of the Utopian material universe in that dimension, the F dimension, into which it had long been known to extend for perhaps the length of a man's arm, to rotate this fragment of Utopian matter, much as a gate is swung on its hinges, had manifestly been altogether successful. The gate had swung back again bringing with it a breath of close air, a storm of dust and, to the immense amazement of Utopia, three sets of visitors from an unknown world.

"Three?" whispered Mr. Barnstaple, doubtfully. "Did he say three sets of visitors?"

Serpentine disregarded him.

OUR BROTHER and sister have been killed by some unexpected release of force, but their experiment has opened a way that now need never be closed again, out of the present spatial limitations of Utopia into a whole vast folio of hitherto unimagined worlds. Close at hand to us, even as Lonestone guessed ages ago, nearer to us, as he put it, than the blood in our hearts, we discover another planet, much the same size as ours to judge by the scale of its inhabitants, circulating, we may certainly assume, round a sun like that in our skies, a planet bearing life and being slowly subjugated, even as our own is being subjugated, by intelligent life which has evidently evolved under almost exactly parallel conditions to those of our own evolution. This sister universe to ours is, so far as we may judge by appearances, a little retarded in time in relation to our own. Our visitors wear something very like the clothing and display physical characteristics resembling those of our ancestors during the last Age of Confusion. . . .

"We are eager to learn from you Earthlings, to check our history, which is still very imperfectly known, by your experiences, to show you what we know, to make out what may be possible and desirable in intercourse and help between the people of your planet and ours. We, here, are the merest beginners in knowledge; we have learned as yet scarcely anything more than the immensity of the things that we have yet to learn and do.

"Possibly there are streaks of heredity in your planet that have failed to develop or that have died out in ours. Possibly there are elements or minerals in one world that are rare or wanting in the other. . . . The structure of your atoms—(inaudible)—our worlds may intermarry—(inaudible)—to their common and desirable invigoration."

He passed into the inaudible just when Mr. Barnstaple was most moved and most eager to follow what he was saying. Yet a deaf man would have judged he was still speaking.

"Such," said Serpentine, abruptly becoming audible again, "is our first rough interpretation of your appearance in our world and of the possibilities of our interaction. I have put our ideas before you as plainly as I can. I would suggest that now one of you tell us simply and plainly what you conceive to be the truth about your world in relation to ours."

Came a pause. The Earthlings looked at one another and their gaze seemed to converge upon Mr. Cecil Burleigh. That statesman feigned to be unaware of the general expectation. "Rupert," he said. "Won't you?"

"I reserve my comments," said Mr. Catskill.

"Father Amerton, you are accustomed to treat of other worlds," he said turning to the priest.

"Not in your presence, Mr. Cecil. No," Father Amerton said. "But what am I to tell them?"

"What you think of it," said Mr. Barnstaple.

"Exactly," said Mr. Catskill. "Tell them what you think of it, Cecil."

No one else appeared to be worthy of consideration. Mr. Burleigh rose slowly and walked thoughtfully to the center of the semicircle. He grasped his coat lapels and remained for some moments with face downcast as if considering what he was about to say. "Mr. Serpentine," he began at last, raising a candid countenance and regarding the blue sky above the distant lake through his glasses. "Ladies and Gentlemen—"

He was going to make a speech! As though he were at a Primrose League garden-party. It was preposterous and yet, what else was there to be done?

I MUST confess, sir, that although I am by no means a novice at public speaking, I find myself on this occasion somewhat at a loss. Your admirable discourse, sir, simple, direct, lucid, compact, and rising at times to passages of unaffected eloquence, has set me a pattern that I would fain follow—and before which, in all modesty, I quail. You ask me to tell you as plainly and clearly as possible the outline facts as we conceive them about this kindred world out of which with so little premeditation we have come to you. So far as my poor powers of understanding or discussing such recondite matters go, I do not think I can better or indeed supplement in any way your marvelous exposition of the mathematical aspects of the case. What you have told us embodies the latest, finest thoughts of terrestrial science and goes, indeed, far beyond our current ideas. On certain matters in, for example, the relationship of time and gravitation, I feel bound to admit that I do not go with you, but that is rather a failure to understand your position than any positive dissent.

"Upon the broader aspects of the case there need be no difficulties between us. We accept your main propositions unreservedly; namely, that we conceive ourselves to be living in a parallel universe to yours, on a planet the very brother of your own, indeed quite amazingly like yours, having regard to all the possible contrasts we might have found here. We are attracted and strongly disposed to accept your view that our system is, in all probability, a little less seasoned and mellowed by the touch of time than yours, short perhaps by some hundreds or some thousands of years of your experiences. Assuming this, it is inevitable, sir, that a certain humility should mingle in our attitude toward you. As your juniors it becomes us not to instruct but to learn. It is for us to ask, What have you done? To what have you reached? rather than to display to you with an artless arrogance all that still remains for us to learn and do."

"No!" said Mr. Barnstaple to himself but half audibly; "This is a dream. . . ."

He rubbed his knuckles into his eyes and opened them again, and there he was still sitting next to Mr. Mush in the midst of these Olympian divinities. And Mr. Burleigh, that polished skeptic, who never believed, who was never astonished, was leaning forward on his toes and speaking, speaking, with the assurance of a man who has made ten thousand speeches.

IN HIS halting, parliamentary way, Mr. Burleigh was giving Utopia a brief account of the world of men, seeking to be elementary and lucid and reasonable, telling them of states and empires, of wars and the Great War, of economic organization and disorganization, of revolutions and Bolshevism, of the terrible Russian famine that was beginning, of the difficulties of finding honest statesmen and officials, and of the unhelpfulness of newspapers, of all the dark and troubled spectacle of human life. Serpentine had used the term, "the Last Age of Confusion," and Mr. Burleigh had seized upon the phrase and was making much of it.

It was a great oratorical impromptu. It must have gone on for an hour, and the Utopians listened with keen, attentive faces, now and then nodding their acceptance and recognition of this statement or that. "Very like," would come tapping into Mr. Barnstaple's brain, "with us also—in the Age of Confusion."

At last Mr. Burleigh, with the steady deliberation of an old parliamentary hand, drew to his end. Compliments.

He bowed. He had done. Mr. Mush startled everyone by a vigorous hand-clapping.

The tension in Mr. Barnstaple's mind had become intolerable. He leaped to his feet.

He stood up, making those weak propitiatory gestures that come so naturally to the inexperienced speaker. "Ladies and

C In his halting parliamentary manner Mr. Burleigh was giving these Utopians—these people who looked like Greek gods and goddesses—an account of the world of men, telling them of empires and wars and Bolshevism and of the terrible Russian famine, of the difficulty of finding honest statesmen and officials—of all the dark and troubled spectacle of human life.

gentlemen," he said. "Utopians, Mr. Burleigh! I crave your pardon for a moment. There is a little matter. Urgent."

For a brief interval he was speechless.

Then he found attention and encouragement in the eye of Urthred.

"Something I don't understand. Something incredible—I mean, incompatible. The little rift—turns everything into a fantastic phantasmagoria."

The intelligence in Urthred's eye was very encouraging. Mr. Barnstaple abandoned any attempt to address the company as a whole, and spoke directly to Urthred.

"You live in Utopia, hundreds of thousands of years in advance of us. How is it that you are able to talk contemporary English, to use exactly the same language that we do? I ask you, how is that? It is incredible. It jars. It makes a dream of you. And yet you are not a dream? It makes me feel—almost—insane."

Urthred smiled pleasantly. "We don't speak English," he said.

Mr. Barnstaple felt the ground slipping from under his feet. "But I hear you speaking English," he said.

"Nevertheless, we do not speak it," said Urthred.

He smiled still more broadly. "We don't—for ordinary purposes—speak anything."

MR. BARNSTAPLE, with his brain resigning its functions, maintained his pose of deferential attention.

"Ages ago," Urthred continued, "we certainly used to speak languages. We made sounds and we heard sounds. People used to think, and then chose and arranged words and uttered them. The hearer heard, noted, and retranslated the sounds into ideas. Then, in some manner which we still do not understand perfectly, people began to get the idea before it was clothed in words and uttered in sounds. They began to hear in their minds, as soon as the speaker had arranged his ideas and before he put them into word symbols even in his own mind. They knew what he was going to say before he said it. This direct transmission presently became common; it was found out that with a little effort most people could get over to each other in this fashion to some extent the thoughts they had, and the new mode of communication was developed systematically.

"That is what we do now habitually in this world. We think directly to each other. We determine to convey the thought and it is conveyed at once—provided the distance is not too great. We use sounds in this world now only for poetry and pleasure and in moments of emotion or to shout at a distance, or with animals, not for the transmission of ideas from human mind to kindred human mind any more. When I think to you, the thought, so far as it finds corresponding ideas and suitable words in your mind, is reflected in your mind. My thought clothes itself in words in your mind—which words you seem to hear—and naturally enough in your own language and your own habitual phrases. Very probably the members of your party are hearing what I am saying to you, each with his own individual difference of vocabulary and phrasing."

Mr. Barnstaple had been punctuating this discourse with sharp, intelligent nods, coming now and then to the verge of interruption. Now he broke out with, "And that is why occasionally—as for instance when Mr. Serpentine made his wonderful explanation just now—when you soar into ideas of which we haven't even a shadow in our minds, we just hear nothing at all and think you are silent."

"Are there such gaps?" asked Urthred.

"Many, I fear—for all of us," said Mr. Burleigh.

"It's like being deaf in spots," said Lady Stella. "Large spots."

Father Amerton nodded agreement.

"And that is why we cannot be clear whether you are called Urthred or Adam, and why I have found myself confusing Arden and Greenlake and Forest in my mind."

"I hope that now you are mentally at your ease?" said Urthred.

"Oh, quite," said Mr. Barnstaple. "Quite. And all things considered, it is really very convenient for us that there should be this method of transmission. For otherwise I do not see how we could have avoided weeks of linguistic bother before we could have got to anything like our present understanding."

"A very good point indeed," said Mr. Burleigh, turning round to Mr. Barnstaple in a very friendly way. "A very good point indeed. I should never have noted it if you had not called my attention to it. It is quite extraordinary; I had not noted anything of this—this difference. I was occupied, I am bound to confess, by my own thoughts. I supposed they were speaking English. Took it for granted."

It seemed to Mr. Barnstaple that this wonderful experience was now so wonderfully complete that there remained nothing more to wonder at except its absolute credibility. He sat in this beautiful little building looking out upon dreamland flowers. He listened and occasionally participated in the long, informal conversation that now ensued. It was a discussion that brought to light the most amazing and fundamental differences of moral and social outlook. Yet everything had now assumed a reality that made it altogether natural to suppose that he would presently go home to write about it in the Liberal and tell his wife, as much as might seem advisable at the time, about the manners and customs of this hitherto undiscovered world.

Presently two pretty young girls made tea at an equipage among the rhododendrons and brought it round to people. Tea! It was what we should call China Tea, very delicate, and served in little cups without handles, Chinese fashion, but it was real and very refreshing tea.

The earlier curiosities of the Earthlings turned upon methods of government. This was perhaps natural in the presence of two such statesmen as Mr. Burleigh and Mr. Catskill.

"What form of government do you have?" asked Mr. Burleigh. "Is it a monarchy or an autocracy or a pure democracy? Do you separate the executive and the legislative? And is there one central government for all your planet or are there several governing centers?"

It was conveyed to Mr. Burleigh and his companions with some difficulty that there was no central government in Utopia at all. "But surely," said Mr. Burleigh, "there is someone or something, some council or bureau or what not, somewhere, with which the final decision rests in cases of collective action for the common welfare. Some ultimate seat and organ of sovereignty, it seems to me, there must be."

No, the Utopians declared, there was no such concentration of authority in their world. In the past there had been, but it had long since diffused back into the general body of the community. Decisions in regard to any particular matter were made by the people who knew most about that matter.

"But suppose it is a decision that has to be generally observed? A rule affecting the public health for example? Who would enforce it?"

"It would not need to be enforced. Why should it?"

"But suppose someone refused to obey your regulation?"

WE SHOULD inquire why he or she did not conform. There might be some exceptional reason."

"But failing that?"

"We should make an inquiry into his mental and moral health."

"The mind doctor takes the place of the policeman," said Mr. Burleigh.

"I should prefer the policeman," said Mr. Rupert Catskill.

"You would, Rupert," said Mr. Burleigh.

"Then do you mean to say," he continued, addressing the Utopians with an expression of great intelligence, "that your affairs are all managed by special bodies or organizations—one scarcely knows what to call them—without any coördination of their activities?"

"The activities of our world," said Urthred, "are all coördinated to secure the general freedom. We have a number of intelligences directed to the general psychology of the race and to the interaction of one collective function upon another."

"Well, isn't that group of intelligences a governing class?" said Mr. Burleigh.

"Not in the sense that they exercise any arbitrary will," said Urthred. "They deal with general relations, that is all. But they rank no higher, they have no more precedence on that account than a philosopher has over a scientific specialist."

"This is a republic indeed!" said Mr. Burleigh. "But how it works and how it came about I cannot imagine. Your state is probably a highly socialistic one."

"You live still in a world in which nearly everything except the air, the high roads, the high seas is privately owned."

"We do," said Mr. Catskill. "Owned—and competed for."

"We have been through that stage. We found at last that private property in all but very personal things was an intolerable nuisance to mankind. We got rid of it. An artist or a scientific man has complete control of all the material he needs, we all own our tools and appliances and have rooms and places of our own, but there is no property for trade or speculation. All this militant property, this property of maneuver, has been quite got rid of. But how we got rid of it is a long story. It was not done in a few years. The exaggeration of private property was an entirely natural and necessary stage in the development of ¶ Presently two pretty young girls made tea for the Earthlings at an equipage surrounded by rhododendrons. It seemed to Mr. Barnstable that this whole wonderful experience was now so complete that there remained nothing more to wonder at except its credibility. It seemed natural to suppose that he would presently go home, and tell his wife, as much as seemed advisable, about the manners of this world.

human nature. It led at last to monstrous results but it was only through these monstrous and catastrophic results that men learned the need and nature of the limitation of private property."

The conversation continued desultory in form and yet the exchange of ideas was rapid and effective. Quite soon, as it seemed to Mr. Barnstaple, an outline of the history of Utopia from the Last Age of Confusion onward shaped itself in his mind.

The more he learned of that Last Age of Confusion the more it seemed to resemble the present times on earth. In those days the Utopians had worn abundant clothing and lived in towns quite after the earthly fashion. A fortunate conspiracy of accidents rather than any set design had opened for them some centuries of opportunity and expansion. Climatic phases and political changes had smiled upon the race after a long period of recurrent shortage, pestilence and destructive warfare. There had been an enormous increase in real wealth and in leisure and liberty. Many thousands of people were lifted out of the normal squalor of human life to positions in which they could, if they chose, think and act with unprecedented freedom.

A FEW, a sufficient few, did. A vigorous development of scientific inquiry began and, trailing after it a multitude of ingenious inventions, produced a great enlargement of practical human power. In a couple of brief centuries the Utopians, who had hitherto crawled about their planet like sluggish ants or traveled parasitically on larger and swifter animals, found themselves able to fly swiftly or speak instantaneously to any other point on the planet. They found themselves, too, in possession of mechanical power on a scale beyond all previous experience, and not simply of mechanical power; physiological and then psychological science followed in the wake of physics and chemistry, and extraordinary possibilities of control over his own body and over his social life dawned upon the Utopian. But these things came, when at last they did come, so rapidly and confusingly, that it was only a small minority of people who realized the possibilities, as distinguished from the concrete achievements, of this tremendous expansion of knowledge. The rest took the novel inventions as they came, haphazard, with as little adjustment as possible of their thoughts and ways of living to the new necessities these novelties implied.

The first response of the general population of Utopia to the prospect of power, leisure and freedom thus opened out to it, was proliferation. It behaved just as senselessly and mechanically as any other animal or vegetable species would have done. It bred until it had completely swamped the ampler opportunity that had opened before it. It spent the great gifts of science as rapidly as it got them in a mere insensate multiplication of the common life. At one time in the Last Age of Confusion the population of Utopia had mounted to over two thousand million. . . .

"But what is it now?" asked Mr. Burleigh.

About two hundred and fifty million, the Utopians told him. That had been the maximum population that could live a fully developed life upon the surface of Utopia. But now with increasing resources the population was being increased.

A gasp of horror came from Father Amerton. He had been dreading this realization for some time. It struck at his moral foundations. "And you dare regulate increase! You control it! Your women consent to bear children as they are needed—or refrain!"

"Of course," said Urthred. "Why not?"

"I feared as much," said Father Amerton, and leaning forward he covered his face with his hands murmuring, "I felt this in the air. The human stud farm! Refusing to create souls! The wickedness of it! Oh, my God!"

MR. BURLEIGH regarded the emotion of the reverend gentleman through his glasses with a slightly shocked expression. He detested catch words. But Father Amerton stood for very valuable conservative elements in the community. Mr. Burleigh turned to the Utopian again. "That is extremely interesting," he said. "Even at present our earth contrives to carry a population of at least five times that amount."

"But twenty millions or so will starve this winter, you told us a little while ago—in a place called Russia. And only a very small proportion of the rest are leading what even you would call full and spacious lives."

"Nevertheless, the contrast is very striking," said Mr. Burleigh.

"It is terrible!" said Father Amerton.

The overcrowding of the planet in the Last Age of Confusion was, these Utopians insisted, the fundamental evil out of which all the others that afflicted the race arose. An overwhelming flood of newcomers poured into the world and swamped every effort the intelligent minority could make to educate a sufficient proportion of them to meet the demands of the new and still rapidly changing conditions of life.

And the intelligent minority was not itself in any position to control the racial destiny. These great masses of population that had been blundered into existence, swayed by damaged and decaying traditions and amenable to the crudest suggestions, were the natural prey and support of every adventurer with a mind blatant enough to appeal to them.

Upon this festering, excessive mass of population, disasters descended at last like wasps upon a heap of rotting fruit. It was its natural, inevitable destiny. A war that affected nearly the whole planet, dislocated its flimsy financial system and most of its economic machinery beyond any possibility of repair. Civil wars and clumsily conceived attempts at social revolution continued the disorganization. A series of bad years accentuated the general shortage. The exploiting adventurers, too stupid to realize what had happened, continued to cheat and hoodwink the commonalty and burke any rally of honest men, as wasps will continue to eat even after their bodies have been cut away. The effort to make passed out of Utopian life, triumphantly superseded by the effort to get. Production dwindled down toward the vanishing point. Accumulated wealth vanished. An overwhelming system of debt, a swarm of debtors, morally incapable of helpful renunciation, crushed out all fresh initiative.

The long diastole in Utopian affairs that had begun with the great discoveries, passed into a phase of rapid systole. What plenty and pleasure was still possible in the world was filched all the more greedily by the adventurers of finance and speculative business. Organized science had long since been commercialized, and was "applied" now chiefly to a hunt for profitable patents and the forestalling of necessary supplies.

The neglected lamp of pure science waned, flickered and seemed likely to go out again altogether, leaving Utopia in the beginning of a new series of Dark Ages like those before the age of discovery began. . . .

"It is really very like a gloomy diagnosis of our own outlook," said Mr. Burleigh. "Extraordinarily like. How Dean Inge would have enjoyed all this!"

"To an infidel of his stamp, no doubt, it would seem most enjoyable," said Father Amerton, a little incoherently.

These comments annoyed Mr. Barnstaple, who was urgent to hear more.

"And then," he said to Urthred, "what happened?"

WHAT HAPPENED, Mr. Barnstaple gathered, was a deliberate change in Utopian thought. A growing number of people were coming to understand that amidst the powerful and easily released forces that science and organization had brought within reach of man, the old conception of social life in the state, as a limited and legalized struggle of men and women to get the better of one another, was becoming too dangerous to endure, just as the increased dreadfulness of modern weapons was making the separate sovereignty of nations too dangerous to endure. There had to be new ideas and new conventions of human association if history was not to end in disaster and collapse. The idea of competition to possess, as the ruling idea of intercourse, was, like some ill-controlled furnace, threatening to consume the machine it had formerly driven. The idea of creative service had to replace it. To that idea the human mind and will had to be turned if social life was to be saved. Propositions that had seemed, in former ages, to be inspired and exalted idealism, began now to be recognized not simply as sober psychological truth but as practical and urgently necessary truth. In explaining this Urthred expressed himself in a manner that recalled to Mr. Barnstaple's mind certain very familiar phrases; he seemed to be stating that whosoever would save his life should lose it, and that whosoever would give his life should thereby gain the whole world.

Father Amerton's thoughts, it seemed, were also responding in the same manner. For he suddenly interrupted with: "But what you are saying is a quotation!"

Urthred admitted that he had a quotation in mind, a passage from the teachings of a man of great poetic power who had lived long ago in the days of spoken words.

He would have proceeded, but Father Amerton was too excited to let him do so. "But who was this teacher?" he asked. "Where did he live? How was he born? How did he die?"

A picture was flashed upon Mr. Barnstaple's consciousness of a solitary looking, pale-faced figure, beaten [Continued on page 128]

ALL THE WAY up the broad, tree-bordered avenue, as the shining car nosed expertly in and out of small pockets in the traffic under the skilled hands of Jules, the chauffeur he had brought back from his mission in France, Henry Milner was conscious of the stir of interest his passage created.

Once, the car halted by an autocratic policeman in blue suit and brass buttons, he even caught the spoken comment.

"It's Henry W. Milner—the great man himself!"

The car moved on, but the glow aroused by the words persisted. Yes, thought Henry Milner, relaxing, it was true. In the eyes of the world he was a great man. Sighing, he considered the white dome of the Capitol building, jutting sharply against blue sky in the distance. He could have ruled from there had he so chosen, but the prospect had not appealed to him. Four years, certainly not more than eight, of greatness—and all that came afterwards anticlimax. No . . . it had not appealed to him. His own choice had fallen on the greater freedom offered by his almost absolute control of the political destiny of his followers, augmented by the sense of power contributed by management of his paper. A powerful weapon, this paper, which he used alternately as a whip for some recalcitrant or as a means of pinning the final flower of achievement upon some political aspirant. Smiling, Henry Milner contemplated comfortably the gulf between his obscure beginnings and his present prominence.

A poor boy, with nothing especially to recommend him; yes, he had been that. No unusual amount of ambition, no particular brilliance, nothing at all to predicate the destiny which had been granted him. Never head of his class at school—perilously near the foot of it always—well, he had outdistanced them all, those brilliant scholars. Considering his unpromising beginning as the car rolled into a district of handsome homes, he speculated upon the interesting question of whether his greatness had been thrust upon him or whether he had really had some inherent spark of greatness. It was, he realized, a humility all men of prominence were subject to at times, that wondering how much of their success was really due to personal effort.

“In three months, maybe six, I’m going to die,” Emmy told her husband. “And I’m not sorry. It gives me the chance to get away. I’ve wanted to go before, but you can’t leave a man because he’s grown great and powerful.”

A poor boy, with red, protruding wrists, and ill-fitting clothes, and nothing whatever to distinguish him except a vast and consuming interest in everything. Later a country school-teacher training the young idea to shoot between intervals of shaking down an obsolete stove and wondering if his salary would be paid promptly by the county board. The fact that it seldom was paid promptly was directly responsible for his next step upward. He had not been ambitious, not at that stage of his career certainly, but the prodding of unsatisfied desires had urged him to heights unconquered.

A HIGH SCHOOL teacher in a small mid-Western town which happened to harbor a newspaper edited by a man of national distinction—that had been his next step. Pure coincidence that the distinguished editor had refused to abandon his native town and that he himself should be wafted to the same place. One of those curious workings of destiny beyond understanding. And there, in that little town, the beginnings of his first stir of ambition in his rising bitterness against the dullness of his life, culminating in his attempt to find vent for his unreleased creative energy in a series of sketches built around commonplace happenings of the town itself. Events moved swiftly after that: The distinguished editor’s interest; his abandonment of high school teaching for newspaper work; the years in which his future political career shaped itself under the expert handling of the nationally-known editor; his first trip to Congress as State Representative; his later trip as Senator; his years in Washington; and finally, the establishing in Washington of the newspaper which had become a powerful political influence—all these were successive steps in a destiny which had never failed him.

Never? He frowned, conscious that he had reached in his thoughts the one sore spot upon which his entire career converged—his wife. Why wasn’t it given to a man in his sentimental twenties to understand the far-reaching influence of marriage? Why was a man permitted to thrust his head blindly into a noose of obligation in which, by his own natural kindliness, he was compelled to remain?

Still frowning, he contemplated Jules’s irreproachable olive-livered back. Yes, the one weak spot in his triumphant progress upward, yet a corroding sore which had power to gangrene the whole of his satisfaction in life.

Emmy . . . she was like a child, holding him by her very helplessness. She depended upon him so utterly, looking to him for all her own happiness, deriving her only reason for existence from her contact with him. It wasn’t possible to strike down anything so helpless—at least, not for him. His own sensitiveness to pain precluded that. If only Emmy were not so timid, so incapable . . . he paused in exasperation, mechanically bowing to a smiling greeting.

But Emmy had always been like that. It was how he had happened to marry her. Impatiently, he allowed his thoughts to travel back to that marriage. He had met Emmy during his days as a high school teacher, while they were both boarding near the school. The pretty, fair-haired, fragile girl had held a certain appeal for him in those days, an appeal heightened by the inchoate craving of maturity for something to cherish and protect. Her very helplessness and her aloneness had a potent claim upon his masculine strength. And when one day he came home to hear muffled sobbing behind Emily's closed door, quite naturally he had gone in to comfort her.

"I'm—discharged," Emmy had sobbed, a pitiful heap of tear-stained despair upon the bed. "They told me I'm not business-like enough for an office."

Some obscure part of his brain had clearly recognized the justice of this statement: flowers in a glass of water, immaculate dusting, window curtains—that would be Emmy's idea of efficient office management. Yet his more emotional self, disturbed by her childlike grief and her patent inability to fend for herself, had gathered her up in his arms.

"Don't cry, Emmy," he consoled

What is Happening to OIL in Russia

By Anna Louise Strong

Illustrated by W. T. Benda

C. Russian oil workers strive to rebuild a war-wrecked industry from their labor, still lacking machinery and cash.

IN THE GREAT Oil Duel going on everywhere today—the duel that makes and unmakes governments and boundary lines and empires—Russia holds the largest reserves in the world. Russia intends to develop those reserves for the welfare of her own people, and not for the pleasure or prestige of any foreign nation whatever. Foreign nations intend otherwise.

That's the story of Russian oil. It is a story of struggle, beginning five years ago and destined to continue for a generation to come—a day by day struggle for control. This struggle is the big economic fact behind one European conference after another, behind Genoa, behind the Hague, behind British, French, Italian intrigue in the Near East.

"Not without reason," writes a Russian editor, "does the press report that Standard Oil representatives came to Genoa before the official delegates, and took the best hotel, and have 'watchfully followed' each Russian concession, defending their own rights. The oil of Baku, in the hands of Soviet Russia, does not allow them to sleep calmly."

One technical invention after another has brought oil to a commanding position in the world today. The nation that controls oil controls the seas and commerce. The United States is producing today the greater part of the oil of the world. But she is producing it wastefully. The pleasure automobiles of America may perhaps explode into the air the oil on which the future control of the seas depends.

England has been more far-sighted. She saw that unless she had reserves of oil, the British Empire was doomed. By financial power and political intrigue, by conference and by armies, she has secured control of nearly all the visible supplies of oil. Now—on the horizon appears Soviet Russia—and she has more oil than anyone else.

The fields of Baku alone, in the part already worked and known, have a greater reserve than all the United States. Seven to eight billions of barrels is the lowest calculation of the oil still obtainable here. There is perhaps as much again in the Baku peninsula, untouched and unworked.

To the north of Baku lies Grozny, a smaller field, but producing the best benzine in the world. It has also oil wells so heavy in paraffin that they have to be closed down because there are no adequate refineries.

Over in the great mountainous desert beyond the Caspian, there is still another oil district, the Ural-Emba, discovered only shortly before the war and little prospected. There are fifty separate oil-fields known to exist in that 80,000 square kilometers of waste country, inhabited only by nomad tribes and belonging without contest to the Russian Government. Only two of those fields have yet been opened, but already a billion barrels of oil are known to exist in Emba. In the end it is expected to prove even richer than Baku! And Baku is richer than the whole United States!

No wonder England supported Denikin's army, when she thought he could secure this prize. No wonder she abandoned him when he lost Baku! No wonder Standard Oil and Shell watch each other like hawks in their moves with Russia, so that the reported deal of Krassin with Shell was the bomb that wrecked the Genoa Conference!

AT THE HAGUE again, the question of private property restoration was largely a question of oil. Russia offered to "compensate" private owners for losses incurred through the nationalizing of property. But the entente demanded "restoration" of the actual properties instead. What was the difference? Just this: that after the oil wells of Russia were nationalized, their Russian owners, escaping to Paris, sold the stocks and bonds for a song, and Standard Oil and Shell bought large blocks, enough to insure control. If the fields are "restored," they get cheaply vast properties that are worth billions. If only proved losses are "compensated," they will get nothing.

Outside Russia, the great ones of earth are fighting for Russian oil. England and France have signed treaties, agreeing on what they would do with Russian oil! English representatives have visited America—to arrange a joint program between Shell and Standard over Russian oil, and thus avoid a war! England came almost to a break with Italy, her only ally, over the proper division of Russian oil! And the Turkish minister, Kemal Pasha, explains the reason why the Allies alternately fight and agree over the control of the Dardanelles—"this control is important because of Russian oil!"

Battle and devastation! Turkish and Armenian massacres! Revolution and counter-revolution! Through it all, the heroic struggle of hungry, half-clad engineers and workmen against floods that rose to overwhelm them, and fires that burned great gushers, and spying and sabotage of managers, and against the slow attrition of war and occupation and blockade and famine.

Now, while the oil workers strive to rebuild a war-wrecked industry from their own labor, lacking still machinery and drills and ropes and the cash that buys these things, agents of foreign concessionaires are already talking with Krassin in Europe, or with Lejava, chairman of concessions, in Moscow, about control of the various oil fields of Russia.

As I sit in my room in Moscow, I know that across the Moscow River, in the beautiful Sophiskaia Palace, now a soviet hotel for wealthy visitors, is a group of American business men talking oil. I do not know whether they are independent millionaires or a fly-by-night company operating on a shoe-string, hoping to get a concession for nothing and sell out to Standard Oil later. It is not my business to look up their rating. Besides, they do not excite me. For always, all the time now in Moscow, there are Englishmen and Americans talking oil.

I sat in on a discussion between Lejava and an American business man about an oil concession over in the Emba, concerning only two of those fifty oil fields. The capital needed for proper development was over two hundred million dollars. Thirty million at least would have to be spent on wells and storage and pipe-lines before any return would begin; the rest might be turned back from income. Within ten years it would be making profits by tens of millions; and the contract would run for twenty-five to thirty years. That's the kind of money you have to have to talk oil in Russia, on even two fields out of fifty.

The oil workers of Baku have no money like this. They have no food or clothes or ropes or technical equipment. They have faced floods and fires and massacres. They have seen the wells go down and down in production till it was feared they would be permanently lost to the world under the Caspian.

They have seen the tide turn and production climb upward, slowly, very slowly at first, but according to definite engineering plans. With the first coming of peace to Russia the change came. Day by day they have grown steadily more hopeful. Now they are flinging their challenge to the Soviet Government, which in the end must decide: "What do you want of foreign concessionaires? Give us a little more food, and a little time, and you will need no other concessionaires than the workers of Baku."

Already it is becoming government policy to rebuild the old oil industry to pre-war strength by Russian labor alone, and to let foreign capital find application in the developing of new fields. This was the statement made to me by Ivan Gubkin, the head of the Oil administration. Lejava, chairman of concessions, said, supplementing this:

"At present, we will give concessions anywhere, if they are sufficiently advantageous to Russia. But if foreign capital delays, and the workers of Baku continue to advance production, a year or two hence we shall not be so willing to admit foreigners to these fields. The engineers are increasingly optimistic."

There were one hundred and fifty-three oil companies operating in Baku under the reign of the Tsar. But the chief of them all was Nobel, a Swedish-Russian company, in which, even before the war, it was rumored that Standard Oil had bought control. Nobel had shares in many minor companies; he put forth his fingers of trade all over Russia in depots for the selling of oil. He controlled the machinery of distribution.

When the Bolshevik Revolution came, Gustave Nobel called together his upper employees in Petrograd and laid out their plan of action. They were to remain in Russia and stick close to oil, sending secret reports through Finland to Paris. In the wars of intervention which came later, they were to act as economic spies.

C. War struck the oil fields. The German troops came down from the north. The English troops came from Persia. The great ones of earth raced for the oil region.

If the moment for action came, they were to hold themselves ready to paralyze the oil industry and so wreck Russia, by sabotage from within, even to the total destruction of oil reserves by fire. Gustave Nobel departed; his higher employees remained. In the dire need for experts, the Soviet Government made use of anyone who was not openly opposed. These spies obtained positions of trust; one became manager of oil for the Petrograd district; another was in the college of technical management for all Russian oil. They were the heads of a conspiracy which reached all over Russia; and they sent out weekly reports, and received money from abroad by underground channels. Their reports went to Paris where General Wrangel had established a counter-revolutionary trade center.

That's what Russia was up against in every basic industry. Men who had their hands on the resources of the nation, secret spies, ready to paralyze industry when the hour came, and meantime working always against order. Only within this last year were these oil spies caught by the Extraordinary Commission, which existed for just such emergencies. They were condemned to be shot, but they were not shot.

Meantime while conspiracies like this raged through Russia, and while speculators in Paris bought and sold shares of Russian oil, the Baku oil workers were cut off from Russia by a ring of steel. Armed force after armed force seized the wells and country round them; and for four long years there was no settled life.

The Baku workers proclaimed a Soviet Government when the rest of Russia did, in November, 1917. They had always been revolutionary; the fields had been one of the centers of revolt since 1905. They took over the local government and declared the oil the property of the nation.

At once they reorganized the fields. The one hundred and fifty-three little competing companies, each with dozens of tiny holdings scattered through many districts, were wasting the oil.

Within a month after nationalization, the engineers of Baku had divided the wells into eight great districts, leaving the lesser engineers in charge of local production, and placing the higher engineers in general control. The chief engineer of the Baku had as his first assistant a man elected by the union.

And immediately war struck them. The Germans and Turks came down from the north and established themselves in Tiflis, the center of the Caucasus. The English troops came up from Persia. The great ones of earth raced for the oil-fields.

RRACE and religious feeling ran high in the oil fields, stimulated by so many opposing armies. Armenians, Turks, Tartars and Russians—such is the mixed population of Baku. The Mensheviks and social revolutionaries called the Soviet régime pro-German, declared a counter-revolution with the help of two Cossack bandits and called in the British to help them. Under the encouragement of the British advance, the Armenians massacred 25,000 Mohammedans in the town and fields of Baku. The English came in, took possession, and then led forth from jail twenty-seven Communist Commissars, who had previously for a short time governed Baku. They took them over the Caspian to Turkestan, and shot them.

Swiftly the Turks retaliated for the slaughter of their co-religionists. Within two months they also swept down into Baku from the north, while the English forces retired toward Persia. The Turks then massacred 30,000 Armenians and the tale of the atrocity went forth to all. [Continued on page 104]

YES, MISTER," said Charles Samek, as he spread a slice of rye bread with mustard by the way of filling in the interval between soup and roast at Mrs. Feinrubin's Ideal Restaurant and Lunch Room, "if you would have the duodenum which I got it, understand me, instead of sitting here forcing myself to eat a little something, y'understand, you would be already in a home for chronic incurables."

"Tell me, Mr. Samek," Max Citron inquired sympathetically, "how did you come to get this here—now—duodenum in the first place?"

"A question!" Samek said with his mouth full of bread and mustard. "Some people is born with a weak constitution, and they get everything you could have an operation for from appendicitis up, which I could have been in my grave six times already if it wouldn't be that I take such good care of myself and never eat nothing but the plainest food."

At this juncture, Mr. Samek gave way to a fit of coughing, which had its origin in some of the bread and mustard going astray but which by long practice, Mr. Samek was able to enlarge upon until it seemed as though he were about to succumb to apoplexy.

"Here!" Mr. Citron said. "Take a glass of water."

"Hand me one of them dill pickles," Samek gasped, and after he had eaten two of them he lay back in his chair in what he intended for an attitude of complete exhaustion.

"Dill pickles is wonderful for such attacks," he explained. "The acid cuts the mucous membrane of the bronchial toobs, which if dill pickles ain't handy sometimes a lemon will do it, too."

"I suppose a feller which has got the matter with him all the things like you've got it could give pointers to a big majority of doctors," Max Citron suggested sympathetically.

"I bet yer," Samek agreed. "In fact, I ain't got a great deal of confidence in doctors, Mister-er—"

"Citron," Max Citron said, for his acquaintance with Mr. Samek was purely a casual one, arising from the circumstance that Citron had just happened to sit at the corner table in Mrs. Feinrubin's restaurant—fortuitously, as it were, and by the merest chance—after being told by several people who were acquainted with Samek's habits that he could always be found at the corner table in Mrs. Feinrubin's restaurant any day from half-past twelve to a quarter-past one.

"Yes, Mr. Citron," Samek continued. "To most doctors, the human body is a deck of cards face down, and they could over tell if your liver, for example, is an ace or a deuce without you let 'em rubber at it through a five-hundred-dollar operation."

"Still there must be some doctors which is anyhow good guessers," Citron said.

"I never met but one," Samek replied, "and he don't always play in luck neither, which the last time I had nephritis Eichendorfer says it is inflammation of the gall duct, and he goes to work and gives me a prescription for a dollar and a quarter at a cut rate drug store even."

"You don't say!" Citron exclaimed. "And Eichendorfer is considered wonderful for the liver, too."

"That's the trouble," Samek said. "With liver specialists, any pain the patient has got between the vest opening and the suspender buttons they lay to the liver. So what is the consequence—after I finished up the prescription, I got my wife to iron me over the kidneys on a New York Times, y'understand, and in twenty minutes I am free from pain except from my heart, which I have off and on, practically all the time."

"And yet Doctor Eichendorfer examines for all the big life insurance companies," Citron remarked.

"I know," Samek said, "and look at the way life insurance companies gets stuck, too. People is dying on 'em practically every day."

Citron wagged his head from side to side and made incoherent noises through his nostrils, indicating profound sympathy with such a human wreck as Samek described himself to be, although it cannot truthfully be said that either the personal appearance or the manner in which he was stowing away Mrs. Feinrubin's plat du jour of gefüllte Miltz Southern Style exactly corroborated his medical history. Indeed Citron was a trifle disappointed, for he had been led by Mrs. Samek only that morning to believe that it was but a matter of a few months at the most when, as widow and sole devisee and legatee of her potentially deceased husband, she would be in control of sufficient funds to assure permanently the future of her only niece, Miss Jennie Singerman.

"It only goes to show that, no matter how well you know a person, you never can tell nothing about it," Max Citron said, after an unbroken silence of some minutes—that is to say, a silence as unbroken as any silence could be in the vicinity of Mr. Samek eating gefüllte Miltz.

"I give you right, Mr. Citron," Samek agreed, accepting the observation as referring in some way to his pathological condition, although, as a matter of fact, Citron was only thinking aloud. He had accepted almost without question Mrs. Samek's account of her husband's state of health.

HOWEVER, he now saw clearly that Mrs. Samek was either unduly optimistic or unduly alarmed—depending upon the affection she bore her husband—for Citron was something of a diagnostician himself.

In addition to his profession of marriage broker, he had been treasurer of Abraham Lincoln Lodge 211, Independent Order Mattai Aaron, ever since its foundation, and for over twenty years he had officially visited his ailing lodge brethren with a view of finding out whether they were really sick or just sick-benefit sick; and had he now been investigating Samek's ill health on behalf of the I. O. M. A. instead of his own account, he would unhesitatingly have reported that Samek was not sick enough to receive the ministrations of the lodge's Number Two doctor—the one that charged fifty cents for a house call and twenty-five for an office call.

AS MISS JENNIE SINGERMAN's childless aunt, Mrs. Samek's attitude toward her orphaned niece was entirely maternal save in one particular—she did not possess the maternal lack of perspective sufficiently to overlook her niece's physical shortcomings, and ever since Jennie's twentieth birthday, Mrs. Samek had been convinced that if Jennie were to depend on the conventional heaven-made marriage, she was a matrimonial goner. But had Mrs. Samek viewed her not as a niece but as a private secretary to Mr. Joel Sunderland, uptown superintendent of the Mercantile Life Assurance Society of Newark, New Jersey, she might have shared Mr. Sunderland's opinion that Miss Jennie Singerman was all right.

He rendered this opinion in response to a question by Jacob Polongin, Mr. Max Citron's client, who, a moment before, had said rather huskily that he would like to ask Mr. Sunderland if he could tell him a little something about Miss Jennie Singerman, and had then blushed. Polongin occupied the offices next door to Mr. Sunderland, and was by profession a life insurance agent, doing business principally with the company of which Sunderland was the uptown superintendent, and as Mr. Sunderland, in all his years of experience as a life insurance superintendent, had never before seen the blush of embarrassment on the face of a life insurance agent, he grew naturally suspicious.

"I know she's all right," Polongin said; "but what I mean to say is: what for a disposition has she got?"

"What do you mean—'what for a disposition has she got?'"

Q. "Dill pickles is wonderful for such attacks," Samek explained. "The acid cuts the mucous membrane of the bronchial tubes, which if the dill pickles ain't handy a lemon will do it too."

M. C. KONE
BRACKER

Sunderland retorted. "Do you imagine, for one moment that I would ask a young lady like Miss Singerman a personal question like what for a disposition she's got? What kind of a loafer do you think I am, anyway?"

"Aber couldn't you tell what kind of a disposition she's got without asking her?" Polongin inquired, with increased color.

"Say, look here, Polongin," Sunderland cried, for he now saw or thought he saw just why Polongin was blushing. "If you would got a scheme for getting Miss Singerman to come to work for you by offering more money, y'understand, let me tell you that I raised her wages last week, and if necessary, I would raise her wages next week, too."

"I don't doubt it," Polongin said; "but I ain't thinking of offering her the kind of job she's got here. A lady which comes from such a good family like Miss Singerman ain't got no business to be working, anyway."

"MISS SINGERMAN's family and any other private affairs which she has got it, don't concern me not in the least."

"Then what are you standing in her light for?" Polongin asked. "You could get hundreds of stenographers to do what she is doing here, and sooner or later you would got to get one, too, because a woman which has got an uncle like Charles Samek in the dress-suit, cutaway, and tuxedo business, with a rating a hundred and seventy-five to two hundred thousand dollars credit high, ain't going to stay single forever, even if she wouldn't be so good-looking like all that."

"Miss Singerman's looks is the least of my worries, Polongin."

"I know they ain't," Polongin went on, "which if I would be fifty-five—"

"Fifty-one," Sunderland corrected severely.

"Fifty-one oder fifty-five—what is the difference?" Polongin said. "Which I am only thirty-seven, Mr. Sunderland; so I am asking you as an office neighbor, considering that Miss Singerman has worked for you for eight years and everything, you should ought to know something about her disposition; so, therefore—"

Sunderland rose abruptly from his chair.

"Senough, Polongin," he interrupted, "I heard enough already, because if Miss Singerman would have worked here for eighteen years instead of eight years, and I knew her disposition from A to Z, y'understand, I wouldn't tell you about it, because what does a lady's disposition matter to a feller which has already fallen in love with her uncle's mercantile rating?"

"All right, Mr. Sunderland," Polongin said, as he made ready to leave; "if you are trying to insult me, let me tell you that—"

"I ain't trying to insult you, Polongin," Sunderland broke in. "I am only telling you what my ideas are, which I admit that I am fifty-one years old, and I ain't never been married and don't want to be, neither, but if I did want to get married for what a decent respectable man should ought to get married for—a good home, a good wife, and once in a while a cup of coffee that tasted like a cup of coffee, understand me, I wouldn't place no reliance in my intended's uncle's business standing."

IT HAD never occurred to Sunderland until Polongin's visit that he had never thought of his stenographer except in a business way, and although not ten minutes had elapsed since Polongin had left, it seemed to Sunderland, when Miss Singerman came in from lunch, that his newly awakened regard for her had persisted hopelessly and unrequited for at least ten years.

She wore a neat and well-fitting tailor-made suit, as she always did, and while Sunderland had probably seen it a hundred times, and thousands of other women had passed him daily on the street wearing suits just like it, it seemed to the insurance manager that he was looking now for the first time upon a startling, new-fashioned and most becoming feminine garment. Moreover, just as he had recently discovered himself to be quite bald, when Miss Singerman removed her hat he was astonished to find out that she possessed rather abundant dark hair, and that her face, while its features were undeniably prominent, bore an exceedingly pleasant expression. It was her eyes, however, which made him admit the futility of his aspirations. That a woman with large, brown, melting eyes like hers should condescend to a fat, partially bald, and wrinkled man of fifty-one suddenly struck him as so utterly hopeless that he could not entirely restrain an audible groan.

"What's the matter, Mr. Sunderland?" she asked. "Don't you feel good?"

"I feel as good as I generally feel," he said.

"Well, you don't look it." Miss Singerman commented as she pinned paper cuffs on the sleeves of her white waist preparatory to beginning her afternoon's work.

"When a man gets to be fifty-odd years old, Miss Singerman," Sunderland said, "his looks begin to show, in especially where he ain't taken it so particular as to what he eats and where."

To this observation Miss Singerman made no reply, principally because she was engaged in drafting a report of last month's business for the downtown office of the company, but more especially because she was unaccustomed to holding conversations with her employer, save those of a business nature.

"I don't suppose I've et a meal twicet running in the same restaurant in weeks already," he continued, without any encouragement from Miss Singerman, "and some of the coffee which I drunk in that time, honestly you wouldn't believe that such poison existed at all."

"Restaurant coffee is pretty bad," Miss Singerman admitted.

"Bad!" Sunderland exclaimed. "I had a cup of coffee with my dinner last night, Miss Singerman, and I give you my word that if a married man would be handed such coffee in his own home, y'understand, he could 'a' got a divorce for it."

"Most people don't know anything about making a cup of coffee," Miss Singerman said, without much enthusiasm, for she felt that this conversational mood would soon pass and that, when Sunderland's business habits had reasserted themselves, he would want to know why that report wasn't ready yet. At this particular moment, however, what Sunderland really and truly wanted to know was: could Miss Singerman make a good cup of coffee, and without leading up to it by any further conversation, he broached the matter at once.

"Well, how would you make a good cup of coffee, for instance?"

"I always grind my coffee fresh," she began, and not only did it seem to Sunderland that he could see her doing it in a spotlessly clean kitchen but his nostrils twitched to the fragrant odor which his imagination supplied. "I grind it fine—almost to a powder," she went on. "I have my water boiling, and I put one heaping tablespoonful of my coffee for each cup into a bowl, say six tablespoonfuls for six cups. I add a little water, and mash the powdered coffee in it till it becomes a sort of coffee paste. I then put this paste into my coffee-pot—"

"Our coffee-pot," Sunderland thought.

"And then," Miss Singerman concluded, "I pour in the boiling water, as many cupfuls as there are tablespoonfuls, and it makes a perfectly delicious coffee."

DURING the rest of the afternoon Miss Singerman was able to devote herself to her report, because Sunderland perceived at once that it was unnecessary to carry the matter further. He knew as soon as she ceased speaking, not alone that this was the one and only method of making a good cup of coffee but also that Miss Singerman was the one and only person who could do it right—at least so far as he was concerned. He therefore applied himself to his books of accounts, without much success, however, for it is obviously impossible to concentrate on figures, names, and addresses and at the same time to visualize Miss Singerman making coffee in the kitchen of a six-room apartment, something around fifty-five dollars a month in the Dyckman or West Bronx section. He pictured himself walking down to the subway at about eight-ten or eight-fifteen with two cups of coffee inside of him, turning once or twice to wave his morning paper at Miss Singerman, or else he saw himself seated opposite Miss Singerman in the dining-room of the same apartment, or even a slightly better apartment, at about seventy or eighty dollars a month, with nothing but a domed electrolier between them, while he drank not a demi-tasse but a large cup of after-dinner coffee, and one way or another, between two and six o'clock that afternoon, he drank over fifty cups of imaginary coffee.

"Well," he said at length rousing himself from an imaginary Sunday night supper in which the delicatessen was washed down with drafts of some of the most fragrant coffee that a human mind ever conceived, "I guess we'll shut up shop now."

Miss Singerman put away her report and rose from her desk.

"Why, Mr. Sunderland!" she exclaimed. "Don't you look terrible!"

"I don't look no different to what I always look," he said "which I guess you ain't never noticed my looks before particularly."

For the second time that day, Sunderland witnessed the blushes of a person whom he had never seen blush before, and for the second time he misapprehended the cause, since how was he to know that during the past eight years, while Miss Singerman's fingers mechanically hit the right keys of her typewriter by long practice of the touch system, she had taken the opportunity on more than one occasion—and that is to say, on a great many occasions, of sizing up the personal appearance of her employer? She knew the degree of his baldness as well as he did, and, what is more, she knew a great deal better than he did which of his neckties became him and which did not.

At Mrs. Samek's mention that she expected a candidate for the hand of her niece, Samek headed off discussion by one of his well-timed attacks of acute indigestion.

NOW WHAT is the use talking, Mrs. Samek; you couldn't make omelets unless you got the eggs," said Max Citron on the afternoon of his visit to Mrs. Feinrubin's Ideal Restaurant and Lunch Room.

"But I am telling you that it's my misfortune that I would have the eggs inside of six months at the outside, Mr. Citron," Mrs. Samek said, "because if my poor husband would last much longer than that, Mr. Citron, it would be a miracle."

Here Mrs. Samek buried her face in her handkerchief and wept in what to a more impressionable person than Mr. Citron, would have been a most pitiable manner. Mr. Citron, however, was entirely unmoved.

"Don't jolly yourself, Mrs. Samek," he said. "If you would see the insides of a Surrogate's court on account of your husband any time this side of ten years, Mrs. Samek, you would be a lucky woman, and that's all there is to it."

"I wish I could think that way about it," Mrs. Samek said through her tears.

"Well, you've got to think that way about it," Citron advised her; "because even if Mr. Samek was—not wishing him no harm—to be already getting oxygen, Mrs. Samek, you've got to figure that while there's life, there's hope, and an up-to-date business man like Polongin don't got to take no such chances like that."

Mrs. Samek dried her eyes.

"Then get somebody else," she said, "because all I want to do is to see Jennie settled in her own home, and so long as her husband is a decent respectable man which could make for her a living, Mr. Citron, never mind if he ain't such an up-to-date business man like Polongin. All I am asking him to do is that he should wait a little while for the dowry."

"What do you mean—'a little while'?" Citron exclaimed. "Um Gotteswillen, talk sense, Mrs. Samek. I am telling you a hundred times that your husband is a first-class A number-one risk for his age, which you don't got to take my word for it, Mrs. Samek. Ask any life insurance man, and he will tell you the same, that a feller which has got umberufen an appetite like a horse and the good color and bright eyes like your husband has got it, at fifty-one years of age he could expect to live between twenty and twenty-one years."

"That's practically what I said to Doctor Eichendorfer only last week," Mrs. Samek declared, "and he laughed me in my face yet."

ANY DOCTOR that has got for a customer such a gold mine like your husband, Mrs. Samek, could afford to laugh," Citron said; "but if you want to see your niece happily married to an up-to-date young feller like this here Polongin, Mrs. Samek, you should put the whole matter up to your husband this evening yet, and take a chance on his heart going back on him. Believe me Mrs. Samek, I have been collecting for orphan asylums, lodges, and hospitals already thirty years and in all that time I never seen nobody die from being asked for money, even though once in a while it did look like touch and go with some of the worser giversup, y'understand."

"There couldn't be no harm in trying," Mrs. Samek admitted, "because I've got a couple of dressmaker's bills to show him, anyway."

"That's what I am telling you," Citron said, as he took his hat and stick preparatory to leaving. "So at eight o'clock me and Polongin would be here sure, because, in cases like this, Mrs.

Samek, you've got to strike while the iron is red, otherwise the bird would fly away on you. Am I right or wrong?"

However, when Mr. Citron called that evening with the up-to-date Polongin, he began to think that perhaps he had misjudged Samek's resistance to shock or that Mrs. Samek had slightly overdone the thing for her eyes were red with weeping.

"Your husband throws down the proposition?" Citron asked.

"I didn't even mention it to him, because after what my niece says, Mr. Citron, I didn't have the heart," Mrs. Samek replied. "She says, what do you think she is? A greenhorn?"

"Well, certainly she ain't no greenhorn," Citron admitted; "but, at the same time, if you would excuse me for saying so she ain't such an exactly Ethel Barrymore that she could afford to turn up her nose at even Polongin here, y'understand."

"What do you mean—'even'?" Polongin demanded.

"Don't get mad, Mr. Polongin," Mrs. Samek said; "because you could be still less attractive so far as that goes, and what would it matter anyhow, on account of my niece ain't taken you into consideration at all? It is Mr. Citron she objects to, which when I told her she should stay home tonight on account a Mr. Citron is coming here, right away she asked who is Mr. Citron and when I tell you are a Schadchen, Mr. Citron, the way that girl carried on you would think Schadchen was Loschen Hakodesh for burglar or something."

"Yes?" Mr. Citron said, almost resignedly. "Well, if that's the way she feels about it, Mrs. Samek, it's no use I should waste my time here; so come along, Polongin."

"What are you talking about—'come along'?" Polongin protested. "Just because Miss Singerman has objections to you, Citron, I should throw away the sponge yet! Why, Miss Singerman don't even know what I look like."

Polongin, busy with dreams of a dowry, did his courting of Jennie Singerman under the watchful eye of the marriage broker.

C. Nothing could have dispelled that all-gone feeling at the pit of his stomach when Miss Singerman appeared at her desk wearing a bunch of violets. Sunderland's worst suspicions were confirmed.

"It's in your favor that she should never know," Citron remarked.

"Is that so?" Polongin said. "Well, let me tell you something, Citron: Miss Singerman is right. A Schadchen is a back-number idea."

"You don't tell me!" Citron exclaimed. "And what for an idea is a life insurance broker, Polongin? It stands in the Talmud that it is a Mitzvah to promote marriages, Polongin, but to promote the marriage of a life insurer, Polongin, is more than a Mitzvah; it's a miracle. If things breaks right for a life insurer he could maybe support a wife as good as a book canvasser. All life insurers is bluffers, Polongin, which if I had a niece and she would want to marry a life insurer, Polongin, I——"

HOWEVER, the disclosure of just exactly what measures Citron would have taken to prevent the marriage of a hypothetical niece to a hypothetical life insurance broker was interrupted by Charles Samek, who burst into the living-room of his apartment and gave voice to his indignation with a resounding "Kooosh!"

"What is this?" he asked. "A lodge meeting or something?"

He was clad only in a nightgown, bathrobe and slippers, for when Mrs. Samek had mentioned that evening at supper that she expected the arrival of a candidate for the hand of her niece, Samek had headed off a discussion of the least that any other uncle-by-marriage would do in a case like that by a histrionically perfect attack of acute indigestion. He had retired to his bed with the evening paper and a hot water bag, a procedure which ordinarily would have resulted in a silent tiptoeing round the flat by Mrs. Samek and her niece, but which, in this instance, seemed in no way to modify the scene that almost immediately ensued between the two ladies. Miss Singerman condemned made-up matches just as forcefully and Mrs. Samek protested her niece's ingratitude just as hysterically as though Samek's digestion had been in perfect working order. Indeed, three times had Mrs. Samek's weeping obliged him to jump out of bed, at the risk of ruining an excellent performance of a difficult rôle, in order to shout, "Say, look-a-here! Lass mir im Ruh, will you?" and his already shaken nerves had barely time to recover from the bang of the street door with which Miss Singerman had ended this discussion when this new tumult rose.

"Out of here, before I send for a policeman and throw you out," he bellowed.

"Listen, popper," Mrs. Samek implored him. "Don't get excited. This is Mr. Citron and Mr. Polongin, the gentlemen about which I was speaking to you about."

"I don't give a damn who they are!" Samek shouted. "What right have they got to come into a house where there's sickness and act like this?"

"Mr. Samek is right, Citron," Polongin said. "You should ought to be ashamed to behave this way. Sit down in this chair and calm yourself, Mr. Samek. Such excitement is very bad for a man with your heart-valves."

Not for nothing had Polongin learned [Continued on page 118]

CIRCUMSTANCES had forced us to be polite to Cousins; but with the blatant cocksureness and self-sufficiency of his kind he had for three mortal hours repaid our hospitality with unfounded assertions and offensive statistics. My own private temper was being torn to shreds and patches, and twice when Cousins wasn't looking, Scofield kicked me and frowned. I suppose I must have said things that I shouldn't.

Scofield was wonderful. I knew that he was raging internally but outwardly he might have stood for a portrait of the "Urbane Host." He led Cousins on into statements which became more and more cocksure, unfounded, outrageous and offensive.

Cousins made a long speech about children and why to his "certain knowledge" so many of them go wrong. Scofield smiled, and, his eyes twinkling, told a story:

"I remember once," he said, "spilling a nestful of eggs from the top of a very high pine tree. Four of the eggs were broken to smithereens and the fifth wasn't broken at all. Can you account for that? Neither can I. And I can't explain how, when so many strong men perished, the Child came safe to shore.

"But he did—all the way from the outer reef where the ship had broken her back to the most sheltered beach of the lagoon.

"At that the Child ought to have perished.

"He had on one of those one piece night arrangements, which button up the back, and which to prevent nail-biting are sewed together over the hands and feet. He was only old enough to walk drunkenly, and he had been landed without companions of any kind, on a desert island, dressed in what amounted to an informal strait-jacket.

"Inside the material of the night arrangement, his hands however had a certain amount of play. And he was able to pick things up and put them in his mouth. The lagoon, and the beaches of the lagoon at low tide, were, fortunately for him, a molluscan paradise. He very quickly discovered that the pretty shells contained food, and that by being placed on a block of lava and pounded with a lump of the same they were easily broken to pieces.

TIME, activity, and the sharp edges of shells soon wore through the material of his sleeping suit. His hands and feet emerged and after a while the rest of him. It was fortunate that in this way he got his tan gradually. The sudden exposure of his pink and white baby body to a few hours of the equatorial sun on that beach must have burned him to death.

"He ought to have died a thousand times, right at the beginning, but he didn't. He survived the bite of a marbled cone, some furious poisonings from green things, which he learned to leave alone after that. And the discovery that little boys sink and strangle in water that is over their depths. Somehow or other he survived, and somehow or other he learned to swim, and to live. He had to learn these things; otherwise he had to eat the pleasure of the tides instead of at his own pleasure."

Here Scofield interrupted himself to rise, sprawl across the room to the table where the drinks were, and pour two fingers of Scotch into a long glass.

"Speaking of pleasure—" he said.

There was a general move upon the refreshments, and a pleasant tinkling of glass and ice.

"There being no laws to prevent," continued Scofield, "our shipwrecked child, having accidentally discovered the principles of fermentation, became a confirmed manufacturer of cocoanut wine. And from the age of ten or eleven on, he was often spiffed. At first of course, he abused the stuff and went on terrible drunks, followed by headaches and nausea, but gradually he learned to handle it, and to use it oftener than he abused it.

"But it wasn't until the dug-out blew in from the sea, and he had learned to navigate it, that he ever visited the wreck which still lay sprawling and broken across the outer reef, and made the acquaintance of spirits and French wine.

"The fore half of the ship, that which lay within the reef in quiet waters, was almost intact. Two equally good halves would have made a sea-worthy whole. So it seems probable that the ship was abandoned before she hit the reef.

"THE CHILD's father, the Reverend Mr. Bootby, a missionary among the islands, had been an able and far-sighted man. He had acquired a small fortune through the manipulation of island curiosities and certain shares in trading ventures, and, but for his untimely death, would have been promoted to a Bishopric. The Child's mother had been the Reverend Mr. Bootby's third wife. She seems to have been a young woman of excellent propensities, a patient wife and a pains-taking mother.

"Man at heart is commonly supposed to be a religious animal. But in spite of his breeding, the Child seems to have been an exception to the rule. Not even the occasional rumblings of the old volcano on which he lived seem to have given him any hint of a divine creator, or of an immortal soul. The craving to worship something mysterious and outside of himself was not in him.

"He lived, and took the pleasure of the natural and unconscious in the act of living. He labored only that he might eat and be comfortable—and satisfy his curiosities.

"These curiosities drew him most often into the fore part of the wreck, and empowered him to smash open every case and chest and barrel in the holds and in the crew's quarters. In the end it was only the iron safe in the purser's cabin which baffled him. To crack that safe became the ambition of his young life.

"How did he know that it was hollow? He had an instinct. I suppose; what the boys call a 'hunch.'

"The ship's cargo had been largely utilitarian—agricultural implements for Australia; to a savage, except for small parts which could be detached and utilized in one way or another, was of no especial interest. The whiskies, wines, and canned goods, were more interesting and more useful to him. He could now drink when he pleased and as much as he pleased without being put to any greater trouble than that of ripping off the tops of cases and knocking off the necks of bottles.

"More precious to him, however, were the contents of the seamen's chests, the canvas trousers, the flannel shirts, the woolen socks, and the oil-skins. There were photographs which clearly showed the use of these things. There were also knives, and needles and many odds and ends the possession of which gave him queer thrills of happiness. The looking-glasses gave him the most happiness. He would never tire of looking at himself in them. He felt sure of that.

THE CREW of the ill-fated ship had either been a very decent lot, or at least they had not been collectors and hoarders of the indecent. There wasn't a photograph which could not with perfect propriety have been placed in a family album. It is true that one chest contained a Bible and a Fanny Hill wrapped in the same piece of oil-skin, but since neither of these volumes was illustrated they were of little interest to him.

"He spent most of his spare time on the wreck, dressing up, parading, making faces in the mirrors, and sometimes overstepping the bounds of strict sobriety.

"At such times he liked to squat in front of the purser's safe and twist the combination lock this way and that, and wonder what was inside, and devise alcoholic schemes for finding out. A real drunk, however, with its disastrous reactions, made a good boy out of him for a week.

"In all the years that he was on the Island, it had but two other visitors. Both came in the same way, but at different times. Both came in dug-outs, which most likely had been caught in storms and blown off shore. It was the man who came first, but before the coming of the man and the woman, the Child by pure accident succeeded in satisfying his curiosity concerning the contents of the purser's safe.

"He was squatted as often before it turning the combination this way and that, and occasionally drinking from a bottle, when all of a sudden he flew into a rage with the thing, and jerked at the knob with all his strength. The door of the safe opened heavily, and the Child began to dance and yell with triumph. He undoubtedly felt that the miracle was entirely due to his own patience and cleverness.

"Except for papers in which he was not able to take an interest, the safe contained only some thousands of pounds in gold, silver and copper, and certain packages of jewelry which women passengers had confided to the purser for safekeeping.

"For immediate wear, the Child settled on some showy rings, and a necklace in which pairs of bay leaves had been imitated in platinum and diamonds.

"In the kind of life that he was obliged to lead, the rings and the necklace soon became a bother to him and he left off wearing them.

I KEEP calling him the Child. I ought not to do that, because at the time that the safe came open, he must have been at least sixteen or seventeen years old. In other words he was to all intents and purposes a grown man.

"One morning he looked out over the lagoon, and saw a dug-out, similar to the one in which he made his trips to the wreck, being slowly propelled toward the beach, by a creature exactly like himself only thinner and darker.

"The creature beached the dug-out, and staggered straight up the beach toward a little pile of bivalves which the Child had gathered, overnight, and placed beyond the reach of the tide to be opened and eaten in the morning.

C. The Child spent most of his spare time on the wreck, dressing up, parading, making faces in the mirrors, and sometimes overstepping the bounds of strict sobriety.

C. The creature snarled and squealed and showed its shriveled old gums and tried to strike with its knife.

"The visiting creature drew a knife from its waistband, knelt, and with shaking but scientific fingers, began to open the bivalves and eat them.

"The Child saw first his breakfast, his own personal, private, peculiarly rare and delicious breakfast vanishing before his eyes and then he saw red.

"He made a run for the creature who was despoiling him, and at every step he let out a yell of hate and fury.

"The creature could not make any defense, even with the knife. It was a very old creature, light and bony as a heron, and half dead with hunger and thirst to begin with.

"It tried to fight. It snarled and squealed and showed its shriveled old gums and tried to strike with its knife. But the Child with all the glory of his young rage and his young strength literally manhandled the feeble old thing till it was dead.

"It was not until the next year that the other visitor—the woman—came ashore. But time, in the meanwhile, had wrought psychological changes in the Child.

"He had grown up believing that the world consisted of one very small island surrounded by one very large water, and that it contained no other creature in any way resembling himself. His discoveries on the wreck and the coming of the old islander had shaken these beliefs and destroyed them. Just as we of this world are of the belief that there may be other worlds inhabited (God help them!) with faulty beings like ourselves, so the Child began to have a glimmering of other islands and other men.

"This glimmering became a conviction. There settled upon him, with all its horrors of wakefulness and futility, the misery of the lonely and the abandoned.

Q. The lonely boy wished that he had not killed the old man. He wished that another like him would come ashore. He would not be angry the next time. There would be the two of them. That was the main thing.

"Drink no longer cheered and amused. It served only to increase the melancholy and the sense of solitude. He became afraid of it, as of something powerful and malevolent, that had only the wish to torture him. For weeks at a time, he would not go near the wreck, and then only when the sun was very high in the heavens.

THERE came a day of great calm and heat. Late in the afternoon a terrific wind rose in an instant of time, and for some hours blew terribly. Even strong trees went down before it. He did not get to sleep until the wind had stopped blowing, and he slept late into the dawn that followed the storm.

"Peering then from the bushes in which he had one of his favorite nests, he perceived that another visitor had come to him across the great water which surrounded the island.

"This visitor in no way resembled the old man. The Child's heart, of which he had never until that moment been more than half-conscious, began to pound his ribs with great slow thumps.

"He rose to his feet, pushed the bushes softly aside and stepped out on the beach. The visitor stood near the edge of the water, looking out over the lagoon.

"She was slender and of a beautiful golden brown.

"The Child approached her with slow, soft, cat-like steps. His fingers twitched, and that his breath might not whistle through his nostrils he had to breathe through his mouth. He had never before needed so much air to keep him going. His heart was like some powerful animal that wished to pound its way out of a prison. Under the thick tan, his face was white.

"But when she turned with a sudden intuition and a whimper of fear, and he looked into her huge, translucent, startled island eyes, the white changed to a furious flaming red, and all the veins on his forehead and temples swelled and darkened.

"Then the girl screamed twice at the top of her lungs and bolted. She ran with incredible speed, but at every step the Child gained on her. At every step he yelled—but not with hate."

Scofield paused, and relighted his cigar which had gone out. He put down his empty glass and poured a little whisky into it.

Cousins, the offensive one, looked puzzled and a little offended. "Is that all?" he asked.

"Why, yes," said Scofield, "I think so. Unless you want to know what became of the Child in after years. Things broke well for him. A decent ship captain found him, and took him off the island, and used the money and jewels to educate him and stake him afterwards. He has a fine ranch now, near Fresno; dislikes oysters and clams intensely, and is in all other ways a model citizen. His wife is darker than the average, but the children are wonderful, and numerous."

"But," protested Cousins, "what is the exact significance of the story? What is the underlying theme—the moral?"

"The Child," said Scofield patiently, "was reared in complete ignorance of everything. All his knowledge and all his temptations came from within himself. The moral is for you people who believe in censorship and morality by legislation. What were the important facts of the Child's life? He drank hard. He cracked a safe. He committed a murder. He married a young lady without her consent. And he did all these things without ever having read what you people call a salacious book or without ever having seen any kind of a motion picture. . . . And then, in common with the average boy who does get hold of a vile book once in a while, or who sees all the pictures good, bad and indifferent, he settled down and became a first-rate citizen."

Cousins for once had nothing to say. For the first time in his life, perhaps, it began to dawn on him that ordinary decent liberty loving men considered him a meddling and boring ass with his ideas of intolerance.

Another visitor had come to him across the great water. This visitor in no way resembled the old man. She was slender and of a beautiful golden brown.

VACCINES for Broken Legs

¶ No. 4 of the Series on DOCTORS and Drug-Mongers

By Paul H. De Kruif, Ph.D.

DRUG-MONGERS advertise and sell preparations which when used without the highest skill are dangerous to human life. It is justifiable to place such things in the hands of highly trained and intelligent doctors. Their widespread advertisement and indiscriminate sale to all doctors are things that demand the attention of the public and the medical profession alike.

The story of vaccines and similar preparations makes one of the best illustrations of this unfortunate condition. Modified vaccines, called Phylacogens, are reported by reliable and prominent doctors to have caused a number of deaths. In spite of this, they are still offered to the medical profession as a whole, regardless of the fact that comparatively few doctors have the skill to handle such a dangerous "remedy." A vaccine vendor, named Sherman, carries on a persistent and tremendous publicity campaign among doctors. He assures them that vaccines can be used without harm. He reduces the treatment of disease to the utmost simplicity. According to this merchant, all the doctor has to do, when perplexed, is to consult Sherman's alphabetical list of diseases. Opposite each disease is its appropriate vaccine. It does not have some jaw-cracking scientific name which would be hard for the doctor to remember. Instead it is marked simply with a number. The momentarily baffled doctor has simply to turn to this chart, run his finger down the list of diseases, from abscess to vertigo. When he comes to the disease he thinks his patient has, he stops, and looks at the number opposite. Has the poor fellow kidney disease? Have no fear! Give him vaccine No. 35 or 15. Or perchance he may be plagued with a toothache. Then let the doctor seize his trusty syringe, and shoot in vaccine No. 5, 6, or 35.

Such a simplification of the mysteries and terrors of disease would seem to be incredible, but turn to Sherman's advertisements and you will find things that are just as foolish as the statements of the most notorious vendors of "patent medicines." In reality, Sherman's list of diseases, with its appropriate vaccine for each one, reminds us of the booklets sent out by the Ensign Remedy Company of Battle Creek, Michigan. This clan of charlatans publishes a booklet which lists all diseases alphabetically, from abortion and abscess to worms, wrinkles and writer's cramp. For Lockjaw use Remedy No. 34, for Housemaid's Knee try No. 1019 A and B. Do you see "Animals and Reptiles?" Then swallow No. 187 A and B. Or if you are "dull and stupid" dose yourself with No. 189. Now the remedies of Mr. Ensign are so quackish that they can appeal only to people of the lowest intelligence. It is not surprising to hear such traffic condemned on all sides. Yet many doctors allow themselves to be fooled by Sherman's list, which is almost equally preposterous, and may in many instances be actually dangerous. It is no wonder then, that patent medicine sharks and quacks of all sorts can point scornful fingers at the medical profession. It is only when that honorable group cleans its own house by refusing to deal with commercialists who seek to exploit it.

that it will be able to fight fraud and quackery effectively.

Before telling the story of how honest but possibly uninformed doctors are fooled by these commercialists, it must be emphasized that the proper use of vaccines, especially in the prevention of certain diseases, is one of the most notable of the triumphs of modern medicine.

As almost everyone knows, the word vaccine came into use through the discoveries of the English physician Jenner. This intelligent doctor noticed that milkmaids and other dairy attendants remained free from smallpox during epidemics of this serious disease. He further observed that cattle often suffered from a mild illness at the same time that people of the same community were smitten with smallpox. This disease of cattle was called vaccinia, a name derived from the Latin word for cow. Jenner believed that the vaccinia of cows and the smallpox of humans were one and the same disease. The only difference was that the malady was not nearly so serious in the cattle. He then reasoned that the failure of the dairymaids to get smallpox was due to their having caught the milder form of it from the cattle they tended. And that, once having had the disease in this mild form, they were then immune to the more serious human type of the illness.

Jenner, like any real experimenter, did not announce this theory and then sit down to rest on his oars. Instead, he took some of the material from the eruptions on the skin of cows sick with vaccinia, and introduced it into the skin of people who were well and who had never had smallpox. He found from this that his theory was right. For the vaccinated individuals did not get smallpox when they were afterwards exposed to it, while people who had not been vaccinated came down with it in great numbers.

This fine discovery of Jenner's consisted then, in giving healthy people a disease which had been made harmless and mild by passage through cows. Such people, having suffered from the milder form which caused them little discomfort, were protected from the much more severe human form. Smallpox has lost its terrors through this beautiful work.

AT THE TIME Jenner lived it was not known that contagious diseases were caused by germs. There were speculations of this kind, but they remained mere guesses until Pasteur and Koch turned such conjectures into knowledge. Pasteur was studying the microbe which caused a fatal disease of chickens. He had found a way to keep this germ alive in his laboratory, by growing it in bottles filled with beef broth, which was free from all other microbes. He could reproduce the disease in healthy fowl by inoculating them with a very small amount of the broth from this bottle. One day, he accidentally injected a chicken with the broth from an old bottle, which had been standing round the laboratory for some weeks. To Pasteur's surprise, the chicken failed to get sick. He knew that the germs he had injected were living ones, for they grew and multiplied when he transferred a little of this old broth to some fresh broth in another bottle. His quick insight told him that he had stumbled across an observation like that made by Jenner many years before. So he hastened to inject the chicken, which had failed to succumb to the old weakened germs, with young vigorous microbes which he knew to be fatal. As he predicted, the fowl that had received the previous dose of the aged microbes, resisted the second fatal injection, which quickly killed new chickens that had not received the previous dose.

He had succeeded, then, in making chickens immune to a fatal disease by injecting them with the weakened aged microbes of this malady. He gave the name vaccine to these attenuated (weakened) microbes. He lost no time in trying to do the same thing with the germs of other contagions, and was soon successful with a serious plague called anthrax. This disease is very fatal to cattle and sheep, and sometimes, too, attacks humans. Pasteur's work was bitterly opposed by many doctors. These men had the natural human suspicion of anything new and strange, and they had little faith in Pasteur, because he was a mere chemist and not a medical graduate. The great scientist did not whimper at their persecutions, but answered by a public experiment, which was crushing and convincing.

THIS TEST is among the most dramatic in the history of science and is a model for all men to follow who believe they have a new boon to confer on mankind, and who wish to convince stubborn doubters of the value of their gift. In the presence of a large gathering of distinguished persons, Pasteur placed a number of sheep in adjacent fields. Half of these he injected with a vaccine consisting of the weakened germs of anthrax. To the other half he gave nothing. Then after some days, he gave all of the sheep an identical amount of vigorous and deadly anthrax microbes. After a day of indescribable suspense for Pasteur and his small band of disciples, the animals which had not previously been inoculated with the weakened germs, became ill, and in a short while all of them died. The vaccinated ones, on the other hand, never became sick, and not one of them died. It was so that Pasteur silenced his opponents, who had gleefully welcomed this public experiment, believing that it would result in the explosion of his ideas. If commercial vaccine mongers, and the promoters of alleged discoveries would follow the same plan, there would be far fewer vaccines for sale.

These experiments of Pasteur built the foundation for the prevention of disease by injection of the germ known to cause the malady in question. His own application of his discovery

Sherman's Polyvalent Vaccines

Vaccine therapy is based on two well-known factors: (a) That antibodies develop, primarily, in the infected tissues during the course of an infection and when killed organisms are injected into healthy tissues antibodies are formed by the tissues into which the killed organisms are injected thus exploiting inactive healthy tissues and forcing them to become actively engaged in antibody formation to aid the infected tissues in overcoming the infection, and, (b) That killed organisms when injected into healthy tissues are more dependable and safer agents towards stimulating tissue cells for antibody formation than the live organisms responsible for infective processes.

Sherman's Polyvalent Vaccines are dependable antigens for destroying or digesting the disease germs in Here is a reproduction of a circular advertising another fake vaccine called Sherman's Polyvalent Vaccines. The very highest authorities have repeatedly warned physicians against the indiscriminate use of these vaccines as they have been known to cause death.

This is an advertisement of Phylacogen Vaccine. It seems almost incredible that a firm of such reputation should thus advertise.

to the prevention of hydrophobia is known to everyone. His methods have been modified by time, for it has been found that you cannot always depend upon a vaccine made of old and weak but still living germs. Such a vaccine might contain a few microbes which had not "lost their kick." In a word it was hard to be sure that you had sufficiently weakened your microbes and a few surviving vigorous ones might set up a fatal disease in a person or animal you had hoped to protect. But it was soon found that it was not necessary to inject a vaccine made from living germs. Dead ones would do almost as well, provided that they were killed as gently as possible. If a mild heat, or some mild germicide be applied to microbes they lose their lives, but when injected into animals or people, the stuff of which they are made still has the power of causing the body to manufacture protective principles.

TWO IMPORTANT things are to be kept in mind about vaccines. First, they are specific. That is to say, if you wish to protect against typhoid fever, you must inject a vaccine made of typhoid germs and not of any other kind. Such a vaccine will give immunity to typhoid fever, but not to pneumonia or mumps or measles. Second, it takes some days after injection of the dead microbes for the body to respond by making the substances to which immunity is due.

An Englishman named Wright tried to protect the English soldiers of the Boer War against typhoid fever by injecting them with a vaccine made of dead typhoid germs. His results were uncertain and it remained for the American army officer, Russell, to perfect this work. Russell was so successful that by 1911 and 1912 he had reduced the occurrence of and death rate from typhoid fever in the army almost to nil. His methods were taken up by all of the armies of the Great War, with the result that typhoid fever was almost a negligible source of death in most of them. In previous conflicts it had been a most serious factor. For example, in our war with Spain, seven times as many soldiers died from typhoid fever as were killed in battle. The protection cannot be said to be perfect. General sanitation, such as the care of sewage, water supply and food must also be attended to, so that people may not swallow a dose of microbes that might overwhelm the protection the vaccine has given them. For example, it would be foolish for a vaccinated man to go swimming in a tub containing millions of virulent typhoid germs. The relative nature of the protection given by vaccines is illustrated by the experience of the English and American armies in the war. Both armies had compulsory anti-typhoid vaccination. Among the English the general sanitation was good, and there was little or no typhoid. Among the Americans the general sanitation was not so good, and there was a considerable amount of typhoid fever, although not nearly so much as in the days before the discovery of vaccines.

Vaccines are also effective in protecting against para-typhoid fever, and are said to be of value in the prevention of Asiatic Cholera, and bubonic plague.

WHILE it is certain that vaccines are very valuable in preventing certain diseases, their curative value, excepting for a very few maladies, rests upon very uncertain foundations. They are apparently beneficial in many cases of boils, and in the rheumatism caused by the germ of gonorrhea. A valuable and authoritative book published by the American Medical Association for the guidance of its members is called "Useful Drugs." This book states that the curative use of ready-made vaccines rests upon uncertain clinical evidence and that no marked beneficial result has been authoritatively confirmed.

In spite of this the doctor is encouraged in his uncertain guessing game by vaccine and phylacogen vendors like Sherman and Parke, Davis & Co. It would seem proper now to take up in some detail the operations of these commercialists, showing their methods of publicity, their willingness to exploit uninformed doctors, and their [Continued on page 138]

THREE THINGS all must learn who survive on the Earth's frontiers: to think quickly, to act instantly, and to conceal fear.

Reb Singleton, in his early manhood a cowboy, a Texas Ranger, a cattleman, a sheriff, acquired the three-fold lesson. In middle age, a quiet, unostentatious, easy-laughing, soft-speaking leader in his business community, a person of financial substance and president of a powerful trust company, he has not forgotten it.

Hurl into a lake one who has learned to swim competently in boyhood, even though for a long generation he has not felt the strangling clutch of deep water, and automatically he will strike out toward safety. Throw into a man-made whirlpool of turbulence a mild, peaceable citizen who in his youth was famed across his whole wild border state as one who decided and acted without hesitation, enforcing his judgments when need be with the crackling lightnings of a Colt forty-five, and what may happen is what happened to Colonel Rebel Lee Singleton in the booming, frenzied, wide open, oil-mad Texas city of Moneda.

There was a girl at the bottom of it; there often is, of course. But not as you may think. This one was hardly more than a child, young enough to be Reb's daughter. And her father was his business enemy.

The chain of circumstance that built itself, link by link, until it stretched to that swift-flashing reel of breathless action in the Wigwam at Moneda, began to be slowly heated for its forging in the broad-verandahed house on San Antonio's most exclusive north-side hill which is the home of Reb and Carol Homans, the Colonel's widowed sister.

COLONEL SINGLETON arrived there one afternoon after his hours of business at the bank, and the door was opened to him by a servant recently acquired, a young woman of dark brown complexion, neatly enough dressed above the knees but wearing white stockings which from their thin texture seemed to be the tint of café au lait and which disappeared into bright pink bed-room slippers of extraordinary area and shapelessness.

"Mrs. Homans at home, Delphine?" Reb asked.

In the smoke-eddy dimness, the Colonel saw a lovely girl of eighteen. Her eyes sparkled but not with mirth; there were tears in them.

"Miz Homans," she said, "done went to the Snipnosium." "It couldn't be the Symposium, could it?" he queried, smiling. She smiled back, as most people, white or black, did when Reb Singleton smiled upon them.

"I'm only repeatin' to you whut Miz Homans say to me," she declared. "Miz Homans tole me she goin' to Snipnosium. She say she be home ample time befo' dinneh."

Chuckling quietly, Reb turned into the living-room, and the servitor's pink-shod feet bore her silently toward the rear of the house. He had asked for his sister only to inform her, as early as might be, that plans had made themselves during the day for a gathering that evening of certain of his cronies who from time to time assembled about a round table to wrest modest sums of cash from one another by cards, skill, luck and persiflage, and she would be home soon; she never arrived much later than five o'clock on the days of the semi-monthly meetings of the Symposium Discussion Club.

It was a warm early winter day, and he took his afternoon newspaper and went out to read it on the front gallery. The checked purr of a motor and the sound of applied brakes made him look up, presently, to see a sedan stopping before the house and his sister getting out of it. He identified the driver of the car as Mrs. Delbert Keene and, as she saw him and nodded amiably, he dropped his paper and went down the walk to pay his respects with old-fashioned Southern ceremony.

On the front seat with Mrs. Keene was a girl. Reb had thought, for a moment, that she was some other member of the Symposium whom Mrs. Keene had picked up to take home. As he came to the curb, however, he recognized her and spoke with unaffected surprise.

"Why, it's Margie Belle, isn't it? Goodness, Margie Belle, but how you are growing! It doesn't take any time a-tall for you young ladies to shoot up out of all recollection of us old fellows. But, come to think of it, it must be all of two years since I've seen you."

"Margie Belle's been away at school, you know," Mrs. Keene told him with a note of pride, and named a nationally famous institution for girls. "She has come home to stay with her daddy and me till after Christmas."

"The young men of San 'Ntonio are going to have a brighter holiday season than usual," Reb said. "I reckon your daddy, Margie Belle, will have to hire an extra house servant to sweep 'em off your doorstep. Or does he give that job to the yard boy?"

Margie Belle, product of a section where extravagant compliments do not cause embarrassment, laughed merrily.

"Come over and clear the gallery yourself, Colonel," she said. "I'd rather talk to you than to a lot of boys, anyway."

Seeing that he had never in his life been in Delbert Keene's house, Reb took this for exactly what it was, a conventional reply to his gallantry, and remarked gravely that she was likely to witness his arrival with a broom almost any evening.

During this exchange of badinage, Reb had appraised the girl shrewdly. She was eighteen, and of a slim sweet attractiveness that demanded swift comparison with the species of modern feminine youth that is embraced in the widely popular appellation of "flapper."

"PRETTY," he thought, then discarded the doll-descriptive word and substituted "lovely." Her features were irregular but piquant. Her hair was soft and shining. Her dark eyes, shaded by long lashes, were lustrous. Her creamy complexion and red lips were unmarred by artificiality. Her clothes were tastefully modish without being extreme. She had intelligence and poise, manners and culture. Colonel Singleton approved of her; she was as pleasing to his mind as she was to his sight.

They talked at the curb for a moment; then Mrs. Homans thanked Margie Belle's mother for bringing her home, and Mrs. Keene started the car. Going up the walk, Reb said:

"Ornamental youngster!"

"And as sweet as they make them," Carol replied, warmly. "Her mother is tremendously proud of her—and of the two younger ones, for that matter. She is bringing her family up well. They are all fine children."

The subject came up again when the dark brown Delphine, no longer pink-footed, had served dessert. Mrs. Homans had been animatedly reviewing a debate at the Symposium for which one Mrs. Sivley had pulled the trigger by introducing as a subject for discussion a popular novel located in the Southwest.

"A lot of the women agreed with her," she said. "They thought the Chambers of Commerce or somebody ought to do something about it. Mrs. Sivley said it is a libel on the state. She was right indignant. One would think to read a book like that, she said, that the wild and woolly days aren't over. Such incidents used to happen here, of course, but this writer would make Easterners think, if they took his book seriously, that gunplay and all that sort of thing, still go on in Texas."

"Well, wasn't she right?" asked Reb.

"Of course things like that don't happen here any more. Except now and then, incidentally. Like that noontime killing on the plaza. Or that gunfight the other night at a roadhouse. By the way, did both those men die?"

Reb grinned appreciation of her point.

"Oh, somebody gets shot once in a while," he admitted. "But on the whole Texas is just as civilized, these days, as any other place. I don't believe there's been more than a dozen killings in San 'Ntonio in three months—not inside the city limits anyway. Compared to the old days, that's plumb civilized." "The book doesn't say that everybody in Texas goes around gun-fighting."

"Oh, well." Reb cheerfully conceded his non-possession of any valid counter-argument by frankly moving off the subject. "I've been thinking ever since I saw her what a beauty that Margie Belle Keene is going to be. Brains, too."

"I think her mother is frightfully worried," she said. "She is trying so hard to bring up the children right and give them a fine education."

"Worried? Over Margie Belle?"

"Oh, no. Margie's the kind of girl you don't worry about. Over Mr. Keene. He is gambling again."

"So am I. I almost forgot to tell you there's a session here tonight. Uvalde Cole, Bill Whitcher, Jimmy Dean."

"If I've gone to bed before you get through, for goodness' sake open a window or two and let some of the smoke out. You forgot it last time. . . . How much money has Delbert Keene got, Reb?"

"No great amount. He has only been coming successfully the last three or four years, you know. Forty thousand dollars, for a guess. He is tied up with some strong people, of course. If he'd learn conservatism he'd have a good chance of being really well-fixed in a few years."

A WOMAN down at the club was telling me the other day—a woman who knows Mrs. Keene's mother pretty intimately—that poker is getting him again. He is one of those men, I gather, who can't gamble just for amusement, for small stakes."

"There are such. Gets 'em like booze or dope. That kind ought to leave it strictly alone."

"Delbert Keene has, for close to ten years. It used to be pretty hard on the family, his mother-in-law said, when he had the craze before. And now with Margie Belle still two years from graduation at an expensive school and the oldest boy within a year of being ready to start college, Mrs. Keene is just about worried to death for fear he'll get to going the same way he used to. And he's one of those men a wife can't say much to. Good-natured enough if he isn't crossed, but not one a wife can reason with on a thing of that sort."

"He's not one that likes to be reasoned with about much of anything," Reb commented dryly. "I reckon it isn't a business secret—we didn't tell it but he did, pretty generally—that he took his account out of our bank because we attempted to reason with him, one day, about a certain deal. You may or may not have heard that he semi-publicly referred to your respected brother as a conservative old fool."

"Oh, not old!" she protested.

"Forty-seven, going on forty-eight."

"Will you never stop telling it, with half the town remembering there isn't but five years difference in our ages? . . . If he would only promise, Mrs. Keene told her mother."

"Promise? What's that?"

"Mrs. Keene says he never broke a promise to her in his life. Or to anybody else."

"He has that reputation," Reb almost reluctantly admitted.

"If he had promised, when he stopped gambling ten years ago, not to play cards any more, he would have kept his word—for life, she says. But he didn't. He just stopped."

"And now he has just started again. Well, I don't know as I can seem to get wildly excited over it. I told him, that day at the bank, that he was heading toward bankruptcy with loose brakes and his cut-out open."

"You don't like him."

"We speak friendly enough, but we don't kiss each other all over the face when we meet. I haven't got any interest in Del Keene a-tall; he can go broke and be darned to him, for all I'd worry," he said. "But it's a shame about that nice wife and those children. I don't know when I've seen a finer kid."

THE HONORABLE William B. Whitcher, a normally reserved and dignified person who was a member of the City Commission and an ex-State senator, surveyed a pot, counted its contents, and flipped into the center of the table a brown chip and a blue one. "She's off for the downs," he declared. "A dollar and two bits."

Reb Singleton peeped at the corners of his five cards and discovered the four, five, seven and eight of hearts. He remarked, "Two pair as small as these won't be worth a hoot after the draw; hence and accordingly, I'll make it uninteresting for the pikers," and pushed forward a raise of three dollars.

C, Dell Keene produced the last of his cashier's checks. "Give me another $5,000," he demanded. "If I get my money out of this game, I'll quit."

Whispering Jimmy Dean, whose Bull of Bashan voice had been rumbling maledictions on fortune for more than an hour, hurled his hand into the discards with disgusted snortings. Uvalde Cole, ex-Ranger, cattleman and capitalist, grinned amiably, and said, "Four-flushing again, eh? If you really had two pairs and wanted to drive us out you'd bump her five," and saw the opening bet and the raise. Gus Lamrow, who had dealt, rapped the table to signify cessation of interest.

Whitcher studied Singleton's bland and ingenuous face.

"If you say you've got two pairs, Reb, I'll believe you—but there's thousands wouldn't," he said. He advanced the necessary chips to stay. "Give me three playing cards, principally aces," he requested of Lamrow.

Reb drew, of course, to his four straight flush. Uvalde Cole proved himself to have a simple pair by matching the opener's draw of three.

Whitcher lifted first one and then another card of his draw from the table.

"I haven't looked at my last card," he said, then, "but, ad interim, as we say in the Greek, I'll bet five dollars."

"I don't get your meaning, because I don't know but four Greek words—grap frut and buttterr'd tost," said Reb, mildly,

A. Singleton's hand swooped to the automatic in Quinney's waistband. "Everybody sit quiet," he ordered. "Jewett, keep your left hand in the air and there won't be anything more happen to you."

"but I'll look now at what I got, and it——" he stopped himself.

He squeezed his cards up before his face and inspected them slowly. They now included the four, five, seven and eight of hearts and the king of clubs. He allowed his features to slightly register disappointment—exactly the degree of disappointment that he would be expected to register for his companions' benefit if he had filled a towering hand and was all set for a massacre.

Letting action complete the broken sentence, he stacked up ten brown chips in one pile, leveled another to equal it, made a third pile of five, and shoved them all in.

"Twenty better," he said pleasantly to his two opponents. "Ow!" cried Uvalde Cole. "Not on one pair. Let Bill do it!" Bill, who in the meantime had looked at his fifth card, did it. "I wound up with three queens," he said, as he put forth the necessary twenty. "Beat 'em and take it."

"Three queens," murmured Reb, and leaned forward to look admiringly into their faces. "Three pretty ladies." He displayed his own valueless quintette. "Wouldn't that have been a nice li'l' hand if I'd filled? Well, I reckon I'll buy me another stack or two of chips."

"Poor ole Reb!" gloated Uvalde Cole. "Caught out on a limb!

A bullet from Reb's revolver broke Jewett's right collar-bone and the shot from his falling pistol went into the floor.

Me, I sympathize with him—not! I hope it happens every time he does it. Deal 'em, Bill. Let's go! If it wasn't for Jimmy's moans here on my right, I'd feel, even if I ain't winning much, that this was a fairly pleasant evenin'."

As Whitcher distributed fresh hands, Jimmy Dean ceased being morose long enough to say: "Man told me the other day that he saw a feller hold a straight flush in a pot with about four thousand dollars in it in one of those wide-open clubs up at Moneda, week or so ago. In a square game, too; at least, this feller that held 'em was square; he wasn't no professional."

"There's your chance to recoup for what us good players do to you, Reb," grinned Uvalde. He added, to explain the jest to the others: "Reb and me are going up to Moneda day after tomorrow. Little matter of business."

"There's a busy town," commented Whitcher. "Ever been there since the oil boom?"

"I have, once. Reb hasn't."

"GAMBLERS, bootleggers, high-jackers, wild women and all-round bad men; believe me, it is some old-fashioned Wild West camp," Whitcher declared. "When I go up there, I take my exact expenses, split it into six pockets, and wear a dollar watch."

"Considerable gun-toting?"

"And gun-shooting," said Uvalde. "A reasonably perfect defense for murder in Moneda is to say your temper got upset."

"Governor'll have to send the Rangers in sooner or later, I suppose," Lamrow said.

"Rangers!" exclaimed Whitcher. "They'll be lucky if it doesn't take the militia. Rough? Say, those gamblers up there are using tricks that went out before the Silver King closed."

"Speaking of tricks of the trade," remarked Reb, "are we a session of the Snipnosium Discussion Club, or what?"

It was after the game had stopped, at midnight, and while the chips were being cashed, that Whitcher referred to Moneda.

"I didn't know you and Uvalde were interested in the Moneda field," he said.

"We ain't," Reb told him, "but we might be. It isn't any secret—at least not between us girls—seeing it's a public auction, and advertised, and all that. We're aiming to bid on that receiver's sale of the Rolling Prairie Company. If we don't have to go much over a quarter of a million, we might buy. Not all our money; I don't believe Uvalde's got that much laying around loose and I know cussed well I haven't; there are some other fellows in the deal with us."

"What does the successful bidder have to deposit to bind the sale—ten percent?"

"Yes."

"Take it in paper that won't be any good to the high-jackers without endorsement."

"Did you think us two old tenderfeet might pack it in one-dollar bills?" reproachfully demanded the humorous Uvalde of Bill Whitcher.

Lambrow looked up from rolling a cigarette.

"You won't be the only San Antonians bidding," he said. "I hear the Smith-Gestwerther crowd is after that property. Del Keene is going to represent them at the sale."

"That so?" Reb commented, noncommittally.

"I don't know Delbert Keene very well," Whispering Jimmy rumbled, "but, somehow or other, he hasn't ever rung any loud alarms with me. They say he's a live wire. That's what some of 'em say. Is he, Reb?"

"I reckon so," Reb said, and blew a cloud of smoke. "Yes, I reckon he is. With defective insulation."

There were two beds in the hotel room at Moneda, and Uvalde Cole sat on one of them and eased off his shoes.

"I don't guess I'll go out and look at the bright lights," he said. "I didn't sleep good last night, and I've got rheumatism around those three darn buckshot that I got under my shoulder blade back in ninety-one, and something I et ain't settin' pretty. The thing for me to do is hit the blankets and get me some sleep. If you don't mind roaming round alone—"

"Not a bit," Singleton assured him. "I don't aim to be out very late; just figure on drifting round and watching the tiger. What's the biggest and best of the palaces of chance?"

"I don't know which is the best, but one of the biggest and worst is the Wigwam; it was the time I was here before, anyway. 'Wigwam Social and Pastime Club.' Run by an ol'-timer named Tim Golden. Ever hear tell of him?" [Continued on page 108]

Can a woman find freedom in a man-made world? That was Lilla Vance's problem. Read how Lilla's biographer, the distinguished author of TOGETHER, portrays that period of her life when she experienced the disillusionment of marriage

HER OWN LIFE

By Robert Herrick

A Résumé of the Early Chapters

Illustrated by Dalton Stevens

IT WAS Lilla who found her father. He had been working with a circular saw. Something had gone wrong and the saw had bitten deeply into his shoulder. The girl, then only twelve, did what she could to help him; but it was useless. With the death of her father, Lilla lost the only friend who understood and appreciated her. Of course the Wyoming ranch was no place for Lilla and her mother after this tragedy so they came East and settled in a Chicago suburb where Lilla went to school and grew to womanhood.

As a girl, Lilla certainly was not pretty; indeed, she was homely and none knew it better than she. However, as she rounded into maturity she became at least attractive, though always conspicuous because of her size.

During the summer following her graduation from high school she met a distant cousin and the first love episode of her life occurred.

The cousin was not particularly attractive but somehow he fired the girl's imagination and one afternoon when they were wandering through the woods she yielded to his importunities. Lilla was not the girl to be crushed by a mistake of this kind, but there was a moment during the following night when she seriously contemplated suicide. Even then she told herself that the situation would not have been so desperate had there been anyone in whom she could have confided. The relations between herself and her mother were strained and the father to whom she might have talked was dead. However, Lilla's life followed a rather even course for some time thereafter and it was not until she became a teacher in the high school that love entered with great seriousness into her life. Gordon James, the young superintendent of the high school, became interested, fell in love, proposed to her and they were married. It never for a moment occurred to Lilla that she was marrying a man with whom she was desperately in love. Everything that her mother had told her led her to believe that the feeling she had for her fiancé and later her husband was that which should characterize a young woman in her attitude toward a man. But with her marriage began for Lilla many dreary and at times miserable years. The coming of the first boy was a relief and as the baby lay in her arms, Lilla was supremely happy. That her husband had not wanted the baby did not then mar her satisfaction. So things ran until it became necessary for her to admit that she was expecting another baby. This was in many ways the breaking point of her life. Gordon was distinctly unpleasant when she gave him this information. He was afraid a growing family would interfere with his personal ambition. As a result they drifted apart and after Mr. James's election as county superintendent of schools, there were long periods when they saw little of each other. This incompatibility was emphasized when Lee Smith, a friendly book agent, came to live at their home and of him Gordon became violently and inexcusably jealous. This jealousy led to a bitter scene in the course of which Gordon accused her of indiscreet conduct with Smith. "Don't lie like that Gordon," was Lilla's retort, "I might kill you!" The quarrel ended with Gordon saying, referring again to Lilla's impending motherhood, "If you had any consideration for me, you wouldn't let this happen. Even now it's not so very late." At which Lilla cried, "Oh, you coward! To say such a thing to me—to suggest it—even to think it!" With this cry, she left Gordon and went to her own room, bolting the door behind her.

The Story Continues:

LILLA was never clear in her memory of what happened the night of the quarrel nor for many days until she woke early one hot summer morning in a hospital and watched a white clad nurse coming and going about her bed. She tried to remember how she had got there. But all she could recollect was flying through the hot night along the sandy lake shore in a mad endeavor to get away somewhere, never to go back. Then a terrible resolve which dried all the tears in her body forever; then darkness—from which she shuddered. Ever afterwards she shuddered when her mind tried to penetrate that dark spot in her consciousness.

It was as if all the wrongness of her futile life, her groping youth, her mistaken marriage to her mother's ideal of what was good and pure, her ineffective struggle to carry on the ideal of a good woman and a good wife, had suddenly crashed to bits in one swift terrible act, which divided her once and for all from what she had been, from what she might have been. . . .

Before she left the hospital, she knew that she could never have another child.

"You know, my dear lady," the doctor said warningly, "you can consider yourself mighty fortunate to come off with your life." He looked at her meaningly.

"Do you think that it is so fortunate?" she asked dully.

"Oh, maybe you don't think so now, but in a few weeks you'll feel differently. You'll forget!" he said with the tolerant cynicism of one who deals habitually with human nature at its weakest ebb. "Anyhow, you won't have to worry any more about that."

Lilla closed her eyes.

Mrs. Vance came to see her and brought David, who talked volubly about Lee, the motorboat, and the garden, which was a relief to Lilla and to her mother. The child's chatter made it impossible for them to refer to what had happened, and Lilla realized, almost with relief, that never again would they have to go into things intimately. What had happened to her was an insuperable barrier between them. So much the better.

Gordon had sent flowers and called every day. He would, Lilla reflected, do that for the sake of appearances. Lilla sent the flowers to the public ward on the excuse that their odor oppressed her. The second time her mother came, she said, "Gordon is waiting outside, Lilla, and wants to see you."

"I'm too tired," Lilla said dully.

"When will you see him, dear?"

"When I go back—next week, the nurse says it will be."

"Very well," Mrs. Vance agreed with a sigh of relief.

She had not felt sure that Lilla would return to her home.

Lilla herself had not known until she spoke what she meant to do. In her present apathy, it seemed immaterial what she did. David was there and expected her. It would be much the same if she went to Lawndale with her mother, and besides there would be all the explanations. . . .

So one hot August afternoon, she found herself back in her room on the second floor of the Wilmette house. The garden plot had flourished greatly during her absence: Lilla could see the tops of the corn and the beans from her bed.

"Lee and I kept up the garden," David explained importantly. "I watered it 'most every night!"

Lee was not staying in the house, David explained, but he came out every other afternoon and took him out in the motorboat and worked in the garden. Toward five o'clock, Lilla heard Gordon's voice in the room below speaking to her mother; then shortly his stealthy tread on the stairs. She closed her eyes, pretending to sleep, but presently opened them, impatient to have it over with. He was standing just within the door, looking at her. Their eyes met. Lilla thought that she hated her husband, that for the first time in her life she loathed a human being; but now that he stood before her, she was surprised to perceive how unimportant he was to her; how little she felt anything.

"Well," he said, clearing his throat, "how do you feel, Lilla?" "All right."

"That's good." He sat down awkwardly in a chair beside the bed and matched his finger-tips precisely one against the other, as if he were trying to formulate his next remark. "You must take care of yourself—keep perfectly quiet for some time. Your mother will stay here and look after things, you know. She's managed to get a very good servant. Everything is going all right. So just make yourself easy until you feel quite strong."

Lilla said nothing. There was nothing to say. He too had made up his mind to ignore the past. Very likely, he had convinced himself that he had had no part in it—in fact was forgiving her magnificently for her reckless action, which might have resulted in disaster to him. A faint smile hovered on her lips at the thought. However, it was best so.

"Don't you want the shade lowered?" he asked and without awaiting her reply lowered all the shades to an even distance, and then with a final, "Is there anything you want, Lilla?" left the room.

THE NEXT morning while David was at school and Mrs. Vance was away from the house, Lee Smith called, bringing with him a great mass of sweetpeas.

"How goes it, Lilla!" he called cheerily from the hail below. "May I come up? Say, but it's good to see you back here, Lilla!" he beamed as he came into her room. "Isn't the garden fine and dandy? David is a regular little farm-hand—a regular worker. You can make him earn his keep out of that patch."

"He told me how you two looked after it. That was nice of you, Lee!"

"Of course we couldn't let the things die; you'd spent so much time on that patch. I never knew how much hoeing a bit of ground could take. I'd never make a real agriculturist, Lilla!" He laughed amiably, and chattered on about the motorboat, about David, and other trifles.

Lee did not refer to Gordon, and yet Lilla felt sure that Lee had judged Gordon and despised him, and for this reason had refused to stay in the house after that evening.

"I'm sorry you aren't staying here, Lee," Lilla said as he rose to leave.

"It didn't work out just right," Lee drawled placidly. "I guess it's just as well for me to stay in the city and tend to business sometimes. But I'll be coming out to see you often, Lilla, and David. Of course! David and me's got a lot of things planned."

After the young man had gone, Lilla lay very still trying to put her thoughts together, to come to some conclusion about herself, Gordon, life, the future. But she could not. The old way of things seemed to be softly folding in about her as the waves close in above the wake of a boat, but it could never be completely as it was before.

The maid came in and asked questions; Mrs. Vance came in with talk about the prices of foodstuffs and David's clothes; Gordon finally arrived with the evening newspapers. It seemed there was to be war in Europe. The newspapers were full of it.

"Those Europeans," Mrs. Vance said sententiously, "are always aching for a fight. They've been talking about it for years and now they are at it."

"It is a bad system," Gordon explained blandly.

"Suppose I said to them I meant to have a divorce, to leave Gordon, what would they say?" Lilla mused. "But where should I go and what should I do? Teach?" She made a little face. That was ended, too, like so much else.

"I suppose they want something badly," she said aloud, "bad enough to fight for it. . . . That would be nice, too!"

Gordon and her mother looked at her with amazement as if she had been talking in her sleep. . . .

One of her neighbors, a little dark woman, with lusterless eyes, the wife of a lawyer, seeing Lilla in her garden one day, stopped to talk. Gertrude Reiben was very much excited, filled with a suppressed rage and bitterness that flowed into a long vehement defense of Germany and Austria.

LILLA listened trying to understand the jumble of historical facts, incoherent accusations, passions and feelings that the other woman poured out. It was a strange new world, about which she was very ignorant.

"I'll bring you over some papers and books, so you can see that it is not as you read in our newspapers—not at all," Gertrude concluded, as she rose to go.

"I wish you would," Lilla said, "I'd like to know more about it, about both sides. Come again!"

As Gertrude Reiben left, she passed Gordon, who bowed to her coldly.

"So that Reiben woman's been here," he observed to Lilla a little later. "I wouldn't be thick with her if I were you!"

"Why not?"

"She's a German you know, and her husband's an Austrian."

"So are some millions more in the United States," Lilla remarked.

"Yes, and we're likely to have a bad time with them, too," he replied sourly.

It was like Gordon, Lilla reflected, to adopt a popular point of view and shield himself by mental blinders from any disturbing considerations that might invalidate his position. Possibly if her husband had not been so sure, Lilla would have cared less to think for herself.

Lilla read the books and papers supplied by Gertrude Reiben and much else—everything she laid her hand upon about the war. Much that she read she felt was designed not to explain but to make converts, and that was not what her mind was seeking. She did not know just what she craved, but it was not the state of assurance and certainty that Gordon enjoyed. She found little interest in talking with him about the war because he repeated positively merely what he had read or heard, and took vast assumptions for granted.

Lee Smith surprised Lilla very much by his vehement denunciation of "the Huns." He came to dinner one Sunday and chorused hate with Gordon.

"Why don't you two fight instead of talk, if you feel like that?" Lilla asked at last, coldly, weary of so much futile fun.

Gordon shrugged his shoulders, as if her remark were not worthy of notice. But Lee said with evident emotion, "I'd be there by now, Lilla, if there was anyone to look after my folks but me! Do you think I like sticking around here peddling text-books when men are being killed over there for the right?"

He looked at Lilla with anguish in his eyes.

IT WAS after this dinner when Lee had left that Gordon took Lilla to task for her association with the Reibens.

"You'll get talked about," he said, "and in my position it is very unfortunate for you to identify yourself with spies and enemies of your country."

"They aren't yet."

"Not technically, perhaps, but you understand what I mean. You do it out of obstinacy—just wish to be peculiar."

"You think so?" Lilla said coldly.

Lilla gave him free rein for some time until Gordon feeling that he had made his point was preparing to depart.

"Gordon!" She detained him by her neutral tone. "Perhaps you would rather that we no longer kept up the form of living together as husband and wife."

"What do you mean?"

"That we quit!"

"I'm not going into that. . . . You know I won't have any of that nonsense, divorce and scandal, and David!"

"All right," Lilla agreed. "I'm not pressing it. . . . But you must understand, Gordon, that I mean to think as I like and see the people I want to. . . ."

One spring afternoon, the first year of the war, Lilla went to the city early. She was to meet Lee Smith for dinner and afterwards go to a concert with him. As she passed the county building on her way from the railroad station, she remembered a tax bill that she had forgotten to give Gordon, and turned into the building to leave it at his office. She had not been to his office for more than a year. It was in a remote corner of the big building and one entered from the corridor into a large outer office where filing cases and stenographers' desks were huddled. The outer office being empty, Lilla went on and pushed open the door to the corner room which Gordon occupied. It was a small square room, with two large windows, a strip of dark carpet and two desks. As Lilla entered a young woman looked up from the roll-top desk where she was running over a typed list of names and asked coolly: "What do you want?"

There came the soft sliding sound of feet on the bare stairs, and Miss Libowski appeared. She came very slowly, as if forcing herself. Her face was chalky white.

She was small and very pretty, with a mass of dull black hair wound loosely around an oval face. Foreign, Lilla thought, as she shut the door behind her.

"Applications are not received here," the young woman continued in a drawling tone of bored superiority.

"She thinks I want a place," Lilla thought, merely smiling in answer to this remark. She saw her very distinctly, and noted her dress, which was quiet and suitable for office work, yet in quality and style superior to that of a stenographer.

"Well?" the young woman insisted.

She too had made a pretty minute inventory of Lilla's looks and appearances with the slight impertinence of youth toward age. She had the advantage in years and looks, and was aware of it—to Lilla's amusement.

"Mr. James is not here?" Lilla asked.

"Evi-dently not!"

"When will he be back?"

"He did not say."

This, Lilla felt swiftly, was probably a lie. She was sufficiently interested in the young woman installed at her husband's desk to prolong the conversation. So she sat down uninvited.

"Is there anything I can do for you?" the younger woman repeated.

"Oh, no," said Lilla smiling. "I don't think so. . . . You are one of the teachers?"

"I am Mr. James's assistant," the young woman snapped.

"I didn't know he had an assistant," Lilla remarked.

"No? . . . If you have any business with Mr. James you can wait for him in the outer office," the assistant observed, drawing out a drawer in the desk and delving within in an intimate manner.

"I haven't any special business with Mr. James," Lilla replied, watching the young woman's movements in the drawer.

"Then if you will allow me," the assistant drawled, extricating her hand from the drawer with the desired paper. "I will go on with my work."

"Certainly."

But instead of turning back to her papers, the young woman rose and stared haughtily at the intruder. Lilla stared back at her, amused.

"What does an assistant do for Mr. James?" she asked casually.

"All sorts of things, naturally. Receives callers! . . . Just at present I am preparing the material for Mr. James's report, and I work up notes for him when he has lectures to prepare, and sometimes I take dictation. . . . There's always plenty to do: Mr. James is a very busy man!"

"Of course. It must be interesting work, isn't it?"

"Sometimes!"

Again the girl's look became hostile as she surveyed the inquisitive stranger.

"I wish you would tell me your business," she said.

"I haven't any really. I just came in to give my husband this tax bill."

LILLA ROSE and smilingly laid the slip of paper on the desk.

"You are Mrs. James?"

"Yes, I am Mr. James's wife," Lilla said watching the young woman's rapid change of manner. "Please tell him I called . . . and now I won't trouble you any longer."

"Won't you wait?" the girl hastened to say. "I'm sure Mr. James will be back soon—he's only gone over to the avenue on an errand."

"No, I have nothing to see him about especially. . . . I am glad to have met you, Miss—"

"Libowski—Valerie Libowski," the young woman said quickly. Pole, thought Lilla.

"I shall see you again, Miss Libowski," Lilla said as the assistant accompanied her to the private entrance of the office.

She smiled and the smile rose to a little laugh as she thought of the girl's surprise when she learned who the visitor was. A pretty girl, decidedly—soft, pliant, mobile of face and body, with large eyes. Lilla's mind kept turning over the picture, in Gordon's office, of their encounter, the sudden flash from the girl's dull eyes, the curiously conscious look of the mobile face.

At dinner with Lee Smith that evening, before the symphony, Lilla was absent-minded. In the midst of Lee's talk about the war and his wish to be in it, Lilla broke in.

"Women ought to work, Lee, the same as men. . . . I wish I had a job!"

"You have one, Lilla," Lee, who had strict notions of woman's destiny, protested. "What makes you think you haven't a job?"

"Gordon's secretary or assistant—I met her for the first time this afternoon."

"Um-m," Lee commented.

And all through the symphony, whose heavy chords stimulated Lilla's thinking, glinted the picture of that head of dark hair bending over the papers on the big desk, the mobile mouth, the pale young face. Suddenly the clue stole into Lilla's mind.

"I wonder!" she thought. "Gordon! Of all people! But why not?" her mind said. "Why not," and she smiled so broadly that her companion at the conclusion of the movement asked, "What's funny about that, Lilla?"

"Nothing!" But she burst into uncontrollable laughter which did not subside until the conductor once more tapped for silence with his baton.

"Gordon!"

Then she realized that she ought to be very much upset, at the suspicion even of such a thing. But she was not in the least disturbed. Amused, rather. It was a sign how far apart they were, she supposed; how indifferent she was to her husband that she could even in thought find amusement in the supposition of his infidelity. It horrified her in the end that she could be so cool and indifferent. "I must be growing very old," she concluded, and turned her mind back to the music.

It would not stay there, however—it stole back to the dark girl at the desk who began to be more of a person to her, and she tried to imagine Miss Libowski and Gordon together in the office.

"After all, I know nothing about it—and I don't care," she concluded sensibly on the way out of the city in the suburban train. "If she helps him, if she can give him anything he wants, I am glad. Anyhow I am not going to bother."

WITH THIS resolve she did not refer to her chance call at the county building and presently might have forgotten all about it if she had not run into Gordon on the suburban train, one evening sitting with his assistant. Lilla nodded pleasantly to the girl and held out her hand.

"Let me introduce you—" Gordon began.

"You don't have to, Gordon," Lilla laughed. "Miss Libowski and I know each other already. . . . You live out this way? . . . No, keep your seat, Gordon—there's one over there."

Miss Libowski mumbled something about having moved to Evanston to escape the dirt of the city. Lilla nodded and passed on to her seat. At Evanston the girl got out of the train, turning before she left to bow to Lilla, who nodded pleasantly. She joined Gordon who said carefully, "Miss Libowski has just moved to Evanston. She is the best secretary I ever had! I don't know how I could get through my work without her."

"What does Miss Libowski do that makes her such a valuable assistant?" Lilla asked as they were walking from the station.

"Why, all sorts of things," Gordon replied vaguely. "She used to be a teacher and knows all the ropes. Then she is an excellent typist and stenographer, and is sufficiently educated to help me with my addresses—finding material and all that . . . and she is excellent in meeting people."

"I see," said Lilla softly, reflectively. That sort of work would not suit her, she was thinking, and oddly this encounter with her husband's secretary had stirred her to consider ways and means of earning money. She talked of this growing desire to Gertrude Reiben and others, to almost everyone whom she saw, in the direct way she had of discussing without reserve whatever was in her mind.

But for the present nothing more practical offered itself to Lilla than enlarging the garden plot by adding a strip from the vacant field next door. She undertook to clear this of weeds and sod with David's help and an occasional half holiday that Lee Smith contributed. Then the rough ground had to be turned and leveled and fertilized. By the time this had been accomplished, Lilla had already used most of fifty dollars, which her mother had given her for another purpose.

"I can't make it pay this year," she thought with some dismay.

GORDON had decided to run again for office, this time for the state superintendency of schools. For this purpose, he was keeping himself in the notice of the public by accepting every opportunity to speak before different organizations. Lilla, opening the newspapers, often found his name and a brief report of his remarks at the Rotarian lunch or the open meeting of the Baptist Council of Churches. Lilla read these brief reports carefully and tried to think how Gordon looked as he delivered them, standing very stiffly on the tips of his toes to increase his height. She could see the earnest look come into his face as he shuffled his notes before beginning a funny story, as he had ¶ Valerie rose unsteadily. "Thank you very much," she said and crumpled in a heap at Gordon's feet. "She's fainted!" Lilla cried and picked the girl up in her strong arms.

trained himself to do. "I suppose she prepares his stories for him and the speeches too. I wonder if they are good."

Gordon made various short tours in the state giving addresses before small town audiences. All this was indirect campaigning. The nomination practically insured an election. But it was necessary to impress the politicians, and that Gordon was endeavoring to do by keeping himself before the public and speaking as often as he could. It no longer interested Lilla as it had done three years before when she had been thrilled by Gordon's effort at a political career. It all seemed a little stale and perfunctory.

Toward the end of June, Lilla made a visit with David to the Lawndale house. Uncle George Porter had died the previous year, and her mother and aunt after much debate had decided to give up the lodge house and move to California the coming autumn. There was a melancholy pleasure for Lilla in returning to Lawndale, where she had spent her vivid girlhood. How far, far away it was now! She felt as old as the two old women, with whom she sat for long hours.

"GORDON has gone to Springfield?" her mother asked her for the third or fourth time.

"He said he was going on Friday."

"He's away a good deal, I suppose."

"More or less."

"You will have to move to Springfield if he is elected, I suppose," her mother added.

"I suppose so—I haven't thought much about it."

"I wish I saw Gordon oftener," her mother went on. "I like him so much. . . . He's such a hard-working man. You ought to take more interest in his plans, Lilla."

"Why? He doesn't take any in mine!"

The two women looked at each other challengingly and dropped the conversation. It was a pity, Lilla thought, that her mother could not have married Gordon. They would have agreed splendidly! It was a pity congenial people could not always get together in marriage. Then she tried to think out more clearly what sort of woman would have suited Gordon, would have admired and helped him in his career. The speculation interested her. Miss Libowski? She rejected the Polish girl. Gordon needed something more conventional.

After three days, Lilla was restless and wanted to get back to her garden, her quiet routine, and left Lawndale. It was, very likely, the last time she would see the place. One dropped places like old dresses. Of all she had known, the Wyoming ranch, Lawndale, Pitcher's Landing, the Wisconsin Avenue apartment, her present home, only the ranch stood out vividly with an atmosphere warmed by romance.

There were lights in the house, on both floors, Lilla perceived as she turned into their street. Gordon had come back, then, earlier than he expected. Or could it be burglars? With this latter idea in mind, Lilla sent David to the back door while she rang the bell violently. She could hear it echo through the still house. At first no sound, then as she was about to put her key in the lock and venture in she heard footsteps on the stairs, and a fumbling with the safety chain as Gordon opened the door. It was a warm night, and Gordon was in his shirt-sleeves and smoking.

"Lilla!" he exclaimed, still holding the door, as if dazed.

AS soon as she entered the house she knew that Gordon was not alone.

"Miss Libowski came over to help me with some work," he stammered hurriedly.

"Where is she?" Lilla asked quite simply.

"Up in the study." Gordon's voice was now quite steady.

"I thought it would be pleasanter out here than at the office."

Lilla smiled. How clumsy men were!

"You didn't go to Springfield, then?"

"No—yes—but I got back this morning."

"Tell her to come down if you have finished, and we'll have some supper."

Lilla spoke quite naturally, threw off her hat, and looked into the dining-room, where she saw some used dishes.

"Perhaps you have already had supper?"

"N—not exactly."

There came the soft sliding sound of feet on the bare stairs, and Miss Libowski appeared. She came very slowly, one step at a time, as if forcing herself. Her face was chalky white. The dull black eyes were like holes.

"Oh, Miss Libowski," Lilla said cheerfully, "come and help me get supper—there must be something ready outside."

"She looks so pitifully small and weak," Lilla thought, "as if I were going to eat her up. . . ." Lilla was enjoying herself.

"I'd like to," the girl said in a miserable voice.

"Come on!" Lilla called out over her shoulder, cordially.

Gordon with a gesture to the girl disappeared upstairs.

Lilla bustled about the kitchen preparing three times the food that could be eaten, talking all the time, to cover up the girl's confusion and awkwardness. "She must be feeling awfully small," Lilla thought, pityingly, "to get caught like that. It was stupid of Gordon to do such a thing, stupid and selfish!"

Lilla also did most of the talking at supper, telling at great length of her three days at Lawndale, giving an elaborate account of every Lawndale resident whom she had seen.

Miss Libowski made a pretence of eating, but Lilla could see her hand tremble, and the black eyes in the white face follow her every motion. "Poor thing!" thought Lilla. "I wish she didn't suffer so. . . ."

The girl rose unsteadily from the table, saying, "Thank you very much, Mrs. James, for your kindness. I must be going now," and suddenly crumpled in a little heap at Gordon's feet.

"Why, Valerie, what's the matter!" he cried.

"She's fainted!" Lilla said, running to the girl and picking her up in her strong arms.

Between them, they carried her into the living-room and put her limp figure on the lounge.

"Get some ice water," Lilla directed Gordon, who was hovering about agitatedly.

With a long shudder and sigh, the girl finally opened her eyes.

"I must go," she moaned feebly.

"You can't think of going tonight," Lilla replied positively, bathing her forehead. "I'll get you to bed, and you will be all right in the morning."

The girl began to cry, softly, silently. Lilla made a motion to Gordon to leave the room. . . .

After Valerie Libowski had been put to bed in the room on the third floor which had been arranged for Lee Smith, and her sobbing had subsided to a long clutching sigh, Lilla left her, and went to her own room.

"Well!" said Lilla softly to herself. "Well!"

HOW SHE loves him!" Lilla thought. "How she loves Gordon." Her first inclination to laugh at the absurdity of such an emotion was checked by her perception of the pathos of the situation, the tragedy for the girl. She could not see Gordon as Lilla saw him after fourteen years of marriage—his littleness, his egotism, his selfishness. She must see him as he probably liked to see himself—chivalrous, devoted to duty and public service, brilliant. Yes, Valerie Libowski probably helped Gordon to keep up his own bluff! Her love and devotion sustained him morally. That clue led to so many perplexing considerations about her husband and marriage that Lilla put them aside for the present.

She found her guest much calmer in the morning when she carried her a breakfast cup of coffee. Valerie was trying to dress herself, but Lilla persuaded her with some difficulty to rest longer.

"Mr. James will need me at the office," she suggested.

"He'll have to get along without you, then," Lilla said brightly.

"I don't like making you all this trouble!"

"No trouble at all. . . . I'll send Gordon to you before he leaves for the office."

"You are so good," the girl moaned.

Gordon stayed some time talking to Miss Libowski, and when he came down remarked casually as he prepared to leave the house, "She'll be all right in a little while, I think."

"She can stay as long as she likes," Lilla replied in an even voice. "It doesn't make any difference to me."

Gordon gave her a swift glance, and resumed in his colorless voice, "She just needs a little rest. . . . Good-by, dear," and clicked the door after him. Lilla could see him through the living-room window, head erect, portfolio under his arm, newspaper neatly folded—the picture of a correct, law-abiding, public officer, setting forth for the day's cares. "Men!" Lilla exclaimed with a little smile, and began her housework.

Later in the morning Valerie Libowski came downstairs almost furtively as if she had thought to escape from the house unobserved. Lilla seeing her from the dining-room greeted her with—"Feeling better? That's good! We'll have luncheon presently on a tray in the front room, and then I'll show you my garden."

She bustled around talking at random [Continued on page 134]

Here is a
WALL STREET MAN
Working with the MILITANT
FARMERS

Eugene Meyer, Jr. AND THE FARM BLOC

By William Hard

THERE is a man in Washington who has lent more than one-third of one billion of dollars of public money to private parties in this country since January of last year.

This man is Eugene Meyer, Jr., Managing Director of the United States War Finance Corporation. His work is the best possible platform from which to view the achievements and the prospects of the "Farm Bloc" movement in the United States.

Virtually all of the money lent by Mr. Meyer has been lent for the facilitating of the marketing of farm products. It has been lent—some of it—to farmers' coöperative marketing associations. It has been lent—some of it—to banks in order to be lent by them to farmers' associations and to individual farmers. Virtually all of it has gone directly or indirectly to the promoting of the orderly marketing of the commodities produced by farmers.

This work has been strongly supported by the "Farm Bloc" in Congress. In fact, it may quite justly be regarded as having been the very first achievement of the "Farm Bloc."

It became its first achievement through events which happened in the year 1920. In that year the work of the War Finance Corporation was suspended by the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury in this matter was supported by the President. Senators and Congressmen representing agricultural constituencies roused themselves to resist the Secretary of the Treasury and the President. They resisted them.

Some of these Senators and Congressmen were Republicans and some were Democrats. They united themselves together on behalf of a resolution ordering the resuming of the work of the War Finance Corporation. Through their efforts the resolution was passed. It was vetoed by the President. It was thereupon re-passed—by a two-thirds majority of each house.

This spectacular success was a "Farm Bloc" success and it stands historically first in the list of successes now credited—by both friendly and unfriendly observers—to the influence of the "Farm Bloc" on Capitol Hill.

It happened, however, that the one greatest single personal force in securing the resumption of the work of the War Finance Corporation was not that of any member of the "Farm Bloc." It was that of a banker—Eugene Meyer, Jr.—who often is in disagreement on various things with various members of the "Farm Bloc."

On the subject of the War Finance Corporation he was in total unison with them. That is, he wanted its work resumed. So the country was treated to the novel spectacle of an agitation forcefully conducted by a Wall Street personage for stimulating the public mind—and the "Farm Bloc" mind—to an overriding of a presidential veto in order to promote an expansion of governmental credit to the marketing operations of farmers.

Mr. Meyer, though by no means always applauded by the whole of the "Farm Bloc," was in a way the godfather at its christening.

It is desirable at this point to say a few words regarding the nature of the "Farm Bloc" and regarding the character of its leaders and members.

Its leaders are men of moderation—of moderation relatively to the forces behind them in important parts of their constituencies. The first leader of the "Farm Bloc" was Senator Kenyon. The present leader is Senator Capper. The names of Kenyon and Capper gave Senator Moses his opportunity for one of his most widely appreciated witticisms—the one which hailed the "Farm Bloc" as the "Ken Cap Klan."

But was Senator Kenyon a "radical"? He was not—if compared with what has come after him in Iowa. Senator Kenyon retired. In the Republican primary in Iowa for nominating his successor the choice has fallen on Col. Smith W. Brookhart. Brookhart is admittedly very much more "radical" than Senator Kenyon ever was.

AS FOR Senator Capper, he is a business magnate. He is the "Lord Northcliffe of the Corn Belt." He owns two daily papers—one in Topeka and one in Kansas City. He owns two farm weeklies, one of which circulates principally in Kansas and the other of which circulates also in Missouri, Oklahoma, Texas, Colorado, Nebraska, and other neighboring states. He owns four farm semi-monthlies, circulating respectively in Missouri, Nebraska, and other neighboring states. He owns two farm monthlies, which have general agricultural circulations.

The print-paper which Senator Capper uses for printing these various farm periodicals has been estimated by his advertising department to require each year the services of 390 railroad cars.

It might seem unreasonable to suppose that such a man would pine to destroy the present property system of the United States. It might seem unreasonable; and it is in fact unreasonable. Senator Capper wants a revolution just about as much as the Harriman National Bank in New York wants it.

The Harriman National Bank prints advertisements against the "Farm Bloc." The "Farm Bloc" is saving the Harriman

National Bank from a situation which would be much worse for it than the "Farm Bloc."

The measures supported by the "Farm Bloc" have been moderate indeed in comparison with the measures demanded by large elements in our agricultural districts. They have been moderate indeed in comparison with the measures supported earnestly and vigorously in Washington by certain Senators of high ability and of wide popularity.

These latter Senators will be stronger rather than weaker in the next Congress. They will be reinforced on the floor of the Senate by the presence of Brookhart, of Iowa, and by the presence probably of Frazier, of North Dakota.

LA FOLLETTE, Norris, Brookhart, Frazier—others on the Republican side—many others on the Democratic side—would go much farther than the bulk of the "Farm Bloc" has yet gone. New York seems to think that the "Farm Bloc" is the worst. The worst is yet to come.

The "Farm Bloc" today has a right wing and a left wing. The right wing has been dominant. The left wing may grow.

There are two attitudes taken toward the "Farm Bloc." One is to rail at the "Farm Bloc." The other is to try to cure the facts which produce the "Farm Bloc."

What are those facts? A standard specimen of them was once presented to the House Committee on Banking and Currency by Congressman King of Illinois. He said:

"Two young men in my county went to farming, and they equipped themselves. Harness and horses were high, and all of their equipment was high in price. They put in a crop of corn. It cost them seventy cents a bushel to put the corn in. Today it is worth only fifty cents. If they had been financially enabled to carry that corn a little while, they could have gotten out. They could have saved themselves. Now they have lost everything; they have gone away, and they never will be able to get a start again to take a farm."

What was the trouble in this case? The trouble was a temporarily collapsed market. It was the inability to postpone selling till the market was reasonably restored. It was the necessity of proceeding to sell in the midst of the collapse. It was the lack of credit for carrying the crop till the collapse was over.

The problem was a marketing problem. The element lacking for a successful solving of that problem was credit.

If the principal measures supported by the "Farm Bloc" are examined, they will be found to be measures dealing with marketing—or credit.

The measure ordering a resumption of the work of the War Finance Corporation was for the purpose of financing the marketing of agricultural products during this existing emergency. The measure regulating the packers was for the purpose of regulating the markets which the packers offer to the producers of cattle, sheep, hogs. The measure regulating grain exchanges was for the purpose of regulating the markets which the grain exchanges offer to the producers of wheat, rye, corn, oats.

The measure putting agriculture on the list of national interests to be considered in the appointment of members of the Federal Reserve Board was for the purpose of exerting a direct agricultural influence on the Federal Reserve Board's rules regarding credit. The measure expanding the work of the Federal Farm Loan Board was for the purpose of enlarging the opportunity for agricultural credit based on the security of agricultural real estate. The new measure, called the "Rural Credits Bill," is for the purpose of enlarging the opportunity for agricultural credit based on the security of agricultural personal property and character.

THESE MEASURES have been the "Farm Bloc's" principal measures. Its other measures have been subordinate in number and subordinate in importance.

The high tariff duties on agricultural products in the Emergency Tariff Bill and in the Fordney-McCumber Bill are not the work of the "Farm Bloc" properly so-called. The "Farm Bloc" is an organization of Republicans and of Democrats. The high tariff duties on agricultural products have been promoted by an organization consisting entirely of Republicans and including many members not belonging to the "Farm Bloc."

The work of the "Farm Bloc" itself has revolved around marketing and has centered—first and last—on credit.

Eugene Meyer, Jr., in conducting the War Finance Corporation, has conducted the "Farm Bloc's" greatest experiment in credit; and he has gained for it its greatest experience in credit. The size of that experience is worth further observation.

The amount of money loaned by the War Finance Corporation to exporters—from January of 1921 to September 15, 1922, inclusive—was approximately $9,000,000.

In that same period the amount of loans authorized by the War Finance Corporation to banking and financing institutions for agricultural purposes was approximately $295,000,000.

The amount of loans authorized to cooperative marketing associations of farmers was approximately $175,000,000.

These moneys had been loaned in thirty-seven states.

The total loans on live stock had been some $89,000,000. On cotton it had been some $117,000,000. On grain it had been some $34,000,000. On tobacco $40,000,000. On sugar beets $10,000,000. On rice $2,500,000. On dried fruits $1,250,000. On canned fruits $700,000. For "general agricultural purposes" $157,000,000.

There had been loans even on peanuts. The financial succor extended to the peanut industry by the United States Government through the War Finance Corporation had been $1,132,103.

At this point the business man who is a manufacturer, or who is a merchant, inquires:

"Why this favoritism to farmers? Why this lending of public money to them? Or, if to them, why not to me?"

At this point also the left wing of the "Farm Bloc" movement rises contrariwise to inquire:

"Why all this lending of money by the War Finance Corporation to banking and financing institutions? Why only $175,000,000 to associations of farmers? Why $295,000,000 to bankers? Why not all of it to farmers directly?"

The question by the manufacturer and the merchant has been answered by Mr. Meyer from the standpoint of a banker.

Mr. Meyer is a banker and the son of a banker. Environment would incline him toward radicalism even less violently than it would incline Senator Capper. His father was not only a banker but an international banker, and he himself studied banking in Europe before he practiced it in America.

He has been in public life only since 1917. At that time he came to Washington to join the War Industries Board. Up to that time he had been entirely a private business man—and a private banking business man—in the district compendiously known to Senator Capper's constituents as "Wall Street."

WHEN he came to Washington, he did not come for the purpose of fostering an agrarian revolt. He came for the purpose of advising the War Industries Board on the subject of the securing and allocating of non-ferrous metals. He had been familiar with them as a financier. He was appointed to the War Finance Corporation because of being a financier. What he has come to believe regarding farm finance may be friendly to the farm but it can hardly be supposed to be hostile to finance.

Mr. Meyer has put his views of finance—of finance in its relation to the business of the manufacturer and of the merchant—and of finance in its relation to the business of the farmer—into the following words:

"As I see it, in the light of my recent experiences, there is one great trouble with the financial system of this country. Speaking broadly it is this:

"Our fundamental financial conceptions and attitudes are based upon the imported English and continental ideas of what constitutes soundness in banking.

"The financial machinery of Europe was developed to meet the requirements of its own industrial and commercial business; and a sixty-day or ninety-day banking credit facility is exactly what is needed to finance imports of foodstuffs and of raw materials, the manufacture of these raw materials into finished goods, and the export of the finished goods.

"But the basic business of America is the production and distribution of agricultural commodities; and sixty-day or ninety-day financing does not adequately meet the marketing needs of the agricultural producer. Our great staple crops and our live stock are neither produced nor consumed in ninety days, and we ought not to expect to market a year's production in ninety days.

"The need for longer-term financing for our agricultural turnover is partly recognized by the Federal Reserve System in that provision is made for re-discounting agricultural paper for six months; but our financial system as a whole does not adequately recognize the necessity of harmonizing and synchronizing agricultural financing with the natural processes of production and consumption.

Loyalties

By John Galsworthy

"A debt of honor," Dancy (Charles Quartermaine) says, explaining the theft. "It was to a woman," his wife (Diana Bourbon) moans. "Ronny, don't lie any more."

CHARLES WINSOR and his wife, Lady Adela, gave a house party for a number of their friends, including Ferdinand De Levis, described as young, rich and new. Obviously Mr. De Levis is a Jew. Mr. Winsor is preparing for bed and he and Lady Adela are talking of the day's events. Captain Dancy has been playing in bad luck and seems financially embarrassed. He has just won a wager in the drawing-room by jumping to the top of a four-foot bookcase. The ten pounds, by the way, was won from Mr. De Levis. Lady Adela leaves the room for a moment and immediately afterwards there is a knock at the door and in reply to Winsor's "Come in," young De Levis enters arrayed in a gorgeous dressing-gown.

WINSOR—Hello! De Levis! Anything I can do for you?

DE LEVIS (in a voice whose faint exoticism is broken by a vexed excitement)—I say, I'm awfully sorry, Winsor, but I thought I'd better tell you at once. I've just had—er—rather a lot of money stolen.

WINSOR—What! (There is something of outrage in his tone and glance, as who should say: "In my house?") How do you mean stolen?

DE LEVIS—I put it under my pillow and went to have a bath; when I came back it was gone.

WINSOR—Good Lord! How much?

DE LEVIS—Nearly a thousand—nine hundred and seventy, I think.

WINSOR—Phew! (Again the faint tone of outrage, that a man should have so much money about him.)

DE LEVIS—I sold my Rosemary filly today on the course to Kentman the bookie, and he paid me in notes.

WINSOR—What? That weed Dancy gave you in the Spring?

Courtesy of Charles Dillingham, Producer, and Charles Scribner's Sons, Publishers.

C. Lady Adela (Cathryn Young), at whose house party the theft occurred, was first thrilled and then shocked at the robbery of De Levis.

DE LEVIS—Yes. But I tried her pretty high the other day; and she's in the Cambridgeshire. I was only out of my room a quarter of an hour, and I locked my door.

WINSOR (again outraged)—You locked—

DE LEVIS—Yes, and had the key here. (He taps his pocket.) Look here! (He holds out a pocket-book.) It's been stuffed with my shaving papers.

WINSOR (between feeling that such things don't happen, and a sense that he will have to clear it up)—This is damned awkward, De Levis.

DE LEVIS (with steel in his voice)—Yes, I should like it back. WINSOR—Have you got the numbers of the notes?

DE LEVIS—No.

WINSOR—What were they?

DE LEVIS—One hundred, three fifties, and the rest tens and fives.

WINSOR—What d'you want me to do?

DE LEVIS—Unless there's anybody you think—

WINSOR—Is it likely?

DE LEVIS—Then I think the police ought to see my room. It's a lot of money.

WINSOR—Good Lord! We're not in Town; there'll be nobody nearer than Newmarket at this time of night—four miles.

LADY A. (reëntering)—What is it? Are you ill, Mr. De Levis?

WINSOR—Worse; he's had a lot of money stolen. Nearly a thousand pounds.

LADY A.—Gracious! Where?

DE LEVIS—From under my pillow, Lady Adela—my door was locked—I was in the bathroom.

LADY A.—But how perfectly thrilling!

WINSOR—Thrilling! What's to be done? He wants it back.

LADY A.—Of course. Oh, but— Oh, it's quite too unpleasant.

WINSOR—Yes. What am I to do? Fetch the servants out of their rooms? Search the Grounds? It would make the devil of a scandal.

DE LEVIS, however, is insistent. He wants to know who rooms next to him and discovered that Mr. and Mrs. Dancy are on one side and Miss Margaret Orme on the other. But that gets him nowhere and at Lady Adela's suggestion, they consult General Canynge. He has little to offer and De Levis is determined on having the police called. When the inspector arrives, the butler and Mr. De Levis's valet are examined but no information is secured from them. Dancy is had in and questioned, but of course has a perfect alibi. However, General Canynge discovers, in the course of his conversation with Dancy, that the young man's coat sleeve is wet, which seems a trifle suspicious as it has been raining. After all, there is nothing more to be done in the matter and Canynge is on the point of leaving when De Levis stops him.

C. For the benefit of the police Inspector (Victor Tandy), De Levis (James Dale) repeats his account of the money under his pillow, the locked door, and the missing one thousand pounds.

Q. "There are alternatives to going away," Captain Dancy exclaims when his guilt is discovered. His face, as he speaks, suggests the final tragedy.

DE LEVIS (suddenly)—General, I know who took them.

CANYNGE—The deuce you do! Are you following the Inspector's theory?

DE LEVIS—That ass! No! Come and look here, General. (He goes to the window; the General follows.) See the rail of my balcony, and the rail of the next? (He holds up the cord of his dressing-gown, stretching his arms out.) I've measured it with this. Just over seven feet, that's all! If a man can take a standing jump on to a narrow bookcase four feet high and balance there, he'd make nothing of that. And, look here! (He goes out on the balcony and returns with a bit of broken creeper in his hand, and holds it out into the light.) Someone's stood on that—the stalk's crushed—the inner corner too, where he'd naturally stand when he took his jump back.

CANYNGE (after examining it—stiffly)—That other balcony is young Dancy's, Mr. De Levis; a soldier and a gentleman. This is an extraordinary insinuation.

DE LEVIS—Accusation.

CANYNGE—What!

DE LEVIS—I have intuitions, General; it's in my blood. I see the whole thing. Dancy came up, watched me into the bathroom, tried my door, slipped back into his dressing-room, saw my window was open, took that jump, sneaked the notes, wrenched the creeper there for a blind, jumped back, and slipped downstairs again. It didn't take him four minutes altogether.

CANYNGE—This is outrageous, De Levis. Dancy says he was downstairs all the time. You must either withdraw unreservedly, or I must confront you with him.

DE LEVIS—If he'll return the notes and apologize, I'll do nothing—except cut him in future. He gave me that filly, you know, as a hopeless weed, and he's been pretty sick ever since, that he was such a flat as not to see how good she was. Besides, he's hard up, I know.

CANYNGE—It's mad, sir, to jump to conclusions like this.

DE LEVIS—Not so mad as the conclusion Dancy jumped to when he lighted on my balcony.

Q. "Do you think I don't know I'm only tolerated for my money?" De Levis cries. "Society can't add injury to insult and have my money as well. That's all. If the notes are restored, I'll keep my mouth shut; if they are not, I shan't."

Graces of the Flying Rings

“The Trapeze,” this new painting of the stage and its people by Everett Shinn shows a perfection of drawing and of lyric composition that almost makes one forget the technical tour de force of this American artist.

C. Buoyancy and audacity have made possible the versatility of Everett Shinn, a characteristically American artist.

Paganini of the Brush

By Karl Freund

EVERETT SHINN represents in art the spirit of the American youth who succeeds because he has no fear of erring, who never loses the magic cloak of self-reliance—newsboy, curb broker, miner, engineer or rail magnate. It is this buoyancy, this inspired audacity of the American youth to which we owe the Goyesque versatility of Everett Shinn.

Born and raised in a little New Jersey hamlet, he went to the Baldwin Locomotive Works. The lesson in truth acquired at the designing board became the anchor in Shinn's imaginative travels, and while it is often said that music and mathematics are twin sisters, locomotives and canvases are rarely so closely associated. But Shinn may owe to this association his logic of observation, his faultless drawing which in but indicated details relieves the eye from strain as the "leitmotif" conducts the ear in flamboyant orchestration. Shinn is a virtuoso whose brush recalls the bows of Paganini or Kreisler but like Kreisler he is a conservative artist, his technical mastery is a mere means to ease the arrival of his imageries and personages.

His romanticism pervades two monumental allegories of modern industrial labor which grace the council chamber of the Trenton, New Jersey, City Hall. The potters and steelworkers are in their teaming shops, accurately and minutely drawn and painted symbols of physical and mental determination without false pathos or dramatic emphasis—neither whitewashed angels nor maddened victims of social injustice—compositions of a Socratic equanimity which is rarely ever found in "official" art. The stage, the tent, the footlights, their hopes and deceptions have inspired some of Shinn's most ingratiating canvases. They are not pictures of incidents, trivial productions of "genre"; the stage folk appear as one—in Shinn's imagination—guided by one enchanted purpose, symbolic masks recalling Eugene O'Neill's much vaunted Society Marionettes in "The Hairy Ape"—and the audience appears as but one mask of enjoyment and receptiveness.

Mr. Shinn's most recent canvas, "The Trapeze," depicts a spirited act of acrobatics which is rendered with a youthful and unsophisticated abandon, a theme which has given Mr. Shinn an unusual opportunity for distribution of light and shadows which pass and envelop the slender bodies of the performers.

Shinn's irrepressible idealism helped to make him the painter of probably the most lovable wall decorations in America.

Some years ago the fluid black or sanguine chalk rubbings by Boucher and Fragonnard had so fascinated the young artist that he could freely compose such drawings which, done "premier coup" and on old paper would deceive the most expert amateurs. The facility thus acquired can be admired in large red chalk panels (executed for Edwin Bayer and J. R. Cosden) drawn in an unmistakably Fragonnard manner with a captivating up-to-date pertness.

Shinn's ability to romance, to invent, to originate in the art language of the Eighteenth Century is shown in a series of reveries painted in monochrome for the Salisbury Music Room in Pittsfield. Though the figures are costumed à la Louis Seize and the backgrounds recall Hubert-Robert and Van Spandonck, these decorations are as original and as much of our time as the music composed by Strauss for the Rosen Cavalier.

As a document of Shinn's artistic multiplicity and an amazing contrast to the bucolic poses of the Salisbury panels we must contemplate his "Blind Love" at the Belasco Theater. It is not only a fine group of superbly modeled figures but an example of admirable restraint in the treatment of a subject which invited others to brutality or sentimentality.

Shinn has recently interpreted the spirit of a tea garden in his own intriguing way. He is not a reformer or a secessionist; his purpose is to convince and enchant in his paintings as he has in his illustrations.

R This FREEDOM

ROSALIE'S earliest apprehension of the world was of a mysterious and extraordinary world that revolved entirely about her father and that entirely and completely belonged to her father. Under her father, all males had proprietary rights in the world and dominion over it; no females owned any part of the world or could do anything with it. All the males in this world—her father, and Robert and Harold her brothers, and all the other boys and men one sometimes saw—did mysterious and extraordinary things; and all the females in this world—her mother, and Anna and Flora and Hilda her sisters, and Ellen the cook and Gertrude the maid—did ordinary and unexciting and generally rather tiresome things. All the males were like story books to Rosalie: you never knew what they were going to do next; and all the females were like lesson books: they just went on and on and on.

Rosalie always stared at men when she saw them. Extraordinary and wonderful creatures who could do what they liked and were always doing mysterious and wonderful things, especially and above all her father.

Being with her father was like being with a magician or like watching a conjuror on the stage. You never knew what he was going to do next. Whatever he suddenly did was never surprising in the sense of being startling, for (this cannot be emphasized too much) nothing her father did was ever surprising to Rosalie; but it was surprising in the sense of being absorbingly wonderful and enthralling. Even better than reading when she first began to read, and far better than anything in the world before the mysteries in books were discoverable, Rosalie liked to sit and stare at her father and think how wonderful he was. Everything belonged to him. The whole of life was ordered with a view to what he would think about it. The whole of life was continually thrown off its balance and whirled into the most entrancing convulsions by sudden activities of this most entrancing man.

THUS EARLY in life, Mr. Hutchinson makes it clear that Rosalie was born with an urge for freedom. Men were free; they did what they pleased, and when they pleased. Their comings and their goings were untrammelled. For this independence, for this relief from restraint, Rosalie sighed. Her brothers and her father were wonderful creatures about whom the universe revolved. The fact that her father was a disappointed country minister made little impression upon her. Nor did she have much appreciation of the burden his tireless enthusiasm imposed upon her mother. Poverty constantly shadowed this family, but to Rosalie it seemed a small thing. It was first seriously brought home to her when an uncle in India agreed to have one of her older sisters out to live with him. Each of the older girls wanted to go but Flora was favored. This proved a keen disappointment to Anna and led to the first tragedy of the book.

ON SUNDAY, Anna said she would not go to church as she had a headache. Rosalie had been invited to spend the day with the little girl of Colonel and Mrs. Measures and she had lunch and tea there and then came home. The path from the gate to the house was bounded by a thick hedge. On the right was the rectory paddock and through the hedge Rosalie saw that something very strange was going on in the paddock. Away in the corner where there was a little copse with a pond in the middle was a crowd of people, some men from the village and her mother and Robert and some others. Whatever was it? While she peered Harold came running out of the group toward the house. His coat was off, and his waistcoat; and his shirt and trousers looked funny and he ran funnily. He came near Rosalie and she saw that he was dripping wet. Had he fallen in the pond? Then two men came round from the back of the house carrying something, and Harold ran to them and they all ran with the thing to the pond. It looked like the door of the shed they were carrying. Rosalie scrambled through the hedge and ran toward the pond. Someone called out "Here's Rosalie." Hilda came out from among the people and waved her arms and called out, "Go back! Go back! You're not to come here, Rosalie! You're not to come here!" Rosalie stood still.

People were stooping. They had the door on the ground and Harold and a man were stooping and walking backwards over the door, carrying something. Presently there was more stooping, and then Harold and Robert and three men were carrying the door between them and walking as if the door were very heavy. Whatever was happening? Hilda came running to Rosalie. She was crying, "Rosalie you're to keep away. You're not to come into the house yet. I'll tell you when you can come. Go and stay in the garden until I tell you."

Rosalie wandered about the drive. Whatever was the matter? Robert appeared with his bicycle. Harold came out after him. "Go to Ashborough Station with it, you understand. See the station master. Tell him it must be sent off at once. Tell him what has happened." Robert was sniffing and nodding. Away went Robert bending over the handle-bars of his bicycle riding furiously.

Evening began to come on. Rosalie was wandering at the back of the stables when Hilda came out through the kitchen door. "Rosalie, I have been looking for you. Rosalie, Anna is—dead."

They went in through the kitchen. On the big kitchen clothes rail before the fire were Anna's clothes. They were muddy and sopping wet and steam was rising off them.

Rosalie ran to her mother to cry.

Awfully frightening days followed for Rosalie. There wasn't a room that wasn't dark and frightening with all the blinds down, and there wasn't a voice that wasn't dark and frightened, all in whispers.

There was that Rosalie in church at the funeral service. She sat at the inner end of the pew with Hilda beside her. The coffin had stood before the altar all night, and Rosalie believed her father had stayed with it all night. He was struck right down by what had happened, Rosalie's father. She had heard when Anna lay on the bed and he crouched beside her crying out loud, "I hated my lot! Oh God, I was blind to this my child, that shared my lot."

Well, there was that Rosalie in the pew beside Hilda, and while she waited for her father to begin (ever and ever so long he was upon his knees at the altar, his back to them) while she waited she turned back the leaves of her prayer-book from the burial service and noticed with a curious interest the correctness of the order in which the special services came. There, in its order, was the complete record of life. Rosalie must have had an imagination and she must have had budding then what was a strong characteristic of her afterwards—a very orderly mind. She appreciated the correctness of the order of the services and she turned them over one by one and could imagine it, like a story: that record of a life. First the service of Baptism; you were born and baptized. Then the Catechism; you were a child and learnt your catechism. Then the Order of Confirmation; you were getting older and were confirmed. Then the marriage service; you were married. Then the Order for the Visitation of the Sick; you were growing old and you were ill. Then the Burial Service; you died. Born, brought up, growing up, married, ill, dead. Yes, it was like a story. Rosalie turned on. The next service was called The Churching of Women. It was new to Rosalie. She had never noticed it before. "Forasmuch as it hath pleased Almighty God of His goodness to give you safe deliverance. . . ." Rosalie had heard the word deliverance used in the Bible in connection with death. She thought this must be a service special to the burial of a woman—of Anna. She read the small print. "The woman at the usual time after her delivery shall come into the church decently appareled—" Decently appareled? Anna was in one of those nightgowns in which Rosalie so often had seen her praying. "—and there shall kneel down in some convenient place." Kneel down? How could she?

There came upon the book while Rosalie pondered it the long, black-covered forefinger of Hilda. It turned back the thin leaves to the burial service and then pushed over one or two of the thin leaves and indicated certain places. Then Hilda's new black hat was touching her own new black hat, and Hilda whispered, "Where it says 'brother' and 'his' father will say 'sister' and 'her.' It's written for men, do you see?"

Always for men! Even in the prayer-book!

And it was because of men that Anna had drowned herself in the pond. Over and over again Rosalie had thought of that, wondering upon it, shuddering at the thought of men because of it. How she came to know that Anna had not died as ordinary people die, but had drowned herself in the pond she never could remember. No one told her. Rosalie was twelve then but the others were all so much older, and were so accustomed to treating Rosalie as so very much younger, that the pain and mystery of poor Anna's death was outstandingly of the class of things that were kept within the established wheel of the rectory by "Not in front of Rosalie," or "Hush, here's Rosalie."

ABOUT the same time, Rosalie's aunt in London decided to take Rosalie and let her go to school in the city. There for several years she harbored her thought of freedom and grew to womanhood. Her last term came when she was eighteen and in spite of her aunt and friends, she determined to go into business like a man. Thus you see her early leaning directed the course of her maturer life. She left the school with a very bad opinion of men and an entire indifference to them from the standpoint of marriage or love. In business she was quickly successful and won to a place that at least gave her financial freedom. Meanwhile she had met Harry Occleve who was an admirer of her cousin Lætitia and to whom he was as good as engaged. Rosalie distinctly looked down on Mr. Occleve as being one of the least admirable of all the men she had met. Later she met him again at the home of Mr. Sturgiss, a banker in Lombard Street, who offered her a very desirable place with his institution. She disliked, she thought she hated Occleve, but he was not to pass out of her life. She encountered him again at her aunt's at a dinner at which it was expected that the announcement of his engagement to Lætitia would be made. This final chance meeting changed all the course of Rosalie's life.

HARRY OCCLEVE came into the room—looked pale—poor calf—and went, with a nervous halt in his walk—sick fool!—to his Lætitia; and looked across at Rosalie and made a half-step to her; and she thought with all her force, to send it to him, her last words to him: that most malevolent, "to see you raise your eyes and hear you breathe, 'Ah, Lætitia'"; and surely sent it, for on that half-step toward her he stopped, hesitated, and turned and engaged Lætitia again.

She had told herself, leaving the Stuss's house that night a week ago, that she had not believed it possible to hate a man so. Now! Why that was not hate; that, compared with the inimity that now consumed her, was a mere chill indifference. And it had made her tremble! She was rigid now. Stiff with hate! He personified for her all in life against which she was in rebellion, all in life that her soul abhorred; and while, in the moments before dinner, grunting Uncle Pyke and rallying Aunt Belle and coquetting Lætitia crowded about him, leaving her alone and far apart, she, for the reason that it gave to her hate, and for the example that stood before her eyes, reviewed again her theories of life and again pledged herself in their support. . . .

"Dinner is served."

That group went laughing to the door; she followed. "No, no, my boy. Don't stand on ceremony. Pass along as we come. Why, hang it, man, we regard you as one of the family! Ha! ha! haw!" Down the stairs in a body, she following. There is, from their conversation, something the wreathed calf is to get from his coat to bring to show them, a letter or a token or something. The dining-room is to the front on the ground floor. The coats hang in the hall, a narrow passage there, that runs back to Uncle Pyke's study. They are down. "Shall I get it now?" "Yes, bring it along; bring it along, my boy." "And Rosalie" (Aunt Belle) "my fan, dear child. Dear child, I left it on the table in Uncle Pyke's den. You will? Dear child!"

They pass in. The gilded calf turns from them for what it is he is to fetch from his coat; she slips by him to the study and takes up the fan and comes with it again.

It is dim in the passage. A condition on which generous Uncle Pyke years before installed this wonderful electric light that you flick on and flick off as you require it was that it should always be flicked off when you did not require it. Now as Rosalie came from the study the passage was lit only by the shaft of light that gleamed from the dining-room door; its only sound Aunt Belle's noisy chatter from the waiting table.

He was fumbling at the coats, standing there sharply outlined against the stream of light, his face cut on it in a perfect silhouette. She had to pass him. That hateful he! Her knees trembled, she felt faint; awful to hate so! She was quite close, almost touching him. It was necessary he should move forward or back to give her room, but he did not move. His hands outstretched before him on the coat and sharp against the light, appeared to her to be shaking. She tried to say, "If you please," but dreadfully had no voice; but made some sound; and he, moving slowly, drew back. It was before him that she had to pass.

She caught her breath. . . .

The thing too poignant for words a man has.

She was caught in his arms, terribly enfolding her. He was crying in her ears, passionately, triumphantly, "Rosalie, Rosalie." She was in his arms, those long strong arms of his were around her; and she was caught against his heart, her face upturned to his, his face against her own; and she was swooning, falling through incredible spaces, drowning in incredible seas, sinking through incredible blackness; and in her ears his voice coming to her in her extremity like the beat of a wing in the night, like the first pulsing roll of music enormously remote, "Rosalie, Rosalie."

It was, the intimacy and the abruptness of it, the perfect comprehension that their thoughts were shared, as if they had known and loved for years.

He caught her hand. "My conspirator! My secret-sharer!" She gave him her heart in her eyes.

He said, "Tomorrow, I will come to you."

She disengaged her hand.

He gave a swift look all about and caught her in his arms.

"You must tell me, my Rosalie. Tell me."

She breathed, "You knew, before I knew, that I loved you."

When she was home and got to her room she undressed, suffering her clothes to lie as they slipped from her. She got into bed.

Cataclysm! All she had been, all she had determined—all, all gone; all nothing, surrendered all. At a touch, in a moment, without a cry, without a shot, without a stroke, all her life's habit swept away.

NATURALLY there was much weeping and bitterness when Rosalie's aunt and cousins discovered what they called her perfidy. But Occleve was hers and they set up housekeeping in an unre-tentious, comfortable home to which each returned after the day's work was done. For of course, Rosalie kept on with her work. That had been understood from the first. But then the children began to come, first Huggo of whom she said: "There's never, never been a hugger like him since the world began. Creature straight out of heaven, you're Huggo." That was when he first lay in her arms and she was supremely happy. Then came the daughter, Dodo, and last the well-beloved Benji. But the first great joy passed and Harry voiced his discontent:

"I HAVE a right to a home."

She replies, as grave as he, as one debating a matter that is weighty but that is before the arbitrament, not of feeling, but of reason, "Harry, you have a home."

A gesture of his head, much comprehensive, is made by him: "Is this a home?"

"It's where we live."

"Ah, where we live, Rosalie!"

She did not reply to this.

They had been talking a very long time. Harry hadn't any arguments. He just kept coming back and coming back to the one thing. He said again, the twentieth time, in that dull voice, "We are responsible for the children. We have a duty."

The twentieth time! She made a gesture, not impatient, just tired, that was of repletion with this thing. "Ah, you say 'we' have a duty. You say 'we'; but, Harry, you mean me. Why I a duty more than you? Why, am I the accused?"

Harry's dull note: "Because you are a woman."

Ineffable weariness was in the murmur that was her reply. "Ah, my God, that reason!"

HARRY's plaint was not enough. Rosalie was out for freedom, determined to escape the irksome responsibilities of home and children. But she was too good a business woman to let anything run to ends. So the home was well-organized and the children were brought up with every modern advantage brought to them by hired nurses and instructors and for a long time she felt no worry about them. But the shock was not prevented—it was only delayed. It came at last when she and Harry, with Huggo, now fourteen, were lunching together.

"WELL, SCRIPTURE," Harry was saying to Huggo. "Come they give you plenty of scripture?"

"Oh, don't they just! Tons and tons." Listen to him, how merry he was now! "Tons and tons. First lesson every morning, but don't ask scripture, father. Father, what's the use of learning all that stuff about the flood, about the ark, about Israelites, about Samuel, about Daniel, about the Red Sea, what's the use?"

Harry said, "Here, steady, old man. 'What's the use?'"

"Well, what is the use? It's all rot. You know it isn't true."

Rosalie called out dreadfully, "Huggo!"

"Mother, you know it's all made up!"

She cried out in a girl's voice and with a girl's impulsive gesture of her arm across the table toward him, "It isn't! It isn't!"

She was seen by Harry to let fall her extended arm upon the table and draw it very slowly to her and draw her hand then to her heart and slowly lean herself against her chair back, staring at Huggo. No one spoke. She then said to Huggo, her voice very low, "Darling, run now to see everything is in your playbox. Dodo, help him. Take Benji, darlings. Benji, go and see the lovely playbox things."

When they had gone she was seen by Harry to be working her fingers at her key ring. In one hand she held the ring, in the other a key that she seemed to be trying to remove. It was obstinate.

He recognized it for her office pass-key.

He said, "Your pass-key? Why?"

She said, "I'm coming home, Harry."

"Coming home?"

She was sitting back in her chair. She tossed with a negligent movement of her hand the key upon the table. "I have done with all that. I am coming home."

COMING home did not save Rosalie. Obviously the children were not minded to be saved. In the end Rosalie wearied of the house mismanagement and returned to Lombard Street. But nothing went well. Huggo was expelled from school, blundered along with a tutor, fell into bad company, at last went into the army, served two years and came out, certainly not better than when he went in. A man now, but still sticking to his bad companions. Then one night—

The door opened and Huggo walked in. His face was very flushed, and his articulation a little odd. Then, after greetings, he sat down with a curiously unsteady thud and gave a little laugh and said, "Whoa, mare, steady!"

It appeared, after explanations, that he had come to talk about "this Oxford business." "I really can't very well go to Oxford now, father. I really ought to start in some money-making business now and I've got a jolly good opening promised me. I really ought to take it."

The decanters were on the table. He had already taken a glass of port. He filled another and drank it.

"The fact is, I'm—married."

Harry said, "Who are her people? That's a plain question, isn't it?"

Huggo, very red, increasingly difficult to understand, said, "It's a plain enough question. It's a plain enough question."

Rosalie broke out of the frozen stupefaction that had numbed her. "Huggo, you must know. You must know who her people are."

Huggo turned a very slow gaze around from his father to his mother. He looked at her. He said with astonishing violence, "Well, I tell you I don't. People! What have her people got to do with it? I haven't married her people. She's my little girl and I've married her, not her people. Isn't that enough for you?"

Harry got up and went over to him. "Look here, you'd better run along. You're not in a fit state to talk to your mother. I'm not sure you're in a fit state to talk to anybody or to know what you're saying. You'd better go, my boy."

THE DISAPPOINTMENT over Huggo was bad enough for Rosalie to bear, but the real blow fell when Dodo, her Dodo, began to travel reckless ways. Home was dull for Dodo—she was always eager to get away. Early enough she took to paint and powder and her room was always untidy. "I can't be tidy," she said. "I simply can't. It's no good trying." At eighteen, Dodo was a woman and going her own way, reveling in her war work. After Huggo's marriage, disaster trailed him. His wife died, and he himself was sentenced to six months imprisonment in connection with a fraudulent stock deal. Immediately after the shock of Huggo's disgrace, Rosalie was dealt another and a more terrible blow. Dodo had not stopped going out, but after a time she lost her lightness, she appeared ill. Her mother's anxious questions, however, were cut short with, "What should be the matter?" Then one night, when Dodo was out, the telephone rang. It was a friend of Dodo's. The girl was sick—dangerously. Rosalie hurried away. An old Scotch doctor whom she found tending Dodo told her, "Ye'll need be sensible. There's been another here before me— There's been a creature here before me. There's been blackguard work here. There's been—that poor child there. . . ." So Rosalie found her daughter and heard the story of her shame, and sat by her bed through the long hours.

DODO, as that night went, was in delirium. She seemed to lie upon a bed. She lay in fact upon the altar of her gods, of self, of what is vain, of liberty undisciplined, of restless itch for pleasure, and of the gods of Rosalie, a piteous sacrifice.

Rosalie was all night with that child. Harry was there upon the other side upon his knees and never raised his head. Benji was there that loved his sister so. Across the unblinded window strove a moon that fought with mass on mass of fierce, submerging clouds as it might be a soul that rose through infinite calamity to God. That child was in much torment. That child was in delirium and often cried aloud.

She calmed and a long space was mute. The moon, its duress passed, stood high, serene, alone. The doctor breathed, "She's passing." That child raised her lids and her eyes looked out upon her watchers.

Rosalie cried, "Oh, Dodo!"

That child sighed. "Oh, mother!"

There was no note of love. There was of tenderness no note. There only was in that child's sigh a deathly weariness. "Oh, mother!" That child passed out.

They came home in the very early morning. Rosalie was in her working room. She had some things to do. She wrote to Mr. Field a letter of her resignation from Field's Bank. She only wrote two lines. They ended, "This is Final. I have done."

She sealed that letter and she moved about the room unlaying and as she unlayed, destroying, all evidences, all treasures, all landmarks, all that in any way referred to or touched upon her working life. There were cherished letters, there were treasured papers. She destroyed them all. From one bundle, not touched for years, dust-covered and time-discolored, there came a battered volume. She turned it over. "Lombard Street." She opened it and saw the eager underlinings and saw the eager margin notes, and ghosts . . . (it's written earlier in these pages). She rent the book across its perished [Continued on page 103]

HEN the Master came to our village we were in a bad way. We were like other villages. We gossiped, we were snugly and prosaically married. We had the town drunk and the town cut-up. We supported a village band and the usual sort of church. But we had no Science. I mean by Science that not a person in our village had ever been psychoanalyzed. We were jogging along with our Complexes, making regressions almost every day.

Then the Master came and a new life began for us. We were rather a prosperous little place. The best soil in Massachusetts, and a dancing river through our backyard, helped to keep us industrious, and fortunately enabled us to pay down the two hundred dollars a head which the Master charged for making us better citizens.

The Master was a handsome blond, foreign type of man, who dressed in rich brown colors. His eye was magnetic and his manner psychic. He had rounded off his studies by being analyzed by the Herr Doctor Bernard Blitz in Vienna. There he had found his strength, which now he gave to others.

His first great success was scored with Nellie Burton, the wife of the bank clerk. He gave her the word test. He called off words, and timed her with a stop-watch on how long she took to respond with another word, brought up by what the first word suggested.

"Allopath," he said in his vibrant staccato voice.

"Catarrh," replied she, cheerily, after two seconds.

"Irish," he followed the lead.

"Home Rule," she said, shaving one second.

"Hand-bag," he prompted.

She flushed, fluttered, her fingers dug at the hand-bag round her wrist. The watch ticked on with horrible hammer blows—one, two, three, four, five, and on to ten.

"Money," she gasped, faintly.

"Dig deep, woman, dig deep," he urged. "Money—what does that suggest? What mental picture does it form?"

"I see many bills, green."

"Go on," he commanded.

"They are where I can reach them."

"Yes," he suggested. "Yes. Tell me what you did."

"I took them," she said.

"Were they yours?"

"No."

"You stole them," he thundered.

"I-I-I—" she stuttered, went white, and fell in a faint.

The Master rolled her over, and placed her at full length on the floor. He sprinkled water on her face. Her eyelids twitched. Color touched her cheeks. She sat up.

"You will feel better, now," he said.

"I must tell you all," she sobbed, brokenly. "They were in my husband's trousers."

"What?" asked the Master.

"The money, the bills, green, new. He had brought them home from the bank. His week's pay changed into ones. They looked more that way. He used to like a thick wad. I took them, all of them. He never knew."

"Never knew? How was that?"

"He went to his class reunion over at Springfield that evening," she answered, "and he returned a little cloudy. So he decided next morning he must have shown the wad to a cabman or a classmate."

It turned out that she wished her husband earned more money. When Janet Thompkins stumbled and spilled the kerosene lamp and burned up her sitting-room, all the village came running. There was a half-hour of lively work with the bucket-brigade, while Janet was the center of attention, telling just how it had happened. A fire is a big event with us.

"You'll have to be psychoanalyzed after this," we told Janet. "It all means something."

So she went around next day, and on for three months. It was hard delving to get down to the bottom of her hopping bird-like consciousness, but finally the truth popped out. She had enjoyed the fire because it made her significant. People listened to her where before they had done all the talking. It was possible, she finally confessed, that she had meant to spill the lamp in order to be noticed. That is what comes of facing yourself. Without it, Janet would have gone to her grave thinking she had stumbled by accident. If people could only learn there are no accidents, no slips of the tongue, but back of every misplaced word and gesture the subconscious mind is moving in its mysterious, indirect way. It is a comfort to know this. It fills everything with purpose.

"I never suggest anything," the Master explained. "It all comes out of you. It's the stuff buried in you which you gradually recall, and that leads to more. That's how our method differs from all the other mental cures—psychotherapy by hypnotism, and the rest of them. They put things into your mind from the mind of the operator. But P. A. T. (that was his abbreviation for Psychoanalytical Treatment) makes you do the telling."

HE had us all keep dream books. We used to get up in the night, and jot down the vagrant tail-end of a dream, as it was just escaping, and bring it around to him in the morning. Then he would interpret it for us. We learned that all those strange drifting visions were merely disguised handwriting, telling the suppressed desires of our thwarted life. It was wonderful. Apparently innocent people seemed to be the worst. Mrs. Morton discovered to her amazement that she had long wished to kill her husband. Unbelievable, but there was her dream book to prove it.

"Your dream, woman," he ordered, when she came to him.

"I dreamed I was riding a white goat down a broad boulevard," she began reading. "The goat stumbled and fell. I alighted without injury and mounted a sorrel horse and rode away. I never looked back to see what became of the goat."

"The white goat is your husband," the Master interpreted. "A husband is always a goat by the inevitable dream law of transposition. The sorrel horse, now—think well. Sorrel, what does it remind you of?"

"Red," she answered.

"Red," he echoed, "the color, red. What does the color, red, suggest?"

"Why, the schoolmaster's hair."

"What schoolmaster?"

"The new teacher where Eileen goes to school. His hair is brick red."

"Ha, a complex," he pounced. "Now we have your dream. You saw yourself leaving your husband and marrying the schoolmaster. Tell me," he cried in a terrible voice, "do you love your husband?"

"Why, why—I don't know," she said weakly, in a daze.

"You don't know?" he said. "Think, woman."

"I never thought," she confessed.

"What does the thought of your husband suggest?" he probed.

"Why, I see his head, a little bald on the top."

"That is what the thought of your husband has come to be—a bald man?"

"Yes, I suppose so."

"And the schoolmaster—what does his name bring before your mind's eye?"

"Red hair," she said, "the same as before."

"Something vivid," interpreted the Analyst. "You see your husband as a humdrum bald-headed man, dull at the top. And you see the schoolmaster as a gay flaunting creature, with a fiery top. Is it not so?"

"Why, yes."

"Well, woman, your case is clear. You have hidden it from yourself. But now you've spread it out in the open. You wish to leave your husband and marry the teacher. If you wish it supremely, you must do it. The first step is to get a divorce from your husband. I can help you. The rest is easy."

WE ALL liked him immensely, all except Old Doctor Bemis, who had handled our ailments for thirty years. Here he was getting his three dollars for the mean, messy jobs with measles and bronchitis, while the new man did the big, high-priced work with sick souls. But Dr. Bemis's bitter comments had no effect on us, for by this time we could analyze his motive in making them.

When the Townsend boy got croup the day before school opened, the Master was able to prove to him that he had really wanted the croup in order to stay home, and so it had come. When he got the asthma on the first afternoon of the swimming season, Doctor Bemis sent the boy around to the Master to ask what he wanted this time. That is how shallow the old type of physician is when he encounters something new.

As the Master said, the treatment is not for everyone. It is only for strong natures, able to respond. A sculptor uses marble, not mud.

"Every confidence is sacred," the Master told his clients. "Tell me all. Speak as to your God, if there were a God."

And indeed it was so. They told him all—more even than they knew, for he was able to show them unguessed tendencies which they had never suspected. Outside myself, I am sure that no one knew what went on in his laboratory of souls. He had to tell someone, of course, and he rightly chose me, because I am safe and certain to be sympathetic and discreet.

"You have a strong woman Libido, Martha," he said, "faithful and maternal and daring."

It was pleasant to have your Libido read by an expert. I had been among the first that went to him. He dug up all my little weaknesses, and in his strong presence I overcame them. I learned, too, with him what it was I really wanted. I learned from him that there must be no privacies, no reticences. All those go with shame, and back of them somewhere lurks a complex. It is better, far better, to tell everything about yourself. That clears you. So I have no hesitation in saying that I loved him. I told him so.

"You fall in love with me, of course," he said. "All my female clients do. That's transference. But later I teach you to turn it onto some other object, if that seems best for you."

"It isn't best for me," I replied. "I want you."

"WE LL, we will see," he said. "I've been married you know—twice in fact. I've had to burn several persons out of my path. I arranged that my last wife should divorce me, but she has left me with four children to support. So the court ruled."

"That makes no difference to me," I responded. "Bring your children to me at any time. I will care for them."

"I shall remember that," he answered with a kindness I can never forget. "Just now they are doing nicely in a school. I never see them and all goes well. So much better for them than home. But I assure you I shall remember what you have said."

One by one the Master hunted the people down through the village, pried them apart from the old bad alliances that had wrecked them, and remarried them. Within three years he had remodeled our village. It was embarrassing for an old resident, who had settled elsewhere, to come back. He would make awkward slips, with the new names under the old roofs. It was like "going to Jerusalem," but it gave the people a fresh feeling and they liked it.

I have never met a man I admired so much as the Master. He had conquered fear and anger in his own nature and lived in an Olympian aloofness. His voice was calm and level. Why should he hate, when he knew the sources of hate in the conflicts of one's inner life. He had found liberation from the passions that distort other men. After the long ages of religious romancing and the fairy stories of the poets, at last Science had solved human nature.

He had a wonderful faculty of spearing our least statement. "Soul," he would repeat after us, if we had blundered, "what do you mean by soul? Memory? Impulse?"

"MORALITY," was another word that roused him. "Tribal customs," he would correct us, "instinct of imitation. Crowd suggestion."

But "God" was the battleflag that drew his keenest sharp-shooting. By patient work with us, he lifted most of the membership away from the church, and the poor old minister was heart-broken.

"A quaint survival," the Master described him, saying he wished to free us from the old clutter by revaluing our values.

C "Your dream, woman," he ordered. "I was riding a white goat. The goat stumbled and fell. I mounted a sorrel horse and rode away," Mrs. Morton told him. "The goat is your husband," the Analyst cried. "A husband is always a goat. You want to leave him and marry the red-haired schoolmaster."

He showed us how the brightest, cheeriest girl was trotting around with a nest of dark extravagances under her curly head, made manifest only by her subconscious activities.

The mother-complex was his most famous specialty, and he made it a household word among us. No supper-table talk failed to play lightly and with a sparkle around the mother-complex.

When "Butcher" Joe murdered his mother over at Knowlsby's Station, the Master said:

"A strong soul. At great cost to himself he has cut loose from a mother-complex. Violent, perhaps, but doubtless necessary. Let us not judge him."

If the trial had been held in our town, the man would have been acquitted.

"Know thyself," the Master preached, and we went around picking complexes from our neighbor's interior, while we kept a sharp watch on our own hidden weaknesses; which we were finding decidedly interesting.

One day Sally Breese said she was going to Paris, when she intended to say New York.

"Now, that means something," he pointed out. "Paris has some kind of secret drawing for Miss Breese—some call to her of which, naturally, she is wholly unaware."

AFTER THAT we redoubled our watch on her, and we caught her tripping again and again. Soon she grew almost afraid to open her mouth, for fear she would give away some secret of her inner life. But for him she would have gone on cherishing her guilty dreams, not knowing what they signified. We never found out just what it was that Paris meant to her, but we could make a rather shrewd guess—but of course we always put the kindest interpretation on the matter.

It does a community all manner of good to wake up and know itself. Talk, which for four generations had fluttered around crops and politics and the president, turned to its proper business of sex and the suspicious goodness of the good. Those that wore the white flower of a blameless life were raked fore and aft, because we now knew that the whiteness was paint. Gradually we unseated every moral leader in the community. No one who hasn't gone through the process can know the feeling of relief that swept us like a clean wind out of the north.

The Master published a study of Mother Goose, showing how the Libido of the race had expressed its secret life in those apparently harmless anecdotes. The paper was translated into German within three months, and Dr. Bing, of Zürich, whose work on "Nightmares" is a classic, wrote of the Master's essay, saying:

"You have given one more filthy corner of the human mind to the sunlight. You have revealed that even infancy is infamous. The world is your debtor. Work on in the dawn, fellow struggler. The sky grows red with our fires. It is the dung-hill that grows the lily, and our dark science shall yet create the long awaited and badly needed superman."

We had been getting a lot of fun out of the village orchestra. We called it orchestra, but it was mostly brass band on the full notes. The Master pointed out to us what our love of music really meant, and how closely music, in its origins, was connected with certain ancient rites. What we had thought fun was far otherwise, far otherwise. And we realized this, now that our eyes had been opened to the folly of old joys.

BUT AFTER the third year of the Master's too brief stay, things began to change. The trouble with us was that we weren't up to his tests. We weren't as strong as he wished us to be. What he needed was a race of supermen, a race of hardy Uhlan officers who had outgrown pity and homesickness and loneliness and could go marching out into the strange new emptiness, where there are no enfeebling loves and memories, no village traditions, where comradeship is a laughing self-sufficient greeting of two strong souls, saluting each the will-power in the other's fearless eyes. I tell you it was too big and bold, too fine and enlightened for our weak neighborhood. We were really just middle-grade people, with none too much strength, rather relying on each other's good will, rather lonely without it. I am not defending our failure. Personally I am sorry we didn't see the thing through to the last logical bit so we would know exactly how psychoanalysis wanted us to live.

Q. "Martha," the Master said to me, "my work is finished in this village. Here are the children."

THE BIG BREAK came out of Susanna Morton's flannel pancakes. Jeff Morton in the first burst of his new life under the Master had remarried, shuffling off the staid Susanna, and taking to himself young Lulu Walton. Lulu was emancipated all right and could talk sex all the evening. The trouble was at breakfast next morning. Jeff found that his Libido craved the flannel pancakes of his narrower life and old helpmate. He set out to have them. But Susanna had meanwhile gone home to her mother's. When Jeff began talking flannel pancakes at the post office during mail-time when all the village was clustered, the echoes of his longing drifted back to Susanna, and something in her answered. Several gossips began to quote her as favorable to Jeff, and there was considerable scandal when we learned that two persons, legally and honorably put apart, were wanting to team up again and renew the ancient bondage from which our Analyst had so gladly freed them.

I POINTED out that it wasn't fair to the Master after all he had done for us. And I sent to a Boston library, and got the book in which Dr. Blitz of Vienna had referred to us in a footnote as an American community where psychoanalysis had taken possession of the city government and the school system, emptied the church, and discredited the old moth-eaten ethic. Were we to go back on all that and revert to the dark days of our original blindness?

It seems that we were. For Jeff and his old wife ran away together from their new homes and took a farmhouse on the outskirts of the village, where they were an eyesore and a challenge to every newly-married divorcé. I had hoped I could say that they were outcast by public opinion. But instead of that they became a little stronghold of revolutionary sentiment, and Flannel Pancakes became the symbol and battle-cry of the return to the shackles. Couple after couple outrageously talked of remating back to their beginnings and going on as they had in former, happier days.

"They haven't killed the child," said the Master in his symbolic phrasing.

Next, the boys wanted the band back in spite of what they had learned about it. Then the school children went on strike, and refused to tell on themselves. Of course there can be no interpretation if there is no confession, and those little ones in their ignorance preferred to go knotted through life rather than become outstanding personalities and seek enlightenment by an acknowledgment of their small sins and ambitions. They wouldn't confess and that ended that.

THE CLIMAX came crash one evening when a private massmeeting for Remarried Men Only was held in the deserted church. They were all there early, as I learned afterwards. The first resolution was carried unanimously. All the men wanted their old wives back and were set and determined to have them back. There was a most bewildering unanimity about this.

The next resolution was more difficult. It concerned itself with him whom I shall always regard as our emancipator. What should be done with him? That was the point under discussion: with him who had done so much for us? Jeff Morton suggested lynching. It shows unanimity, he said, and is in line with our best democratic tendencies. Peter Murphy was for a lonely call and an "honest bullet," as he described it. "Don't drag in the village," he urged. "Leave it to a Sinn Feiner. A dark night, a cozy chat, a little gunplay, and all is well along the river front."

Old Doctor Bemis belonged to another generation and hadn't undergone a changed life. So he had no business to be in the meeting, but had gained admission when he learned what it was about.

"Pat must go," he said (Pat was his name for the Master), "that is agreed. Let's give him the regulation twelve hours. If he hasn't dusted quietly and quickly by then, we'll ride him out with tar and feathers and so get rid of him once and for all."

His plan was carried with no dissenting voices. All this I learned later from Mrs. Morton who had it from Jeff who, of course, told her everything that happened.

While the meeting was going on, I was sitting at home. A knock came, and I opened. It was the Master. In a word he made clear what was happening. In fact he had foreseen it and made his preparations. The day before he had brought his four children from the select school where the expenses had been mounting all too heavily for him, so he had decided to bear them no longer.

"Martha," he said, "my work is finished in this village. Here are the children."

That night he left us. I have never seen him since. The children are with me yet.

Greetings to MR. Grouch

By Walt Mason

I wanted the world's masterpiece in the auto line. It took my banker the rest of the day to argue me out of my brainstorm.

¶ In which the Sage of Emporia hands a bouquet to that useful citizen who keeps us from joy-riding to destruction

THE NIGHT was senescent, and star dials hinted of morn, when nine able-bodied men called at the office of Col. Turnagen Whittington, editor of the Hay Center Palladium. The colonel had been working all night, plying his trenchant pen with his accustomed vigor, and turning out several of those cold-blooded, pessimistic editorials which had driven the Live Wires of the town to fury.

The nine visitors had tied bandanna handkerchiefs over their faces. They said nothing, but silently and inexorably surrounded the colonel and pushed him out of his office, and then down the road to the pond. The pond was a desolate stretch of stagnant water, covered with green slime; into this disagreeable fluid the colonel was pitched, and when he crawled out, with the slime dripping from his hair and whiskers, he was thrown in again.

Twice more this happened, and then, when the victim emerged from his bath, he was permitted to remain on dry land; but the leader of the avengers lifted up his voice and said:

"Colonel Whittington, this is merely a warning of what will happen to you if you don't change the policy of your paper. You are a brake on the wheel of progress. We want boosters, not knockers, in Hay Center. The next time we call on you, we'll give you something more than a warning."

"The next time you call," said the undismayed colonel, clawing some decayed vegetables out of his hair, "I will have a sawed-off shotgun, and it will be loaded with shingle nails. So bring the coroner with you. And paste this in your hats: The day is at hand when the people of this town will turn to me for help, as the only man who preserved his sanity through this crazy period of the boom."

All this happened—and it did happen—long, long ago, when the great boom swept over the Middle West, and every cross-roads hamlet was going to be something greater than Chicago. I was a reporter on the Palladium, and now that I am waxing old I confess with shame that, in common with the Live Wires of the town, I bitterly resented the colonel's editorial course. Hay Center, like a hundred other prairie towns, was crazy. Surveyors were busy staking out the cornfields for town lots. New companies and colossal undertakings were being organized in every real estate office. We were to have big shoe factories, and woolen mills, and packing houses; we were to have skyscrapers and elevated railways, and a population so great the town would need sideboards. Everybody was buying and selling real estate, and the slogan was, "Get in on the ground floor!" Even the lawyers and bankers of the town contracted the fever; and the ministers of the gospel were chasing around in their shirtsleeves buying and selling lots they had never seen.

And through it all Colonel Turnagen Whittington printed his pessimistic editorials pointing out that the boom was a transient thing; that presently it would collapse, and the small investors would be ruined, and it would take Hay Center a hundred years to get back to the point she departed from when she went insane. He argued that it was impossible to have big factories with no raw materials for manufacture; he insisted that the cornfields would continue to be cornfields, and not suburbs. And in this way he irritated the town and made the Live Wires frantic, and the episode of the horse-pond surprised nobody. And after that episode he continued to assail the boom and the boomers; and no man in the Wide West was so cordially hated. It was generally admitted that his funeral would be the most encouraging thing that could happen.

And then one bleak morning Hay Center awoke with a bad taste in her mouth, and looked around, and behold, the boom was dead. In a night it folded its tents and silently stole away. And scores of Live Wires found they were in debt up to their scalplocks, and loaded down with property they couldn't give away; and sad-eyed Merchant Princes, who had stocked up to supply the demands of a metropolitan population, went to the banks to borrow money, and the bankers, who had been stung themselves, couldn't advance fifty cents. Hay Center was sown to salt, like Jerusalem of old.

AND THEN the people, in their misery, turned to Col. Whittington for aid and counsel; they elected him mayor, and he bravely went to work to save what he could from the wreckage, and never once said, "I told you so." For many years the colonel has been sleeping with his fathers, but there is a life size statue of him in the public square, and the old inhabitants take off their hats when his name is mentioned.

And now, when I hear a citizen denounced as a grouch, a pessimist, a knocker, I do not wildly jump to the conclusion that the world would be a more popular resort if he withdrew from it. I am strongly of the belief that the grouch serves a good and useful purpose in the world, and that it would be better to dispose of a few optimists at bargain sale prices than to get rid of the grouch.

My chief weakness is a desire to change automobiles about once a month. Every time I see an auto of a new design I experience a fierce yearning to own one like it. The banker who has custody of my meager savings is aware of my failing, and watches me with an eagle eye, and I owe it to his eternal vigilance that the motorcar dealers don't get every nickel I earn. As we go to press I have the best car I ever owned. It is a medium-priced bus, with nothing of Oriental splendor in its furnishings. But it never gives me a minute's grief. Month after month it toils over the roads, only pausing at filling stations for refreshments now and then, and never demanding the services of a mechanic.

The other morning I went into the bank and asked how many pieces-of-eight I had in storage there. I wanted them in a hurry. I had just seen the world's masterpiece in the auto line, and I must have one like it. The banker overheard me and came forth from his office and cross-examined me. I was enthusiastic. The new car had eight cylinders, and could develop eighty horse-power, and had genuine broadcloth upholstery and six flywheels, and a full-jeweled radiator, and so on. My next-door neighbor, Jim Bragg, owned the one I saw, and as the scion of a martial and haughty house, I couldn't stand supinely by and see Jim Bragg driving a better car than mine.

It took the banker the rest of the day to argue me out of my brainstorm.

"I have heard you say," he observed, "that the car you now drive has more than human intelligence. It consumes the miles and never gives any trouble. What more can you ask? What's the difference whether it has one cylinder or twenty? What would it profit you to have the steering wheel inlaid with mother of pearl? Try to reassemble your faculties and forget everything except the fact that your present car is fool-proof, and that your balance in this bank should be increased rather than diminished."

I FELT as I departed that the banker was more depressing than an east wind, and that it would serve him right if I transferred my account to the bank on the other corner; but when I reached home my wife met me on the porch and said: "Mr. Bragg seems to have a hideous time with that new car. He has been working under it all afternoon, and Mrs. Bragg came here for an hour or two, saying that his language was undermining her nervous system and destroying the morals of the children."

It's that way every day. Jim is forever pawing around his car with a wrench in one hand and a lantern in the other, and ever as he toils he expresses his sentiments in ringing terms; and I go joy-riding around, and my old bus never misses, never wastes a minute, never gets pinched by the busy country constable for disturbing the peace.

The grouch is good medicine for most of us, although we refuse to recognize him as such when we are taking our badly needed but more or less bitter dose.

Not long ago one of our gifted young townsmen came home from New York where he had been studying art. He brought several of his paintings with him and, at the request of the Woman's Club, exhibited them in the clubhouse. Of course we all turned out to see them and, out of pure benevolence of spirit, went into ecstasies over them. The young man had all the Old Masters backed off the walk. He made Rembrandt look like a paperhanger.

But old Horace Bittenbender walked around and gazed at the pictures and shook his head mournfully. "Horrible daubs!" he growled; "the young man has talent, but he will have to study for thirty-nine years before he'll be fit for anything better than house painting."

Everybody in the room heard it, and we were all indignant, and felt that some steps should be taken. But the young artist had sense. "Mr. Bittenbender is right," said he; "so I am going to study for thirty-nine years, or fifty-nine years, or as long as necessary; but sooner or later I'll paint a real picture!"

Few, alas, can receive the chastening of the pessimistic Mr. Grouch in such a spirit. And so we follow our foolish enthusiasms, and buy things we can't pay for, and make contracts we can't carry out, and start things we can't finish, all the time bitterly resenting the efforts of the grouch who would set us right. And when at last we realize that Mr. Grouch is our best friend, we are too old to make any profitable use of the knowledge.

"I Killjoy Guessed Right

"I WOT," I remarked, "and I wist and I ween that I'll soar to the clouds in my flying machine." "Don't do it, don't do it," the pessimist cried; "the earth is the safest, so on it abide. Your pinions will break or your engine will stall, and down will come poet and airplane and all; a hole in the ground you will punch with your head—but that will not matter for you will be dead." "Oh, Killjoy, avaunt, you are always the same; you're grouching and beefing and spoiling the game." I stepped on the gas and I scooted aloft; the earth where I lit wasn't cushioned or soft; my head's in a sling and my slats are a wreck, my collarbone's twisted three times round my neck. And Killjoy is saying, "What fools mortals be! What grief they would dodge if they'd listen to me!"

The Great Man's Wife

entirely clear to him, but Emmy had had no uncertainty. Shyly radiant, she had announced their engagement to the interested dinner table that night, and he lacked heart to spoil her happy planning.

Speculatively, Henry Milner considered other men of his acquaintance. Masters, now, wasn't he in the same boat? Frowning, he remembered Masters in the dining-room of a popular hotel, his gray hair slightly ruffled, an excited animation on his pink, clean-shaven face as he leaned across to his very young, discreetly painted companion. No . . . that wouldn't do for him as a solution. Besides . . . there was Claire.

And Claire loved him—or would, if she decided to let herself drift toward him. His ready understanding absolved her of calculation in keeping aloof. It was wise; it showed mature judgment.

She had come into his life meteor-wise, Claire Shanley. Young? Thirty, perhaps, but a young thirty, a beautiful thirty. That her beauty drew its existence partly from art left him indifferent.

WITH a deeper inner aching which wrung him with torment, he heard Claire's ultimatum as she had spoken an hour earlier in a deserted corner of a big hotel.

"People are talking about us, Henry."

"I suppose," he had assented dully.

A pause, filled in by a few haunting bars of music from the hotel orchestra.

"We must either go forward or turn back," Claire told him then, inexorably.

He had inclined his head without replying. And they had gone out to the waiting car without further speech on the subject. Only, in parting, she thrust out her fragrant hand to him, gloveless, the warm fingers holding tightly to his own.

"I could hope that it might be forward—together," she said with an odd quiver in her deep, caressing voice.

The car turned swiftly into a curving driveway. Drew up beneath a porte-cochere. He stepped out. The chauffeur awaited orders.

"I'll not be needing you again tonight, Jules," he told him.

A gong rang through the great house announcing dinner. Across the hall he could hear Emmy's footsteps. Fervently he hoped that she would not stop at his door. But she did.

"Dinner, Henry?" The thin, flat, tremulous voice inquired.

"Down in a minute," he returned shortly. And delayed to smoke half of a cigarette in an impotent wish to ward off the ordeal of seeing her.

Presently he went down to the immense dining-room where Emmy was already seated, waiting docilely, thin, colorless, scrawny in a high-cut gray dress without line or imagination.

Emmy, he observed discontentedly, ate little, crumbling her bread, pale eyes fixed vacantly before her, making none of her usual effort toward futile conversation.

It annoyed him, her refusal to enjoy the good things he provided. Her abstinence was in some way an unvoiced reproof of his own enjoyment.

"Food . . . won't help me," said Emmy, and again some strange current in her voice upset him.

Frowning, he hurried through the meal, inwardly rejoicing when she left the table. At the door she paused, turning back to Milner, in the act of lighting a very black and a very large cigar.

"You'll stop in the library for a few moments?"

He hesitated, then visibly braced himself. He must go through with it. This situation was intolerable. He nodded.

The door closed behind her flat back, and he signed to the hovering manservant to refill his glass with golden brandy. Savoring the sharp bite of the mellow liquid as he drank it slowly, he became aware of its ameliorating influence. Somehow it took the raw edge off the situation.

Confidently, he made his way to the library. Emmy was knitting beside the open fire. Idly he watched the motion of the bright needles. She must have made thousands of socks by this time.

"What do you do with 'em?" he inquired curiously, coming to a pause beside the fire.

"I send them back to the rector of the church at home."

Involuntarily he smiled, visioning how much more the rector of the struggling church would appreciate a gift of money from a source of such wealth.

EMOTIONALLY he considered the emptiness of her life. No friends, she lacked the gift of making them; no purpose, she lacked the ability to enthuse over abstract causes.

In his mind he saw Claire in rich colorful silks sweeping over the marble floors of an ambassador's palace. The great lady, she was made for it. And Emmy? Shrinking, he had a picture of Emmy, with her scanty hair primly barbed over naked ears, her dress unfashionably long and full. He'd have to refuse the ambassadorship; Emmy wouldn't fit in. A rising flood of rebellion choked him. He wouldn't—he'd tell Emmy. He'd tell her now. Resolutely he took a step toward her.

Emmy looked up with her pale eyes, and the old, familiar flood of pity for her helplessness, her fluttering mothlike hands, her impotence, claimed him. With a dull despair he realized he would never be able to tell her. The old sympathetic understanding, the old incapacity to stand the sight of pain was betraying him. For once his destiny had failed him. Emmy's helplessness was her protection. The same quality which had won him in the beginning held him imprisoned now. It would kill her, nothing less. She'd pine and finally die, leaving him a burden of unendurable remorse.

Emmy's voice broke in upon the reverie. The half-finished sock with its bright needles lay unheeded in her meager lap. Her thin, faintly wrinkled hands were clasped, blue veins showing prominently.

"I've something to say to you," she said, again in that disturbing tone.

Stupidly he waited. What could she have to say to him?

"I went to see a doctor today. . . ."

Always ailing, never actually ill—she might have known it was nothing of importance. Her communications never were at all important.

"In three months, maybe six, I'm going to die," she finished.

"I'm—sorry," he stammered inadequately. Always ailing, never actually ill—it couldn't be.

"I'm not sorry," said Emma amazingly, a blaze in her pale eyes. "It gives me a chance—to get away!"

Such a flood of longing quivered in her voice that he gaped, amazed.

"I'VE WANTED to get away before." The pale hands strained in her lap. "But somehow I couldn't tell you. I wouldn't be telling you now if it wasn't that I've got a real reason at last. All these years I've wanted to go, and I couldn't get away. You—you wouldn't give me any cause. And you can't leave a man just because he's grown great and powerful!"

"You wanted to go?" he stammered.

"I wanted to go," repeated Emmy's pale lips. "All this glory, all this magnificence—I've hated it! I hate the very bigness of this house, the contempt of the servants—they know I'm not a success at being a great man's wife. I'm just as big a failure in my way as you're a success in yours, and failure is something that eats in on you like acid with the passing years."

She paused, a hand at her flat breast, while another golden shower of sparks flew gaily up the chimney.

"It wasn't fair," she said then, with a ghostly sort of passion. "I never wanted to be a great man's wife. I wasn't meant for it. In my own kind of life I'd have been a success—" again she paused, her eyes upon him accusingly.

"How could anybody have told you'd be a great man? Just any likely, upstanding young fellow, that's what you were in those days. But now—" she broke off with a bitterness which touched him.

"I haven't been a success," she continued dully. "And I've known it. Do you think I haven't seen people smiling behind my back, comparing us, feeling sorry for you? And do you s'pose it hasn't hurt? At first I really tried. . . ."

WITH a quick stab of pity Henry Milner remembered their first days in Washington, and Emmy's anxious interest in her clothes, her house, and her desire for his approval.

"It wasn't any use," said Emmy. "Not a bit in the world. It frightened me, the greatness so suddenly thrust upon me. I wasn't meant for it. And after awhile I began to hate it and to want to get away. But you—you wouldn't let me go."

A silence. Henry Milner stood in dazed quiet, his forgotten cigar gone cold in his hand. So Emmy had held her own bitterness against him all these years, a fantastic grievance against his very success!

"I used to be sorry we hadn't any children," the fluttering voice was saying. "And to think maybe I wouldn't have minded things so if I'd had something to fill the emptiness in my heart. But it was for the best. I've stood seeing contempt in the eyes of strangers, I've stood seeing it in the eyes of my servants, I've stood seeing it in your eyes—but I couldn't have stood seeing it in their eyes!"

"Emmy!" said Henry Milner.

"I've understood," she repeated. "And I've waited and waited hoping you'd let me go. There's nothing between us any more. We're strangers. I'm not the only one: there are thousands of us in the world today—old wives of successful men remaining young. We meet, we old wives, and underneath the patter of polite conversation is the one question: how is it with you? And our talk is always of beauty parlors, of chin straps, of new treatments for retaining youth. Because we care about it? No! Because our husbands demand youth in their women. Ignoble, this frantic straining after reluctant youth, heart-wringing at its tragedy. I'm old. I'd have liked nothing better than to enjoy the twilight years in peace. You—why didn't you let me go?"

"I thought you needed me," confessed Henry Milner, telling the truth.

EMMY smiled rather terribly. "You thought that without your strength I'd wither and die, and you couldn't bear the thought of being my executioner," she reasoned clearly. "And I hadn't the courage to tell you I wanted to go because in your way you'd been kind and I thought you were afraid of the scandal. Cowards, both of us! Well—" she sighed. "It's come to an end in spite of us."

"I'm sorry," said Henry Milner with the utmost sincerity.

Standing there gazing down at Emmy sympathetically, it was impossible for him not to realize what this meant for him personally. Destiny, after all, had not failed him. Without scandal, without lasting unpleasantness, he would be free. Three months . . . six months . . . and Claire, in all her beauty and her vivid enjoyment of life, would be his wife.

Then, with a feeling of horror at his own lack of generosity, he put Claire quite definitely out of his mind. Claire was of that enchanting future so nearly impending. But the present belonged to Emmy.

"Emmy," he said very gently, placing his hand upon her head in rare caress, "it seems that, after all, I haven't given you anything of real consequence in these years of success. Won't you let me try to make it up to you in the little time left?"

The head beneath his pitying hand quivered. Emmy looked up at him, in her faded eyes a shimmer of tears.

"I think," she stammered, "it's what I hoped you would say. It—well, it won't be for long, Henry."

cover and pressed it on the fire and onto the flames in the fire. "I have done," she said as her last word.

But she was not done with and she had the feeling that she was not done with. She said to Harry, "This is not the children's tragedy. This is my tragedy. These were not the children's faults. These were my transgressions. Life is sacrifice. I never sacrificed. Sacrifice is atonement. It now is not possible for me to atone."

She was on her knees beside his chair. He stroked her hair.

THERE was an inquest. Harry went. She stayed at home and Benji stayed with her to be with her. Benji was not to be consoled. His mood was very dreadful. A report was printed in the evening paper before Harry came home. Benji read it and told Rosalie a witness, a man, had been arrested on the coroner's warrant. Benji said, "I think I'll go out now, mother, for a little."

Later in the evening when Rosalie was with Harry a maid came into the room and looked at Harry and saw how sunk he was in his chair and so went to Rosalie and whispered to her. Rosalie went out. There was a man wished to see the master. Rosalie spoke to him. He was a large, burly man with a strong face. He looked like, and was, a police officer in plain clothes. Rosalie heard what he began to say and said she would go with him. In the cab the man told her about it. All his sentences began with or contained "The young gentleman."

"The young gentleman . . . the prisoner, when the young gentleman came rushing in, happened to be in the charge-room writing out a statement. . . . The young gentleman, before any one could stop him, rushed at this prisoner and caught him by the throat and threw him and the table over and banged the man's head against the floor, fair trying to kill him. They got the young gentleman off. They ought to have arrested the young gentleman, and they did most earnestly wish they had of arrested him, and blamed themselves properly that they didn't arrest him. But they felt cruelly sorry for the young gentleman and they got him outside and let him go and no more said. Of course, as madam knew, the police office wasn't very far from Gower Street station, the underground station with them steep stairs leading straight down from the street to the platform, as madam might be aware. . . . The young gentleman was seen by witnesses, whose names were took, to come rushing down these stairs on to the platform as if some one was after him. . . . The young gentleman come rushing down and there was a train just coming in, and whether he couldn't stop or whether he . . . There's some say one thing and some say the other. . . . Whichever way it was the young gentleman. . . ."

ROSALIE did her errand with the man and then came back to Harry. She had to tell Harry.

He was sitting in his chair. He had an open book on his knees. She saw, as one notices these things, it was a Shakespeare. She stood up there at the door before him and she said, "Harry—Benji!"

He saw it in her face.

He groaned.

He took the book off his knees and fumbled it, and with a groaning mutter dropped it: "Unarm, Eros, the long day's work is done."

She came to him and saw, as one sees things, above his head the picture he had hung when raven was his hair and radiant his face, and had hit his thumb, and jumped, and cried out, "Mice and Mumps!" and had laughed and wrung his hands, and cried out, "Mice and Mumps!" and laughed again. She came to him and saw him wilt and crumple in his chair, and could have sworn she saw the iron of his head, that had been raven, go gray anew and grayer yet. She came to him and she said, "Harry—Benji—an accident—not an accident—on the railway—killed."

His voice went, not exclamationally, but in a thick mutter, as one agropes, in sudden darkness, befogged, betrayed. "My God, my God, my God, my God, my God!"

She fell on her knees; and on her arms and on his lap she buried then her face.

He suddenly stooped to her, and caught his arms about her, and raised her to him, and pressed his face to hers, and held her there; and his cry was as once before, passionately holding her, his cry had been; then from his heart to her heart, now from the abysses of his soul to her soul's depths, "Rosalie! Rosalie!"

THERE was to have been some more of it; but there, they're in each other's arms, and one has suffered so with them one cannot any more go on. One's suffered sol One has looked backward with her. The heart must break but for a forward glimpse:

They're all right now. Huggo's in Canada. He writes every week. They're all right now. That other Rosalie (Huggo's child) that they brought in is looking after them. She's looking after them, that elf, that sprite, that tricky scrap, that sunshine thing. She calls Harry father and Rosalie she calls mother. She has all her meals with them. There's no nurse. It's breakfast she loves best. She's on the itch all breakfast. When breakfast's done she's off her chair and hopping. She trumpets in her tiny voice, "Lessons! Lessons!" # What is Happening to Oil in Russia

All these shifts of power and massacres and occupations, took place in a single year. It was not exactly good for the oil industry of Baku. Production dropped from sixty million barrels in 1916, to only twenty-four million in 1918, the year of all this conflict.

For a year and a half the British held Baku sharing control for a time with some Italian troops, as the Versailles treaty and the Supreme Council juggled with spheres of control in the Near East, but later regaining exclusive control. There was a fiction of an independent Azerbaijan government, which existed mainly for the purpose of being bribed and corrupted.

THE oil fields were declared private property again. There was a year and a half of relative peace. But the oil production still continued low, at twenty-eight million barrels. There were strikes, suppressed by tanks and armed force! The Russian market, to which most of the Baku oil must go, since the pipe-line to Batum and the outside world is only good for kerosene—the Russian market was cut off by a wall of steel, and behind that wall Russia was fighting for existence. The storage tanks of Baku filled to overflowing, and in the earth storage tanks the oil gradually spoiled from long contact; oil clogged the sands and ran in a riot of waste into the sea.

Meantime, while Britain sat secure (more or less) in Baku, the armies of Denikin, financed by British gold and helped by our own American Red Cross, drove northward, threatening the very center of Russia during that darkest year of 1919. They captured the Grozny fields, where nine great gushers were burning as a result of civil war. The gushers burned on for a year and a half consuming enough wealth to pay one-fourth the expenses of the Russian State during the extravagant days of the Tsar.

Then, in the fall of the year, the Red Army gathered strength, slowly organized out of broken, starving bands into one united control. Month by month through the winter Denikin was hammered back, and when another spring came the oil workers of Baku knew that the red armies were near, on the borders of Azerbaijan. Promptly they revolted again, calling on Soviet Russia for aid.

It took less than half an hour for the government of Baku to change hands. The red troops came down the railroad, took possession of the oil fields, declared them national property and have held them ever since, from the twentieth of April, 1920.

Some day, when the writers of heroic romances get busy, the tale will be fitly told how the half-fed, half-clad workers of Russia brought a fleet of cruisers and destroyers a thousand miles overland through the heart of Russia, to take possession of the Caspian Sea. From Petrograd up the Neva, through a chain of lakes and canals to the upper Volga, and so down the great channel of Russia to the Caspian, that was the unheard of path they followed. It was an impossible feat—only one of the many impossible things done in that year of exhaustion by the besieged Russians.

It was not a mere defeat for the British; it was a rout. Their army in northern Persia was scattered completely. British generals escaped without clothing, and fled southward into Persia. "It was quite horrible," I have heard the pitying Russian workers say of the plight of the proud British troops.

The oil fields were again in the hands of the Baku workers—what was left of them.

Drills were lacking, and machinery, and ropes and clothes and shoes and food. Exhausted Russia, struggling now against the combined attacks of Poland and Wrangel, could absorb the Baku oil with joy, but could give nothing back to the Baku workers. The floods crept onward, and it seemed as if the oil fields would be lost altogether to Russia and the world.

And then—came peace. But before a breath could be drawn, came the greatest famine the world has ever known. But even the famine proved less disorganizing than war. The blockade was broken; the most necessary materials could be bought abroad. There was time to think and to plan. Even during the year of the great drought, Russian industries began to improve.

THE engineers of oil drew up a plan, a month by month program for production, for flood-fighting, for reconstruction. It was a plan to rebuild the oil fields out of their own resources. Gradually, slowly, repairing old wells, digging new ones, buying machinery piece by piece as there was money, the work went forward.

Month by month for over a year that plan has been fulfilled. Baku has produced 112 percent of the program demanded, Grozny 103 percent, and Emba 115 percent. Month by month the oil workers are doing more than is asked of them by the engineers who have worked out the program. The oil production is running around three million barrels a month, or nearly two-thirds of the 1916 figure. And the floods are coming under control.

There was struggle, not only with foreign demands, and with material lacks, but with the other hungry needs of Russia herself. For a year past there has been a transition period, from the old "military communism" under which the government took everything from everybody for the needs of national defense, to the new "state capitalism" in which state industries stand on their own feet, controlling their own buying and selling and financing themselves as independent units. During this transition period there were many powerful government departments that wanted to finance themselves from the earnings on Russian oil.

The oil industry itself possessed no legal right to sell oil, but was forced to turn its product over to the Department for Foreign Trade, the All Russian Coöperatives or the Department of Food Supply. These organizations, struggling under severe emergencies, sold Russian oil and used the proceeds, not to re-equip the oil fields, but for other pressing needs.

OUT of these conflicting claims in the industries of Russia a coherent plan was built at last. Not in five years time is an industrial order made over. But the oil industry of Russia is now organized as an independent unit.

Under the Fuel Administration comes the Oil Management. It appoints a Chief Engineer for each of the great oil districts. The oil workers of the district choose an oil worker as the chief's first aide. This is the simple organization for the production of oil.

The sale of oil is simple in form. Each of the three great districts select directors on an oil syndicate, which controls the marketing of oil in Russia. The Fuel Administration in Moscow appoints the chairman. All over Russia they have their branches for the sale of oil. Thirty percent royalty goes to the state; the rest is returned to build up the oil industry.

But the oil industry itself is an organ of the state, a self-supporting, self-contained organ which must pay its own way, and build itself up into power, but which need fear no drafts upon its reserves by the general needs of government.

For Foreign Trade there is another company, the Naphtha Export controlled half by the oil syndicate and half by the Department of Foreign Trade. Down in the three half-furnished rooms that serve as office and living-quarters, I met Bill Shatoff, the manager of Naphtha Export.

Bill is one of those primitive men of strength and great vigor, which can be turned into channels of destruction or used to build empires. He was an I. W. W. in the United States.

AMERICA made of him a strike organizer, a wanderer from coast to coast; Russia made of him an empire-builder. He has no use for Russian politics, being an anarchist now as always, but his energy finds outlet in big jobs for Russia. He was chief of police in Petrograd's stormiest days, and manager of Siberian railways in the civil war, and general of an army in the Ukraine, and investigator of the untold wealth of the Far Eastern Republic. Now he is manager of Naphtha Export.

"We have fifteen million dollars worth of naphtha, benzine and machine oils ready to deliver to the European markets in the next nine months," he said, "and six million dollars worth to the Near East market. We sold last month ten thousand tons of benzine, twelve thousand of naphtha, and five thousand of machine oils on the open world market, chiefly London and Berlin."

Although America cast him out, he is proud of America. "America was my teacher," he said. "Some day she will be proud of the men she taught and sent

Making the Shaggy Buffalo The American Painter's Mascot

How Andrew S. Butler harnessed the hardy bison to 28 Quality Products

By JAMES WALLEN

ANDREW S. BUTLER

No age is too remote; no country is too sparsely settled and no man too isolated to furnish inspiration for American commercial genius and aggressiveness. When Andrew S. Butler, President of the McDougall-Butler Co., chose the buffalo as the trade symbol of a group of twenty-eight quality paints, varnishes and enamels, he had historical precedence.

The earliest painters known to us, the Reindeer men of the post-glacial age, pictured a bison in tawny coloring on the roof of the Altamira Cave in northern Spain. In our own day, J. C. Beard and A. B. Frost have expressed their admiration of the buffalo with their able brushes. Mr. Butler affirms that he could do honor to the buffalo only by making house paints, enamels and varnishes of character. The Buffalo Quality trade-mark, here reproduced, identifies twenty-eight such products covering the entire range of the painter's and householder's needs.

When the saw, hammer and trowel have completed their work, it is given to the brush to add the touch which makes the house livable and the building impressive. McDougall-Butler Buffalo Quality paints, varnishes and enamels crown the architect's achievements with the final finish that emphasizes the beauty of line like the patina on old bronze. Time tests the quality of paint as it does the character of men and bison. Mr. Butler says that the laboratory test is good, but the trial on the job is better.

With McDougall-Butler products, the brush of the painter leaves a durable surface but little affected by the marking brush of time. The whims of weather and circumstance are the provers of paint virtue. Sun, sleet and grime are no kinder to Buffalo Quality paints, varnishes and enamels than to any other, but somehow the McDougall-Butler staff put into their products a content that makes them impervious to many destructive elements.

Whether the painter contracts to decorate the boudoir of a butterfly, or cover the steel girders of a bridge, he can fill his needs from the McDougall-Butler Buffalo Quality group. However, like the horseman who reveals the secret of the favored steed in the string by his track-talk, Mr. Butler's conversation leads one to the suspicion that he has thought long and hard on certain products.

Mr. Butler believes that inasmuch as we carry woods from the solitary ends of the earth to build the home nest and public gathering place, the beauty of mahogany, walnut and oak should be preserved. So McDougall-

Butler chemists have produced Permanite, the crystal-clear varnish to reveal and conserve the richness of grain and burl. Among other favored McDougall-Butler Buffalo Quality items are Zanzite, the lily among white enamels; Mattona, the true mat finish in sixteen pastel shades; Buffalo Quality House Paint, smooth as fine porcelain; Flooroleum, a floor finish clear, clean and hard as Chinese amber and Buffalo Quality Colors in Oil, that are doing much to make the shaggy buffalo the mascot of the painter.

Since 1887 this sturdy house has made quality paints. When in 1919 Andrew S. Butler became the president and his name a part of the corporate title, he determined that the world should know about its high merits thru the medium of the Buffalo Quality mark. It takes a man with commercial instinct to put forward the old traditions. This is the debt the English potters owe to Josiah Wedgwood.

What has been accomplished under the McDougall-Butler Buffalo Quality mark is merely a token of what is to be achieved. The American buffalo has for a long time faced the setting sun. There is eloquent symbolism in the fact that under the kindly direction of his admirers he has turned his majestic head to the sunrise.

back to Russia. We learned from her the trick of efficiency, organization and speed; and now we are using it to build something greater than America—a Workers' Republic possessing the world's richest lands."

Meantime, the owners of stocks and bonds in old Russian oil companies, speculate in their shares in London and Paris and New York, and demand that the wells be given back to them.

But the great forces of life, that sweep forward by months or by ages, wiping out cities and civilizations ruthlessly, and building new ones—have carried Russia forward into a different world which they will never understand. The workers of Baku live in that world. They have seen a half-dozen armies of occupation; they have seen massacres of tens of thousands; they have fought back floods and fires.

"Shall we give for pieces of paper," they say, "what you tried to take by the slaughter of thousands of our best men—and failed?"

Yet, though the obligations of the past mean nothing to Russia, the needs of the future mean much. So it is that she offers "compensation," not as a right, but as a price for credits.

In two ways she will let foreign capital into her industries, either in Mixed Companies, with the Russian Government controlling the majority stock; or as a straight lease, under definite conditions for a definite term of years.

For the leases which Russia offers are not the kind of leases which capitalists have learned to expect in the world where money is king.

"We do not allow the small competitive oil claims that have wrecked American oil," said Lejava to me. "We demand that the concessionaire shall have capital enough to develop a definite oil-field, with all the pipes and transport necessary. It is the only rational way.

IN FIELDS where great gushers are expected, we demand that he shall provide adequate storage, that the oil may not be wasted. He must provide protection against floods and fires. He must have a plan for working the whole field rationally. Any solid company, wishing to make its money out of developing the oil industry, can make big money in Russian oil. But wildcat companies, interested in quick returns on little capital, to make a showing and unload on the public—for these our leases offer no inducements."

Sound oil companies, ready to sink a hundred millions in wells and pipe-lines, take time to consider. They send engineers; they take into account political recognition.

In no case will there be any exclusive monopoly contract, giving control of the future of Russian oil to either Standard or Shell. Lejava himself told me that; that would be contrary to Russian principles and to Russian interests.

This contract of the Barnstable Corporation, for only fifteen years, giving the government a percentage of the product and of the net returns, in return for machinery and transportation, is exactly the kind of foreign concession of which the Soviet officials as a whole are in favor.

Each agreement will be a definite business contract, giving definite oil districts for a definite term of years, under definite requirements of development and of royalty paid to the state. But even so, such agreements may be events big enough to break world-wide monopolies.

Meantime, while foreign concessionaires deliberate and finally begin, and foreign owners of old bonds speculate, and foreign diplomats meet in conference after conference, the oil workers and engineers of Russia labor day by day to increase production. There is peace now; there is food; there is a chance to sell their oil and rebuild their industry from the proceeds. Before them gleams the hope, which the Soviet Government is not unwilling to encourage, that in the race between old bondholders, new concessionaires, and the great oil-trusts of the world for the major control of Russian oil—it may be the workers of Baku and Grozny and Emba themselves who will get that major control.

David R. Solomon's Story of a Second Courting—From page 41

He could understand now why a shot bird crept off into some dark hole. He knew how the wild animal felt, wounded and frightfully shocked.

With a start he returned to the present. The reverend gentleman was offering smiling congratulations. Falkner pressed a bill into his hands. Turning, he bowed low to his new-old wife.

"If you'll pardon me," he said, with all the courtesy in the world, "my taxi is waiting outside. Good-by—and all the luck you deserve."

"But, Falkner! There'll be papers to sign—and everything! Where'll you be?"

"MY PLANS, my dear, are very vague. By this time Jupe should have for me a drawing-room on the Pullman and a ticket for Memphis, Tennessee. If he has not dropped my suitcase, I hope to have drowned most of my cares before we get there."

The mask of his light tone dropped. "You said you were tired of it all," he said savagely. "I am too—God knows I am. I'm going as far away from it all as money will carry me. Good-by!" The door slammed behind him.

As his taxi drew up, the long train was waiting in the station. Falkner strode through and into the Pullmans at the rear. In passing, he glanced through the door of his drawing-room. Yes: Jupe had obeyed orders. His well-remembered suitcase was lying, innocent and inviting, upon the seat.

From the rear observation platform he glanced around. Neither Jupe nor tickets were in evidence. Oh, well—that was the tiniest of worries.

"Bo-o-oard!" came the final warning. Leisurely the engine began clanging its bell and emitted one preparatory hiss of steam.

Mingled, came the flap-flap of running feet on the concrete platform. It was Jupe, the unaccounted-for. He held, outstretched, Falkner's tickets and Pullman reservation.

"Los' you, Mist' Falkner!" he panted. "Like to never foun' you, suh." Falkner took them as the train groaned into slow motion out of the station.

"Don' lose 'em, suh," Jupe cautioned. "Good-by, suh, an' good luck!"

The words rang ironically in Falkner's ears. "Good luck!" Was there such a thing?

Falkner stalked stiffly through the diner, set in its fresh white napery and glittering silver. The train lumbered heavily around a curve. A Pullman—another—another; then, in a window, the symbol of his own car: S-17. He lurched down the plush-flanked aisle and wrenched open the door of his drawing-room in relief. The slam of it behind him was comforting.

Head down, he blinked dazedly. Then he shook his head from side to side, as does a stunned boxer to clear his senses of the strange confusion.

Before his unseeing eyes a dainty slipper took form, a silken clad ankle, and the edge of a smart tweed skirt. He dared not raise his eyes. It could not be—what he hoped.

But it was—and none but eyes that ached with the want for her could have missed the too-easy nonchalance of her pose; the studied ease that was not ease; the careful matter-of-factness that betrayed itself.

Falkner, stunned, could only stand and stare. His mind had dropped into a state of shocked inaction.

AT HIS stupefaction, Ann Brooke's expression underwent a swift change. Came surprise, then relief—then a warm glory in the clear-cut little face, and a tender, misty cloud in the wide eyes. Suddenly, unaccountably, she was upon her feet, close to him: her little hands rose-petal light upon his sleeves.

"Falkner—honey! I didn't know you'd take it like this. Why, you're just a little boy, hurt!" A warm, crooning note had crept into her voice. "I didn't mean it that way at all, Falkner. It was just my way of making up, honey. Look." She held up her left hand.

About the third finger was a plain little gold circlet, the ring that he had placed there—a lifetime ago—in the dingy little office of the Justice of the Peace. Spellbound, he stared, his heart thumping.

"Falkner Noel!" Ann Brooke broke the silence. "Aren't you going to kiss your wife?"

Colonel Reb Singleton Plays Poker for High Stakes—From page 75—and Finds Himself

Out on a Limb

"Not that I remember. Was he in Texas in our day?"

"I've heard so—somewhere west of the Pecos. I never remember seeing him. He's been everywhere, since. Alaska, Tonopah, Goldfield—wherever the lid has been off."

"Square games?"

"Moderately so, I reckon; he's still living. But not gentle. He's never had any special prejudice against bickering in his places, providing the authorities ain't fussy. Got a gun on?"

"No. Why should I clutter myself up with a gun? I'm not going into the dark highways and byways where the hold-ups are, and if I see any symptoms of trouble in any of the bright places I'm going right away from there."

Having spent an hour or so, in lesser places, strictly in accordance with the program he had announced, Colonel Singleton came finally to the Wigwam.

He surveyed a big, smoke-clouded room, turbulent with excited, laughing, shouting, money-spending, sometimes drunken humanity. If it lacked any of the allurements possessed by sporting resorts in the wide-open days of the old Southwest, Reb did not miss them.

HE HAD a soft drink at a bar where business was brisk but soft drinks the exception, he lost five dollars in three rolls at roulette, and he stood, not far from the door, watching a hysterical crap game, when a San Antonio acquaintance, now spending much time in Moneda and running an oil company in the county, came past on his way toward the exit.

"Hello, Colonel," he hailed, not loudly but expansively. "Nice li'l' game of draw going back there. I cleaned up six hundred and knew enough to quit; got to be up at sunup to start for our property. Have a li'l' drink?"

"Just had one," Reb smiled. "First time I've ever been in here. I was wondering if they didn't have any poker tables. Where are they?"

"Rooms in back. The biggest game is usually in the room in that corner—too big for me. I've been playing in that third room. Good luck to you if you sit in."

Reb threaded his way through the crowd and entered the corner apartment. The first face he saw, pale and drawn under the downward-reflected light, was Delbert Keene's, and as Reb edged into the little group of spectators Keene went down into a pocket inside his vest, got a rectangular slip of paper from a wallet, and said:

"Another five thousand."

He used a fountain pen.

"Cashier's check, same as the others; made payable to me and I've endorsed it in blank," he informed the house banker, who inspected it, face and back, put it safely away without comment, and counted out chips.

"Give us a fresh deck," Keene demanded. "Great Judas, did you ever see worse luck! Who'd have believed that seven-full of mine could've been beat. No, not a red deck; a blue one. Come on; throw 'em around. I'm going to get some of that roll of mine back."

More than five thousand dollars loser, obviously; he had called for "another" five thousand. Three cashier's checks at least in the possession of the house; he had said this check was similar to the "others." Checks brought from San Antonio to Moneda, no doubt, to be used as the required ten percent deposit if his bid at tomorrow's receiver's sale should be the highest.

"I'll crack it for a hundred," announced a player, and another said, "Let's make it two."

COLONEL SINGLETON studied the faces of the players. There were six, and all save Keene were strangers to him. Three were plainly well-to-do oil men. One other, who was playing for the house, was a typical professional, with shallow, flat blue eyes and a stone face. The remaining participant might also be a professional, but Reb did not think so.

Keene won two or three pots and temporarily jubilated. Then he lost. He lost much more than he won. By far his greatest losings went into the stacks of the house professional, whose name, it developed, was Quinney.

Reb fell to watching Quinney's hands as they shuffled and dealt. They looked like hands competent to manipulate cards dishonestly, but they did not so manipulate them; Reb was certain of it. He did not make any of the covering gestures that sometimes disguise a shifting of the cut; and he dealt with a studied slowness that absolutely precluded even a suspicion of legerdemain.

All these things—and Reb's eyes were only one of a dozen pairs that watched him—would have gone far toward demonstrating that he was merely lucky in his holdings and skilful in his playing, but there was one more convincing argument: His biggest winnings were not made on his own deals. Nor on the deals of any special one of the others.

And yet Reb did not feel entirely sure.

He changed his position at a convenient moment, and stood against the wall a step or two to Quinney's left and somewhat behind him. Raising his eyes from the play, a few moments later, he recognized one of the other spectators who, like himself, was standing back in the shadow. It was a notorious bootlegger named Buck Jewett, who at one time, until driven out, had plied his trade in San Antonio.

It was fifteen minutes later that Reb noticed Quinney's knees.

They were tight pressed together as he sat there in his chair, and now that Reb thought of it, he realized that they had steadily remained so. It would have been natural for the man to ease his cramped posture occasionally, at least between deals, but he did not.

Then, after a while, Quinney spread them—the least bit, five or six inches, perhaps—and almost instantly let them come together again. This was repeated, presently, in the middle of a pot which Delbert Keene had dealt, another player had opened, and Keene had raised. When that pot was played out to a showdown, after Quinney had bet five hundred dollars and Keene had called it, Keene's ace-high flush was beaten by Quinney's king-full.

And Singleton knew.

A sleeve hold-out is an ingenious but desperately dangerous contrivance. Every poker player in the world has heard of it; not one in ten thousand has ever seen one. A phrase of Bill Whitcher's came into Reb's mind: "Those gamblers are using tricks that went out of style in San Antonio before the Silver King closed."

Up the sleeve, on the under side of the operator's left arm, is an artful bit of clamp mechanism designed to hold cards. At the proper pull of a cord that runs down from the left shoulder, the clamp deftly slides down past the wrist to the palm of the hand, and opens. When cards have been slipped into it to be saved for a later emergency or, the emergency having arrived, have been taken out of it and replaced by the relatively worthless ones that were in the player's legitimate hand, it crawls silently back up the sleeve.

THE OPERATOR'S left hand, during this operation, lies innocently quiescent, back upward, palm resting upon cards that are in the palm of the right hand. The cord that controls the device passes up through a loop at the left elbow on the shoulder, across a harness to the right shoulder, down past the hip to the inside of the right knee, and out through a hole in the trouser leg there to end in a little hook. There is an eye to match the hook, attached to the knee of the left trouser leg. Early in the game the player connects them, the cord being black, like his trousers. So long as his knees are together, the hold-out remains up his sleeve. Wishful to store cards in it or, the time for a killing having arrived, to secure the aces, or kings, or whatever other valuable cards he has from time to time slipped out of the hands dealt him and concealed there, he slightly spreads his knees and stealthily the contrivance moves down into place.

It calls for a high degree of adroitness to work with one, but, more, it calls for cold-steel nerve. Once discovered, there can be no excuse or alibi.

Quinney was working with a hold-out, but Singleton was not a player, and the ethics of the Southwest do not provide that an outsider shall concern himself with gambling house proceedings in which he has no personal interest. If Reb were himself a participant in the game, he would be within his rights to expose the cheat, assuming he dared provoke the violence that might be expected to follow. If he had a friend in the game, it would be within the proprieties for him to endeavor to get the friend to quit, afterward advising him that he believed the play to be crooked. Neither of these things applying, custom

Are We a Nation of Low-Brows?

It is charged that the public is intellectually incompetent. Is this true? It is charged that the public is afraid of ideas, disinclined to think, unfriendly to culture. This is a serious matter. The facts should be faced frankly and honestly.

Without Cultural Leadership

The main criticism, as we find it, is that the people support ventures that are unworthy, that represent no cultural standards. The public is fed on low-brow reading matter, low-brow movies, low-brow theatrical productions, low-brow music, low-brow newspapers, low-brow magazines. We think the criticism is unfair in that it does not recognize the fact that the public is without cultural leadership. Those who have the divine spark get off by themselves. We believe the public has never had a real chance, never had an opportunity to get acquainted with the great and the beautiful things of life. Given half a chance, the public will respond.

We believe there has been enough talk about the public's inferior taste.

The time has come to give the public an opportunity to find out something about philosophy, science and other higher things. And it must be done at a low price, because the average person's pocketbook is not fat. As it stands, the publishers charge about five dollars a volume, and then wonder why the people stand aloof.

We believe we have a way to find out if the people are interested in the deeper problems of life. And the first thing we decided was to fix a price that shall be within the reach of the person with the most slender purse.

We have selected a library of 25 books, which we are going to offer the public at an absurdly low price. We shall do this to find out if it is true that the public is not going to accept the better things when once given the chance. And we shall make the price so inviting that there shall be no excuse on the ground of expense.

All Great Things Are Simple

Once the contents of the following 25 books are absorbed and digested, we believe a person will be well on the road to culture. And by culture we do not mean something dry-as-dust, something incomprehensible to the average mind—genuine culture like great sculpture, can be made to delight the common as well as the elect. The books listed below are all simple works and yet they are great—all great things are simple. They are serious works, of course, but we do not think the public will refuse to put its mind on serious topics. Here are the 25 books.

Are the People Ready to Read These 25 Books?

Schopenhauer's Essays. For those who regard philosophy as a thing of abstractions, vague and divorced from life, Schopenhauer will be a revelation.

The Trial and Death of Socrates. This is dramatic literature as well as sound philosophy.

Meditations of Marcus Aurelius. This old Roman Emperor was a paragon of wisdom and virtue. He will help you.

The Discovery of the Future. H. G. Wells asks and answers the question: Is life just an unsolvable, hazardous struggle?

Dialogues of Plato. This volume takes you into Plato's immortal circle.

Foundations of Religion. Prof. Cook asks and answers the question: Where and how did religious ideas originate?

Studies in Pessimism. Schopenhauer presents a well-studied viewpoint of life. The substance of his philosophy.

The Idea of God in Nature. John Stuart Mill. How the idea of God may come naturally from observation of nature is explained in this volume.

Life and Character. Goethe. The fruits of his study and observation is explained in this volume.

Thoughts of Pascal. Pascal thought a great deal about God and the Universe, and the origin and purpose of life.

The Olympian Gods. Tichenor. A study of ancient mythology.

The Stoic Philosophy. Prof. Gilbert Murray. He tells what this belief consisted of, how it was discovered, and what we can today learn from it.

God: Known and Unknown. Samuel Butler. A really important work.

Nietzsche: Who He Was and What He Stood For. A carefully planned study.

Sun Worship and Later Beliefs. Tichenor. A most important study for those who wish to understand ancient religions.

Primitive Beliefs. Tichenor. You get a clear idea from this account of the beliefs of primitive man.

Three Lectures on Evolution. Ernst Haeckel's ideas expressed so you can understand them.

From Monkey to Man. A comprehensive review of the Darwinian theory.

Survival of the Fittest. Another phase of Darwinian theory.

Evolution vs. Religion. You should read this discussion.

Reflections on Modern Science. Prof. Huxley's reflections definitely add to your knowledge.

Biology and Spiritual Philosophy. An interesting and instructive work.

Bacon's Essays. These essays contain much sound wisdom that still holds.

Emerson's Essays. Emerson was a friend of Carlyle, and in some respects a greater philosopher.

Tolstoi's Essays. His ideas will direct you into profitable paths of thought.

25 Books—2,176 Pages—Only $1.95—Send No Money

If these 25 books were issued in the ordinary way they might cost you as much as a hundred dollars. We have decided to issue them so you can get all of them for the price of one ordinary book. That sounds inviting, doesn't it? And we mean it, too. Here are 25 books, containing 2,176 pages of text, all neatly printed on good book paper, 3½x5 inches in size, bound securely in card cover paper.

You can take these 25 books with you when you go to and from work. You can read them in your spare moments. You can slip four or five of them into a pocket and they will not bulge. You can investigate the best and the soundest ideas of the world's greatest philosophers—and the price will be so low as to astonish you. No, the price will not be $25 for the 25 volumes. Nor will the price be $5. The price will be even less than half that sum. Yes, we mean it. Believe it or not, the price will be only $1.95 for the entire library. That's less than a dime a volume. In fact, that is less than eight cents per volume. Surely no one can claim he cannot afford to buy the best. Here is the very best at the very least. Never were such great works offered at so low a price. All you have to do is to sign your name and address on the blank below. You don't have to send any money. Just mail us the blank and we will send you the 25 volumes described on this page—you will pay the postman $1.95 plus postage. And the books are yours.

If you want to send cash with order remit $2.25.

Are we making a mistake in advertising works of culture? Are we doing the impossible when we ask the people to read serious works? Are we wasting our time and money? We shall see by the manner in which the blank below comes into our mail.

He wouldn't have done it knowingly

HE was a fastidious fellow: always immaculate, spruce-looking, well-groomed.

He never neglected anything about his personal appearance, even down to the smallest detail. He was extremely gracious and considerate to those about him.

Yet there was one thing he overlooked that did embarrass his friends—and a thing for which he really could not be blamed because he was entirely ignorant of it himself.

That's the insidious thing about halitosis (the medical term for unpleasant breath). It creeps upon you unawares. Nine times out of ten the person so suffering is least of all conscious of it. And while it embarrasses friends and associates with whom you come in contact, the subject is so delicate a one they can't bring themselves to mention it.

Sometimes, of course, halitosis is a chronic thing that requires professional aid. Usually, however, and fortunately, halitosis is purely a local condition. Smoking often causes it, the finest cigar becoming the offender even hours after it has brought the smoker pleasure.

Listerine used regularly as a mouth-wash and gargle will usually correct most forms of halitosis. It halts fermentation in the mouth and leaves the breath sweet, fresh and clean.

Any druggist will supply you. Listerine has dozens of uses as an all 'round safe antiseptic. Fastidious people everywhere are adopting it as a regular part of their daily toilet routine. Its use as a mouth-wash affords such an easy, sure way of putting yourself on the safe and polite side.—Lambert Pharmacal Co., Saint Louis, U. S. A.

and caution alike urged him to mind his own business.

Delbert Keene lost a big pot, got out his wallet, his fountain pen and another cashier's check—and Reb saw there were no more where it came from.

"Another five thousand," he said, and licked his lips. His face was white, but there were beads of sweat on his forehead.

He looked up and around at the spectators and for the first time observed Singleton. A flush spread over his face.

"Howdy, Colonel," he said, striving to be casual. "Were you planning to sit in? Maybe it'll change my luck."

"I don't believe I will, tonight," Reb replied. "Game is a little stiff for me."

"I'll say it's too stiff for me!" Keene cried, in his desperation little considering his words, but moved to confession by the sight of a familiar face. "Great Judas! If I'd had any idea— You listen to me declare myself. If I get back what I've lost tonight, I'm going to quit. I'm off poker for good. Twenty-five thousand dollars! That's too much!"

THE OTHER players listened boredly; un-repressed talk of reformation by a heavy loser is not uncommon at a poker table. But Reb's eyes narrowed. In the smoke-eddy dimness at Keene's shoulder he saw a lovely girl of eighteen. Her features were piquant. Her hair was soft and shining. Her complexion was creamy. Her lustrous eyes sparkled, but not with mirth; there were tears in them.

"Is that a promise, Keene?" he asked quietly. "If you get your money back? You'll quit gambling?"

"You bet your life I mean it. Great Judas, I know when I've got enough!"

Reb Singleton leaped forward and dragged up Quinney's left sleeve to the elbow, and every man present saw the hold-out and its content of cards. Quinney went after his pistol with the speed of a striking snake. Reb smashed him on the point of the jaw with every ounce of strength he could put behind his left fist, and the gambler lay limp and unconscious, sprawled back in his chair.

From his waistband, at the front, protruded the grip of the automatic pistol he had not been given time to reach. In the very instant that Reb saw it a harsh voice snapped, "Get 'em up! Quick!" and he shifted his eyes to find Jewett, the bootlegger, holding a forty-five steadily pointed at his breast, the trigger pressed, the hammer raised and held back from action only by Jewett's restraining thumb.

Reb's hands flew out from his sides and lifted. Jewett, it was instantly obvious, must be an armed guard of the house, stationed there in the corner for just such a contingency as this.

"All right; they're up," Reb said. "You don't think you'd live to get out of this town if you killed me, do you? Not unless you killed all these other witnesses, and you can't very well do that. On the other hand, if we agreed to let you make a getaway before we made anything public about this little machinery that your friend is wearing— You and him, too, perhaps, when he comes to. Of course these gentlemen would want to get back what they've lost; some of it, anyway. That last pot, for instance. Keene and Quinney were the only players. It had about six hundred dollars in it. They belong to Keene. Why not take them back, Keene?"

Half-dazedly, Keene reached across toward Quinney's stacks. Jewett hesitated the barest second, confused by this diversion, then swung his pistol away from Reb and toward the table. "Leave them chips alone!" he commanded.

Singleton's right hand swooped to the automatic in the unconscious Quinney's waistband. Jewett swung back his weapon, a split-second too late. A bullet from the automatic smashed his right collarbone. Another broke his arm.

"Everybody sit quiet," ordered Reb.

The door slammed open and through it came a special officer of some sort, pistol in hand, at his shoulder Tim Golden, the proprietor, a white-haired man with a face hard as iron and bleak as a January norther. At sight of the silver badge, Reb for the second time that evening raised his hands, spinning the automatic so that he held it by the barrel, butt upward.

As the representative of the law, his own forty-five competently held, took possession of the automatic and then of Jewett's gun from the floor, Golden's quick eyes took in the senseless Quinney, the damning hold-out in plain view.

"Wait a minute before you make any arrests, Sam! It looks like whatever happened was justified."

He shut the door behind him, precluding any greater number of spectators than were already there, and continued:

"Caught him crooked, eh? Of course I didn't know it. I paid him a percentage of his winnings, and I knew he was a good player, but— My house is run square. Any of you gentlemen that have been losing will get your money back."

"Get me a doctor," groaned Jewett, now sitting on the floor, his back against the wall. "That damned old wildcat shot me all to pieces. Ain't you going to arrest him, Sam?"

"I wouldn't," Golden advised the officer.

"Say, Colonel, I'm much obliged," Keene stammered. "If there's anything I can ever do for you—"

"There is. Keep that promise."

"I will. No trouble to do that. I know when I've got enough."

"Is there any reason, Mr. Golden, why I shouldn't be going?" Reb asked.

"No, none whatever. And thank you, Mister. I run a square house. You done me a favor keeping it so."

The gambler's voice was low and even, and his eyes were without expression.

"You're welcome, suh," said Reb, courteously. "Good night, gentlemen."

UVALDE COLE sat up on the edge of his bed, when the light was switched on, and screwed up his face in an effort to make his eyes read the hour on his watch.

"Gosh, Reb!" he said. "What kept you out so darned late?"

"I got out on a limb."

"How come?" Uvalde asked drowsily.

"I had a little hand to play, and I played it sort of careless, and I got caught out on a long, long limb. And I had to shoot a bootlegger."

Uvalde's eyes had closed, and even this startling information did not open them.

"Oh, well," he murmured. "There are so many bootleggers."

Speedometers - Clocks - Watches

The value you do not see

Speedometers may look alike to you, but there is only one air-friction speedometer in all the world.

An automobile clock may be just a clock, but Waltham auto clocks are super-time keepers when you think for a moment what a daily pounding of vibration they get. You may imagine one watch is as good as another, but Waltham Watches have invariably defeated the world's best, when it came to scientific investigation and rigid test.

A great family of watchmakers, master mechanics, inventors cannot make precision instruments for seventy years without putting values into mechanism and design that give a value beyond the purchase price—the value you do not see. That is why the world's leading motor cars are Waltham equipped. And why the careful buyer, who invests money in a fine watch, demands a Waltham.

The Waltham Speedometer is the only air-friction Speedometer in the world (Invented by Nikola Tesla.) Developed and perfected by Waltham.

Intolerance

America was settled by those seeking intellectual liberty. The United States has been the asylum for practically all peoples and all tongues. Fate and circumstances seemed to dedicate this Continent to an experiment in government grounded in the utmost freedom of thought and the greatest liberality of opinion. All the nations of Europe have sent here men and women who accepted our institutions, contributed through brain and brawn to the development of our great natural wealth and entered into and became a part of our national life.

REGARDLESS of race or nationality they became part of the mighty whole which now constitutes the American people. Here have gathered all races, all creeds, all religions, all customs, to be welded into something new, distinct and permanent. The Constitution in its sublime guarantees of civil liberty protects all alike—it recognizes neither creed nor race.

We have a perfect right, not only a right, but there rests upon us the impressive duty, to say who shall come to our shores and who shall become citizens. But the decree, having been made, the laws accepted, and in good faith complied with, ever thereafter to permit race or religion to become a cause for inequality before the law, for persecution or injustice, is to tear away the last vestige of free government and to commit the most cowardly and most self-destructive act of which the government could be guilty.

Sydney Smith, the celebrated English divine, declared: "Nothing dies so hard and rallies so often as intolerance. The fires are put out and no living nostril has scented the nidor of a human creature roasted for faith," yet he goes on to say, in substance, unexpectedly the vicious urge returns, the evil spirit persists and persecutions and punishment are revived for those of a different race or faith. The great number of letters coming to one's desk in these days, laden with the most intolerant and vicious antagonism to certain races and creeds within our own country to this or that religion or to this or that people and insisting upon constitutional amendments or laws, proscribing and denying to them the enjoyment of political honor, bring back Sydney Smith's statement and the truth it conveys—"nothing dies so hard and rallies so often."

THE RACE issue has been raised in some of our universities and colleges. It has been raised around or because of a people whose origin is associated with the most sacred traditions of the human family and whose history is rich in romance and achievement beyond the power of language to tell. These people are here, they are a great part of us, owning allegiance to our institutions, contributing in energy, in moral force and intellectual power to the upbuilding and preservation of our nation. It has been seriously proposed as a solution of the college question that there shall be a limitation of percentage of these people seeking admission as students.

In other words, we are to blandly sacrifice the principle—recognize the barbarous practice of discrimination on account of race, compromise with intolerance—in the seats of American learning.

It would be mortifying enough to have men in politics trimming and sidestepping and compromising by reason of some racial or religious question, but to see America's great institutions of learning, which should at all times and at all hazards hold aloft the banner of tolerance, yield on such a question would be disturbing beyond expression. We ought to say, not only from our college rostrum, but from the pulpit and from the hustings—and most of all from our legislative halls—that we refuse to defer in any way whatever to racial prejudices.

What is this all-but-insuperable obstacle to the recovery of Europe but a widespread, deep-seated and apparently unconquerable spirit of intolerance? What lies at the bottom of all this misery and what is this Saturnalia of turmoil and crime, continent-wide, and now overflowing into other continents, other than racial and religious and nationalistic intolerance? Why cannot the people, after all these years of suffering and sacrifice, after looking throughout these harrowing months upon their children unfed and unclothed, be at peace? It is because of the vice of intolerance.

IT HAS apparently become ingrained in their very being, and thus suspicion, fear, hate, vengeance, murder and assassination, like the brood which kennel as Milton's hounds about the parent sin, torment night and day the souls of men. The press, the voice of the public servant, and even the pulpit, feed this insatiable glutton of discord. It is sometimes said that Europe impatiently awaits a Napoleon—some genius for war who will bring warring factions together and put all under his universal sway.

But even more, I venture to believe it awaits a Lincoln whose healing and uplifting message of tolerance and mercy will banish hate and fear from the hearts of men. There has been no message of that kind gone forth in Europe for years. If one wishes to know how hungry the masses are for such a message, let him recall how they received the messages of Wilson and how their hopes were blighted when these messages met defeat in the intolerant and vindictive provisions of the Versailles Treaty.

Since the World War the frightful dogma of force has seemingly secured an increased hold upon the minds of men. Through force all things apparently are to be accomplished. The healing influence of justice and the wisely directing power of enlightened public opinion are less and less relied upon in both national and international affairs.

The first fruit of this dogma of force is the suppression of facts, censorship of the press, limitations on free speech, the denial of free assemblage—for these things belong to a different creed and signify a different national life. Metternich, the great advocate of despotic power, rightly declares:

"No government can pursue a firm and undeviating course when it is exposed daily to the influence of such dissolvent conditions as the freedom of the press." Force, arbitrary power, injustice, cannot withstand the dissolvent influence of free and independent discussion.

If there is any one thing which history establishes beyond dispute, it is the utter futility of intolerance in the world of ideas, the utter fruitlessness or persecution on account of race or creed. The only way we can meet erroneous and unwise doctrines is in the open field of debate where truth at last prevails. No error, however deep-seated, can long withstand the pulverizing effect of the combined influence of untrammelled minds.

I HAVE read somewhere that in Rome they will show the traveler the stately column of the Emperor Trajan. On the outer surface they have caused to be inscribed the triumphal march of the Emperor when he came back to Rome leading all nations, all tongues, all customs, all races, in the retinue of his mighty conquest; all these they have traced on the imperial marble circling the pillar from base to capital. Illustrative of this Republic: Broad enough and brave enough to admit and protect all creeds, wise and just enough to shield all citizens who accept our laws and acknowledge obedience to duly constituted authority. I would rather see this country called again to war with a foreign foe than to see it come under the sway of these forces of intolerance, which array creed against creed, race against race, class against class.

Whose temple of liberty and justice is this within which we as a people now dwell? Who reared it and who have maintained and defended it? Who fought the battles of the Revolution, spanned the rivers, felled the forests, reared cities, tunneled mountains, and finally joined the oceans in eternal wedlock? Who wrote the Constitution and placed safely there the sublime guarantees of civil liberty, free speech, free press, and the right to worship God according to the dictates of one's conscience? Who has enriched our history with heroic deeds and jeweled our national story with brilliant achievements? Who wove into the warp and woof of our traditions the story of sacrifice that now inspires men with pride and arouses them again and again to deeds of glory? These things are the handiwork of all creeds and all faiths, all races and all classes. Under this creed we have prospered and strengthened with the years. "Sirs, ye are brethren: why do ye wrong one to another?"

The Secret of Beautiful Hair

How Famous Movie Stars Keep Their Hair Soft and Silky—Bright and Fresh-Looking

STUDY the pictures of these beautiful women and you will see just how much their hair has to do with their appearance. Beautiful hair is not a matter of luck, it is simply a matter of care.

You, too, can have beautiful hair, if you care for it properly. Beautiful hair depends almost entirely upon the care you give it.

Shampooing is always the most important thing.

It is the shampooing which brings out the real life and lustre, natural wave and color, and makes your hair soft, fresh and luxuriant.

When your hair is dry, dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy, and the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, it is because your hair has not been shampooed properly.

When your hair has been shampooed properly, and is thoroughly clean, it will be glossy, smooth and bright, delightfully fresh-looking, soft and silky.

While your hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali in ordinary soaps soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why leading motion picture stars and discriminating women, everywhere, now use Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure, and it does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

If you want to see how really beautiful you can make your hair look, just follow this simple method:

A Simple, Easy Method

FIRST, wet the hair and scalp in clear, warm water. Then apply a little Mulsified coconut oil shampoo, rubbing it in thoroughly all over the scalp, and throughout the entire length, down to the ends of the hair.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips, so as to loosen the dandruff and small particles of dust and dirt that stick to the scalp.

After rubbing in the rich, creamy Mulsified lather, rinse the hair and scalp thoroughly—always using clear, fresh, warm water. Then use another application of Mulsified, again working up a lather and rubbing it in briskly as before.

Two waters are usually sufficient for washing the hair, but sometimes the third is necessary.

You can easily tell, for when the hair is perfectly clean, it will be soft and silky in the water, the strands will fall apart easily, each separate hair floating alone in the water, and the entire mass, even while wet, will feel loose, fluffy and light to the touch and be so clean it will fairly squeak when you pull it through your fingers.

Rinse the Hair Thoroughly

THIS is very important. After the final washing, the hair and scalp should be rinsed in at least two changes of good warm water and followed with a rinsing in cold water.

When you have rinsed the hair thoroughly, wring it as dry as you can; finish by rubbing it with a towel, shaking it and fluffing it until it is dry. Then give it a good brushing.

After a Mulsified shampoo you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it is.

If you want to always be remembered for your beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This regular weekly shampooing will keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage—and it will be noticed and admired by everyone.

You can get Mulsified at any drug store or toilet goods counter, anywhere in the world.

A 4-ounce bottle should last for months.

Friends as You Might Say

when Jeff chided his friend for not mixing more genially with the party. With the exception of Ashley and Corrigan, all the rest of the crowd were gathered about Eva Haskell in a far corner of the room, laughing uproariously.

"You hadn't ought to sit off here 'long with me, like this, an' act so unsociable," Jeff protested. "These here people are her friends, an' after you're—after the wedding, they're goin' to be your friends. You ought to mess 'round with 'em an' act nice."

"I s'pose not," said Corrigan gloomily. "I'll go act up with 'em for a little while an' then I'll be back. You set here, Jeff; I won't be long."

He walked across the considerable length of the dance floor to the far corner where the loudly laughing crowd pressed close about Eva Haskell.

As he drew near he heard his fiancée's voice: "And just as soon as we got into the house, he got down on both knees on the carpet. Oh, he was too funny for words! And he started in as though he was reciting a piece on the stage. He had his hands together in front of him like a preacher saying his prayers. Oh, it was a scream! And he said, 'Miss Haskell, I know I'm not fit to breathe the same air in the same room with a girl like you. I've been a rough man,' he says, 'but the way I feel for you now—'"

Her mockery of Jeff Ashley's voice was good. She was giving a thoroughly amusing imitation of the rejected suitor's proposal. She gave it in full to the last humiliating detail, while her friends roared with laughter.

SHE faltered just a trifle when she noticed Corrigan among the listeners, but his laugh reassured her. While Ashley sat alone in the far corner, she completed the verbal picture of his ludicrous wooing and none of her hearers laughed louder than Bob Corrigan.

"Now that's right funny, ain't it?" he chortled. "I reckon that's about the laughin'est story I've heard in a long time."

He turned to the young fellow standing beside him, a telephone lineman.

"Didn't you think that was funny?" he asked.

"I sure did!" the young fellow agreed, tears of mirth standing in his eyes. "I haven't laughed so much in I don't know when!"

"I reckon your mouth must be plumb tired out from laughin'," Corrigan said. "I'll move it 'round for you where it'll rest easier."

There were two immediate ensuing sounds. The first the smash of Corrigan's fist on the young fellow's mouth; the second the thud of the young fellow's body on the floor.

Corrigan's booming laugh rose loud above the women's screams as he stepped catlike toward the man nearest to him.

"Wasn't it funny!" he shouted. "You thought it was funny: what do you think of this?"

He lashed out with his right fist and another of Eva Haskell's humorous-minded young friends joined the telephone lineman on the floor. Corrigan's fiancée was screaming with terror. The rest of her men friends, ten of them in all, bunched up and started to work collectively on their riotous host. As they closed in on him, Jeff Ashley came booming across the floor. In one hand he held the chair in which he had been sitting; in the other was the small table at which he had sat. He had no idea what the row was about. He only saw that his friend was beset and in his mood he welcomed the chance to fight as never before.

ASHLEY smashed into the crowd about Corrigan, swinging the chair with one hand and the small table with the other. The hard-swung chair definitely accounted for one of Corrigan's assailants, the table downed three before it splintered and came apart in Ashley's hand. By that time Jeff was through to his friend and standing back to back with him.

"Work on 'em, Bob," he shouted joyously, lashing out with both fists.

"Yowee!" said Corrigan cheerily, "Let's go, Jeff!"

They went. They went through that crowd of men like a mowing-machine through a field of wheat. They went through most of the hired help that the proprietor lustily summoned from outside and only hesitated when the manager of the place cut loose with a gun.

"Come on, Jeff!" Corrigan shouted, as the gun began to speak.

He picked up and hurled a bottle at the man in the doorway who was shooting, turned and leaped through an open window, closely followed by Ashley. They rolled on the ground together, recovered their footing, and dodged among the automobiles parked outside.

Behind them in the place they had left, the men were shouting and the women screaming. A waiting chauffeur, sitting in a big car near the road spoke to them.

"What's the row?" he asked.

Corrigan leaped on the running-board of the car, grasped the chauffeur by the collar with his left hand, and poked the end of his right thumb viciously into the man's ribs.

"Drive, you blinkety blank!" he commanded. "Get going for El Paso an' get goin' quick or I'll put a hole through you."

The chauffeur could not see the object with which he was being prodded in the ribs. Perhaps the end of a man's thumb does not feel precisely like the muzzle of a gun, but to that particular chauffeur at least it felt enough like it for all practical purposes.

"Don't shoot!" he begged. "I'll take you in."

Ashley leaped into the tonneau; the chauffeur started the car, threw in his clutch, and shot out on the road to El Paso. Behind them there were shouts and shouts and then the whir of motors being hastily started for the pursuit.

"Got him covered?" Corrigan asked of Ashley, who had no gun.

"I sure have," Ashley growled. "If he don't get more speed out of this ol' can pretty soon, I'm goin' to let him have it."

The chauffeur groaned and the car leaped ahead. Corrigan tumbled back into the tonneau with Ashley chuckling.

"What was the row?" Ashley inquired.

"Damn if I know," Corrigan lied cheerfully. "It just started. See anybody comin'?"

"Yes," said Ashley, looking back. "There's some cars gettin' under way after us, about a mile back."

"We'll make it," said Corrigan.

They flew into El Paso far ahead of their pursuers, whisked through the town to a spot near the railroad station and there leaped from the car.

"There's an eastbound passenger train in the station now," Corrigan said breathlessly, as they legged it through the yards. "When they find out we made for the railroad, they'll think that's what we took."

"What are you goin' to do?" Ashley panted as he blundered over the ties and tracks in the dark beside his friend.

"Listen!" said Corrigan. "Keep still!"

There was the sound of many cars being urged reluctantly into motion. An engine whistled long and loud.

"Listen!" said Corrigan again, and then: "She's coming, heading west. We can make her from here!"

They saw the headlight of the freight locomotive coming suddenly from behind a string of box cars on a siding. The snorting engine passed them. A string of closed box cars went by, swaying, screeching, gathering speed. "Here comes an empty gondola!" Corrigan shouted, starting to run. "Let's make it!"

Ashley grabbed him by the arm. "What about Eva, Bob!" he shouted. "You can't leave her like this!"

"I can't, hey?" Corrigan yelled back. "Maybe not, Jeff; she may catch up with me: but she'll need a spare pair o' feet to get where I'm goin' by the time I get there, an' the U. S. army to bring me back! I may not be able to leave her, but if she gets me, she'll have to burn the woods I'm hidin' in an' marry my ashes. Come on, you old slow coach."

A YEAR LATER, old Hank Withers sat on the deck at Juneau, Alaska, sucking at his pipe and watching a fifty-foot gas boat, heavy-laden with truck for a cannery on Icy Strait, chugging away down Gastineau channel.

"See them two fellers in that gas boat out there?" he piped to an idle longshoreman lounging near. "Sittin' on the world with their feet hangin' over, them two fellers is. Got a nice home for life together an' nothin' to worry about. Shoot their own meat, do a little fishin', make a little money—"

"Oh, yes!" said the longshoreman. "That's the boat was tied up here this mornin' loadin', ain't it? The Bachelor Kid they call her."

"That's her name," old Hank agreed. "Yes, sirree! That's her! The Bachelor Kid that's sure her and them boys are drivin' her and live fine and genial."

The longshoreman shook his head and made a face.

"Good graft, but it won't last," he prophesied darkly. "They'll get fightin', them two, an' bust up. Always the way with a couple o' guys cooped up together. They get fightin'."

"Not them two!" Hank cackled. "Not them. I seen 'em fust time they met, five, six years ago, an' they fit all their fightin' right then. Yes, sir! ## Without Benefit of Dowry from Citron the details of Samek's acute hypochondria, and when, being thus reminded of his infirm condition, Samek exchanged his belligerent manner for an air of weakness appropriate to a sufferer from—among other disorders—valvular disease of the heart, Florence Nightingale with the assistance of Clara Barton could not have ministered to him more tenderly than Polongin did.

"Maybe you'd better lay on the couch," he said, and Samek nodded feebly in reply. "Because getting the patient off of his feet is the first thing in heart-attacks," Polongin continued, as he placed a pillow gently beneath Samek's head and carefully spread Citron's overcoat across the sufferer's bare ankles. "In the meantime, don't talk. If you want anything, make signs."

This was the kind of treatment for which Samek had long yearned but had never received, since it cannot be said that Mrs. Samek neglected her husband, her attentions were never exactly spontaneous. In fact his appreciation and gratitude were such that not only did he distort his face at Polongin in what he intended for a wan smile but he also patted the insurance broker's sleeve so affectionately that Citron began to regret the haste with which he had abandoned his share in Polongin's matrimonial enterprises.

"LISTEN, Polongin," he said. "Maybe I would better run round to the drug store and get some new mathematic spirits of ammonia."

"I guess we could get along without your assistance, Citron," Polongin said. "And besides what is mathematic spirits of ammonia in cases like this? You might just so well give the patient sugar and water."

Samek fairly flushed with pleasure.

"Never mind troubling yourself," he murmured; "I am feeling a whole lot better now."

"Don't jolly yourself, Mr. Samek," Polongin advised. "Lay quiet there for at least another half-hour. In the meantime, Citron, I guess you and me would better be moving on."

"Say, looky here, Citron," Polongin broke out angrily as soon as they reached the sidewalk; "I thought you was out of this here affair. Miss Singerman comes from such a good family, sagt er? Somebody should be content to take her without even furniture even. An idea! What for an easy mark do you think I am, anyway?"

Citron shrugged his shoulders in reply. "Of course, Polongin," he said, "at a pinch a Schadchen could always make up a match for somebody, no matter who or what he is; but nobody could give you brains if you ain't got already them."

"I suppose the way I jollied that old faker just now was the idea of a lunatic. I suppose," Polongin boasted.

"It is, if you don't get something more substantial out of it as furniture," Citron said.

"And don't you suppose I intend to get something more substantial as furniture, Citron," Polongin retorted. "The way I figure it is that, while Miss Singerman is a nice, refined young lady, still at the same time, Citron, if I would marry Miss Singerman, I would expect at the very least that her family would come down with a dowry to the extent of anyhow——"

He hesitated between five thousand dollars as being too modest and ten thousand as too extravagant, and in that moment of indecision, there approached from the opposite direction a rather plump young lady, dressed in a well-cut brown duvetine tailor-made costume. She wore a small brown velvet hat which fitted close to her head, and the fact that she may or may not have possessed somewhat prominent features, was at least evaded by a becoming brown veil, although, as is the office of veils, it in no way concealed the beauty of its wearer's eyes. Round her throat was wound a narrow mink scarf, the end of which actually brushed against Polongin's shoulder and stirred a gentle breeze that at once confounded Polongin's calculations with faint odors of fur fabric, toilet-soap and talcum powder.

"WHAT for a dowry did you say you expected?" Citron inquired.

"I said," Polongin replied huskily, "that with a nice, refined young lady like Miss Singerman, I wouldn't bother about the furniture even."

There is, however, no line of conduct more difficult to support with firmness than an unmercenary one, and even if Citron had not been at his side to beg him not to be a damn fool, those devil's advocates we call Second Thought, Ordinary Prudence, Due Consideration, and the like, would doubtless sooner or later have shaken his resolution with arguments just as convincing as Citron's. Thus, Polongin's decision to seek Miss Singerman's hand in marriage for herself alone, barring possibly the housekeeping linens and a few pieces of sterling silver, persisted only as long as it took Citron to lead the way into the nearest coffee-house and place two orders of Mohn Kuchen and coffee.

"It come to me like that," Citron said, snapping his fingers.

"What come to you?" Polongin asked.

"The whole thing," Citron replied. "I knew we had him where we wanted him soon as I see the way he fell for your nonsense, Polongin."

"No nonsense at all, Citron," Polongin protested. "For the time being, and so to speak, if you know what I mean, I really and truly felt the feller was dying."

"I know you did, and so did he," Citron said. "That is the wonderful part of it, Polongin. There is a feller which is otherwise a smart, up-to-date business man, and he actually and no faking believes that he has got the matter with him everything what people dies of from soup to nuts, y'understand, whereas he has got already a constitution like a truck driver."

"All this you already told me, Citron," Polongin remarked, "and even if I was hearing it for the first time, Citron, the news that such a tightwad like Samek is enjoying perfect health wouldn't be such simcha to me neither."

"What do you care what for a tightwad he is?" Citron continued. "You don't expect nothing from him, and you don't want nothing from him. All you are asking is that you should marry his niece."

"Who says that is all I am asking?" Polongin demanded.

"I do," Citron said. "You are a young life insurance broker with a good future and you want to get married, see? Although of course, Polongin, even life insurance brokers couldn't live on prospects, y'understand. You are, so to speak, only a new beginner, if you get what I mean, Polongin, and naturally if you could go to the insurance company you are connected with, which I don't know the name of it, but if you could go to this here—now—"

"The Mercantile Life Assurance Society of Newark, New Jersey," Polongin supplied.

"Whatever the name of it is," Citron continued, "and say to them, 'Here, gentlemen, I got here an application for a hundred-thousand-dollar twenty-payment life insurance policy, the premium of which is in the neighborhood of four thousand dollars, from a first-class, A-number-one risk at fifty-one by the name of Charles Samek, and at the same time hand them Charles Samek's check for four thousand dollars, it would not only help your prospects a whole lot with such a company, but you would get a big, fat commission, Polongin, and also you might also cop out a general agency from such a company. Now, what do you say to that, Polongin?'"

"Well," Polongin replied, "such things ain't absolutely impossible, Citron, because in the Old Country already, it stands somewheres in the Hapthorah where a feller once commanded the sun to stand still and got away with it."

Magic Lies in pretty teeth—Remove that film

Why will any woman in these days have dingy film on teeth?

There is now a way to end it. Millions of people employ it. You can see the results in glistening teeth everywhere you look.

This is to offer a ten-day test, to show you how to beautify the teeth.

Film is cloudy

Film is that viscous coat you feel. It clings to the teeth, enters crevices and stays. When left it forms the basis of tartar. Teeth look discolored more or less.

But film does more. It causes most tooth troubles. It holds food substances which ferment and form acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Germes breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

You leave it

Old ways of brushing leave much of that film intact. It dims the teeth and, night and day, threatens serious damage. That's why so many well-brushed teeth discolor and decay. Tooth troubles have been constantly increasing. So dental science has been seeking ways to fight that film. Two effective methods have been found. They mean so much that leading dentists the world over now advise them.

Pepsodent MARK TRADE

The New-Day Dentifrice

Now endorsed by authorities and advised by leading dentists practically all the world over. All druggists supply the large tubes.

A new-type tooth paste has been perfected, correcting some old mistakes. These two film combatants are embodied in it. The name is Pepsodent, and by its use millions now combat that film.

Two other foes

It also fights two other foes of teeth. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. To digest starch deposits on teeth which may otherwise cling and form acids.

It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. To neutralize mouth acids which cause tooth decay.

Thus Pepsodent brings to people new conceptions of clean teeth.

Lives altered

Whole lives may be altered by this better tooth protection. Dentists now advise that children use Pepsodent from the time the first tooth appears. It will mean a new denture.

The way to know this is to send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

See and feel the new effects, then read the reasons in the book we send.

If you count such things important, cut out the coupon now.

"That's where you make a big mistake, Polongin," Citron said. "Of course, if Samek had any idea that he was giving such a check for keeps or that the insurance company would accept his application, y'understand, that would be something else again, but if you would go to Samek and say to him: 'Mr. Samek,' if you would say, 'I want to marry your niece, y'understand, and I am not asking that you should make even a medium-size wedding, even. The furniture also, I wouldn't argue about, but naturally I am a new beginner in the life insurance business,' and you put up the proposition to him like I told it you and explain to him that naturally a feller like Samek with his heart and liver, as soon as the insurance company's examiner makes his report the company would quick return him his check for the first year's premium and turn down his application, y'understand, it would already be a horse of another color."

BUT, as a matter of fact, Citron, there ain't a life insurance examiner which wouldn't pass that feller for a half-million dollars even," Polongin said, "and the consequences would be that as soon as Samek discovers he is stuck with a hundred thousand dollars' life insurance, and he realizes that I done it, Citron, I could live and die a bachelor so far as getting married to Miss Singerman is concerned. Besides, Citron, I may be a life insurer, y'understand, but I ain't no crook exactly, y'understand."

"What is there crooked about it?" Citron asked. "Why, just think of that big, strong, healthy feller without a cent of life insurance and a wife and niece depending on him, y'understand, making their lives miserable with every other day an attack of heart trouble or liver trouble, which, if you only work things right, Polongin, the way that life insurance doctor is going to pass Samek as an A-number-one risk, Polongin, he wouldn't dare to even pull a toothache on them two poor women unless he has got the cavity to show for it."

"Sure I know," Polongin said; "but who ever heard of depositing the first year's premium with an application for life insurance?"

"Well, for one, probably Samek never heard of it," Citron admitted, "and that's where you would tell Samek that this is an old scheme for getting influence with a life insurance company."

"And what do you expect to get out of this, Mr. Citron?" Polongin asked.

"Well," Citron said, "my usual charges is ten percent, and expenses, but in your case I tell you what I will do. I'll waive the expenses."

HAD Joel Sunderland read the advertising pages of the magazines to any good purpose, he might possibly have visualized Miss Singerman making coffee of surpassing strength and fragrance but with all the caffeine eliminated from the bean and thus might have prevented some of the sleepless nights which supervened the awakening of this new regard for his stenographer. However, nothing could have dispelled that all-gone feeling at the pit of his stomach which attacked him ten days after Polongin's visit, when Miss Singerman appeared at her desk—on time to be sure—but wearing a large bunch of violets; for not once during all the time she had worked in his office had Miss Singerman ever worn a bunch of violets and when she went out to lunch at half-past twelve, still wearing the violets, Sunderland fairly staggered to the window and threw up the sash. His purpose was to confirm his worst suspicions.

"That's what I thought," he muttered to himself as he saw Polongin raising his hat to Miss Singerman with a jauntiness of which Sunderland knew himself to be entirely incapable. He was about to draw in his head and bang down the window when he began to witness an incident, which, had it been displayed as a side elevation on the moving-picture screen instead of as a ground-plan in real life, would have struck even Sunderland as being extremely trite.

Of course it was as impossible for Sunderland to perceive the fine points of Miss Singerman's performance as it would have been for the ordinary gallery auditor to follow every gesture, every facial expression of Duse as Magda for instance, so that he felt rather than saw the indifference with which Miss Singerman received the greeting of the person whose expensive gift of violets she was even then wearing. Polongin felt it too. In fact, he was so taken back by Miss Singerman's behavior that she had almost stepped off the curb to cross the street before he attempted to detain her. He grabbed her by the left arm, and Sunderland from his gallery seat exclaimed, "Good!" to the sparrows on the telephone wires, as he saw Miss Singerman loosen Polongin's hold with what was unmistakably a vigorous smack of her right hand. The now thoroughly amazed Polongin again raised his hat and asked a question, which he emphasized by pointing to the bunch of violets. This immediately ushered in the climax of the situation.

FOR A brief interval, Miss Singerman tugged at the pin which held the stalks of the violets, and then, before the widely separated but astonished gazes of Sunderland and Polongin, she cast violets, pin, tin-foil, and ribbon into the gutter and walked rapidly away.

Twenty minutes later, the office door opened and Polongin entered.

"Say, looky here, Polongin," Sunderland said. "This here office is small enough without I would allow all my agents to bring in here every Schnorrer which wants to take out for five hundred dollars life insurance."

"And I suppose you are too high-toned to let a hundred-thousand-dollar applicant into your office, Sunderland," Polongin declared, and justified his omission of the title "Mister" by slapping down on the desk in front of his superintendent Samek's signed application for a hundred-thousand-dollar twenty-payment life-insurance policy at the age of fifty-one, with Samek's own check pinned onto it for the amount of the first year's premium.

Sunderland took up the application as calmly as though hundred-thousand-dollar applications were a matter of hourly reception in his office. In fact, Sunderland's concealed agitation was such that he had not recognized the name of the applicant at the time the door opened to admit Charles Samek himself.

Polongin jumped to his feet and did the honors of the office as though the ambition he harbored had been satisfied and he was already the uptown superintendent instead of Joel Sunderland.

"Mr. Samek," he said, "I think you know our Mr. Sunderland."

"I should ought to know him," Samek replied. "My niece has been working in his office for a long time already."

PLEASED to meet you," Sunderland murmured as he shook hands rather limply.

"Don't mention it," Samek said. "The pleasure is all mine. In fact, only the other day my wife was saying it's a funny thing how Jennie was working for you for so long and neither one of us have ever come here to say so much as 'Thank you' for all you done for her."

"Say—what did I ever done for her?" Sunderland protested. "I paid her every week her salary, and she earned it."

"Earn it or not earn it," Samek said, "of your own volition already you raised her salary three times. A father couldn't act no different."

"At my age, how should I act?" Sunderland asked sadly, for he had now definitely resigned himself to wrinkles, baldness, and the usual type of hotel-made coffee.

"What do you mean—at your age?" Samek exclaimed. "Why, I bet you ain't five years older than I am, and, anyhow, Mr. Sunderland, it's an old saying and a true one that a man ain't no older as his duodenum, which if you would got it the matter with your duodenum the same like—"

"I think, Mr. Samek," Polongin cut in, "that if you want to save yourself and me a whole lot of time, we'd better get Mr. Sunderland to make an appointment with our medical examiner."

"What's the hurry?" Samek said. "Yesterday you said we should take our time about putting in the application, and here a quarter of an hour since, you rushed me over here like you was afraid I am going to be knocked down by an automobile or something before I could get my life insured."

POLONGIN stooped to recover ostensibly a stray page of the Annotated Life Insurance Laws but actually his self-possession, which had suffered a slight derangement by Sunderland's question, since it was quite impossible for Polongin to explain that unless Samek was examined and passed by the company's medical examiner before Miss Singerman arrived home that evening, all the plans suggested by Citron the Schadden, and up to the present time so successfully executed by himself, would be set at naught; for nobody realized better than Polongin how dependent that success had been upon a fortunate combination of circumstances. In the first place, ever since his first visit with Citron to the Samek household, Miss Singerman's relations with her aunt and uncle had been so strained that neither one had cared to risk asking her just how she liked the idea of marrying Polongin. They had therefore taken Polongin's word for it that things were progressing satisfactorily. Secondly, Mrs. Samek's confidence in the desperate condition of her husband's health had been rudely shaken by what Citron had told her, and she urged on Samek that by merely depositing four thousand dollars with a life insurance company for a few days he could ascertain without expense and from an entirely disinterested source, just exactly what were the physical ailments from which he suffered.

As for Samek himself, he welcomed the idea of establishing once and for all his status in his own household as a chronic invalid, and would probably have gone through with it even if Polongin had not agreed to accept the proposition as a substitute for Miss Singerman's dot.

BUT WHEN Miss Singerman, that noon-time, had cast into the gutter Polongin's expensive violets, with them had gone all his hopes of marrying her, and he had wasted no time in ringing up Citron. By the Schadchen's advice, he had immediately telephoned Dr. Eichendorfer, the local medical examiner for the Mercantile Life Assurance Society, to say that he would be around at the doctor's office in half an hour with a hundred-thousand-dollar applicant, and that if the doctor wouldn't take it too particular, he could relieve the doctor's mind of remembering to buy cigars for the next six months, anyhow.

"To tell you the truth," Polongin blurted out, "in my anxiousness to get this thing over for you, Mr. Samek, I already telephoned the examiner that we would be over there in a few minutes."

Again Polongin was playing in luck; for had Sunderland been his usual businesslike self he would have wanted to know why Polongin had asked him only a moment before to make an appointment which had already been made. But throughout the entire interview, Sunderland's ordinarily alert mind had been preoccupied with thoughts far removed from the affairs of the Mercantile Life Assurance Society. In the interval between Miss Singerman's rejection of Polongin's violets and the entrance of Polongin himself, Sunderland's dark view of his solitary future had become if not exactly roseate at least slightly tinged with Mocha and Java; but he saw clearly now that what he had mistaken for a complete rupture was probably only coyness on the part of Miss Singerman.

THE convincing proof of Polongin's standing with Miss Singerman's family, and therefore with Miss Singerman herself, rested on the desk in front of him, and he could not restrain a tremulous sigh as he affixed his signature to the printed authorization for a medical examination which was indorsed on Samek's application. Under Samek's anxious gaze, he unpinned the check for the first annual premium and placed it in the drawer of his desk.

"All right, gentlemen," Sunderland said handing the application back to Polongin, "go ahead with your medical examination."

Samek could hardly wait till they were outside the door before he began anxiously to question Polongin.

"Say, looky here, Polongin," he said; "supposing the medical examiner shouldn't be able to find out what's wrong with me!"

"Do you suppose that I am fool enough to take any chances on the medical examiner passing you oder not?" Polongin demanded angrily. His manner toward Samek since Sunderland had taken the check had undergone a change that was not exactly subtle. It was downright rude. "I am taking you to somebody which knows your body like you know the dress-suit, cutaway, and tuxedo business. I am taking you to be examined by Eichendorfer."

"Oh, Eichendorfer!" Samek said, much relieved. "Then what is the use my going at all. Anything what Eichendorfer could tell me, I already know."

"I know you do," Polongin declared; "but you don't know what he would tell the company, Mr. Samek."

"What do you mean—what he would tell the company?" Samek asked.

"I MEAN that the company pays him to tell applicants the truth and not to jolly them along—if you know what I mean," Polongin said.

"Sure I know what you mean," Samek said confidently. "But he never jollied me, Polongin. He always let me know the worst; so I am prepared for anything."

He was not, however, prepared for the difference between Doctor Eichendorfer's attitude toward a patient and his attitude toward an applicant for insurance. It exactly corresponded to the treatment Samek respectively accorded a gilt-edged customer and a too insistent traveling salesman. In fact, Samek had never exhibited so brusque a manner even toward a book-cannasser as the doctor displayed when they entered his consulting-room.

"Sit down, Samek," he said, omitting the warm hand-clasp with which he always greeted his visitors. For years, he had practiced this soft and comforting grip which combined in just the right proportions his pleasure at seeing an old and trusted friend and his assurance that no matter how violent the treatment of other physicians might be, he was not going to hurt the patient. It represented about a dollar and a half of Eichendorfer's regular fee of two dollars for an office call; but as in this case Samek paid nothing, he received nothing, and all Doctor Eichendorfer's anxiety was for the insurance company which he now represented.

He went to a filing cabinet and pulled out a large square envelope which contained a complete history of Samek's case; but when he drew out the enclosed card, Samek noticed, with some chagrin, that there were written upon it surprisingly few data in view of the complication and variety of diseases it represented.

"Let me see, Samek," Doctor Eichendorfer said. "I examined you pretty thoroughly a week ago last Sunday, didn't I?"

He glanced hurriedly over the card with his naked eyes, not even assuming the rubber-tired spectacles with the large round lenses which, in addition to the doctor's heavy eyebrows and full black beard, had so often impressed Samek and all Eichendorfer's other patients with his infallibility as a physician. A sense of misgiving oppressed Samek, and his heart pounded so nervously at this unwonted behavior of Doctor Eichendorfer, that he was unable to reply except by a nod.

"Well, then I suppose I am justified in assuming that there has been no change in your condition since," Eichendorfer continued. "On last Sunday a week, the examination disclosed, Polongin, that this applicant's condition was as follows: heart and lungs, negative; liver, negative; kidneys, negative; blood-pressure, a little above normal but nothing to worry about; all the regular analyses also show a negative result, so I guess there is nothing else for me to do but to approve this application, Polongin." He nodded and smiled at Samek.

"I congratulate you, Samek," he said. "You're a first-class, A-number-one risk."

Polongin could not help grinning as he looked at the astonished Samek, whose face was suffused with a deep flush.

"Well, Samek, didn't I told you he would tell you the truth?" he said.

Samek struggled to reply. The flush on his face assumed a purplish shade and spread to the back of his neck until finally his head sunk upon his breast and he slipped out of his chair onto the floor. At last Samek had something the matter with him. It was an apoplectic seizure, his first genuine attack of illness—and nearly his last.

ALMOST a week elapsed before a decided improvement in her uncle's condition permitted Miss Singerman's return to her duties at the office. She had telephoned Sunderland the day before that she would be at work the following morning, and, in preparation for it, Sunderland had made a long memorandum of letters to be dictated and reports to be typewritten. He had also put on a new dark suit, which made him look almost slender, and had spent nearly an hour and a half selecting his necktie and brushing his hair, and yet, when she entered, he found himself quite unable to express his pleasure at seeing her save by a husky "Good morning." He even remained seated at his desk as Miss Singerman offered her right hand in greeting, but although he clasped it quite limply, nobody with half his years and twice his hair could have thrilled more to the touch of her fingers.

"My aunt and I want to thank you, Mr. Sunderland," she said, "for the beautiful roses you sent. It made his room so cheerful."

SUNDERLAND attempted a few incoherent noises in his throat which Miss Singerman rightly interpreted as her employer's hope that Samek felt much better.

"Indeed, he does!" she declared. "He told me particularly to say how much he appreciated your mailing back that check he gave to your company."

"I thought he would," Sunderland said, as she started to remove her coat, "and now, Miss Singerman, I have made here a memorandum which—"

He broke off suddenly, for he could not help noticing that, pinned to Miss Singerman's waist, were some of the precise roses that he had purchased for her uncle only the day before. Nor could Miss Singerman in turn help noticing that he had noticed, and a faint and most becoming pink began to appear in her ordinarily pale cheeks.

"What did you say about the memorandum you prepared?" she asked, sitting down at her typewriter.

For answer, Sunderland took the memorandum and slowly tore it into small pieces. He cleared his throat ineffectually.

"Miss Singerman," he began hoarsely, "I am nearly old enough to be anyhow your uncle, but, at the same time, I ain't growing no younger day by day; so therefore what is the use beating bushes around."

He cleared his throat again, but it was no use. It would not clear.

"Miss Singerman," he croaked, "you didn't really and truly like that young feller Polongin, did you?"

Miss Singerman shook her head. "Then why, if you threw them violets away on him, did you wear them in the first place?" he asked.

And when she answered, the room seemed for Sunderland to be filled with all the combined fragrance of Porto Rico, Santos, Mocha, and Java.

"Because," she said with rare honesty, "I thought you sent them to me."

He read the movie titles aloud and wept. See Clifford Raymond's story of the sentimental crook in Hearst's International for January, ready December 20th.

Will Levington Comfort's Story of a Chinatown Reporter—Continued from page 21

moment, but there was nothing for me to put together. Then he hung up and called a number which I missed, because he was using an automatic 'phone. His voice changed queerly. I had heard the tone before from him—as a man might talk about his little girl who was perfect no matter what she did.

"All safe—chauffeur and car and all?"

he laughed, and then after two or three seconds: "Not hurt at all, and on the way home! . . . Oh, tomorrow maybe. . . . I'm all snarled up tonight. . . . That's all right. Good-night."

Clinton Dean was standing over him, his chin hard and white under the amber mask.

"There's two sides to it," Clabby said.

"We'd better hold off a day, anyway. The other papers haven't got a sniff, so it will be safe to wait, in any case."

Dean stared at him a moment in silence. "You know a lot about this—not in your story, Mr. Clabby," he said icily. "I'd quite like to know how much you're pulling out of Chinatown—using the Chronicle for your block and tackle."

Clabby was standing now, and I was in the presence of that brow again, for the cap had been taken in hand.

"Yes, the more I think of it," he said, "it seems best to kill the story for tomorrow morning's issue."

Dean ignored that and continued slowly:

"I'm not a big enough man to fire you, Mr. Clabby, but I've got an idea you're too big a man for the Chronicle. You're a financier, not a criminal reporter—or maybe you're trying to be a journalist!"

"I can see how it would look to you," Clabby answered wearily. "I guess you're big enough to fire me all right—"

"Resign, eh—resign tonight! Pretty rich night's work, eh—little sixty a week from the Chronicle pays your chauffeur."

THE SPINY tones and words followed Clabby out of the editorial rooms. His eyes were mournful.

"They didn't think I would do it," he said. "They had to call the city editor to believe I meant what I said. Then they worked fast. They must have had her already to spring—because she was out of Chinatown and on the way home when she called me."

He didn't suit me somehow, not hurrying to Miss Enright at once.

"You're not going to her tonight?"

He stood in the center of the broad empty pavement. His cap came off and as always he was a different man to me. He rubbed his fingers back through his hair; his eyes coming slowly to mine. I knew he was trying to speak; that he liked me well enough to talk, trusted me well enough. For an instant I was breathless, as his eyes held mine—puzzled but tender—but the moment passed without the big story of Clabby being told.

"No, I'm not going to her tonight," he said. "I'll meet her later on."

His cap wasn't on yet. His eye glanced back to the Chronicle and down toward the city bottoms where Chinatown lay like a field of uncovered dead. He couldn't go to her—couldn't go to Chinatown—couldn't go to the Chronicle. I glanced quickly into his face again, for one doesn't often see a man cut off from his work and his woman and his heaven all in a night.

"Come on home with me—just tonight."

"No, thanks. But talk to her often—make it easy as you can for her."

I knew right there and then that I wasn't to see him again.

And so it turned out. Brill, Brock and Co. closed a deal with my help that freed Paul Enright with something of a crimp in his fortune. We had to advertise by hand-bill in Chinatown and no arrests were made. The money was paid through Miss Enright herself, and what she knows she didn't tell me. Brill, Brock and Co. believes still that Clabby profited, also Clinton Dean, in a lesser way.

Occasionally I feel that nothing will do but an afternoon with Miss Enright. It isn't very often because it makes the world I live and move in, diminutive and awry for days afterward. At times she seems actually above separation and the hurt of it—as if she lived with the sense of his being near her, though she doesn't know if he is living or dead. If I stay away too long, she sends for me.

"We are his friends, you know," she always says as she greets me.

“The Women of My Neighborhood are Extremely Particular”

IN some form or other this sentence was written and emphasized by almost all of the 26,000 A.D.S. druggists who were asked for local requirements for a face cream.

The A.D.S., that organization composed solely of druggists who are owners, producers and retailers of their own products, were following their usual procedure before launching a new product.

This time it was a vanishing cream that must really vanish after accomplishing its full, beautifying effects on the face of the woman who uses it.

Each druggist was requested to find out from the women of his neighborhood what were the specific shortcomings of the facial creams then on the market. Also what the women expected of the ideal face cream.

Then the druggist was required to send his recommendations to the A.D.S. Formula Committee of his State. Each State Committee then sent its recommendations to the A.D.S. Headquarters at Long Island City, N. Y., for final deliberations before the Formula was decided upon.

It was remarkable to note how the letters of these druggists agreed on one point. Pick any letter, and whether the writer was running a little store in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, or a gigantic store on Broadway, N. Y., he sincerely believed that his women customers were the most particular in the United States when choosing aids to beauty.

It took much time and many arguments before complete agreement on the Formula was reached. There were fights about each ingredient within and among State Committees. Even the recommendations for daily use—twice a day, or three times a day—was voted several times before the twice-a-day folk won.

But they were unanimous about the ideal. This facial cream of theirs must leave a woman's face as soft, as smooth, as unblemished as that deliciously delicate skin she feels on the inside of her arm, above the elbow.

C. Frazier Hunt's Third Article on the World War on Booze—Continued from page 35

Drinking in Scandinavia

to keep on friendly terms with France even if they had to pour these spirits into the North Sea.

And now Spain steps into the foreground. "We buy some 4,000,000 dollars worth of your split cod every year," she explained in her best Norwegian. "Now that you've lost your German and Russian markets and Newfoundland has gypped you out of most of South America, there's nowhere else to sell this fish except to us and Portugal. Now, how about our hot wines? They run way above fourteen percent you know? Don't you think you'd better buy, say, 500,000 litres annually?"

Norway had hardly recovered from this speech on "hot" Spanish wines, when tiny but by no means powerless Portugal boldly walked into the limelight.

"WHAT'S all this I hear about your silly prohibition laws?" the cut-in reads. "Keep your old split cod: we'll buy what we need from Newfoundland. If you want to unload your fish on us you'll take—well, let's say 1,200,000 litres of our port wines. These port wines run about twenty percent or twenty-one percent alcohol, you know. Better get over this stupid prohibition idea, anyway. There's your shipping to be considered, too."

Now shipping and fishing are Norway's great twin businesses. Without the split cod trade the northern coast towns of Norway would die, and without the shipping Norway's national income would be decreased to a disastrous extent. A good deal of Norway's shipping is handled on what is termed "time charters"—her ships are leased to outside and often foreign concerns. An unfriendly Spain and Portugal—not to mention France—could do great harm to the value of these "time charters," as well as to the Norwegian operated lines that touch at the countries or operate directly between them and Norway.

Friendly and open markets for her cod are even more essential to her life. They are, in fact, her very life. For one hundred years sixty percent of her split cod has gone to Spain and Portugal. She must protect these markets and her shipping good will. All Norway recognizes this. And sooner or later she must actually change her prohibition laws to suit the wine countries of Europe: probably she will admit wines up to twenty-one percent alcohol—and, of course, 400,000 litres of spirits from France "for medicinal and scientific use."

Probably in chronicling the flies that have dropped into the prohibition ointment and the rifts that have sprung in the dry lute, I should have said that there were three of each instead of two. The No. 3 in this list of temperance setbacks is the prohibition consultation referendum held throughout Sweden on Sunday, August 27th.

This referendum read: "Do you want prohibition of the making, selling and possessing of intoxicating liquors?" By intoxicating liquor was meant all beverages containing more than 2.8 percent by volume of alcohol—or 2.25 percent by weight. The result of the referendum was 950,000 votes cast against a dry Sweden to 900,000 in favor of prohibition.

In more ways than one this was a decidedly unfortunate defeat for the dry cause for Northern Europe. Not only was it a blow to the morale of the temperance forces in Sweden itself but it greatly discouraged the whole prohibition movement in the Scandinavian countries.

Now to get the necessary background for this dry referendum one must make a quick survey of the history of the temperance movement in Sweden. Three or four generations ago Sweden was one of the banner hard drinking countries of the world. However, as early as 1856 home distilling was prohibited, and state regulated distillers were established. Then came the Gottenborg System which limited profits on booze selling to five percent per annum.

In 1909 in the great labor troubles temporary prohibition was asked for and enforced by the workmen. The unusual effect of this was to give new hopes to the drys and in 1910 they circulated a great voluntary referendum on the question, "Do you want total prohibition for Sweden?" This was signed in the affirmative by 1,800,000 men and women over 18 years old, out of a possibility of some 3,500,000. But there was no equal suffrage then, even for men, so there was no result from this unofficial vote.

In 1914 the proposition of total prohibition—except, of course, for beer of 2.8 percent alcohol by volume—was voted on by Parliament. This was passed by the lower house, but defeated by the upper house.

ABOUT this time there arose a young doctor by the name of Dr. Ivan Bratt, who propounded the theory that the Gottenborg System placed no limit on what one individual could buy, but only on what could be sold. "The control of the buying is the thing," Dr. Bratt argued. "Men who cannot drink sanely shall have no liquor. Only those who know how to drink shall have the privilege of drinking."

This proposition was made a law in 1914, and along with the conditions brought about by the war, resulted in a great decrease in drinking. By the Bratt and Gottenborg Systems all liquors are sold only by the bottle—except with certain café exceptions. Under the Bratt System, "Motboks," entitling the holder to buy four litres of distilled spirits per month, are distributed to all sober adults who apply for them. There are at present 1,024,000 of these Motboks in circulation. All liquor is sold in bottles and cannot be drunk in the stores. There are no bars as we in America were accustomed to them.

In 1911, several years before the Bratt System was established, Premier Karl Staaff had a Royal Commission appointed to study the temperance movement. This body deliberated for nine years and in 1920, in its report proposed a plebiscite or "consultation referendum." The result at the best was to be only consultatory and the Swedish parliament was only morally bound to vote temperance measures if the dry forces gained sixty percent of all votes cast. In April, 1921, the bill authorizing this national consultation referendum was passed by the Parliament and on August 27th of this year the vote was taken. Instead of gaining sixty percent of all votes cast the temperance forces failed to get even a bare majority.

It is extremely interesting to note that contrary to the early newspaper reports of the result of the referendum, some 150,000 more women voted in favor of a dry Sweden than voted for a wet one. Almost 200,000 more men voted for the wet side as against the dry. The heavy dry vote by the women is a valuable forecast of what will probably happen throughout Europe when the women get the full privilege of equal suffrage.

THROUGHOUT the whole of middle Europe lying north of the wine belt and south of the semi-temperance belt, the dry cause has advanced steadily and determinedly. In poor broken Austria, for instance, one sees the American dry idea in full bloom. The story of the growth of this idea among these tired, discouraged people is one of the most thrilling chapters in the whole warm, human drama of this world war between the Wets and the Drys.

With the breaking up of the Empire following the peace, Austria, dismembered, prostrate, hopeless, had no time or thought for purely moral problems. She was busy with the cruel struggle for plain life. All the energies of her 6,000,000 people were consumed in a primitive battle for bread.

In September, 1921, an American dry worker, E. G. Hohenthal—working with V. G. Hinshaw—appeared on the scene. He was crammed full of pep—and determination. After a little digging around he located one or two old-fashioned "T. T's." They put their heads together and began plotting. Buzzing around on his own our American visitor finally got together and organized a Central Union Committee of eleven—with the President of the Republic at its head.

"Austria dry by 1930—or say 1950 by the latest!" he told them.

"But we must have money for education and propaganda," they answered.

Finally he promised $2,000—1,000 dollars from the Prohibition Foundation and 1,000 dollars from the Methodist Board of Temperance, Prohibition and Public Morals. Two thousand dollars to put a nation dry! A funny little old man by the name of Dr. F. L. Stuever, once of St. Louis, was made treasurer.

IN CZECHO-SLOVAKIA—similar to Austria in that its President is a dry advocate—a great temperance move has already been made. In 1919 Dr. Srobrir, the then Minister for Slovakia, enforced a government regulation against the selling of paiinka, the native prune spirits, throughout Slovakia. This definite prohibition step for the backward mountainous portion of the new Republic is the forerunner of a great semi-dry movement throughout the whole country.

In Hungary the movement is less pronounced but it has unquestionable strength. Here two great obstacles tend to keep the country from enacting any dry legislation; first of all sixty percent of the total expenditure for beer, wine and spirits goes to the government—and the state is badly in need of the taxes; secondly, the government will take no chances in aggravating unrest among the workmen.

IN Germany one finds a sturdy and steady anti-distilled spirits movement. Except among the soldiers there was practically no drinking at all during the war. The beer and the spirits both were practically monopolized for the fighting men. The result was that millions of civilians and back-of-the-fighting-line soldiers got more or less out of the habit of drinking, while hundreds of thousands of front-line soldiers found themselves won over through their spirits rations to the drinking of distilled liquors. This, coupled with the general post-war moral breakdown, has boomed the spirits business. Whisky bars have sprung up over Germany, particularly in Berlin. In this one city 700 new spirits bars have been opened during the past eighteen months.

But against all this is a growing dry consciousness not only within the temperance groups, but within the government itself. A great movement for the government control of drinking places is under way; anti-alcoholic education is being carried on; a great government investigation of prohibition is to be undertaken and little by little a sentiment against distilled spirits is being developed.

Here in Germany, as well as throughout the rest of Central and Northern Europe—and even in the southern wine countries—the wet interests are thoroughly awakened and thoroughly frightened. Even beer interests are uneasy.

"Things are really serious for us," the head of the German Beer Brewers' Union told me. "No one can tell what effect the woman vote will have, but it is the Socialists who are really dangerous for us."

He might have added that the third great unknown quantity in this problem of world temperance, is the economic factor—the economic handicap of wet countries as against the increased efficiency of dry America. For there are these three great unknowns in this mathematical problem—Madame X the woman vote; Y the Socialist vote; and Z the economic factor. Whoever can work out what the exact strength of these three unknowns will be—say ten years from now, can solve the riddle of when Europe and the world will go dry.

Is England going dry? Frazier Hunt asked himself that question and set out to answer it. See his fourth article in this series on the "World War on Booze" in Hearst's International for January.

H. G. Wells's New Novel of a Modern Utopia—Continued from page 48 and bleeding, surrounded by armored guards, in the midst of a thrusting, jostling, sun-bit crowd which filled a narrow, high-walled street. Behind some huge ugly implement was borne along, dripping and swaying with the swaying of the multitude.

Men Like Gods

"Did he die upon the cross in this world also?" cried Father Amerton. "Did he die upon the Cross?"

THIS PROPHET in Utopia they learnt had died very painfully, but not upon the Cross. He had been tortured in some way, but neither Utopians nor these particular Earthlings had sufficient knowledge of the technicalities of torture to make clear any idea about that, and then apparently he had been fastened upon a slowly turning wheel and exposed until he died. It was the abominable punishment of a cruel and conquering race and it had been inflicted upon him because his doctrine of universal service had alarmed the rich and dominant who did not serve.

Mr. Barnstaple had a momentary vision of a twisted figure upon that wheel of torture in the blazing sun. And, marvelous triumph over death! out of a world that could do such a deed had come this great peace and universal beauty about him!

A fair and rather slender man with a delicately beautiful face whose name, Mr. Barnstaple was to learn later, was Lion, presently took over from Urthred the burden of explaining and answering the questions of the Earthlings.

He was one of the educational co-ordinators in Utopia. He made it clear that the change in Utopian affairs had been no sudden revolution. No new system of laws and customs, no new method of economic coöperation based on the idea of universal service to the common good had sprung abruptly into being complete and finished. Throughout a long period, before and during the Last Age of Confusion, the foundations of the new state were laid by a growing multitude of inquirers and workers, having no set plan or preconceived method, but brought into unconscious coöperation by a common impulse to service and a common lucidity and veracity of mind. It was only towards the climax of the Last Age of Confusion in Utopia that psychological science began to develop with any vigor, comparable to the vigor of the development of geographical and physical science during the preceding centuries. And the social and economic disorder which was checking experimental science and crippling the organized work of the universities was stimulating inquiry into the processes of human association and making it desperate and fearless.

The beginnings of the new order were in discussions, books and psychological laboratories; the soil in which it grew was found in schools and colleges. In a world where men came to power through floundering business enterprises and financial cunning, it was presently being taught and understood that extensive private property was socially a nuisance and that the state could not do its work properly nor education produce its proper results, side by side with a class of irresponsible rich people. They had to go, for the good of the race.

"Didn't they fight?" asked Mr. Catskill pugnaciously.

They had fought irregularly but fiercely. The fight to delay or arrest the coming of the universal scientific state, the educational state in Utopia, had gone on as a conscious struggle for nearly five centuries. It was fought wherever ideas were spread, it was fought with dismissals and threats and boycotts and storms of violence, with lies and false accusations, with prosecutions and imprisonments. Point after point was won in education, in social laws, in economic method. No date could be fixed for the change. A time came when Utopia perceived that it was day and that a new order of things had replaced the old. . . .

"So it must be," said Mr. Barnstaple, as though Utopia was not already present about him. "So it must be."

A QUESTION was being answered. Every Utopian child is taught to the full measure of its possibilities and directed to the work that is indicated by its desires and capacity. It is born well. It is born of perfectly healthy parents; its mother has chosen to bear it after due thought and preparation. It grows up under perfectly healthy conditions; its natural impulses to play and learn are gratified by the subtlest educational methods. Hands, eyes and limbs are given every opportunity of training and growth; it learns to draw, write, express itself, use a great variety of symbols to assist and extend its thought. Kindness and civility become ingrained habits, for all about it are kind and civil.

And in particular the growth of its imagination is watched and encouraged. It learns the wonderful history of its world and its race and how its kind has struggled and still struggles out of its earlier animal narrowness and egotism toward an empire over itself that is still but faintly apprehended through dense veils of ignorance. All its desires are made fine; it learns from poetry, from example and the love of those about it to lose its solicitude for itself in love; its sexual passions are turned against its selfishness, its curiosity flowers into scientific passion, its combativeness is set to fight disorder, its inherent pride and ambition are directed toward an honorable share in the common achievement. It goes to the work that attracts it and chooses what it will do.

If the individual is indolent there is no great loss, there is plenty for all in Utopia, but then it will find no lovers nor will it ever bear children, because no one in Utopia loves with those who have neither energy nor distinction. There is much pride of the mate in Utopian love. And there is no idle rich "society" in Utopia, nor games and shows for the mere looker-on. It is a pleasant world indeed for holidays but not for those who would continuously do nothing.

For centuries now Utopian science has been able to discriminate among births and nearly every Utopian alive would have ranked as an energetic creative spirit in former days. There are few dull and no really defective people in Utopia; the idle strains, the people of lethargic dispositions or weak imaginations, have mostly died out; the melancholic type has taken its dismissal and gone; spiteful and malignant characters are disappearing. The vast majority of Utopians are active, sanguine, inventive, receptive and good-tempered.

"And you have not even a parliament?" asked Mr. Burleigh, still incredulous.

UTOPIA has no parliament, no politics, no private wealth, no business competition, no police or prisons, no lunatics, no defectives or cripples, and it has none of these things because it has schools and teachers who are all that schools and teachers can be. Politics, trade and competition are the methods of adjustment of a crude society. Such methods of adjustment have been laid aside in Utopia for more than a thousand years. There is no rule or government needed by adult Utopians because all the rule and government they need they have had in childhood and youth.

Said Lion: "Our education is our government."

At times during that memorable afternoon and evening it seemed to Mr. Barnstaple that he was involved in nothing more remarkable than an extraordinary dialogue about government and history, a dialogue that had in some inexplicable way become spectacular; it was as if all this was happening only in his mind, and then the absolute reality of his adventure would return to him with overwhelming power and his intellectual interest fade to inattention in the astounding strangeness of his position. In these latter phases he would find his gaze wandering from face to face of the Utopians who surrounded him.

Not one of these Utopian faces but was as candid, earnest and beautiful as the angelic faces of an Italian painting. One woman was strangely like Michael Angelo's Delphic Sibyl. They sat in easy attitudes, men and women together for the most part concentrated on the discussion, but every now and then Mr. Barnstaple would meet the direct scrutiny of a pair of friendly eyes or find some Utopian face intent upon the costume of Lady Stella or the eyeglass of Mr. Mush.

The effect of these people upon Mr. Barnstaple was mingled stupefaction with familiarity in the strangest way. He had a feeling that he had always known that such a race could exist and that this knowledge had supplied the implicit standard of a thousand judgments upon human affairs, and at the same time he was astonished to the pitch of incredulity to find himself in the same world with them.

And together with a strong desire to become friendly and intimate with these fine and gracious persons, to give himself to them and to associate them with himself by service and reciprocal acts, there was an awe and fear of them that made him shrink from contact with them and quiver at their touch. He wanted to bow down before them. Beneath all the light and loveliness of things about him lurked the intolerable premonition of his ultimate rejection from this new world.

So great was the impression made by the Utopians upon Mr. Barnstaple, so entirely did he yield himself up to his joyful acceptance of their grace and physical splendor that for a time he had no attention left over to note how different to his own were the reactions of several of his Earthling companions. The aloofness of the Utopians from the queerness, grotesqueness and cruelty of normal earthly life, made him ready for the most uncritical approval of their institutions and ways.

IT WAS the behavior of Father Amerton which first awakened him to the fact that it was possible to disapprove of these wonderful people very highly and to display a very considerable hostility to them. At first Father Amerton had kept a round-faced, round-eyed wonder above his round collar; he had shown a disposition to give the lead to anyone who chose to take it and he had said not a word until the naked beauty of dead Greenlake had surprised him into unclerical appreciation.

But during the journey to the lakeside and the meal and the opening arrangements of the conference there was a reaction, and this first naive and deferential astonishment gave place to an attitude of resistance and hostility. It was as if this new world which had begun by being a spectacle had taken on the quality of a proposition which he felt he had either to accept or confute. Perhaps it was that the habit of mind of a public censor was too strong for him and that he could not feel normal again until he began to condemn. Perhaps he was really shocked and distressed by the virtual nudity of these lovely bodies about him. But he began presently to make queer grunts and coughs, to mutter to himself, and to betray an increasing incapacity to keep still.

He broke out first into an interruption when the question of population was raised. For a little while his intelligence prevailed over this emotional stir when the prophet of the wheel was discussed, but then his gathering preoccupations once more resumed their sway.

"I must speak out," Mr. Barnstaple heard him mutter. "I must speak out."

NOW, SUDDENLY, he began to ask questions. "There are some things I want to have clear," he said. "I want to know what moral state this so-called Utopia is in. Excuse me!"

He got up. He stood with restless hands, unable for a moment to begin. Then he went to the end of the row of seats and placed himself so that his hands could rest on the back of a seat. He passed his fingers through his hair and he seemed to be inhaling deeply. An unwonted animation came into his face which reddened and began to shine. A horrible suspicion crossed the mind of Mr. Barnstaple that so it was he must stand when he began those weekly sermons of his, those fearless denunciations of almost

Statement of the Ownership, Management, etc., required by the act of Congress of August 24, 1912; of Hearst's International, published monthly at New York, N. Y., for October 1, 1922, State of New York, County of New York, ss. Before me, a Notary Public in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared R. H. Waldo, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the Business Manager of the Hearst's International and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management, etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of August 24, 1912, embodied in section 443, Postal Laws and Regulations, to wit:

1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor, managing editor, and business manager are: Publisher, International Magazine Company, 119 West 40th St., New York, N. Y.; Editor, Norman Hapgood, 119 West 40th St., New York, N. Y.; Managing Editor, Wm. C. Lengel, 119 West 40th St., New York, N. Y.; Business Manager, R. H. Waldo, 119 West 40th St., New York, N. Y.

2. That the owners are: International Magazine Co., 119 West 40th St., New York, N. Y. Stockholders: Star Holding Corporation, 119 West 40th St., New York, N. Y. (W. R. Hearst, 137 Riverside Drive, New York, N. Y., sole stockholder).

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are: None.

4. That the two paragraphs next above, giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company but also, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, is given; and also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than as so stated by him.

Richard H. Waldo, business manager. Sworn to and subscribed before me this 29th day of September, 1922. K. J. Moore, Notary Public, New York County, New York Co. Clerk's No. 343, New York Co. Register's No. 3144. (My commission expires March 30, 1923.) (SEAL.)

everything, in the church of Saint Barnabas in the West. The suspicion deepened to a still more horrible certainty.

"Friends, Brothers of this new world—I have certain things to say to you that I cannot delay saying. I want to ask you some soul-searching questions. I want to deal plainly with you about some plain and simple but very fundamental matters. I want to put things to you frankly and as man to man, not being mealy-mouthed about urgent if delicate things. Let me come without parley to what I have to say. I want to ask you if, in this so-called state of Utopia, you still have and honor the most sacred thing in social life: Do you still respect the marriage bond?"

He paused and in the pause the Utopian reply came through to Mr. Barnstaple: "In Utopia there are no bonds."

But Father Amerton was not asking questions with any desire for answers; he was asking questions pulpit fashion.

"I want to know," he was booming out, "if that holy union revealed to our first parents in the Garden of Eden holds good here, if that sanctified lifelong association of one man and one woman, in good fortune and ill fortune, excluding every other sort of intimacy, is the rule of your lives. I want to know—"

"But he doesn't want to know," came a Utopian intervention.

"—if that shielded and guarded dual purity—"

Mr. Burleigh raised a long white hand. "Father Amerton," he protested, "please."

THE HAND of Mr. Burleigh was a potent hand that might still wave toward preferment. Few things under heaven could stop Father Amerton when he was once launched upon one of his soul storms, but the hand of Mr. Burleigh was among such things.

"—has followed another still more precious gift and been cast aside here and utterly rejected of men? What is it, Mr. Burleigh?"

"I wish you would not press this matter further just at present, Father Amerton. Until we have learned a little more. Institutions are, manifestly, very different here. Even the institution of marriage may be different in this Utopian world."

The preacher's face lowered. "Mr. Burleigh," he said, "I must. If my suspicions are right, I want to strip this world forthwith of its hectic pretense of a sort of health and virtue."

"Not much stripping required," said Mr. Burleigh's chauffeur, in a very audible aside.

A certain testiness became evident in Mr. Burleigh's voice.

"Then ask questions," he said. "Ask questions. Don't orate, please. They don't want us to orate."

"I've asked my question," said Father Amerton, sulkily, with a rhetorical glare at Urthred, and remained standing.

The answer came clear and explicit. In Utopia there was no compulsion for men and women to go about in indissoluble pairs. For most Utopians that would be inconvenient. Very often men and women, where work brought them closely together, were lovers and kept very much together, as Arden and Greenlake had done. But they were not obliged to do that.

There had not always been this freedom.

In the old crowded days of conflict and especially among the agricultural workers and employed people of Utopia, men and women who had been lovers were bound together under severe penalties for life. They lived together in a small home which the woman kept in order for the man, she was his servant and bore him as many children as possible, while he got food for them. The children were desired because they were soon helpful on the land or as wage earners. But the necessities that had subjugated women to that sort of pairing had passed away.

People paired indeed with their chosen mates but they did so by an inner necessity and not by any outward compulsion.

FATHER AMERTON had listened with ill-concealed impatience. Now he jumped in with, "Then I was right, and you have abolished the family?" His finger pointed at Urthred made it almost a personal accusation.

No. Utopia had not abolished the family. It had enlarged and glorified the family until it embraced the whole world. Long ago that prophet of the wheel, whom Father Amerton seemed to respect, had preached that very enlargement of the ancient narrowness of home. They had told him while he preached that his mother and his brethren stood without and claimed his attention. But he would not go to them. He had turned to the crowd that listened to his words, "Behold my mother and my brethren!"

Father Amerton slapped the seat-back in front of him loudly and startlingly. "A quibble," he cried, "a quibble! Satan too can quote the scriptures."

It was clear to Mr. Barnstaple that Father Amerton was not in complete control of himself. He was frightened by what he was doing and yet impelled to do it. He was too excited to think clearly or control his voice properly so that he shouted and boomed in the wildest way. He was "letting himself go" and trusting to the habits of the pulpit of Saint Barnabas to bring him through.

"I perceive now how you stand. Only too well do I perceive how you stand. From the outset I guessed how things were with you. I waited—I waited to be perfectly sure, before I bore my testimony. But it speaks for itself—the shamelessness of your costume, the licentious freedom of your manners! Young men and women, smiling, joining hands, near to caressing, when averted eyes, yes, averted eyes are the least tribute you could pay to modesty! And this vile talk—of lovers loving—without bonds or blessings, without rules or restraint. What does it mean? Whither does it lead? Do not imagine because I am a priest, a man pure and virginal, in spite of great temptations, do not imagine that I do not understand! Have I no vision of the secret places of the heart? Do not the wounded sinners, the broken potsherds creep to me with their pitiful confessions? And I will tell you plainly whither you go and how you stand. This so-called freedom of yours is nothing but license. Your so-called Utopia, I see plainly, is nothing but a hell of unbridled indulgence! Unbridled indulgence!"

Mr. Burleigh held up a protesting hand but Father Amerton's eloquence soared over the obstruction.

He beat upon the back of the seat before him. "I will bear my witness," he shouted. "I will bear my witness. I will make no bones about it. I refuse to mince matters I tell you. You are all living—in promiscuity! That is the word for it. In animal promiscuity! In bestial promiscuity."

Mr. Burleigh had sprung to his feet. He was holding up his two hands and motioning the London Boanerges to sit down. "No, no," he cried. "You must stop, Mr. Amerton. Really, you must stop. You are being insulting. You do not understand. Sit down please. I insist."

"Sit down and hold your peace," said a clear voice. "Or you will be taken away."

SOMETHING made Father Amerton aware of a still figure at his elbow. He met the eyes of a lithe young man who was scrutinizing his build as a portrait painter might scrutinize a new sitter. There was no threat in his bearing, he stood quite still, and yet his appearance threw an extraordinary quality of evanescence about Father Amerton. The great preacher's voice died in his throat.

Mr. Burleigh's bland voice was lifted to avert a conflict. "Mr. Serpentine, Sir, I appeal to you and apologize. He is not fully responsible. We others regret the interruption—the incident. I pray you please do not take him away, whatever taking away may mean. I will answer personally for his good behavior. . . . Do sit down, Mr. Amerton, please; now; or I shall wash my hands of the whole business."

Father Amerton hesitated.

"My time will come," he said and looked the young man in the eyes for a moment, and then went back to his seat.

Urthred spoke quietly and clearly. "You Earthlings are difficult guests to entertain. This is not all. . . . Manifestly this man's mind is very unclean. His sexual imagination is evidently inflamed and diseased. He is angry and conscious to insult and wound. And his noises are terrific. Tomorrow he must be examined and dealt with."

"How?" said Father Amerton, his round face suddenly gray. "How do you mean—dealt with?"

"Please do not talk," said Mr. Burleigh. "Please do not talk any more."

For the time the incident seemed at an end but it had left a queer little twinge of fear in Mr. Barnstaple's heart. These Utopians were very gentle mannered and gracious people, indeed, but just for a moment the hand of power had seemed to hover over the Earthling party.

And then Mr. Barnstaple in the midst of his distress met the brown eyes of Lychnis, and they were kinder than the eyes of the other Utopians. She, at least, understood the fear that had come to him, he felt, and she was willing to reassure him and be his friend. Mr. Barnstaple looked at her, feeling for the moment much as a stray dog might who approaches a doubtfully amiable group and gets a kind greeting.

[To be continued]

The Utopians are angered by Father Amerton's outburst against their lack of morals. How will this affect their attitude toward the Earthlings who are at their mercy? See Hearst's International for January, ready December 20th.

The Dollar

The daily actions of most of us are influenced by the messages received over the telephone, and yet few of us stop to think of the men and women, and the mechanisms, which help to make that daily service possible.

Maintenance, repairs, and the work of handling calls, must constantly be carried on in good times or in bad, and they must be paid for, in order that your telephone service may be continued.

The average dollar will buy to-day less than two-thirds of what it would buy before the war. This means that it costs, on the average, half as much again to buy most of the things that are necessary for keeping the country going; but the advance in telephone rates is far less than this average.

In fact, gauged by the present purchasing power of the dollar, telephone service in the country as a whole is costing the subscriber less than it did in 1914.

The Bell System generally has been able to meet higher commodity prices and increased wages by means of new economies in operation and the increased efficiency of loyal employees.

Eugene Meyer, Jr. and the Farm Bloc

"We must modify foreign banking conceptions to conform to the normal processes involved in the production and distribution of our big basic commodities in America. Our finance should be Americanized."

Here is the heart of the farm finance policy which the experience of the War Finance Corporation—in Mr. Meyer's view of it—has suggested. It is that the lending of money should remain private—not public—but that the system for the lending of money should be expanded to become as convenient and as advantageous for the farmer as it now is for the manufacturer or the merchant.

In harmony with this view a definite date has been set on which the War Finance Corporation will cease active operations. It is July 1, 1923.

In harmony again with this view a bill has been prepared—called the McFadden Bill—for encouraging the expansion of private finance in the marketing of agricultural commodities.

Mr. Meyer's policy is the encouragement of private finance to new useful duties and to new profitable opportunities—under public scrutiny.

There are two alternatives to this policy. The first is to do nothing. The results of doing nothing have already been experienced once. They were experienced year before last and last year. They were very unpleasant for many banks.

They were unpleasant in two ways. First, these banks were accused of not lending enough money to farmers. They had to bear that obloquy. Second, they were almost insolvent through having lent more money to farmers than the farmers could repay. The irony in this situation did not diminish its painfulness.

THROUGHOUT great agricultural districts in this country the bankers could not collect from the farmers and therefore could not pay off the Federal Reserve banks from which they in turn had borrowed. They were in hot water politically and in "frozen credits" financially.

But why was it that they could not collect from the farmers? The explanation advanced by Mr. Meyer is as follows:

"The collapse in the banking situation in the agricultural districts was partly due to an attempt to collect loans on farm commodities in too short a period. Wheat was forced to market in the shortest time in the history of the country. It was forced onto the market in abnormally large quantities. What was the result? The farmer did not get a good price; he could not pay off his bank; and the bank could not pay off the Federal Reserve system."

It may be that some bankers want some more of that kind of thing. It can be safely said that the representatives of the Western and Southern farmers at Washington do not want any more of it and are determined to prevent more of it.

This second alternative is the outright entrance of the United States Government into the marketing—and into the financing of the marketing—of agricultural products as a real, permanent proposition.

The War Finance Corporation has financed the marketing of agricultural products temporarily. It has not itself bought and sold those products at any time. It has not itself been a marketing institution. It has endeavored to foster private coöperative marketing institutions. It has furnished help to banks which would foster those institutions. But it has refrained from three things:

It has refrained from trying to make itself permanent.

It has refrained from going into the actual physical handling of agricultural commodities.

It has refrained from going into the direct lending of money to individual farmers.

Its argument against those things may be summed up thus:

THEY would create a centralization of power at Washington—and a distribution of jobs throughout the country—which would be an intolerably bad industrial machine and an intolerably good political machine.

But this argument is not convincing in all quarters in Washington. Many political persons of much influence—and of undoubted devotion to the public welfare—did their best last year to put the War Finance Corporation into the business of direct buying and selling of commodities and into the business of direct loaning to individuals.

The conflict will be between public encouragement of new farm marketing finance and public outright participation in it. The McFadden Bill is at present the accepted expression of the public encouragement side of this conflict.

The McFadden Bill does three things. It makes it easier for small banks in small towns to join the Federal Reserve system. It makes it possible for a farmer's note based on staple non-perishable agricultural commodities properly warehoused to run in the Federal Reserve system for a period up to nine months. It establishes a new system of financial regional institutions for the developing of private loans on live-stock.

"This industry, however," says Mr. Meyer, "has never been properly financed. It involves a turnover of two, or three, or three-and-a-half, years. There is no 'home' today for live-stock paper of that duration. A lot of it is in the banks—where it does not belong; and a lot of it has been financed through certain loan companies, but many of these companies are busy taking care of their troubles."

The War Finance Corporation was obliged to loan more money to live-stock men than to any other one specified class of agricultural producers. The McFadden Bill sets up a live-stock financing system which it is hoped will make it unnecessary for the Government to come to the rescue of the live-stock industry with public money in the next crisis. It is hoped that under this new system the live-stock industry will be able to survive the next crisis on private money.

This new system makes use of the existing Federal Farm Loan Board. It commands the Federal Farm Loan Board to divide the United States into "live-stock districts."

In each of these districts it sets up a Federal Live Stock Finance Corporation. It assumes that in each district there are—and will be—private live-stock loan companies. These companies make loans to farmers on the security of live-stock. They also contribute to the capitalization of the Federal Live Stock Finance Corporations. They take the notes of the farmers and re-discount them at the offices of the Federal Live Stock Finance Corporations.

Such is the project in the McFadden Bill. It grows directly out of the experience of the War Finance Corporation. It grows out of experience with the facts which have produced the "Farm Bloc" in the Senate and in the House of the Congress of the United States.

GENTLEMEN like Mr. Secretary Weeks rebuke the "Farm Bloc" for existing. They say that it indicates a class spirit. There is never a class spirit except because of a class grievance. These gentlemen would be helping to abate the spirit which they deplore if they would help to abate the grievance which they neglect.

Farm people in many millions now know precisely what their class grievance is. They know that during this last crisis they suffered enormous needless misery from poor and bad facilities of marketing and of credit. They know that larger and better facilities of marketing and of credit are enjoyed by the manufacturer and the merchant. They are demanding that they be equalized with the manufacturer and the merchant; and the total meaning of the "Farm Bloc" is that they are demanding it irrespective of party.

Their political viciousness was expounded by the farmer who said that after all he would rather be Democratic than dead.

A major part of their grievance was expounded by Mr. Meyer in the words:

"We have tried to force agriculture to adjust itself to the needs of our banking practices."

A major part of the remedy in prospect was expressed by Mr. Meyer in the words:

"We must adjust our banking practices to the needs of agriculture, which is our basic industry."

Mr. Meyer and Mr. McFadden—in the McFadden Bill—have laid down a certain line toward that adjustment. Whatever line is adopted, Mr. Meyer has given the problem its classic statement to date. We have made our banking practices to fit our subordinate industries. We now have to make them also to fit our basic industry.

He grew a hundred-year walnut tree in a decade. His name is Luther Burbank, the Wizard of Santa Rosa. See his article—"What Plants Taught Me About Men," in Hearst's International for January.

Her Own Life

about the house and the garden. She felt that the girl might break down and weep, might throw herself into her arms and confess, and she knew that she must prevent that at all hazards for the girl's own sake, at least for the present. She and Gordon, on the other hand, would have to face it out. It was too intolerable, Gordon's make-believe. She would not protect his self-esteem, not another day. For once, she resolved, Gordon should get straight down on the level with other human beings and see himself as they would see him. The sooner the better.

She let the girl leave late in the afternoon, realizing how embarrassing it might be for her to encounter Gordon.

"You've been so kind to me!" the girl exclaimed. "May I—may I kiss you?"

"Of course!" Lilla laughed, a little embarrassed at this temperamental expression, and she patted Valerie's white cheek.

"Don't hate me—I couldn't help it."

"I don't hate you in the least," Lilla said hurriedly. "I'm awfully sorry for you, my dear, and I want you to come here whenever you will, and let me help you all I can. Now don't cry and excite yourself. . . . You can take the electric and it will get you to Evanston in a few minutes. I'll walk to the carline with you."

"I don't live in Evanston," Valerie said. "I thought you said—"

"I—I live with a friend in an apartment in Ravenswood," the girl gulped out.

"Oh," said Lilla softly. "Then you had better take the railroad."

SHORTLY after Valerie Libowski had gone, Gordon appeared. Lilla said nothing about the visitor during supper. She did not know how far her talk with Gordon might go, and she preferred to have David definitely out of the way before they began. After David had gone to bed, Gordon remarked with elaborate indifference:

"Miss Libowski went home, I suppose?"

"Yes, Valerie went just before you came—but not to Evanston."

Gordon looked up from the magazine he held in his hand. It was a long look of inquiry.

"She's a high strung girl, but very able."

"Most girls might be upset under similar circumstances," Lilla observed placidly.

"What do you intend to imply, Lilla?"

"Don't be a fool, Gordon," Lilla went on. "At any rate don't treat me like one."

"Miss Libowski is a very valuable aid to me. I could hardly get along without her, especially just now," he blustered on.

"Yes, I know! And I don't in the least care how much or what kind of help she is able to give you, Gordon. Not in the least! You must realize that, don't you?"

Gordon's glance lowered and he began to pace back and forth in the little room, as if he were trying to regain the mastery.

"I am not thinking of myself, Gordon—or of you—or of your career," Lilla continued imperturbably. "Queerly enough as it may seem to you I am just thinking of the girl herself. And you ought to have more consideration for her."

"Did Miss Libowski complain to you?"

"Of course not! How could she? . . . It doesn't alter the fact. . . . Why don't you marry her, Gordon?"

Gordon James for once did not find the right word near his lips and kept silent.

"I'll give you a divorce any way you like, and you can marry Valerie Libowski and get all her help and sympathy. It will be fairer for the girl, a great deal fairer. Of course I shall keep David."

"I don't want a divorce."

"It will cause far less scandal than this thing will if it ever gets out, Gordon."

"I do not want a divorce," Gordon said.

DOES THAT mean you don't really care for Valerie?" she demanded. "If you loved her, you would jump at the chance."

"That's my affair!" he said glumly.

"Rather mine too now, isn't it, as well as Valerie's? Suppose I demand a divorce?"

"You couldn't do that!"

"You mean," she said slowly, trying to follow the involutions of his mind, "I haven't got the necessary evidence?"

"I do not admit any relations with Miss Libowski," Gordon said defiantly.

"How helpless you are," Lilla sighed.

"I do not believe in divorce."

"You mean that you are afraid it might hurt your career. . . . Well, you had better take care not to rouse talk in your office about your relation with your assistant."

There for a time the situation rested, most unsatisfactorily for everybody, as Lilla felt. She was irritated with her failure to make Gordon "act on the level" in this matter. "If he would only say he cared for the girl, or that he just wanted her, or anything except pretend, pretend, and try to keep the surface smooth—as he always does and always will do!"

Lilla's contempt for her husband was deepened by the incident. For the time it passed into the background. Gordon was away from home more and more as the summer waned and the time for making up the political slate drew near. He was encountering unexpected opposition in certain quarters and seemed worried and nervous. When Lilla asked for Valerie Libowski, Gordon mumbled something vague about her having been away on a vacation, as if he wished Lilla to conclude that this episode had passed out of his life.

Lilla working through the hot summer days in her little garden, weeding and cultivating and spraying and carrying water, pondered much the nature of man and of Gordon James, and the state of modern marriage. She wondered at her own passivity. "Why do I do this?" she asked herself often. "Why do I stay here housekeeping in the home of this stranger instead of beginning a life for myself?"

Then the trouble came. A weak, sallow youth with several large pimples on his face came out into the garden one day and asked, "Are you Mrs. Gordon James?"

"I am."

"Well, The Mirror sent me out here to find out what you think of this story about your husband and some stenographer in his office." Lilla straightened and frowned, trying to think quickly what to say. "You know about it I suppose?"

"I know nothing about it," Lilla said. "Perhaps you don't want to know?" the sallow-faced boy sneered.

"I said I didn't know anything about this," Lilla blazed. "If you wish to talk to me you better mind your manners."

The reporter took another tack.

"They say you're friendly with Miss Libowski. The neighbors say you've had her out here."

"Certainly."

"Then there isn't anything in this?"

"Nothing at all," Lilla said steadily.

"Well," the youth smiled broadly. "I'll say you are a good sport all right. . . ."

When Gordon hurried up the street an hour later, Lilla met him at the door with a question on her lips, which was interrupted by his nervous volubility.

"This is a terrible catastrophe . . . the work of some enemy no doubt . . . a spy in the office . . . political spite, etc., etc."

"Gordon!" Lilla almost shouted. "Will you stop thinking about yourself for one minute and tell me where she is!"

"Miss Libowski? Don't know."

"When did you leave her?"

"I haven't seen her since yesterday."

She gave him one withering look and turned to get her hat.

"Where are you going?" he asked.

"After her," Lilla snapped. "What's that address, not the Evanston one?"

"I will go," he parried.

"You had better stay here and explain your story to the newspaper men. . . ."

ARMED finally with several addresses, Lilla set forth. The girl had been alone nearly twenty-four hours, facing this terrible plight. As the car wheels pounded on the track and the long suburban train stopped and started slothfully, Lilla's anxious mind raced with unaccustomed swiftness toward all the possibilities of tragedy. Gordon had never even thought of the girl, since he had read the newspaper article and realized his own situation! . . .

In the stuffy little tenement on the South Side of Chicago where Valerie's parents lived with a married daughter, Lilla found no trace of the missing girl, no more than at the flat in Ravenswood to which she had first hurried. The relatives, apparently, were still ignorant of the scandal. Probably could not read English, Lilla reflected, as she took a cross town car to the address of a sister, who worked in a department store. The sister, however, had read the newspaper article and though she professed to be ignorant of Valerie's whereabouts, she was sullen and hostile.

On the corner, she waited, baffled. Where now? The sister had given her the address of a friend, with whom Valerie had lived when she was teaching school. It was a long way out on the Northwest Side and it was already late. However, she must not let any possibility go unsearched. Suddenly on her way into the city, Lilla had an inspiration and changed her direction.

She returned to the little Ravenswood flat. Instead of ringing the bell, she climbed the outer stairs in the rear and cautiously tried the rear door. It was locked. A window opened just beyond the staging and Lilla swinging herself out and holding to the rail with one hand pushed with the free hand on the window. It yielded, and gradually she was able to work it up a few inches. A sickish odor escaped. Lilla worked faster, and when she judged she had moved the window up far enough to admit her body she swung herself to the ledge and wiggled through the opening. Inside it was dark, and the atmosphere was heavy with gas.

THE GIRL lay face down on the floor where apparently she had rolled from the box lounge on which she had thrown herself at full length to die. Luckily she had fallen with her face near the door, which was no tighter than most Chicago flat doors and had permitted the entrance of much fresh air. Lilla quietly unbolted the door and carried the unconscious girl onto the rear porch.

In another half hour Valerie was lying on the couch, trying to explain, and interrupting herself with sobs, while Lilla bathed her face and calmed her. From the girl's broken words she got a vivid picture of the awful day she had spent in the silent flat, waiting for Gordon's footsteps, terrified at every sound, cringing when the bell rang for fear that somehow her retreat had been discovered. As dark came on and Gordon did not appear, she had taken her resolve.

"I knew it would be better for him if I was dead," she sobbed.

Valerie protested feebly when Lilla proposed taking her at once to the Wilmette house.

"I can't," she moaned. "Let me stay here. . . . I won't try it again. . . . Besides I haven't any more money."

"Nonsense," Lilla said. "It's the only thing to do. . . . It will be better for him, too," she suggested. Then the girl made no further objection.

Thanks to Lilla's prompt tactics, no further newspaper notoriety came from the affair.

"They hadn't anything to go on," Gordon declared with a slight bluster. "They would only have made themselves liable for libel suits."

"And you would have sued The Mirror?" Lilla demanded ironically. "They had the truth to go on, if they had cared enough to run it down."

"It was all a political scheme to prevent my nomination," Gordon fumed.

If that had been the animus of the business it succeeded, for it was the end of Gordon's candidacy. The managers decided that they could do better without his name on their ballot. Gordon was very much downcast, and inclined to consider himself abused by fate. What was worse, he developed an impatience toward Valerie that was painful to observe, while he almost fawned upon his wife.

"I must get her a place as soon as I can," he said. "She can't stay here."

"She isn't strong enough to teach this autumn," Lilla protested. "You aren't thinking of having her return to the office?"

"No, she can't go back there after all that has passed."

ESTABLISHED 1897

INCORPORATED 1904

"I've written Gertrude Reiben to see if she will invite her up to her Michigan place for a couple of weeks. She needs to get to some place where she isn't known, where she can think things out and find her balance."

"Yes, that is a good idea," Gordon agreed indifferently.

"It's really been hardest upon her," Lilla suggested.

"You have been mighty fine about it, Lilla," Gordon said.

"Thanks!"

"I've been an awful fool."

"Don't do it again," Lilla counseled. "I might not take it the same way another time," and when Gordon began to protest, she added coldly, "I guess I mean, don't expect me to shield you from the consequences of your acts. Another time you'll have to stand up and take 'em."

Their conversation was interrupted by Valerie's appearance. She was a pathetic figure in the household, pitifully wistful for some recognition from Gordon, who avoided her and always addressed her with elaborate formality. Since the defeat of his hopes, he had been almost brutal to the girl, and Lilla knew that Valerie wept often blaming herself for all that had happened,—which was quite just according to Gordon's own point of view. Finally one Sunday, Lilla packed them both off in the motor for a ride.

Gordon and Valerie returned rather sooner than she had expected. Gordon was glum and magisterial, and Valerie looked as if she had been crying.

What brutes men were!

That week Valerie Libowski left to visit the Reibens and soon Lilla's life took a new slant.

AFTER CHRISTMAS, Lilla went to California to be with her mother. Mrs. Vance had been ill, and Aunt Myra wrote that she missed her daughter and wanted to see her. "I don't believe you can realize how much she cares for you," Aunt Myra wrote with a note of gentle reproach. No, Lilla thought, she had never felt that her mother loved her.

When David's holidays were over with their small festivities, Lilla set forth on the long journey. The route crossed Wyoming not far from those uplands where her youth had been passed.

She spent six weeks at the little southern California hotel where the two elderly women had established themselves. After the first gush of warmth and color, in such vivid contrast to the drab city from which she came, Lilla did not care for the much-praised health resort.

One day her mother remarked unexpectedly, "Lambert Wells has been here, staying at the Excelsor with his family. They called on me. He asked after you, Lilla."

"Did he?" Lilla said indifferently. "How is he?"

"He's grown quite stout, wears a beard now. I believe he has been very successful with his father's mining property. There were two little girls, nice children."

Lilla let the gossip drop, but her mother resumed.

"I always felt that you might have cared for Lambert," she said.

Lilla reflected a while before replying, her memory going back to those summer days at Pitcher's Landing, which had seemed to her so tragic.

"No," she said. "I don't think so!"

And yet this man Lambert Wells had shaken her life and given it a twist. Now he was a name, a figure, with his wife and two little girls. Mrs. Vance gave her daughter a curious look. As if there were some suppressed connection of thought she observed.

"I hope things are going better with you and Gordon."

"Just as usual," Lilla replied.

She could not tell her mother about Valerie Libowski. She would not understand. So there must be silence in this as in so many things between them to the end.

"It's just marriage."

Her mother moved uneasily. "I hoped as time went on it might get better—your marriage might mean more to you."

Lilla slowly shook her head.

It was as it had always been. They were at complete cross-purposes in their understanding of life. The "fault" which Gordon had committed with Valerie Libowski seemed to Lilla the most forgivable of his faults and to her mother the least forgivable. But she shut her lips tightly: her mother should die, without knowing how great the failure of her daughter's marriage had been, the marriage which her own ideal had created and approved.

"Whatever you do," the old woman resumed, as if she must free her mind finally, "don't think of divorce! That ruins so many lives these days."

"Does it?" Lilla objected. "I think it is one of the cleanest ways of settling muddles."

"It settles nothing!" Mrs. Vance exclaimed harshly. "Nothing—and it's bad on children."

"Let me get you a shawl," Lilla interrupted, hurrying into the hotel.

"Lilla," her mother said, "you aren't thinking of getting a divorce?"

"I have thought about it sometimes," Lilla admitted honestly. "But Gordon doesn't want one. He thinks it might hurt his career—though that can't matter so much now that he is out of politics."

"I didn't know it was so bad as that."

"It isn't so very bad," Lilla laughed. "You mustn't worry . . . It isn't worth while . . . I suppose four-fifths of married people consider divorce at one time or another, but they don't all do it!"

"There—there isn't anyone else?" her mother asked fearfully.

Lilla shook her head. "Not yet!"

AFTER HER mother's death, Lilla returned to Chicago. On the journey, she went over the talks she had had with her mother and especially this talk about divorce. Why not? Now that her mother was no longer to be considered—and Gordon was starting a new career, why would it not be a good plan to put an end to the mistake of her marriage, to begin over? The idea teased her mind all the way back to Chicago. She had decided nothing when she arrived. Perhaps, she reflected, that in itself was a decision.

Gordon and David met her at the station and accompanied her back home. Gordon was very attentive. A special dinner had been prepared and there were flowers in the house. It was cold and the garden was covered deep in snow. Lilla, looking out over the white ground and down the street to the blue slab of open lake water, felt glad to be back. It was the familiar, the tried, and as much hers as anything had been. David's delight in getting her back warmed her heart. "Lee has been invalided home," Gordon told her.

"So he never got to France?"

"No . . . Pneumonia. It must have been serious. They wrote from a hospital in England to his firm—he'd given that address."

Lilla thought of his disappointment with a pang.

"Poor Lee! . . . We must find out where they are sending him."

AFTER DINNER, Gordon talked of his new business in a cheerful vein. He had made advantageous arrangements with the firm with which Lee Smith had been connected.

"After all," he said, "it looks as if my getting out of politics was the best thing that ever happened to me. There's much more opportunity in business, if the war ever ends—and we are doing pretty well as it is. It was time to make a change, and I am glad I did it."

Already Lilla saw he had created for himself a favorable version of his disaster and probably believed it sincerely. She listened equably to the details of his new business and its prospects which he expansively gave her.

"Where is Valerie?" she asked irrelevantly.

"She got a position in the Des Moines schools, I believe," Gordon said.

So that was over! Lilla made no comment. She gathered up some things and prepared to go to her room. Gordon followed her upstairs and for the first time in many months entered the room standing a little awkwardly, his hands clasped behind him.

"Lilla!" She felt the tremulousness in his voice and wondered what was coming. "Lilla," he began again, clearing his throat. "I've been thinking of many things since you have been in California!" She waited. "I've always loved you, Lilla. You know that! You're the only woman I ever really cared for. Don't you know that?" He came toward her uncertainly and tried to put an arm about her shoulders. Lilla laughed. He dropped his arm and went on more directly. "It isn't right, the way we have been living."

"What's the matter with it?"

"You know as well as I do! . . . If we had been living together, I should never have gotten into that—unfortunate relation."

Oh, what cowards men are, Lilla thought contemptuously.

"Did you tell Valerie that when you made love to her?"

"Valerie didn't mean anything to me, really. You know it. You were fine to her and me. I shall always honor and respect you more for the way you acted."

"Thanks!" She made a mock courtesy.

"But you are my wife! You are the mother of my son! We have been married almost fourteen years."

"Fifteen next June."

"I want this separation to end, now."

He came toward her more aggressively as if he would carry his point with impetuosity. She let him take her in his arms and kiss her. Then suddenly she brushed him aside, saying, "Gordon, sit down!"

She pointed to a chair. He sat down bewildered and confused.

"You have done most of the talking in our married life. I want you to listen to me now."

"All right."

"You want me—you want to live with me that way as before?"

He nodded.

"Then you've got to win me . . . and this isn't the best way to go about it."

"What do you mean?"

"You had your chance—years ago, a good one too, and you lost it. You didn't care enough about me to keep it!"

"I don't understand. . . . I've always loved you . . . more than any other woman. . . . You can always make me want you."

I SUPPOSE that is true . . . but you can't make me want you. . . . That is the point. . . . If you had been willing to give me all the children I wanted, I probably shouldn't have thought much about the rest—and let you have what you wanted. . . . But you wouldn't do that! We needn't go over what happened! You didn't want children, and now you will never have them from me, nor will any other man," she added with a touch of bitterness.

"Can't you forgive?"

"I suppose I have forgiven you, or I shouldn't be here now in the same room with you. . . . At least, I see how you couldn't help yourself, and I suppose that amounts to forgiveness."

Gordon crossed the room two or three times, trying to determine upon a course of action. "Of course, you know what this sort of thing leads to," he said at last warningly.

"Valeries? . . . I've never objected, have I? . . . Only if I were you, Gordon, I'd think sometimes a little bit about the Valeries. They are human too."

"That's my affair," he said sulkily.

"Very true! . . . And I want you to know in all honesty, that if ever a man did—make me want to love him, I might yield to the temptation."

Gordon's look of consternation made Lilla laugh. "And your marriage—and David!"

"Did you think of them with Valerie? Piffle, Gordon. Piffle!"

"I don't think you quite realize, Lilla, what you are saying," he said solemnly.

"Perhaps not. I think I do, but I am very tired and want to go to bed. Good night. Close the door, Gordon, please."

Lilla did not sleep. She lay awake long hours, crying softly to herself. She did not know why.

[To be Concluded]

Lilla, by the force of the spirit that has guided her life, is driven to break for freedom. In her new strife she meets hardships, but reaches at last a goal—and rest. See Hearst's International for January, ready December 20th.

carelessness of serious harm even to the lives of the public. By a persistent publicity campaign Sherman has forced the indiscriminate use of vaccines on many doctors, and in so doing has risen to wealth and importance. His advertising is copious and quite clever enough to fool those doctors who are not possessed of a critical faculty. His first task is to assure them that his hand-me-down vaccines are just as good or even superior to the more scientific made-to-order ones. His second is to convince them with a constant repetition of half-baked evidence that a countless variety of diseases is benefited or cured by the injection of his preparations. He cleverly avoids telling of cases where vaccines have failed to work, and reports hundreds of cases where people have got well after treatment with vaccines. Apparently he knows that doctors will not remember the important fact that the patient might have got well anyway. Here is an example of the way he tells doctors to convince themselves of the value of the Sherman vaccines. We quote from his advertising literature:

"A GOOD WAY FOR A DOCTOR TO CONVINCE HIMSELF OF THE CURATIVE VALUE OF THESE VACCINES IS TO USE THEM ON HIMSELF IN AN ACUTE INFECTION . . . COMMONLY KNOWN AS A BAD COLD."

No intelligent person would accept such evidence. It is just about as valuable as the evidence of the man who believes he has broken his cold by a dose of Cascara Bromide Quinine and a hot toddy.

IN LARGE and well conducted hospitals where treatment is carefully controlled, vaccines are seldom used to cure diseases. Sherman does not mention this, and his "clinical evidence" of the value of vaccines consists largely in case reports from obscure physicians in equally obscure small towns. He sends broadcast to doctors great lists of cases of people with infected thumbs or with jaundice, with epilepsy or toothache or a pain in the arm, who get better after a shot of vaccine of an appropriate number.

The advertisement by this man is a good example of the discrepancies between the statements of Sherman and the facts. According to this, Sherman's vaccines are dependable in destroying the disease germs in asthma, tuberculosis, mastoiditis, psoriasis, whooping cough, rheumatic fever and many other afflictions. Now the fact is that the causes of asthma, psoriasis and rheumatic fever are not known. The statement that his vaccine will destroy the germs in mastoid disease lacks proof. What is more it is a dangerous remark, because it may lead doctors to try to cure this serious disease with vaccine, when in reality only a surgical operation might save the patient's life.

Sherman displays genius, rather than industry in his so-called scientific writings in periodicals like the "Illinois Medical Journal." The great majority of the journals of the state medical societies are very careful of the kind of advertising they accept. But this one, in addition to accepting Sherman's direct advertising, actually publishes "scientific" treatises by him. These articles do not hint that he is a vaccine vendor but appear to be disinterested reports of medical progress by a scientist of some standing. They are really veiled advertisements, and are devoted mainly to the laudation of the curative power of vaccines in general. A good example of this clever publicity method is furnished by an article signed by Sherman in the Illinois Medical Journal, 1920. The essay is called "Vaccines in Toxic Conditions."

It undertakes to convince doctors that they should not hesitate to inject vaccines even into patients who are very gravely ill, and who show every evidence of being already severely poisoned by the germs that are causing their affliction.

THIS fantastic and dangerous counsel has been admirably summed in an editorial in the Journal of the American Medical Association, denouncing such advice:

1. A germ that is poisonous in the patient's body becomes non-poisonous in some mysterious way when Dr. Sherman prepares a vaccine from it!

2. A germ which fails to produce immunity in the body of the patient it attacks will readily produce immunity when the doctor shoots it into him in the form of a vaccine!

3. When a patient's body is already overloaded with microbes and their poisons, the oftener and the more one injects of these same poisons, the better the result!

In a preceding paragraph we spoke of the Sherman list of different diseases. Each one is supposed to succumb to a vaccine of an appropriate number. Such an idiotic list can mean only one thing to many doctors. They are invited to substitute random guessing for careful attempts to find out the cause of the diseases they treat. They are asked to turn from the path of conservative diagnosis and careful treatment to the rose strewn highway of a foolish guessing game and an absurd juggling with numbers.

You will want to know how the doctor in small towns or the country can avoid being fooled by such misleading advertisements. In reality he is not helpless before this avalanche of buncombe. The American Medical Association, to which nearly all good doctors belong, publishes accurate books which give physicians a reliable guide in their journeys through the jungles created by advertisers. These books are compiled by the Association's Council on Pharmacy and Chemistry. This is a disinterested body of scientists and doctors, the very cream of American medicine. These men work unselfishly without pay to inform doctors in regard to the remedies that are wheat and those that are chaff. Sherman's list mentions ninety-eight diseases in which vaccines are beneficial or curative. The books for the doctors' guidance mention, and then in a guarded manner, only five or six! So the practitioner really cannot plead ignorance. He has but to get these books and study them carefully, and he will be able to toss the vast majority of the advertisements into his waste basket.

Ten years ago, shortly after the "discovery" of phylacogen, Parke, Davis & Co. indulged in an unheard of advertising campaign. The very highest authorities, among them Professor Victor C. Vaughan, have repeatedly warned physicians against indiscriminate use of vaccines and phylacogens. Vaughan, speaking of the poisons contained in the bodies of bacteria and their products, says: "This poison is present in all the so-called vaccines now so largely used and it is not strange that death occasionally follows the use of phylacogen or similar preparations."

While distinguished scientists like Vaughan would themselves hesitate to use the phylacogens, believing or rather knowing them to be dangerous, Parke, Davis & Co. go out of their way to assure doctors that they are not harmful. This in spite of the fact that alarming and profound effects follow the injection of them.

In 1913, Dr. Franklin C. McLean, then a good, now a really distinguished physician, reported the death of a man who had been given phylacogen. The man was a husky laborer who had been troubled with rheumatism. He was getting better under ordinary treatment, but he was in a hurry to get out of the hospital. The doctors asked him if he was willing to take a chance on some disagreeable effects that might follow if they were to give him phylacogen. He told them to go ahead, that he would take the chance. The doctors, who were skilful and careful, made a thorough examination of the man, and found his heart and other organs to be in excellent condition. Then they injected the phylacogen into his veins. In an hour he suffered a severe chill. His pulse became shallow. His heart beat very rapid. He soon became delirious, and never recovered consciousness. In eight days he was dead.

THAT WAS nine years ago. This year Dr. Isidor Kross, a scientist writing in the Journal of Medical Research, tells of a death which he says can only be attributed to phylacogen. And adds, "In an oral communication from Dr. F. C. Wood, the writer was informed of two other fatalities, one in a case of pneumonia, and the other in a case of typhoid fever. In both instances, death followed shortly after the intravenous injection of the phylacogen and the autopsy revealed nothing to account for the outcome except the shock caused by the treatment."

Parke, Davis & Co. do not boom phylacogens as they used to. But they still sell them. In 1919, when everyone feared illness and death from the influenza, doctors were clutching at every straw in their efforts to combat this dreaded affliction. They tried all kinds of vaccines sold to them by many different vendors. Despite great claims careful analysis by competent men has failed to show that they did any good. At this time Parke, Davis & Co. circularized doctors stating that "Pneumonia phylacogen has been found to be a dependable means of preventing and treating pneumonia complications of influenza." As the Journal of the American Medical Association says:

"There is no scientific evidence to show that they (phylacogens) possess any specific prophylactic virtue. To recommend their use in patients with influenza. . . is unwarranted, and the physician who acts on the advice of the manufacturer must assume the responsibility for the results. In case of mishap he cannot fall back on the manufacturer; he will find no scientific evidence to support him."

RECENTLY a new kind of treatment of infectious diseases has arisen with a great hue and cry. It is called "non-specific protein therapy." We shall try to explain what this means in a later article. The rise of this fad has given a new lease of life to phylacogens, and they will probably again be used very widely. It is for doctors to beware, and handle this dangerous "remedy" carefully.

Are Parke, Davis & Co. to be held responsible for these deaths, and for others that possibly may have occurred?

We believe not. They were surely careless in advocating such a widespread use of their product without enough trial of its possible evil effects. But they doubtless sincerely believed in its merits. What they can be criticized for is their persistence in selling the product after it was known to be dangerous. And for saying nothing about the evil effects. And for not withdrawing their first wild intimations that it was a cure-all.

As the highest authorities like to insist, it is really the doctor who is responsible. The American Medical Association has widely published the danger of the ignorant use of vaccines and phylacogens. If doctors in general would read these publications and seek for expert advice before listening to one-sided advertisements, the sale of such things would amount to nothing. Consequently the mongers would be forced to drop their production because of lack of profits. But many doctors refuse to listen to the warnings and advice of men who are in a position to know, and who really have the welfare of both the public and the doctors at heart. If the profession does not wash its own dirty linen, the disagreeable duty will have to be done by others. That is the principal purpose of this series. If doctors insist on being fooled, some power will have to arise that will make it harder for them to be fooled. If they continue to follow the siren voices of drug-mongers, and use nostrums that may actually endanger lives, some method must be devised to keep such tools out of their hands. The many doctors who shoot their patients indiscriminately with their products do so out of ignorance and commercialism. After all, the only value they know to exist for the injection is the five dollars a dose that they will get on the first of the following month.

Cordelia, the Magnificent

Miss Marlowe. That is the big thing!"

"Sure, I understand. But, Lord, man, offering her thirty thousand. That's quite a piece of change, you know."

"It's just as I told her: she will be worth that or nothing to us."

"I suppose so. But how are you going to get that money back?"

"You let me worry about that. It's going to be easy. The tips she'll hand me, without ever knowing what she's done, about the things that are happening among her rich friends—why, there'll be a fortune in them if we follow them up and use them right."

"But you can't expect to keep a girl like Miss Marlowe in ignorance forever of what she's actually doing. Lord, no. When she takes a tumble to the real game, how are you going to handle her?"

"By that time I figure she won't need any handling. But if she refuses, she will find herself so involved that she will not dare do anything except go ahead."

Kedmore raised a hand. "Say no more. Never tell me what you're up to."

"All right. You needn't worry. And, man, think of the other side: how much we'll make when I've made her what I want her to be!"

ON MONDAY afternoon of the following week, Cordelia, at the wheel of her spirited maroon roadster, a large black suit-case strapped upon its after deck (her trunks had been sent in advance by express) was skimming easily over a Long Island road.

Behind her she had left business affairs settled upon much the basis Mr. Franklin had first outlined to her. There had been many interviews with him in his office. Mrs. Marlowe had been prevailed upon to come to his office and leave with Mr. Franklin her unfortunate securities. She had been greatly impressed by Mr. Franklin on her first visit; and her respect had grown a hundred-fold when three days later he announced to her that she had been the victim of fraudulent practices, and that he had succeeded in getting a settlement out of her brokers and the companies in which she held stock, under the terms of which settlement she was to receive twenty-five hundred dollars monthly.

Cordelia had promptly sent off the ordered note to Jackie Thorndike telling that her mother had been premature in her fears of financial reverses.

Presently the maroon roadster turned through the gateway of Rolling Meadows. Cordelia had a consciousness of long rose arbors in flamboyant bloom, of a sunken garden at one side, of a thick pine wood as background to the entire picture, with the Sound on one side glistening in the distance. Then she halted her car at the steps from which Gladys had been eagerly waving to her.

"I'm so glad you were able to come after all!" Gladys cried; and after Cordelia had lightly sprung from the car, Gladys threw her arms around Cordelia.

A man in evening clothes came rapidly and noiselessly down the broad steps of the terrace and crossed to the car and began with quick practiced hands to unstrap Cordelia's bag.

Bag in hand, the butler turned to Gladys. "What time shall I serve dinner, Miss Norworth?"

"You can be ready in half an hour, Cordelia?" asked Gladys. Cordelia nodded. "Dinner at eight, Mitchell."

"I'll show you your room. Your trunks are already there. Wear anything you like; dinner's going to be very informal."

"Aren't you going to let me meet your step-sister now?"

"Esther is helping with François."

"François? Who is he?"

"Our child. Esther's and mine. The French war orphan we adopted."

"OH, YES—in the excitement of getting here I'd forgotten about your war orphan."

"He had a little indigestion this afternoon, and didn't want to go to sleep. Esther offered to help his governess quiet him, so I might be free to meet you."

By this time they had crossed a big hall, mounted a wide stairway, and had come to a door which Gladys opened. "These will be your rooms, Cordie. Annie here will take care of you."

At eight o'clock Cordelia entered the dining-room, and there met Gladys's step-sister, Esther Stevens. Cordelia tried to make swift appraisal of this new member of the household, as she had tried to appraise Mitchell. Esther Stevens was the direct antithesis of the colorfully handsome, imperious Gladys. She was twenty-eight or twenty-nine; pleasant of face and of manner, though no radiant beauty.

A little incident happened at the end of the dinner that gave Cordelia a glimpse of the flawless versatility of Mitchell. He had served the ice and they were in the midst of it, when a childish voice sounded from the main doorway:

"Mother Esther, can't I have some ice-cream?"

Cordelia turned. There in pajamas and bare feet stood a handsome, yellow-haired boy of four, sturdy and manly, blinking sleep-heavy but bright eyes at them. Esther and Gladys were out of their chairs the same moment, but Gladys chanced to have sat the closer to him, and she seized him sharply by the shoulder.

"You naughty boy, François! Why aren't you asleep?"

"Don't want you, Mother Gladys," declared the boy, trying to pull away from her. "Want Mother Esther."

Esther Stevens was now on her knees beside him, her arms about him.

"I left you asleep with Jeanne watching, François," she said gently. "How did you get down here?"

"I woke up, and I wanted you to tell me another story, Mother Esther."

"Wasn't Jeanne there to tell you another story?"

The boy shook his head. Then he sighted Cordelia and pointed at her.

"Who's that, Mother Esther?"

"You mustn't bother us, François," interrupted Gladys. "You must go right back to bed!"

"He'll go in just a minute, Gladys," said Esther. "Come on, François, and meet your new friend."

Gravely she led him pattering across to Cordelia and gravely went through with the introduction. Gravely the boy held out a hand to Cordelia.

"Are you going to be my mother too?" he demanded.

Cordelia felt a swift inward glow.

"I will if you will let me."

"Can you tell good stories?"

"Perhaps she'll try tomorrow, dear," said Esther, starting to draw him away. "Come upstairs, and Mother Esther will tell François a story now."

But at that instant the non-existent Mitchell materialized on the opposite side of François, holding his other hand.

"Pardon me, Miss Stevens," he said, "but won't you finish your dinner. I'm entirely through here. I'll take him up to the nursery." And to François: "Don't you want Mitchell to tell you a nice story? And let your mothers finish their dinner?"

"Yes—yes, Mitchell," the boy cried eagerly. "You tell the nicest stories."

"Then say good night, Master François."

"Good night, Mother Esther," and he put an arm around her neck and kissed her. "Good night, Mother Gladys; you haven't kissed me good night tonight and you didn't kiss me last night."

He held up his face to Gladys, and the flushed Gladys gave him a quick kiss, with, "Now hurry off to bed with Mitchell."

DINNER over, Esther Stevens went upstairs to see if all was going well with little François. Cordelia took advantage of her departure to say how pleasantly impressed she had been with Gladys's step-sister.

"Yes, Esther is a dear!" agreed Gladys. "A perfect dear!"

Cordelia already knew something of Esther, and the account she now heard was added to by bits of facts and deductions which she picked up during the following days. Gladys's father had died when she was ten. When Gladys was twelve her mother had taken as her second husband Mr. Stevens, a rich and daring western speculator, recently left a widower, who had just come confidently to the East to promote some large mining enterprises.

Four years of trying to outwit Wall Street had resulted in Wall Street collecting to itself every dollar Mr. Stevens had brought as a challenge from the West. A few months thereafter he had collapsed from a bad heart and had died within the hour. Esther had been in California, and there had been no time for her to come to his funeral. He had never touched a penny of the very large fortune of Gladys's mother—which included the fortune left by her father—and on her mother's death, when Gladys was seventeen in school at Harcourt Hall, the fortune had passed on intact to Gladys.

The death of her step-father and later of her mother had left Gladys without a single blood relative; and the three tired and busy trustees, bethinking themselves of the step-sister and desirous of avoiding every responsibility that could be evaded, had written Esther a pleading note presenting the care of Gladys as a charge which would have been Esther's father's had he lived. Time and her father's death had softened Esther's resentment, and out of a sense of duty to her father she had resigned the position as English teacher in a Los Angeles high school to become mother, aunt, older sister, chaperon, what-not, to the seventeen-year-old product of the socially ambitious mother.

IF ESTHER STEVENS had different ideas about a young girl's upbringing, she had entered Gladys's life at too late a period, and with too little authority, to have tried to put those ideas into practice without arousing the defiance of her charge. So she had accepted the situation as she had found it, trying to do her father's duty, and during the first months taking a lot of snubbing that tried her patience; and when, after graduating in 1916, Gladys became captivated with the idea of being a nurse in the very smart hospital of the very chic Countess de Crecy (then in America campaigning for funds and volunteers) Esther had also gone as a nurse and had remained in France with Gladys.

While there she had co-jointly with Gladys legally adopted the infant Francois, whom they had taken from one of the many Paris institutions that the war was constantly overcrowding with orphans.

Gladys had made her work as historian of her step-sister as brief as possible. She was eager to get to her own affairs.

Until almost midnight they discussed plans for the social revolution at Rolling Meadows. Long after she was in bed Cordelia lay thinking about this household which for its own good, so she believed, she had been set to study and to watch.

At length, wearied with self-questioning she fell asleep only to find herself after a time sitting up in bed, suddenly awake, with the sense that she had just heard the sharp cry of a woman. This was followed instantly by her definitely hearing the commanding voice of a man. The words she could not make out.

Obedient an impulse, she got quickly out of bed and into a dressing-gown and slippers. She crossed to the door and cautiously peered forth. The hall was lighted but empty. She stepped through the door, silently closed it, and remained in a moment's indecision as to which direction her search would take her. As she so stood, around a corner toward her came the noiseless Mitchell dressed in the formal clothes he had worn at dinner. Startled, she shrank back against the door, but he showed no surprise as he approached her.

"Is there something I can get for you, Miss Marlowe?" he asked in his even voice.

She had recovered enough to have ready a fib explaining her presence abroad.

Despite all Cordelia's trying to note every look, every inflection of tone, every act of these people, it was not until she had been at Rolling Meadows a week that she gained her first clue to the situation.

Toward eleven o'clock one night she caught a swift questioning look which

COMMERCIAL ART

Taught By Improved Methods

Many art school advertisements tell about the great and ever increasing demand for commercial artists—big pay—equal opportunity for both men and women, etc. Very good! This is all quite true, but you must first be properly taught. Understand? Properly taught! Few top notch artists are good instructors. Very few. By searching through many studios we have found them.

A Master Course Is Offered

Endorsed as the official training school for leading Commercial Art houses, employing hundreds of artists. Correct educational methods applied. A practical educator and a corps of top notch commercial artists, offer students the benefit of 20 to 30 years of high grade experience. Only the best instruction is good enough for you. Students finishing half of this unusual course can secure and hold desirable positions. Course can be made to pay for itself many times while studying. Either class room or home study instruction. Gladys gave Esther, and saw Esther's almost imperceptible nod. Instantly Cordelia's every sense was on the alert. She pretended a yawn, said she was going to get a book from the library with which to read herself to sleep. With the book she ascended the main stairway with the tired manner of one to whom a few pages will be an infallible sleeping potion. Inside her room she dropped the book, slipped outside again, locked her door, and carefully made her way down the hall toward a little-used stairway in the western wing. Fortune favored her, for she gained the porch unobserved.

STANDING in a corner of the porch in the black shadow of thick wisteria, not even feeling the chill that had come with night, Cordelia waited in rigid expectancy, peering in every direction into the gloom-flooded lawn. Minutes throbbed by; a half hour; an hour. Then from the shadows of the house there emerged a vague figure and hurried away to the right, avoiding the path and keeping to the silent lawn. It was a woman's figure; no doubt of it—Gladys.

Cordelia still waited. More minutes passed, then hurrying from the house through the gloom of the lawn Cordelia saw another vague figure. This also was a woman, and indubitably Esther Stevens.

With mounting tensely Cordelia waited for another shadowy figure to cross the lawn. Minutes passed. But no figure traversed the darkness. Then it came to her that the other person or persons might have been waiting over there in the unknown blackness before she had come out upon the veranda. She delayed no longer, but went swiftly down the steps and across the lawn in the direction taken by the other two.

Near the limit of the lawn, and sitting almost in the edge of the pine woods, there stood a playhouse built for Gladys when she was ten years old and used by her for two or three years when in the occasional mood for playing at keeping house. It was really as large as many a comfortable summer cottage.

Cordelia recognized, since she was headed straight for it, that the playhouse was the logical place of meeting. She moved carefully around to its farther side, for she remembered that the windows of the living-room faced toward a little clearing in the pines. There were no lights.

Cautiously, she crept further in and tried to make herself a part of the syringa bush's arching branches. Then a leaping thrill went through her like a current of electricity. She had guessed right!—and luck still was with her! A window was open and through it came lowered voices.

In her excitement she did not catch the first words; but the voice was Gladys's and it was angry, loud. The first words she really heard were in a man's voice.

"Soft pedal your talk a bit, Gladys," said the voice. "You're not using the best sense in the world in crying out like this—and the way you did the other night when you got Miss Marlowe out of bed. I don't mind it so much, but it's not particularly safe for you."

Cordelia almost gasped aloud as she recognized this quiet voice. It had the quality of authority, of assured mastery over those it addressed. It was the voice of Mitchell, the self-effacing, ever-present, soft-toned Mitchell—that perfect butler.

"You don't expect me to take any such talk from you calmly!" exclaimed Gladys.

"You must acquire better control of your nerves, my dear," responded Mitchell in his even voice. "I must say that you have lost a lot in the matter of nerves in the last five years, my dear."

"Will you please stop 'my dearing' me?" cried Gladys in exasperation.

"Anything to please you, Gladys."

"And another thing," the exasperated Gladys went on. "I want you—and so does Esther—to stop making up to Francois."

"Do you, Esther?" Mitchell inquired. If Esther made any reply it did not come to Cordelia's ears.

"Anyhow—what is behind your always trying to make Francois so fond of you?" Gladys demanded.

"I like the boy, and I like to make him happy, as I have told you. Isn't that reason enough?"

"Not reason enough for you!"

"Well, of course there might be other considerations prompting my kindness." His tone was meditative, still pleasant; Cordelia could guess how provoking that pleasant quality was to Gladys. "Who knows, I may be thinking of the desirability of some day kidnapping Francois."

"I wouldn't put it beyond you to try."

AND if I should try, it would make the business very much easier, and less dangerous, now wouldn't it, my dear—beg pardon, Gladys; I forgot I wasn't to call you my dear—much less dangerous, if Francois came along of his own accord because he liked me so much? A neat plan. I rather fancy that plan."

Neither of the two made response.

"Or who knows, perhaps I am thinking of something else. For example, that I am getting ready to claim him as my son."

"You wouldn't dare!" burst from Gladys in a choked voice.

"Yes," said Mitchell, in his soft, meditative tone, "I think I like this plan best. I'll claim Francois as my son."

"See here, you listen to what——" Gladys began hotly, but was interrupted by the equable voice of her butler.

"My dear, if I've got to listen to much more I believe I'll first close the window."

The window came down with a soft thud and Cordelia heard no more.

She recognized that her own immediate problem was to get back to the house unobserved. But the trio within might finish any moment, and start for the house. The safe course for her, if she would avoid all danger of discovery, was to remain where she was until the three had departed. So she stood in the enfolding arms of the syringa bush, palpantly wondering, fearing to breathe waiting until the way was clear for her to make an effective escape.

The Intimate Life of Henry Ford

might pick up something new in a shop where marine engines were built.

That he thereby lost fifty cents a week meant nothing to him as, with the watch job, he could still earn $4.50 a week, whereas his board and lodging cost but $3.50. Henry Ford, with $4.50 a week in his pocket with which to pay $3.50 of expenses, felt in as comfortable circumstances as did Walt Whitman when, having received twenty dollars he wrote to a friend that he now had "plenty of money."

An incident of Henry Ford's boyhood days with the Dry Dock Engine Company was recalled during the World War. When the United States Government asked Mr. Ford to build eagle boats, he sent for Mr. Frank E. Kirby, still the head of the Dry Dock Engine Company, and, in the opinion of Mr. Ford, the greatest shipbuilder in the world.

"Mr. Kirby," said Mr. Ford, "I worked for you a short time when I was a boy. I recall now something that you told me then. You came along one day when I was wheeling a heavy load up a steep gang-plank into a ship. I was having a hard time of it to keep my feet, and you stopped long enough to say, 'Stick in your toe-nails, boy, and you will make it.' Well, I have been sticking in my toe-nails ever since."

Henry Ford worked for the Dry Dock Engine Company two years. Again the call came to him from within to move. The time had come when his lust for learning was not being satisfied, because he had absorbed all that the shops in which he was working had to give. He was only 19 years old, but he felt that he had mastered every part of the machinists' trade that was practiced in the Dry Dock Engine Company's works.

THE LATE Collis P. Huntington, one-time Pacific railway magnate, once said that nobody could track him through life by the quarters he had dropped. It would be quite easy to track Mr. Ford through life by the steam and gasoline engines around which he has worked. Having mastered the trade of making engines, Henry Ford's thirst for experience caused him to seek employment at installing, repairing and instructing others how to run steam engines.

In Detroit at that time was John Cheeney, state agent for the Westinghouse portable steam engines, built at Schenectady, N. Y. From Mr. Cheeney Ford obtained a job as "road expert." The company made little engines ranging from ten to twenty horsepower. Henry Ford's job was to install the engines for farm use, to set them going, and to teach farmers how to operate them. Part of his task was also to answer the calls of farmers whose engines were in need of repairs.

This sort of life exactly suited the stage of development that Henry Ford had then reached. His nature called for plenty of action and his duties gave it to him. He was up in the morning with the sun and away to work. With no thought of the passing time, he was still at work when the sun went down. Henry Ford is fond of all machinery, but it seems as if there were some sort of a subtle bond between him and any kind of an engine—a bond that causes him to like an engine better than any other machine. It sometimes seems as if this bond enables engines to understand him and to cease "cutting capers" when he is around.

AS AN ILLUSTRATION of this uncanny connection between Henry Ford and engines, Mr. Frederick F. Ingram, a Detroit manufacturer, related to me the following incident. Mr. Ingram had installed in his factory a new engine. When the experts had finished their job the engine would not go. They fiddled and fussed, but the engine remained still.

Mr. Ingram was in a predicament. He had paid for power, but could not get it. Then a thought came to him. He had been for some years a member of the Detroit Public Lighting Commission, and during this term of service had come enough into touch with things electrical to know that the Edison company had a very resourceful engineer of whom Alexander Dow, the manager, sometimes boasted a little. Mr. Ingram called up Mr. Dow and asked him if he would send out his engineer to see if he could start the engine.

"In a little while," said Mr. Ingram, "a slim, wiry man came out to my place. He said his name was Ford. I shall never forget the occasion as long as I live. Ford stood around a minute or two while we told him of our troubles with the balky engine. He walked around it once or twice and maybe fussed with it a little. Then he walked up to the throttle, turned on the steam and away it went. I was astounded and asked him what he had done. He replied that he had done nothing. I paid him ten dollars and he went away. It seems funny now, doesn't it, to think that I once paid Henry Ford ten dollars for fixing an engine?"

Henry Ford's job as a "road expert" occupied his time only during the summer; for some reason, nobody bought or had engines installed in the winter. Ford held the job two years, but each winter he went back to his little machine shop on the farm and worked at white heat to invent and build a farm tractor.

NO FARMER had ever told Ford that he wanted a tractor. Gasoline engines were still unknown. But Ford's passion for utility and economy, strong even then, simply could not tolerate a team of horses as a power plant. Horses ate their heads off in winter in order that they might do a few days' work in summer, and were not much good for plowing, anyway.

Such were the views of Henry Ford at the age of twenty; and while nobody on earth encouraged him to go on, he persisted in his efforts to contrive a mechanism that would plow tremendously and eat nothing except when it was at work. Only he did not call the thing upon which he

An Easy Way to Remove Dandruff

If you want plenty of thick, beautiful, glossy, silky hair do by all means get rid of dandruff, for it will starve your hair and ruin it if you don't.

The best way to get rid of dandruff is to dissolve it. To do this just apply a little Liquid Arvon at night before retiring; use enough to moisten the scalp, and rub it in gently with the finger tips.

By morning most, if not all, of your dandruff will be gone, and three or four more applications should completely remove every sign and trace of it.

You will find, too, that all itching of the scalp will stop, and your hair will look and feel a hundred times better. You can get Liquid Arvon at any drug store. A four-ounce bottle is usually all that is needed.

labored a "tractor"—it was to be a "farm locomotive."

Henry Ford's father had an old mowing machine that had outlived its usefulness, and the big cast-iron wheels of this machine were pressed into service. In his little country machine shop Ford managed to make a pattern and cast a cylinder for the steam engine that was to drive the "locomotive." Whoever knows nothing about pattern-making and casting will pass over this statement without much thought. But let any such reader try to make a pattern and cast a cylinder and he will understand more about the difficulties that Henry Ford surmounted when he was twenty years old.

The engine had but one cylinder. The bore was three inches and the stroke three and three-quarter inches. Steam was supplied by an upright, tubular boiler. The fuel was wood.

"I thought this engine would plow a whole farm in a short time," said Mr. Ford, smiling. "As a matter of fact, it ran the tractor about forty feet and stopped. It stopped because of lack of steam. I could not generate steam rapidly enough to keep the engine going when it was at work."

RIGHT HERE came a point in Mr. Ford's life that, if he had been a youth of weaker purpose might have wrecked him. His father gave him forty acres of land. It was a bait to get the young man back to the country. William Ford did not want his son to be a factory worker in a city. It seemed so foolish to the father, when the son might as well enjoy the free, independent life of the farmer.

Henry Ford returned to the country. It may have seemed to his father and to the neighbors that he had turned away from his first love—machinery—to follow in the footsteps of his ancestors. It did not, however, seem so to Henry. He returned to the land, but he did not take up agriculture. The land was mostly wooded. He spent the winters cutting the trees and converting them into lumber. He bought a circular saw-mill and rented a 12-horsepower engine to drive it. Maple, beech, basswood and oak fell before his ax. Lumber came from the mill and was sold. Spring put an end to lumbering. But with the coming of the first spring on the farm, farming did not begin. Instead, Ford obtained employment with the Buckeye Harvester Company, setting up and repairing farm engines.

Three years had passed in this way when Mr. Ford, in 1887, and in the twenty-fourth year of his age, was married to Miss Clara Bryant, who was born and reared in Greenfield township, near Dearborn. Ford sawed lumber and built a house 31 feet square and a story and a half high. Into this house the young couple moved. Mr. Ford at the same time moving his machine shop from his father's farm to his own.

Edsel Bryant Ford, only child of Mr. and Mrs. Ford, was born on November 6, 1893. He was named after one of Henry Ford's seatmates in the old country school.

One Sunday afternoon, in the summer of 1889, Henry Ford began to draw on a sheet of paper his idea of a "mechanical buggy." The piece of paper proved too small and Mrs. Ford brought him a sheet of music, the back of which was blank. On the back of this sheet of music he sketched out the plan of a vehicle that was to propel itself and carry passengers. Twenty years later, Mrs. Ford said she would give almost any sum of money to recover this paper. But it is apparently lost forever.

In his little workshop, near the house that he built on his farm, Mr. Ford began to make his first automobile, though at that time the word "automobile" had not been coined. The age of gasoline had not yet come, so a single-cylinder steam engine was made, two-inch bore and a two-inch stroke. The engine was bolted to the bottom of an ordinary buggy and connected with the rear wheels by means of a belt from the engine to a shaft on which was a sprocket wheel, a chain from which drove the differential gear.

This was simple enough. A Frenchman named Cugnot had done as much in 1769. But what stuck the Frenchman and what was yet to stick Henry Ford was the problem of how to generate steam rapidly enough to keep the engine going. The steam pressure must be high—ranging from two hundred and fifty to four hundred pounds to the square inch—and the generation of steam must be continuous and fast. Mr. Ford tried every kind of a boiler but none would meet the requirements. He was eventually compelled to acknowledge defeat, and his first automobile was abandoned without ever having been started. He had been baffled by what, even in the light of present knowledge, is impossible, which is the generation of sufficient steam to run an automobile by the burning of wood or coal under a boiler.

Mr. Ford, having failed to make his first automobile go, now turned aside to do other things. He went to work for the Detroit Edison Illuminating Company as night fireman and engineer at the Willis Avenue sub-station, working twelve hours a night for thirty-five dollars a month.

THIS is but one of many instances that will be given of the manner in which instinct so often leads Mr. Ford, straight as an arrow travels, to a correct conclusion. If he had continued to wring his brain for ideas after it was dry he could not have made his "mechanical buggy" go and he might have broken his faith in himself and ceased trying to be an inventor.

Before beginning the writing of this book I went to see some of the men with whom Mr. Ford worked when he was an engineer for the Detroit Edison Company. The thing that most impresses one with the amazing suddenness with which Ford has risen to the world's pinnacle of wealth is to realize that the men are still in harness and in full vigor who worked with him when he was poor. Mr. Alexander Dow is still the manager of the Edison Company. After Mr. Dow had talked to me a while about the old days, I asked him if he had hired Mr. Ford and he replied that he had not. I expressed my disappointment and said I wished I might have seen the man who hired the future billionaire.

"Right there is the man who hired him," said Mr. Dow, pointing to a man beside him with whom I had also been talking.

"So you hired Ford," I said, turning to Mr. John R. Wilde, a man in his fifties, who now occupies Ford's old position as chief engineer of the Edison Company.

"Yes," he replied, "I hired Henry. He had been at me for a job for quite a while, but I had nothing to give him until the vacancy came at the Willis Avenue sub-station. I had known him since we both worked in Flower Brothers' Machine Shops. We did not work in the same shop, but we soon became acquainted and were friends. Henry was always a nice fellow. He was quiet and serious sometimes, yet always good-natured. I think the thing that I recall most distinctly about him was that he was always deeply interested in his work. He seemed to be anxious to learn all that he could."

"HENRY has changed less than almost any man I know," said Mr. Dow. "He is older, of course, and his hair is getting gray, but in the main he is much the same as he was when he came to work for us more than thirty years ago."

"Henry used to get 'set' when he was a young man just as he does now," continued Mr. Dow. "I mean he would get his mind running on something and think of it to the exclusion of everything else for a while. We soon realized, after he came with us, that he was a very unusual young man, and brought him down from the Willis Avenue sub-station to the main plant, where he later became chief engineer."

"I recall that in putting in some new boilers we ran into a great pocket of quicksand. The foundations of our engines began to give away. Henry kept those engines running on wedges for six weeks. As the foundations of the engines sank into the quicksand he would drive the wedge in a little more, day by day. He was very ingenious in everything. Long before he left we were paying him the maximum salary for his position, which, as I recall, was $135 a month."

Among the many Ford stories going around Detroit, most of which are wholly untrue and the remainder only partly true, is one to the effect that Alexander Dow has an old diary containing this entry: "Told Henry Ford today that he would have to quit trying to invent a horseless carriage or I would discharge him."

Before I saw Mr. Dow I had asked Mr. Ford about the story and he said there was little to it except that Mr. Dow had asked him to work on an electric instead of a gasoline automobile. Mr. Dow, when questioned about the yarn said:

"ALL THERE is to that story is this: For years I have kept notes about company affairs. Occasionally, I go through them and destroy the older ones. About ten years ago I was sorting them over and came upon the one that is referred to in this story. It seemed funny then and I told some of my friends about it. But the memorandum did not say that I had threatened to discharge Henry. I never thought of such a thing. Henry was too valuable a man to discharge."

"The entry in my note-book merely said that I had had a talk with Henry that day as to what part he cared to play in some big plans that we were about to carry out."

We were planning some big extensions that would have meant a bigger job for Henry. On the other hand, I knew that he was giving a great deal of thought to the gasoline automobile that he was trying to make. Why, he made his first gasoline car right here in our shop on company time and I never objected to it.

"But I knew the extensions we were about to make would so increase his duties as to take all of his time. I simply wanted Henry to know what we were planning so that he could make his plans accordingly. But there was no threat to discharge him nor any time limit set, before which he must decide. The talk was friendly."

What had produced Mr. Dow's state of mind was this: When Ford went to work for the Edison Company, he moved from his Dearborn farm to 58 Bagley Street, Detroit, and brought his workshop tools with him. In a little brick barn back of the house he set up his new shop. Only a few months had passed when something happened that set Ford's mind to going on automobiles again, and thereafter most of his nights were spent in the little brick barn. This was in 1891.

The thing that set Ford's mind to running on automobiles again was the sight of a low-speed gasoline engine that he saw running in a bottling works. He had had his troubles with steam boilers on his farm locomotive and mechanical buggy, and his mind was in condition to receive the message that gasoline was the thing with which to run an automobile.

There was no rest for him after that. He had his work to do for the Edison Company, and did it, which left him none of his days. But far into every night he worked on his new car. Often it was three o'clock in the morning before he left the little brick barn.

MR. FORD'S capacity for work always has been and still is little less than marvelous. He seems never to become tired. He will ride all night and all day in his private railway car until everybody who is traveling with him is thoroughly tired out and then, arriving at Dearborn, a little after noon, jump into an automobile, rush to one of his plants, and put in four or five hours watching the removal of an engine, perhaps, or something else in which he is interested. The word "rush" in connection with Ford's automobile riding is used correctly. In the country he seldom drives under sixty miles an hour and often beats the fast trains. In the outskirts of Detroit, he drives forty miles an hour.

The building of Ford's first gasoline car was perhaps one of the most difficult tasks of his life. It was particularly hard because he had to make everything himself. High-speed gasoline engines were unknown. He had not only to invent but to manufacture as he went along. Whatever was required had to be made with his own hands in his workshop.

As Ford entered upon the second year of his work, the neighbors, all of whom knew he was working every night on a "horseless carriage," began to call him crazy.

How I Won Back My Child's Heart

IF YOU are a mother you know what it means when suddenly there creeps into your heart the fear that your child is growing away from you. How terrifying to feel that this chubby little being is reaching out beyond our love! Day by day I felt my child grow away from me. I saw little signs I felt would lead to things I dreaded in other children—disobedience, wilfulness, selfishness, disrespect, ill-temper and jealousy. But then a happy moment brought the secret that won back my child's heart. I heard from a friend whose children were admired about the Parents Ass'n, an organization of 30,000 parents. My friend said:

"There is now a scientific method in child training, which really shows you how in your home to correct disobedience, wilfulness, untruthfulness, and other dangerous habits which, if not properly remedied, lead to serious consequences. The new method removes the cause—not by punishment or scolding but by confidence and cooperation along lines amazingly easy for any parent instantly to apply. It is also endorsed by leading educators. It covers all ages from cradle to 18 years."

This system, put into an Illustrated Course for busy parents has meant much to me and is producing such remarkable results for thousands of parents all over the world, that I want you to send for the Free Book of the Parents Association, "New Methods in Child Training." It describes this new system and the work of this organization. A letter or a postcard will bring this book to you. Why don't you send for it, without obligation, at once? ## Loyalties this money who did not know you had it.

DE LEVIS—How do you know that he didn't?

CANYNGE—Do you know that he did?

DE LEVIS—I haven't a doubt of it.

CANYNGE—That's enough. Now look here, I have some knowledge of the world. Once an accusation like this passes beyond these walls, no one can foresee the consequences. Captain Dancy is a gallant fellow, with a fine record as a soldier; and only just married. If he's as innocent as—Christ—mud will stick to him unless the real thief is found. In the old days of swords either you or he would not have gone out of this room alive. If you persist in this absurd accusation you will both of you go out of this room dead in the eyes of society: you for bringing it, he for being the object of it.

DE LEVIS—Society! Do you think that I don't know I'm only tolerated for my money? Society can't add insult to injury and have my money as well. That's all. If the notes are restored, I shall keep my mouth shut; if they are not, I shan't. I'm certain I'm right. I ask nothing better than to be confronted with Dancy; but if you prefer it, deal with him in your own way—for the sake of your esprit de corps.

THE MONEY is not discovered nor is the thief brought to justice. The bookmaker had the numbers of two of the notes and these were duly advertised and in time bring results. Meanwhile, De Levis is unable to control his tongue, particularly after the horse which he sold for the stolen notes wins the Cambridgeshire. It was just at that time that, at the London Club, he publicly denounced Captain Dancy. This charge, of course, could not be ignored by the club directors, of whom Lord St. Erth was chairman, and General Canynge, a member. De Levis was summoned into their presence.

DE LEVIS—Well, General Canynge! It's a little too strong, all this.

CANYNGE—It is obvious, Mr. De Levis, that you and Captain Dancy can't both remain members of this Club. We ask for an explanation before requesting one resignation or the other.

ST. ERTH (dryly)—You seem a venomous young man.

DE LEVIS—I'll tell you what seems to me venomous, my lord—chasing a man like a pack of hounds because he isn't your breed.

CANYNGE—You appear to have your breed on the brain, sir. Nobody else does, so far as I know.

DE LEVIS—Suppose I had robbed Dancy, would you chase him out for complaining?

CANYNGE (nodding towards the billiard-room)—Are those fellows still in there, Colford?

COLFORD (a friend of Dancy's)—Yes.

CANYNGE—Then bring Dancy up, will you? But don't say anything to him.

COLFORD (to De Levis)—You may think yourself damned lucky if he doesn't break your neck. (He goes out.)

DE LEVIS—I have a memory, and a sting too. Yes, my lord—since you are good enough to call me venomous. I quite understand—I'm marked for Coventry now, whatever happens. Well, I'll take Dancy with me.

ST. ERTH (Dancy has just entered)—Captain Dancy, a serious accusation has been made against you by this gentleman in the presence of members of the club.

DANCY—What is it?

ST. ERTH—That you robbed him of that money at Winsor's.

DANCY—Indeed! On what grounds is he good enough to say that?

DE LEVIS—You gave me that filly to save yourself her keep; and you've been mad about it ever since; you knew from Google that I had sold her to Kentman and been paid in cash, yet I heard you myself deny that you knew it. You had the next room to me, and you can jump like a cat, as we saw that evening; I found some creepers crushed by a weight on the balcony on that side. When I went to the bath your door was open and when I came back it was shut.

CANYNGE—That's the first we've heard about the door.

DE LEVIS—I remembered it afterwards.

ST. ERTH—Well, Dancy?

DANCY—I'll settle this matter with any weapons when and where he likes.

ST. ERTH—It can't be settled that way—you know very well. You must take it to the courts unless he retracts.

THUS THE matter was put directly to Captain Dancy. There was no opportunity for him to dodge the issue. His friends and his wife joined in urging him to bring action and action was brought. For a time things looked well for him but then one of the numbered notes turned up and it was easily traced to Captain Dancy. The giving of the note was in itself a scandal as it had been turned over to the father of a girl whom Dancy had wronged and wished to quiet with money. Twisden and Graviter were handling Captain Dancy's case, but when the matter of the notes was brought to their attention, the senior member, Mr. Twisden, decided that they could not conscientiously continue the prosecution of De Levis. He left word that Dancy was to see him at his office before the opening of court and at this meeting Twisden broke the news.

DANCY—Winsor came to me yesterday about General Canynge's evidence. Is that what you wanted to speak about?

TWISDEN—No. It isn't that.

DANCY—No?

TWISDEN—I have very serious news for you.

DANCY (wincing and collecting himself)—Oh!

TWISDEN—These two notes. (He uncovers the notes.) After the Court rose yesterday we had a man called Ricardos here. (A pause.) Is there any need for me to say more?

DANCY (unflinchingly)—No. What now?

TWISDEN—Our duty was plain; we could not go on with the case. I have consulted Sir Frederic. He felt—he felt that he must throw up his brief, and he will do that the moment the Court sits. Now I want to talk to you about what you're going to do.

DANCY—That's very good of you.

TWISDEN—We can't tell what the result of this collapse will be. The police have the theft in hand. They may issue a warrant. The money could be refunded, and the costs paid—somehow that can all be managed. But it may not help. In any case, what end is served by your staying in the country. You can't save your honor—that's gone. You can't save your wife's peace of mind. If she sticks to you—do you think she will?

DANCY—Not if she's wise.

TWISDEN—Better go. There's a war in Morocco.

DANCY—Good old Morocco.

TWISDEN—Will you go then at once?

DANCY—I don't know yet.

TWISDEN—You must decide quickly to catch a boat train. Many a man has made good. You're a fine soldier.

DANCY—There are alternatives.

TWISDEN—Now go straight from this office. You've a passport I suppose? You won't need a visé for France and from there you can find means to slip over. We will see what we can do to stop or delay proceedings.

DANCY—It's all damned kind of you, but I must think of my wife. Give me a few minutes.

IN THE end he decides that he cannot leave the country without telling his wife and that is likely to have complications, because one learns that a warrant for his arrest has already been issued, although De Levis flatly says he had nothing to do with the move. It is difficult for Dancy to tell his wife the truth because it involves not only admitting himself a thief, but also revealing his relations with the girl whom he had bought off. However, his wife, Mabel, takes it bravely.

MABEL (putting her hand on Dancy's head which is bowed in her lap)—Yes; oh, yes! I think I've known a long time, really. Only—why? What made you?

DANCY—It was a crazy thing to do; but, damn it, I was only looting a looter. The money was as much mine as his. A decent chap would have offered me half. You didn't see the brute look at me that night at dinner as much as to say: "You blasted fool!" It made me mad. That wasn't a bad jump—twice over. Nothing in the war took quite such nerve. I rather enjoyed that evening.

MABEL—But—money! To keep it!

DANCY—Yes, but I had a debt to pay.

MABEL—To a woman?

DANCY—A debt of honor—it wouldn't wait.

MABEL—It was—it was to a woman. Ronny, don't lie any more.

DANCY (grimly)—Well! I wanted to save your knowing.

MABEL—What has happened, exactly?

DANCY—Sir Frederic chucked up the case. I've seen Twisden; they want me to run for it to Morocco.

MABEL—To the war there?

DANCY—Yes. There's to be a warrant.

MABEL—A prosecution? Prison? Oh, go! Don't wait a minute! Go!

DANCY—This'll be good-by, then!

MABEL (after a moment's struggle)—Oh! No! No! No, no! I'll follow—I'll come out to you there.

DANCY—You mean you will stick to me?

MABEL—Of course I'll stick to you. (The bell rings.) Who's that? (Dancy starts toward the door.) No. Let me. (She looks through the slit in the letter-box. Returns to Dancy.) Through the letter-box I can see— It's police! Oh God!—Ronny! I can't bear it.

DANCY—Heads up, Mab, don't show the brutes.

MABEL—Whatever happens, I'll go on loving you. If it's prison—I'll wait. Do you understand? I don't care what you did—I don't care. I'm just the same. I will be just the same when you come back.

DANCY—That's not in human nature.

MABEL—It is. It's in me.

DANCY—I have crooked up your life.

MABEL—No, no! Kiss me.

DANCY—They'll break the door in. It's no good, we must open. Hold them in check a little. I want a minute or two.

MABEL admits the officers and attempts first to convince them that Dancy is not home. Failing in this, she seeks to cajole the policeman from doing his duty, pleading her love and unhappiness if Dancy is arrested. In the midst of this, Dancy's voice is heard from the bedroom saying, "All right, you can come in now." This is followed immediately by a shot. Then Colcord, his friend and Margaret Orme, who have only just entered, rush into the bedroom, preceded by Mabel. There they find Dancy dead. Mabel faints and is carried onto the stage by Colcord.

COLCORD (holding a note in his hand)—It is addressed to me. (He reads.) "Dear Colcord—This is the only decent thing I can do. It's too damned unfair to her. It's only another jump. A pistol keeps faith. Look after her. Colcord—my love to her and you."

INSPECTOR (reëntering from bedroom)—This is a very serious business, sir.

COLCORD—Yes, Inspector; you've done for my best friend.

INSPECTOR—I, sir? He shot himself.

COLCORD (he points with the letter to Mabel, who is unconscious)—For her sake and his own.

INSPECTOR—I want that letter, sir.

COLCORD—You shall have it read at the inquest. Till then it's addressed to me and I stick to it.

MARGARET (wildly)—Keeps faith! We've all done that. It's not enough.

COLCORD (looking down at Mabel)—All right, old boy!

From the Great White Way to the Great White Spaces

If you feel "hemmed-in" by tall buildings—if hard pavements have grown dull and drab to you—if the city has lost its power to grip you—you will enjoy following Curwood into the romantic land of the great Northwest.

This great author knows the animals of the wilderness more intimately than any other writer. His absorbing tales of their adventurous lives are laid in the range of country where no hunters go.

Pack up your troubles and follow CURWOOD into Adventureland

COME to the great magic land of the Northwest—come where the breath of Romance stirs in the blood of men and women—come to the land of adventure, strange, enchanting, wondrous. Stand under the great open sky—gaze at the wondrous Red Moon and the North Star—hear the cry of the wolf-pack—thrill to the magic of the forests—sit by the soft glow of the camp-fire—come to the top of the world! And feel the spell of the vast white wilderness! You do not have to stir out of your easy chair to do it.

James Oliver Curwood takes you to the North Country, where splendid adventures are always happening—where romance steadily spins her golden web of enchantment. Here is great drama, played by great and fearless men who quicken your red blood and lift you clear of care and worry, carrying you far and happily into Adventureland!

James Oliver Curwood used to sleep with a young grizzly bear, and as a result of this close study his novel "The Grizzly King" is one of the most entrancing and realistic animal stories ever written.

What's Wrong in This Picture?

It's so easy to make embarrassing mistakes in public—so easy to commit blunders that make people misjudge you. Can you find the mistake or mistakes that are being made in this picture? Can you point out what is wrong? If you are not sure, read the interesting article below, and perhaps you will be able to find out.

IT IS a mark of extreme good breeding and culture to be able to do at all times exactly what is correct. This is especially true in public where strangers judge us by what we do and say. The existence of fixed rules of etiquette makes it easy for people to know whether we are making mistakes or whether we are doing the thing that is absolutely correct and cultured. They are quick to judge—and quick to condemn. It depends entirely upon our knowledge of the important little rules of etiquette whether they respect and admire us, or receive an entirely wrong and prejudiced impression.

In public, many little questions of good conduct arise. By public, we mean at the theater, in the street, on the train, in the restaurant and hotel—wherever men and women who are strangers mingle together and judge one another by action and speech. It is not enough to know that one is well-bred. One must see that the strangers one meets every day get no impression to the contrary.

Do you know the little rules of good conduct that divide the cultured from the uncultured, that serve as a barrier to keep the ill-bred out of the circles where they would be awkward and embarrassed? Do you know the important rules of etiquette that men of good society must observe, that women of good society are expected to follow rigidly? Perhaps the following questions will help you find out just how much you know about etiquette.

Etiquette at the Theater

When a man and woman walk down the theater aisle together, should the man precede the woman? May they walk arm-in-arm? When the usher indicates their places, should the woman enter first or the man?

Many puzzling questions of conduct confront the members of a theater party who occupy a box. Which seats should the women take and which the men? Should the women remove their hats—or don't they wear any? What should women wear to the theater in the evening? What should men wear? Is it correct for a man to leave a woman alone during intermission?

At the theater, evidences of good conduct can be more strikingly portrayed than perhaps anywhere else. Here, with people surrounding us on all sides, we are admired as being cultured, well-poised and attractive, or we are looked upon as coarse and ill-bred. It depends entirely upon how well one knows and follows the rules of etiquette.

At the Dance

How should the man ask a woman to dance? What should he say to her when the music ceases and he must return to his original partner? Do you know the correct dancing positions?

Very often introductions must be made in the ball-room. Should a man be introduced to a woman, or a woman to a man? Is it correct to say, Miss Brown, may I present Mr. Smith, or Mr. Smith, may I present Miss Brown? Which of these two forms is correct: Bobby, this is Mrs. Smith, or Mrs. Smith, this is Bobby? When introducing a married woman and a single woman should you say, Mrs. Brown, allow me to present Miss Smith, or Miss Smith, allow me to present Mrs. Brown?

When leaving the ball-room, is the guest expected to thank the hostess? What should the woman guest say when she leaves? What should the gentleman guest say? It is only by knowing exactly what is correct, that one can avoid the embarrassment and humiliation of social blunders, and win the respect and admiration of those with whom one comes in contact.

In the Street

There are countless tests of good manners that distinguish the well-bred in public. For instance, the man must know exactly what is correct when he is walking with a young woman. According to etiquette, is it ever permissible for a man to take a woman's arm? May a woman take a gentleman's arm? When walking with two women, should a man take his place between them or on the outside?

When is it permissible for a man to pay a woman's fare on the street-car or railroad? Who enters the car first, the woman or the man? Who leaves the car first? If a man and woman who have met only once before encounter each other in the street, who should make the first sign of recognition? Is the woman expected to smile and nod before the gentleman raises his hat? On what occasions should the hat be raised?

People of culture can be recognized at once. They know exactly what to do and say on every occasion, and because they know that they are doing absolutely what is correct, they are calm, well-poised, dignified. They are able to mingle with the most highly cultivated people, in the highest social circles, and yet be entirely at ease.

The Book of Etiquette

There have probably been times when you suffered embarrassment because you did not know exactly what to do or say. There have probably been times when you wished you had some definite information regarding certain problems of conduct, when you wondered how you could have avoided a certain blunder.

The Book of Etiquette is recognized as one of the most dependable and reliable authorities on the conduct of good society. It has solved the problems of thousands of men and women. It has shown them how to be well-poised and at ease even among the most brilliant celebrities. It has shown them how to meet embarrassing moments with a calm dignity. It has made it possible for them to do and say and write and wear at all times only what is entirely correct.

In the Book of Etiquette, now published in two large volumes, you will find chapters on dinner etiquette and dance etiquette, chapters on the etiquette of engagements and weddings, chapters on teas and parties and entertainments of all kinds. You will find authoritative information regarding the wording of invitations, visiting cards and all social correspondence. The subject of introductions is covered exhaustively, and the etiquette of travel devolves into an interesting discussion of correct form in France, England and other foreign countries. From cover to cover, each book is filled with interesting and extremely valuable information.

Would You Give $1.97 -to Lose 30 Pounds in 30 Days?

Miss Morse before she used this new, easy, pleasant way to reduce. She weighed 230 pounds.

Miss Morse after losing 80 pounds and regaining new health and vitality through this method.

Loses 80 Pounds— Looks 10 Years Younger

"I weighed 230 pounds. I was continually sick and would have to rest after walking a single block. I had tried many remedies in vain. I finally sent for your books and on reading them I realized that never before had I tried the right method. Today I weigh only 150 pounds—a reduction of 80 pounds. I feel better than I have in many years. People whom I have not seen for some time hardly recognize me. I look younger than I have in 10 years. I am greatly indebted to you for your wonderful and pleasant discovery."

(Signed) Miss Laura Morse.
271 W. 119th St., New York City.

Mrs. Denneny before she used the new method. Weight 240 pounds.

Mrs. Denneny after she used the new method. Weight now 166 pounds and she is still reducing.

Loses 74 Pounds— Feels Like a New Woman

"I weighed 240 pounds when I sent for your course. The first week I lost 10 pounds. My weight is now 166 pounds and I am still reducing. I never felt better in my life than I do now. There is no sign of my former indigestion. And I have a fine complexion now, whereas before I was always bothered with pimples. Formerly I could not walk upstairs without feeling faint. Now I can RUN up. I reduced my bust 7½ inches, my waist 9 inches and my hips 11 inches. I even wear shoes a size smaller. Formerly they were sixes, now they are fives."

(Signed) Mrs. Mary J. Denneny,
82 W. 9th St., Bayonne, N. J.

Reaches Normal Weight in 30 days

"For three years I had weighed 168 pounds. I went to a gymnasium and exercised for a month to reduce weight. At the end of the month I had added four more pounds. Then I heard of and sent for your method. That was my lucky day. I found your instructions easy and your menus delightful. I lost 28 pounds in 30 days—8 pounds the very first week. My general health has been greatly benefited, and I have not had one of my former sick headaches since losing my extra flesh."

E. A. Kettel, prominent in New York newspaper circles, who lost 28 pounds in 30 days.

(Signed) E. A. Kettel,
225 W. 39th St., New York City.

That is all it will cost you. And you lose your excess flesh through a wonderful new discovery which does not require any starving, exercise, massage, drugs or bitter self-denials or discomforts. Sent on 10 DAYS TRIAL to PROVE that you can lose a pound a day.

"I REDUCED from 175 pounds to 153 pounds (his normal weight) in just two weeks (22 pounds lost in 14 days). Before I started I was flabby and sick, had headaches all the time. I feel wonderful now."

Thus writes Mr. Ben Naddle, a New York business man, located at 102 Fulton Street. His experience is similar to that of many others who have used this new, easy and pleasant way to reduce excess flesh. Miss Kathleen Mullane, stage beauty and famous artist's model, whom a well-known artist called "a most perfect example of American womanhood," writes:

"In just three weeks I reduced 20 pounds—just what I wanted to—through your remarkable new way to reduce. And without one bit of discomfort. I think it is perfectly remarkable."

Mr. Clyde Tapp of Poole, Kentucky, who lost 60 pounds by this method in a remarkably short time, writes:

"Thousands of dollars would not represent the value of the knowledge I have gained as to this healthful, pleasant way of losing weight."

And now you have this same opportunity to lose every ounce of your excess flesh and gain a wonderful increase in health; at a cost of only $1.97.

Reduce as Fast or as Slowly as You Wish

The rate at which you lose your surplus flesh is absolutely under your own control. If you do not wish to lose flesh as rapidly as a pound a day, you can regulate this natural law so that your loss of flesh will be more gradual. When you have reached your normal weight you can retain it without gaining or losing another pound.

Taking off excess weight by this new method is the easiest thing imaginable. It is absolutely harmless. Almost like magic it brings slender, graceful, supple figures and the most wonderful benefits in health. Weakness, nervousness, indigestion, shortness of breath, as well as many long-seated organic troubles, are banished. Eyes become brighter, steps more elastic and skins smooth, clear and radiant. Many write that they are positively astounded at losing wrinkles which they had supposed to be ineffaceable!

The Secret Explained

Scientists have always realized that there was some natural law on which the whole system of weight control was based. But to discover this "vital law of food" had always baffled them. It remained for Eugene Christian, the world-famous food specialist, to discover the one safe, certain and easily followed method of regaining normal, healthful weight. He discovered that certain foods when eaten together take off weight instead of adding to it. Certain combination cause fat, others consume fat. For instance, if you eat certain foods at the same meal they are converted into excess fat. But eat these same foods at different times and they will be converted into blood and muscle. Then the excess fat you already have is used up. There is nothing complicated and nothing hard to understand. It is simply a matter of learning how to combine your food properly and this is easily done.

This method even permits you to eat many delicious foods which you may now be denying yourself. For you can arrange your meals so that these delicacies will no longer be fattening.

10-Days Trial—Send No Money

Eugene Christian has incorporated his remarkable secret of weight control into a course called "Weight Control—the Basis of Health." Lessons one and two show how to reduce slowly; the others show how to reduce more rapidly. To make it possible for every one to profit by his discovery he offers to send the complete course on 10 days' trial to any one sending in the coupon.

If you act quickly you can take advantage of a special reduced price offer that is being made for a short time only. All you need do is to mail the coupon—or write a letter or postcard if you prefer—without sending a penny and the course will be sent you at once, IN PLAIN WRAPPER.

When it arrives pay the postman the special price of only $1.97 (plus the few cents postage) and the course is yours. The regular price of the course is $3.50, but $1.97 is all you have to pay while this special offer is in existence. There are no further payments. But if you are not thoroughly pleased after a 10-day test of this method you may return the course and your money will be refunded instantly. (If more convenient you may remit with the coupon, but this is not necessary.)

See how our liberal guarantee protects you. Either you experience in 10 days such a wonderful reduction in weight and such a wonderful gain in health that you wish to continue this simple, easy, delightful method or else you return the course and your money is refunded without question.
